7774	3	4.516331	-0.005	18.58	0.003648145
6716	3	4.517656	-0.005	18.575	0.003647163
753	1	4.521678	0.015	18.59	0.003650108
2393	2	4.521766	-0.00625	18.58375	0.003648881
5295	3	4.522537	-0.005	18.57875	0.003647899
8315	3	4.524174	-0.005	18.57375	0.003646917
2878	2	4.526767	-0.00625	18.5675	0.00364569
747	1	4.527646	-0.0075	18.56	0.003644218
816	1	4.527766	-0.0075	18.5525	0.003642745
9432	4	4.528373	-0.005	18.5475	0.003641763
503	1	4.529472	0.015	18.5625	0.003644708
1783	2	4.531664	-0.00625	18.55625	0.003643481
2477	2	4.53247	-0.00625	18.55	0.003642254
2840	2	4.532641	-0.00625	18.54375	0.003641027
1918	2	4.534044	-0.00625	18.5375	0.0036398
1137	1	4.534894	-0.0075	18.53	0.003638327
543	1	4.539321	-0.0075	18.5225	0.003636855
3882	3	4.539753	-0.005	18.5175	0.003635873
5458	3	4.540252	-0.005	18.5125	0.003634891
1484	1	4.540254	-0.0075	18.505	0.003633418
2195	2	4.541557	-0.00625	18.49875	0.003632191
2809	2	4.542791	-0.00625	18.4925	0.003630964
7418	3	4.542982	-0.005	18.4875	0.003629982
9925	4	4.543531	-0.005	18.4825	0.003629001
5558	3	4.544316	-0.005	18.4775	0.003628019
7747	3	4.545613	-0.005	18.4725	0.003627037
3495	3	4.547846	-0.005	18.4675	0.003626055
4888	3	4.548798	-0.005	18.4625	0.003625074
6313	3	4.549249	-0.005	18.4575	0.003624092
843	1	4.550545	-0.0075	18.45	0.003622619
5001	3	4.552157	-0.005	18.445	0.003621638

8525	3	4.553789	-0.005	18.44	0.003620656
5546	3	4.556322	-0.005	18.435	0.003619674
3724	3	4.556801	-0.005	18.43	0.003618692
458	1	4.557438	-0.0075	18.4225	0.00361722
2879	2	4.560825	-0.00625	18.41625	0.003615993
1833	2	4.561145	-0.00625	18.41	0.003614765
4282	3	4.561458	-0.005	18.405	0.003613784
5043	3	4.561462	-0.005	18.4	0.003612802
5919	3	4.563241	-0.005	18.395	0.00361182
179	1	4.564607	-0.0075	18.3875	0.003610348
910	1	4.564618	-0.0075	18.38	0.003608875
9222	4	4.565849	-0.005	18.375	0.003607893
137	1	4.566894	0.015	18.39	0.003610838
2659	2	4.567226	-0.00625	18.38375	0.003609611
2337	2	4.56843	-0.00625	18.3775	0.003608384
3891	3	4.569037	-0.005	18.3725	0.003607402
2232	2	4.569784	-0.00625	18.36625	0.003606175
5968	3	4.570461	-0.005	18.36125	0.003605193
3688	3	4.571285	-0.005	18.35625	0.003604212
4619	3	4.571557	-0.005	18.35125	0.00360323
536	1	4.572102	-0.0075	18.34375	0.003601757
8087	3	4.579127	0.01	18.35375	0.003603721
5140	3	4.579288	0.01	18.36375	0.003605684
5376	3	4.579754	-0.005	18.35875	0.003604703
2701	2	4.579795	-0.00625	18.3525	0.003603475
7973	3	4.580888	0.01	18.3625	0.003605439
7239	3	4.584376	-0.005	18.3575	0.003604457
4656	3	4.585088	-0.005	18.3525	0.003603475
8550	3	4.585945	-0.005	18.3475	0.003602494
9322	4	4.58654	-0.005	18.3425	0.003601512
1854	2	4.586573	-0.00625	18.33625	0.003600285
7110	3	4.588656	-0.005	18.33125	0.003599303
744	1	4.588835	-0.0075	18.32375	0.00359783
1097	1	4.588969	-0.0075	18.31625	0.003596358
8213	3	4.589511	-0.005	18.31125	0.003595376
1487	1	4.589583	-0.0075	18.30375	0.003593903
1778	2	4.591169	-0.00625	18.2975	0.003592676
2324	2	4.591362	-0.00625	18.29125	0.003591449
2619	2	4.593982	0.0125	18.30375	0.003593903
758	1	4.594848	-0.0075	18.29625	0.003592431
1815	2	4.595431	-0.00625	18.29	0.003591204
6059	3	4.59557	-0.005	18.285	0.003590222
2661	2	4.596092	-0.00625	18.27875	0.003588995
9499	4	4.596145	-0.005	18.27375	0.003588013
6581	3	4.596861	0.01	18.28375	0.003589976
1459	1	4.596936	-0.0075	18.27625	0.003588504
2430	2	4.599207	-0.00625	18.27	0.003587277
3080	3	4.601195	-0.005	18.265	0.003586295
1124	1	4.601343	-0.0075	18.2575	0.003584822
6245	3	4.601517	-0.005	18.2525	0.003583841
1805	2	4.602298	-0.00625	18.24625	0.003582613
3460	3	4.602348	-0.005	18.24125	0.003581632

5287	3	4.603978	-0.005	18.23625	0.00358065
3188	3	4.604324	-0.005	18.23125	0.003579668
2104	2	4.604559	-0.00625	18.225	0.003578441
3260	3	4.604797	-0.005	18.22	0.003577459
2760	2	4.604847	-0.00625	18.21375	0.003576232
2370	2	4.605666	-0.00625	18.2075	0.003575005
8105	3	4.608361	-0.005	18.2025	0.003574023
1138	1	4.609183	-0.0075	18.195	0.003572551
1586	1	4.61013	-0.0075	18.1875	0.003571078
8230	3	4.612232	-0.005	18.1825	0.003570096
9599	4	4.612234	-0.005	18.1775	0.003569114
4650	3	4.618425	-0.005	18.1725	0.003568133
2396	2	4.61916	-0.00625	18.16625	0.003566906
2077	2	4.619992	-0.00625	18.16	0.003565678
711	1	4.620366	-0.0075	18.1525	0.003564206
6663	3	4.621227	-0.005	18.1475	0.003563224
7303	3	4.621725	-0.005	18.1425	0.003562242
6768	3	4.62238	-0.005	18.1375	0.003561261
932	1	4.624427	-0.0075	18.13	0.003559788
920	1	4.624616	-0.0075	18.1225	0.003558315
2096	2	4.625878	-0.00625	18.11625	0.003557088
3049	3	4.626547	-0.005	18.11125	0.003556106
4535	3	4.62809	-0.005	18.10625	0.003555125
3720	3	4.629781	-0.005	18.10125	0.003554143
5440	3	4.629889	-0.005	18.09625	0.003553161
8052	3	4.63024	-0.005	18.09125	0.003552179
4572	3	4.632629	-0.005	18.08625	0.003551198
8883	4	4.635321	-0.005	18.08125	0.003550216
29	1	4.635476	0.015	18.09625	0.003553161
5265	3	4.636792	-0.005	18.09125	0.003552179
1400	1	4.63694	-0.0075	18.08375	0.003550707
2302	2	4.638861	-0.00625	18.0775	0.00354948
1656	1	4.639072	-0.0075	18.07	0.003548007
7374	3	4.639707	-0.005	18.065	0.003547025
1690	1	4.640541	-0.0075	18.0575	0.003545553
2419	2	4.64091	-0.00625	18.05125	0.003544326
5649	3	4.64207	-0.005	18.04625	0.003543344
1077	1	4.642425	-0.0075	18.03875	0.003541871
4635	3	4.642866	-0.005	18.03375	0.003540889
7704	3	4.642896	-0.005	18.02875	0.003539908
2042	2	4.644561	-0.00625	18.0225	0.003538681
29	1	4.64468	-0.0075	18.015	0.003537208
733	1	4.648949	-0.0075	18.0075	0.003535735
1833	2	4.650204	-0.00625	18.00125	0.003534508
2914	3	4.650232	-0.005	17.99625	0.003533526
1200	1	4.651412	0.015	18.01125	0.003536472
5895	3	4.652464	-0.005	18.00625	0.00353549
4465	3	4.653349	-0.005	18.00125	0.003534508
2126	2	4.655208	-0.00625	17.995	0.003533281
3472	3	4.655994	-0.005	17.99	0.003532299
2540	2	4.657185	-0.00625	17.98375	0.003531072
2846	2	4.657224	-0.00625	17.9775	0.003529845

4750	3	4.657809	-0.005	17.9725	0.003528863
1785	2	4.6583	-0.00625	17.96625	0.003527636
1179	1	4.658529	-0.0075	17.95875	0.003526163
215	1	4.659901	-0.0075	17.95125	0.003524691
9487	4	4.660294	-0.005	17.94625	0.003523709
3324	3	4.660757	-0.005	17.94125	0.003522727
6391	3	4.661629	-0.005	17.93625	0.003521746
2904	3	4.663347	-0.005	17.93125	0.003520764
8347	3	4.665229	-0.005	17.92625	0.003519782
4028	3	4.666967	-0.005	17.92125	0.0035188
8002	3	4.668533	-0.005	17.91625	0.003517819
1392	1	4.670107	-0.0075	17.90875	0.003516346
6230	3	4.671105	-0.005	17.90375	0.003515364
7570	3	4.673751	0.01	17.91375	0.003517328
2589	2	4.673831	-0.00625	17.9075	0.003516101
475	1	4.675194	-0.0075	17.9	0.003514628
4668	3	4.675952	-0.005	17.895	0.003513646
8295	3	4.676827	-0.005	17.89	0.003512664
2016	2	4.67703	-0.00625	17.88375	0.003511437
9228	4	4.677143	-0.005	17.87875	0.003510456
5140	3	4.677538	-0.005	17.87375	0.003509474
4562	3	4.678369	-0.005	17.86875	0.003508492
273	1	4.683274	-0.0075	17.86125	0.003507019
1357	1	4.683644	-0.0075	17.85375	0.003505547
1276	1	4.684554	-0.0075	17.84625	0.003504074
706	1	4.684735	0.015	17.86125	0.003507019
5297	3	4.685287	-0.005	17.85625	0.003506038
923	1	4.688331	-0.0075	17.84875	0.003504565
7907	3	4.689727	-0.005	17.84375	0.003503583
6203	3	4.694362	-0.005	17.83875	0.003502602
4589	3	4.697837	-0.005	17.83375	0.00350162
8325	3	4.699395	-0.005	17.82875	0.003500638
6514	3	4.699535	-0.005	17.82375	0.003499656
3127	3	4.70065	0.01	17.83375	0.00350162
5252	3	4.701701	-0.005	17.82875	0.003500638
12	1	4.70653	-0.0075	17.82125	0.003499166
8560	3	4.707062	-0.005	17.81625	0.003498184
8015	3	4.707253	-0.005	17.81125	0.003497202
4125	3	4.708814	-0.005	17.80625	0.00349622
4648	3	4.709014	-0.005	17.80125	0.003495239
72	1	4.709824	-0.0075	17.79375	0.003493766
485	1	4.712149	-0.0075	17.78625	0.003492293
598	1	4.712204	-0.0075	17.77875	0.003490821
8690	3	4.714319	-0.005	17.77375	0.003489839
3098	3	4.717716	-0.005	17.76875	0.003488857
1946	2	4.720286	-0.00625	17.7625	0.00348763
5857	3	4.720594	-0.005	17.7575	0.003486648
8046	3	4.722564	-0.005	17.7525	0.003485667
2715	2	4.723705	0.0125	17.765	0.003488121
6394	3	4.723727	0.01	17.775	0.003490084
2469	2	4.724356	-0.00625	17.76875	0.003488857
2173	2	4.724749	-0.00625	17.7625	0.00348763

5700	3	4.726159	-0.005	17.7575	0.003486648
3918	3	4.726324	-0.005	17.7525	0.003485667
4695	3	4.726856	-0.005	17.7475	0.003484685
7491	3	4.730157	-0.005	17.7425	0.003483703
2968	3	4.732389	-0.005	17.7375	0.003482721
1141	1	4.732711	-0.0075	17.73	0.003481249
2281	2	4.732986	-0.00625	17.72375	0.003480022
881	1	4.733046	-0.0075	17.71625	0.003478549
6669	3	4.733054	-0.005	17.71125	0.003477567
5998	3	4.734811	-0.005	17.70625	0.003476586
1535	1	4.737181	-0.0075	17.69875	0.003475113
8470	3	4.738268	-0.005	17.69375	0.003474131
3158	3	4.738536	-0.005	17.68875	0.003473149
3577	3	4.739094	-0.005	17.68375	0.003472168
6167	3	4.740765	-0.005	17.67875	0.003471186
1594	1	4.742791	-0.0075	17.67125	0.003469713
7136	3	4.743787	-0.005	17.66625	0.003468732
2376	2	4.744733	-0.00625	17.66	0.003467504
6628	3	4.747834	-0.005	17.655	0.003466523
4043	3	4.747877	-0.005	17.65	0.003465541
7667	3	4.747879	-0.005	17.645	0.003464559
2853	2	4.749716	-0.00625	17.63875	0.003463332
1146	1	4.75006	-0.0075	17.63125	0.003461859
40	1	4.750101	-0.0075	17.62375	0.003460387
5172	3	4.751354	-0.005	17.61875	0.003459405
172	1	4.751376	-0.0075	17.61125	0.003457932
4160	3	4.752362	-0.005	17.60625	0.003456951
7968	3	4.752852	-0.005	17.60125	0.003455969
2821	2	4.753054	-0.00625	17.595	0.003454742
1199	1	4.754322	-0.0075	17.5875	0.003453269
7482	3	4.755834	0.01	17.5975	0.003455233
467	1	4.759834	-0.0075	17.59	0.00345376
1400	1	4.759855	-0.0075	17.5825	0.003452287
1370	1	4.760034	-0.0075	17.575	0.003450815
7610	3	4.761375	-0.005	17.57	0.003449833
1097	1	4.763283	-0.0075	17.5625	0.00344836
5610	3	4.764793	-0.005	17.5575	0.003447379
3151	3	4.765271	-0.005	17.5525	0.003446397
8939	4	4.765915	-0.005	17.5475	0.003445415
6160	3	4.767005	-0.005	17.5425	0.003444434
2512	2	4.768599	-0.00625	17.53625	0.003443206
6730	3	4.770806	0.01	17.54625	0.00344517
1010	1	4.771572	-0.0075	17.53875	0.003443697
5681	3	4.77291	-0.005	17.53375	0.003442715
878	1	4.775175	-0.0075	17.52625	0.003441243
2582	2	4.775221	-0.00625	17.52	0.003440016
8285	3	4.77533	-0.005	17.515	0.003439034
506	1	4.77582	-0.0075	17.5075	0.003437561
883	1	4.776995	-0.0075	17.5	0.003436089
6045	3	4.778037	-0.005	17.495	0.003435107
3889	3	4.783483	-0.005	17.49	0.003434125
1305	1	4.786947	-0.0075	17.4825	0.003432653

539	1	4.787324	-0.0075	17.475	0.00343118
1640	1	4.791314	-0.0075	17.4675	0.003429707
7914	3	4.791701	-0.005	17.4625	0.003428726
6531	3	4.791712	-0.005	17.4575	0.003427744
3319	3	4.792513	-0.005	17.4525	0.003426762
7199	3	4.794077	-0.005	17.4475	0.00342578
5713	3	4.794434	-0.005	17.4425	0.003424799
3742	3	4.795611	-0.005	17.4375	0.003423817
5400	3	4.798132	-0.005	17.4325	0.003422835
1333	1	4.803066	0.015	17.4475	0.00342578
9750	4	4.804116	-0.005	17.4425	0.003424799
5586	3	4.805277	-0.005	17.4375	0.003423817
5617	3	4.805294	-0.005	17.4325	0.003422835
4943	3	4.807997	-0.005	17.4275	0.003421854
2717	2	4.808304	-0.00625	17.42125	0.003420626
6235	3	4.809509	-0.005	17.41625	0.003419645
100	1	4.809768	-0.0075	17.40875	0.003418172
1014	1	4.81051	-0.0075	17.40125	0.003416699
378	1	4.810903	-0.0075	17.39375	0.003415227
1176	1	4.811752	-0.0075	17.38625	0.003413754
1940	2	4.814452	-0.00625	17.38	0.003412527
97	1	4.814554	-0.0075	17.3725	0.003411054
815	1	4.815188	-0.0075	17.365	0.003409582
7348	3	4.815475	-0.005	17.36	0.0034086
4893	3	4.816073	-0.005	17.355	0.003407618
4172	3	4.816363	-0.005	17.35	0.003406637
1043	1	4.816999	-0.0075	17.3425	0.003405164
1706	1	4.817194	-0.0075	17.335	0.003403691
978	1	4.817536	-0.0075	17.3275	0.003402219
3923	3	4.818941	-0.005	17.3225	0.003401237
3109	3	4.819378	-0.005	17.3175	0.003400255
2534	2	4.81951	-0.00625	17.31125	0.003399028
2077	2	4.820565	-0.00625	17.305	0.003397801
3413	3	4.822534	-0.005	17.3	0.003396819
963	1	4.824136	-0.0075	17.2925	0.003395347
5475	3	4.825715	-0.005	17.2875	0.003394365
8639	3	4.82707	-0.005	17.2825	0.003393383
1207	1	4.827544	-0.0075	17.275	0.00339191
130	1	4.828588	-0.0075	17.2675	0.003390438
6634	3	4.828622	-0.005	17.2625	0.003389456
8926	4	4.831712	-0.005	17.2575	0.003388474
648	1	4.833521	-0.0075	17.25	0.003387002
1633	1	4.834254	-0.0075	17.2425	0.003385529
706	1	4.834404	-0.0075	17.235	0.003384057
3993	3	4.837047	-0.005	17.23	0.003383075
4911	3	4.837259	-0.005	17.225	0.003382093
946	1	4.838351	-0.0075	17.2175	0.00338062
8639	3	4.841097	-0.005	17.2125	0.003379639
2870	2	4.841517	-0.00625	17.20625	0.003378412
1530	1	4.841929	-0.0075	17.19875	0.003376939
8182	3	4.842454	0.01	17.20875	0.003378902
7817	3	4.842727	-0.005	17.20375	0.003377921

6377	3	4.843418	0.01	17.21375	0.003379884
969	1	4.844184	-0.0075	17.20625	0.003378412
7100	3	4.844213	-0.005	17.20125	0.00337743
3459	3	4.845501	-0.005	17.19625	0.003376448
1482	1	4.846126	-0.0075	17.18875	0.003374975
2915	3	4.84619	-0.005	17.18375	0.003373994
3947	3	4.848042	-0.005	17.17875	0.003373012
2712	2	4.850352	-0.00625	17.1725	0.003371785
3957	3	4.851361	-0.005	17.1675	0.003370803
2719	2	4.855005	-0.00625	17.16125	0.003369576
7784	3	4.855008	-0.005	17.15625	0.003368594
4603	3	4.856042	-0.005	17.15125	0.003367612
6992	3	4.856454	-0.005	17.14625	0.003366631
5863	3	4.857467	0.01	17.15625	0.003368594
3048	3	4.857623	-0.005	17.15125	0.003367612
2461	2	4.858602	-0.00625	17.145	0.003366385
1792	2	4.859618	0.0125	17.1575	0.00336884
2740	2	4.860364	-0.00625	17.15125	0.003367612
3525	3	4.860691	-0.005	17.14625	0.003366631
3029	3	4.860789	-0.005	17.14125	0.003365649
4121	3	4.864387	-0.005	17.13625	0.003364667
6579	3	4.864567	-0.005	17.13125	0.003363685
894	1	4.864946	-0.0075	17.12375	0.003362213
8210	3	4.866131	-0.005	17.11875	0.003361231
29	1	4.866515	-0.0075	17.11125	0.003359758
8421	3	4.868837	-0.005	17.10625	0.003358777
9888	4	4.875791	-0.005	17.10125	0.003357795
8305	3	4.877144	0.01	17.11125	0.003359758
3247	3	4.878377	-0.005	17.10625	0.003358777
7023	3	4.879226	-0.005	17.10125	0.003357795
45	1	4.879536	-0.0075	17.09375	0.003356322
4288	3	4.879721	-0.005	17.08875	0.003355341
6530	3	4.88024	-0.005	17.08375	0.003354359
8161	3	4.881285	-0.005	17.07875	0.003353377
1552	1	4.882767	-0.0075	17.07125	0.003351905
1744	1	4.886123	-0.0075	17.06375	0.003350432
442	1	4.890856	-0.0075	17.05625	0.003348959
513	1	4.894247	-0.0075	17.04875	0.003347487
2966	3	4.894467	-0.005	17.04375	0.003346505
1243	1	4.895542	-0.0075	17.03625	0.003345032
2368	2	4.895735	-0.00625	17.03	0.003343805
8254	3	4.895767	-0.005	17.025	0.003342823
2699	2	4.896701	-0.00625	17.01875	0.003341596
1923	2	4.901278	-0.00625	17.0125	0.003340369
4304	3	4.90202	-0.005	17.0075	0.003339387
7	1	4.903094	-0.0075	17	0.003337915
846	1	4.905652	-0.0075	16.9925	0.003336442
523	1	4.906349	-0.0075	16.985	0.00333497
1613	1	4.906714	-0.0075	16.9775	0.003333497
1442	1	4.906765	-0.0075	16.97	0.003332024
1196	1	4.907179	-0.0075	16.9625	0.003330552
1061	1	4.907429	-0.0075	16.955	0.003329079

7517	3	4.907708	-0.005	16.95	0.003328097
7051	3	4.910277	0.01	16.96	0.003330061
7639	3	4.911626	-0.005	16.955	0.003329079
5943	3	4.911895	-0.005	16.95	0.003328097
1163	1	4.913178	-0.0075	16.9425	0.003326625
2351	2	4.913539	-0.00625	16.93625	0.003325398
1540	1	4.914321	-0.0075	16.92875	0.003323925
5378	3	4.915682	-0.005	16.92375	0.003322943
2113	2	4.918567	-0.00625	16.9175	0.003321716
4406	3	4.919093	-0.005	16.9125	0.003320734
8411	3	4.925205	-0.005	16.9075	0.003319753
3916	3	4.926651	0.01	16.9175	0.003321716
548	1	4.930252	-0.0075	16.91	0.003320243
7765	3	4.931186	-0.005	16.905	0.003319262
790	1	4.931843	0.015	16.92	0.003322207
7349	3	4.932887	-0.005	16.915	0.003321225
142	1	4.933212	-0.0075	16.9075	0.003319753
9500	4	4.934396	-0.005	16.9025	0.003318771
1312	1	4.93628	-0.0075	16.895	0.003317298
5008	3	4.937037	0.01	16.905	0.003319262
2584	2	4.93756	-0.00625	16.89875	0.003318035
1894	2	4.937867	-0.00625	16.8925	0.003316807
621	1	4.938092	-0.0075	16.885	0.003315335
336	1	4.938652	-0.0075	16.8775	0.003313862
6737	3	4.940757	-0.005	16.8725	0.00331288
158	1	4.941116	-0.0075	16.865	0.003311408
790	1	4.942676	-0.0075	16.8575	0.003309935
6847	3	4.944006	-0.005	16.8525	0.003308953
3777	3	4.944608	-0.005	16.8475	0.003307972
3956	3	4.944669	-0.005	16.8425	0.00330699
136	1	4.947571	-0.0075	16.835	0.003305517
6521	3	4.948667	-0.005	16.83	0.003304536
1775	2	4.948803	-0.00625	16.82375	0.003303308
1719	1	4.949083	-0.0075	16.81625	0.003301836
8128	3	4.950465	-0.005	16.81125	0.003300854
2030	2	4.953529	-0.00625	16.805	0.003299627
4938	3	4.953903	-0.005	16.8	0.003298645
5863	3	4.954352	-0.005	16.795	0.003297663
7929	3	4.956186	-0.005	16.79	0.003296682
2381	2	4.957424	-0.00625	16.78375	0.003295455
224	1	4.957799	-0.0075	16.77625	0.003293982
2434	2	4.958348	-0.00625	16.77	0.003292755
2218	2	4.959482	-0.00625	16.76375	0.003291528
7567	3	4.959685	-0.005	16.75875	0.003290546
8206	3	4.960756	-0.005	16.75375	0.003289564
5483	3	4.961434	-0.005	16.74875	0.003288582
1147	1	4.962051	-0.0075	16.74125	0.00328711
1019	1	4.962679	-0.0075	16.73375	0.003285637
7204	3	4.966629	-0.005	16.72875	0.003284655
2409	2	4.967506	-0.00625	16.7225	0.003283428
6298	3	4.969243	-0.005	16.7175	0.003282446
3587	3	4.970629	-0.005	16.7125	0.003281465

5972	3	4.970868	-0.005	16.7075	0.003280483
9182	4	4.971879	-0.005	16.7025	0.003279501
1842	2	4.972846	-0.00625	16.69625	0.003278274
1904	2	4.972965	-0.00625	16.69	0.003277047
6541	3	4.974981	-0.005	16.685	0.003276065
4413	3	4.976276	-0.005	16.68	0.003275083
8323	3	4.976511	-0.005	16.675	0.003274102
893	1	4.982437	-0.0075	16.6675	0.003272629
2489	2	4.982935	-0.00625	16.66125	0.003271402
4878	3	4.982977	-0.005	16.65625	0.00327042
8908	4	4.983587	-0.005	16.65125	0.003269438
3129	3	4.9838	0.01	16.66125	0.003271402
1296	1	4.984338	-0.0075	16.65375	0.003269929
4251	3	4.984579	-0.005	16.64875	0.003268948
1556	1	4.985062	-0.0075	16.64125	0.003267475
2458	2	4.988863	-0.00625	16.635	0.003266248
5674	3	4.990399	-0.005	16.63	0.003265266
7510	3	4.990541	-0.005	16.625	0.003264284
3189	3	4.990728	-0.005	16.62	0.003263303
2553	2	4.991648	-0.00625	16.61375	0.003262075
6139	3	4.992144	-0.005	16.60875	0.003261094
146	1	4.992397	-0.0075	16.60125	0.003259621
7808	3	4.993914	-0.005	16.59625	0.003258639
570	1	4.994124	-0.0075	16.58875	0.003257167
4281	3	4.995237	-0.005	16.58375	0.003256185
1458	1	4.996402	-0.0075	16.57625	0.003254712
157	1	4.996626	-0.0075	16.56875	0.00325324
527	1	4.998978	-0.0075	16.56125	0.003251767
1875	2	4.999267	-0.00625	16.555	0.00325054
7635	3	4.999871	-0.005	16.55	0.003249558
1348	1	5.00275	-0.0075	16.5425	0.003248086
6880	3	5.003341	-0.005	16.5375	0.003247104
5252	3	5.004553	-0.005	16.5325	0.003246122
5836	3	5.007461	-0.005	16.5275	0.00324514
2365	2	5.009608	-0.00625	16.52125	0.003243913
5381	3	5.009973	-0.005	16.51625	0.003242931
1392	1	5.010109	-0.0075	16.50875	0.003241459
3923	3	5.011747	-0.005	16.50375	0.003240477
1514	1	5.013162	-0.0075	16.49625	0.003239005
932	1	5.014707	-0.0075	16.48875	0.003237532
9168	4	5.015378	-0.005	16.48375	0.00323655
2022	2	5.016872	-0.00625	16.4775	0.003235323
503	1	5.019779	-0.0075	16.47	0.00323385
1793	2	5.020334	-0.00625	16.46375	0.003232623
5631	3	5.022524	-0.005	16.45875	0.003231641
6576	3	5.023048	-0.005	16.45375	0.00323066
2083	2	5.024054	-0.00625	16.4475	0.003229433
1015	1	5.028527	-0.0075	16.44	0.00322796
7120	3	5.034935	-0.005	16.435	0.003226978
637	1	5.035011	-0.0075	16.4275	0.003225506
2984	3	5.035711	-0.005	16.4225	0.003224524
6388	3	5.038669	-0.005	16.4175	0.003223542

3980	3	5.03891	-0.005	16.4125	0.00322256
7303	3	5.039185	-0.005	16.4075	0.003221579
1172	1	5.03989	-0.0075	16.4	0.003220106
4852	3	5.040983	-0.005	16.395	0.003219124
4320	3	5.041236	-0.005	16.39	0.003218143
8994	4	5.043133	-0.005	16.385	0.003217161
5094	3	5.044089	-0.005	16.38	0.003216179
2723	2	5.04467	-0.00625	16.37375	0.003214952
4825	3	5.048624	-0.005	16.36875	0.00321397
300	1	5.049247	-0.0075	16.36125	0.003212498
1755	1	5.050856	-0.0075	16.35375	0.003211025
6377	3	5.051286	-0.005	16.34875	0.003210043
436	1	5.052183	-0.0075	16.34125	0.003208571
1926	2	5.053492	-0.00625	16.335	0.003207343
6499	3	5.054035	-0.005	16.33	0.003206362
3495	3	5.054507	-0.005	16.325	0.00320538
2598	2	5.062276	-0.00625	16.31875	0.003204153
2786	2	5.06341	-0.00625	16.3125	0.003202926
2868	2	5.064608	-0.00625	16.30625	0.003201698
8673	3	5.065526	-0.005	16.30125	0.003200717
7064	3	5.068776	-0.005	16.29625	0.003199735
2078	2	5.069628	-0.00625	16.29	0.003198508
6107	3	5.072529	-0.005	16.285	0.003197526
247	1	5.074724	-0.0075	16.2775	0.003196053
9975	4	5.07548	-0.005	16.2725	0.003195072
1556	1	5.078663	-0.0075	16.265	0.003193599
5669	3	5.084996	-0.005	16.26	0.003192617
4561	3	5.086554	-0.005	16.255	0.003191636
3315	3	5.087911	-0.005	16.25	0.003190654
2551	2	5.088745	-0.00625	16.24375	0.003189427
5039	3	5.089026	-0.005	16.23875	0.003188445
8915	4	5.089536	0.01	16.24875	0.003190408
3472	3	5.090919	-0.005	16.24375	0.003189427
3683	3	5.091248	-0.005	16.23875	0.003188445
717	1	5.092457	-0.0075	16.23125	0.003186972
5388	3	5.096223	-0.005	16.22625	0.003185991
2530	2	5.097566	-0.00625	16.22	0.003184763
6893	3	5.100161	-0.005	16.215	0.003183782
8360	3	5.10107	-0.005	16.21	0.0031828
4970	3	5.104592	-0.005	16.205	0.003181818
5525	3	5.105177	-0.005	16.2	0.003180836
5370	3	5.107483	-0.005	16.195	0.003179855
8994	4	5.113156	-0.005	16.19	0.003178873
7570	3	5.113192	-0.005	16.185	0.003177891
792	1	5.113252	-0.0075	16.1775	0.003176419
6763	3	5.116302	-0.005	16.1725	0.003175437
173	1	5.116831	-0.0075	16.165	0.003173964
6340	3	5.117328	-0.005	16.16	0.003172983
43	1	5.12156	-0.0075	16.1525	0.00317151
6335	3	5.122285	-0.005	16.1475	0.003170528
1696	1	5.123148	-0.0075	16.14	0.003169056
2724	2	5.124413	-0.00625	16.13375	0.003167828

2310	2	5.124779	-0.00625	16.1275	0.003166601
5656	3	5.125886	-0.005	16.1225	0.003165619
48	1	5.126095	-0.0075	16.115	0.003164147
2924	3	5.127477	-0.005	16.11	0.003163165
9830	4	5.129142	-0.005	16.105	0.003162183
1128	1	5.130981	-0.0075	16.0975	0.003160711
1755	1	5.13251	-0.0075	16.09	0.003159238
3993	3	5.132739	-0.005	16.085	0.003158256
7468	3	5.132813	-0.005	16.08	0.003157275
2439	2	5.133951	-0.00625	16.07375	0.003156048
7522	3	5.134329	-0.005	16.06875	0.003155066
9846	4	5.135436	-0.005	16.06375	0.003154084
1181	1	5.13578	-0.0075	16.05625	0.003152611
9561	4	5.136346	0.01	16.06625	0.003154575
2480	2	5.136394	-0.00625	16.06	0.003153348
2119	2	5.136826	-0.00625	16.05375	0.003152121
7878	3	5.137158	-0.005	16.04875	0.003151139
557	1	5.137238	-0.0075	16.04125	0.003149666
7829	3	5.138147	-0.005	16.03625	0.003148684
1536	1	5.141354	-0.0075	16.02875	0.003147212
9191	4	5.14542	-0.005	16.02375	0.00314623
825	1	5.146699	-0.0075	16.01625	0.003144758
1236	1	5.146892	-0.0075	16.00875	0.003143285
9481	4	5.146987	-0.005	16.00375	0.003142303
213	1	5.146992	-0.0075	15.99625	0.003140831
1020	1	5.147214	0.015	16.01125	0.003143776
2573	2	5.147369	-0.00625	16.005	0.003142549
4737	3	5.15178	-0.005	16	0.003141567
7729	3	5.152467	-0.005	15.995	0.003140585
1435	1	5.152504	-0.0075	15.9875	0.003139113
1209	1	5.153887	-0.0075	15.98	0.00313764
2015	2	5.154693	-0.00625	15.97375	0.003136413
7826	3	5.157029	-0.005	15.96875	0.003135431
796	1	5.162107	-0.0075	15.96125	0.003133958
7923	3	5.163834	0.01	15.97125	0.003135922
302	1	5.164097	-0.0075	15.96375	0.003134449
1928	2	5.164126	-0.00625	15.9575	0.003133222
2930	3	5.164243	-0.005	15.9525	0.00313224
3536	3	5.165811	-0.005	15.9475	0.003131259
8059	3	5.168234	-0.005	15.9425	0.003130277
722	1	5.168686	-0.0075	15.935	0.003128804
3420	3	5.169772	-0.005	15.93	0.003127823
5454	3	5.169871	-0.005	15.925	0.003126841
4303	3	5.17024	-0.005	15.92	0.003125859
2211	2	5.172222	-0.00625	15.91375	0.003124632
5920	3	5.172647	-0.005	15.90875	0.00312365
966	1	5.172753	-0.0075	15.90125	0.003122177
3023	3	5.175697	-0.005	15.89625	0.003121196
885	1	5.180944	-0.0075	15.88875	0.003119723
589	1	5.183003	-0.0075	15.88125	0.003118251
1564	1	5.186851	-0.0075	15.87375	0.003116778
8553	3	5.186949	-0.005	15.86875	0.003115796

2111	2	5.18812	-0.00625	15.8625	0.003114569
1075	1	5.190175	-0.0075	15.855	0.003113096
2215	2	5.191108	-0.00625	15.84875	0.003111869
5642	3	5.192991	-0.005	15.84375	0.003110887
5194	3	5.193575	-0.005	15.83875	0.003109906
1971	2	5.193834	-0.00625	15.8325	0.003108679
6143	3	5.1963	-0.005	15.8275	0.003107697
4182	3	5.197753	-0.005	15.8225	0.003106715
4592	3	5.200037	-0.005	15.8175	0.003105733
747	1	5.200964	-0.0075	15.81	0.003104261
2343	2	5.201356	-0.00625	15.80375	0.003103034
694	1	5.204862	-0.0075	15.79625	0.003101561
6468	3	5.207472	-0.005	15.79125	0.003100579
1624	1	5.211653	-0.0075	15.78375	0.003099107
1792	2	5.216434	-0.00625	15.7775	0.003097879
517	1	5.217125	-0.0075	15.77	0.003096407
418	1	5.217458	-0.0075	15.7625	0.003094934
7250	3	5.218251	-0.005	15.7575	0.003093952
2317	2	5.218803	-0.00625	15.75125	0.003092725
8401	3	5.219247	-0.005	15.74625	0.003091744
848	1	5.219532	-0.0075	15.73875	0.003090271
8461	3	5.220582	-0.005	15.73375	0.003089289
2606	2	5.222422	-0.00625	15.7275	0.003088062
3454	3	5.222752	-0.005	15.7225	0.00308708
2876	2	5.223986	-0.00625	15.71625	0.003085853
3610	3	5.225798	-0.005	15.71125	0.003084871
71	1	5.226986	-0.0075	15.70375	0.003083399
6403	3	5.227104	-0.005	15.69875	0.003082417
6477	3	5.229027	-0.005	15.69375	0.003081435
1374	1	5.22967	-0.0075	15.68625	0.003079963
4209	3	5.230195	-0.005	15.68125	0.003078981
1693	1	5.231764	-0.0075	15.67375	0.003077508
8883	4	5.233468	-0.005	15.66875	0.003076527
9561	4	5.234178	-0.005	15.66375	0.003075545
1333	1	5.236627	-0.0075	15.65625	0.003074072
8509	3	5.23803	-0.005	15.65125	0.003073091
159	1	5.238299	-0.0075	15.64375	0.003071618
4718	3	5.238881	-0.005	15.63875	0.003070636
681	1	5.239457	-0.0075	15.63125	0.003069164
514	1	5.242045	-0.0075	15.62375	0.003067691
8087	3	5.2434	-0.005	15.61875	0.003066709
2011	2	5.244161	-0.00625	15.6125	0.003065482
2663	2	5.244595	-0.00625	15.60625	0.003064255
1254	1	5.244672	-0.0075	15.59875	0.003062782
1618	1	5.244827	-0.0075	15.59125	0.00306131
5908	3	5.245898	-0.005	15.58625	0.003060328
3162	3	5.245928	-0.005	15.58125	0.003059346
8086	3	5.246643	-0.005	15.57625	0.003058364
440	1	5.250102	-0.0075	15.56875	0.003056892
3168	3	5.250532	-0.005	15.56375	0.00305591
752	1	5.251308	-0.0075	15.55625	0.003054437
1432	1	5.252447	-0.0075	15.54875	0.003052965

7051	3	5.253086	-0.005	15.54375	0.003051983
1537	1	5.254485	-0.0075	15.53625	0.003050511
8463	3	5.257068	-0.005	15.53125	0.003049529
7049	3	5.258533	-0.005	15.52625	0.003048547
1191	1	5.259432	-0.0075	15.51875	0.003047074
6528	3	5.262037	-0.005	15.51375	0.003046093
3874	3	5.262726	-0.005	15.50875	0.003045111
1092	1	5.263708	-0.0075	15.50125	0.003043638
6078	3	5.264729	-0.005	15.49625	0.003042657
7811	3	5.265027	-0.005	15.49125	0.003041675
2714	2	5.267844	-0.00625	15.485	0.003040448
3198	3	5.272279	-0.005	15.48	0.003039466
6869	3	5.272658	-0.005	15.475	0.003038484
6206	3	5.274661	-0.005	15.47	0.003037502
3785	3	5.275127	-0.005	15.465	0.003036521
970	1	5.275365	-0.0075	15.4575	0.003035048
453	1	5.278992	-0.0075	15.45	0.003033575
272	1	5.284201	-0.0075	15.4425	0.003032103
2037	2	5.284594	-0.00625	15.43625	0.003030876
422	1	5.285387	-0.0075	15.42875	0.003029403
2889	2	5.285437	-0.00625	15.4225	0.003028176
8665	3	5.286527	-0.005	15.4175	0.003027194
1120	1	5.288081	-0.0075	15.41	0.003025722
8941	4	5.288951	-0.005	15.405	0.00302474
6762	3	5.289311	-0.005	15.4	0.003023758
3413	3	5.289576	-0.005	15.395	0.003022776
4891	3	5.290102	-0.005	15.39	0.003021795
625	1	5.291322	-0.0075	15.3825	0.003020322
334	1	5.296337	-0.0075	15.375	0.003018849
1423	1	5.297818	-0.0075	15.3675	0.003017377
8224	3	5.298289	-0.005	15.3625	0.003016395
4973	3	5.298933	-0.005	15.3575	0.003015413
2843	2	5.299871	-0.00625	15.35125	0.003014186
7265	3	5.301775	-0.005	15.34625	0.003013204
7602	3	5.302509	-0.005	15.34125	0.003012223
4507	3	5.302712	-0.005	15.33625	0.003011241
873	1	5.307058	-0.0075	15.32875	0.003009768
384	1	5.309398	-0.0075	15.32125	0.003008296
4386	3	5.310927	0.01	15.33125	0.003010259
8375	3	5.315122	-0.005	15.32625	0.003009277
8160	3	5.315243	-0.005	15.32125	0.003008296
4213	3	5.315309	-0.005	15.31625	0.003007314
403	1	5.317568	-0.0075	15.30875	0.003005841
393	1	5.319997	-0.0075	15.30125	0.003004369
4280	3	5.321068	-0.005	15.29625	0.003003387
1251	1	5.322246	-0.0075	15.28875	0.003001914
3174	3	5.324696	-0.005	15.28375	0.003000933
5282	3	5.325707	-0.005	15.27875	0.002999951
9341	4	5.327318	-0.005	15.27375	0.002998969
816	1	5.328367	-0.0075	15.26625	0.002997497
6025	3	5.332188	-0.005	15.26125	0.002996515
1353	1	5.333414	-0.0075	15.25375	0.002995042

8440	3	5.335065	-0.005	15.24875	0.00299406
9571	4	5.335699	-0.005	15.24375	0.002993079
2240	2	5.335962	-0.00625	15.2375	0.002991852
1865	2	5.339419	-0.00625	15.23125	0.002990624
2131	2	5.339925	-0.00625	15.225	0.002989397
3105	3	5.339992	-0.005	15.22	0.002988415
1921	2	5.341358	-0.00625	15.21375	0.002987188
8222	3	5.342107	-0.005	15.20875	0.002986207
5714	3	5.3457	-0.005	15.20375	0.002985225
7686	3	5.346414	0.01	15.21375	0.002987188
8573	3	5.346803	-0.005	15.20875	0.002986207
1754	1	5.347306	-0.0075	15.20125	0.002984734
354	1	5.349737	-0.0075	15.19375	0.002983261
4947	3	5.350049	-0.005	15.18875	0.00298228
1357	1	5.350779	-0.0075	15.18125	0.002980807
5992	3	5.351724	-0.005	15.17625	0.002979825
2482	2	5.353919	-0.00625	15.17	0.002978598
3683	3	5.354167	-0.005	15.165	0.002977616
5869	3	5.355203	-0.005	15.16	0.002976635
1989	2	5.355868	-0.00625	15.15375	0.002975407
563	1	5.356771	-0.0075	15.14625	0.002973935
4667	3	5.35783	-0.005	15.14125	0.002972953
2168	2	5.359357	-0.00625	15.135	0.002971726
4184	3	5.361553	-0.005	15.13	0.002970744
7491	3	5.36209	-0.005	15.125	0.002969762
2184	2	5.362811	-0.00625	15.11875	0.002968535
206	1	5.362828	0.015	15.13375	0.00297148
2621	2	5.363764	-0.00625	15.1275	0.002970253
8359	3	5.364514	-0.005	15.1225	0.002969272
6011	3	5.364554	-0.005	15.1175	0.00296829
9184	4	5.365578	-0.005	15.1125	0.002967308
5577	3	5.365893	-0.005	15.1075	0.002966326
798	1	5.367135	-0.0075	15.1	0.002964854
72	1	5.367574	-0.0075	15.0925	0.002963381
2075	2	5.368313	-0.00625	15.08625	0.002962154
8376	3	5.369253	-0.005	15.08125	0.002961172
571	1	5.369931	-0.0075	15.07375	0.0029597
90	1	5.37027	-0.0075	15.06625	0.002958227
98	1	5.372186	-0.0075	15.05875	0.002956754
3919	3	5.372353	-0.005	15.05375	0.002955773
6311	3	5.380339	-0.005	15.04875	0.002954791
2862	2	5.380519	-0.00625	15.0425	0.002953564
1226	1	5.384081	-0.0075	15.035	0.002952091
2086	2	5.384435	-0.00625	15.02875	0.002950864
4731	3	5.38549	0.01	15.03875	0.002952827
7089	3	5.386323	-0.005	15.03375	0.002951846
4838	3	5.386628	0.01	15.04375	0.002953809
2996	3	5.388109	-0.005	15.03875	0.002952827
6049	3	5.391665	-0.005	15.03375	0.002951846
1476	1	5.391852	-0.0075	15.02625	0.002950373
888	1	5.39498	-0.0075	15.01875	0.0029489
6491	3	5.397429	-0.005	15.01375	0.002947919

1178	1	5.399979	-0.0075	15.00625	0.002946446
451	1	5.400112	-0.0075	14.99875	0.002944973
1521	1	5.402703	-0.0075	14.99125	0.002943501
8433	3	5.40313	-0.005	14.98625	0.002942519
8542	3	5.403281	-0.005	14.98125	0.002941537
7637	3	5.406532	-0.005	14.97625	0.002940556
4625	3	5.406732	-0.005	14.97125	0.002939574
4315	3	5.407422	-0.005	14.96625	0.002938592
3442	3	5.407901	-0.005	14.96125	0.00293761
3127	3	5.407967	-0.005	14.95625	0.002936629
3863	3	5.411392	0.01	14.96625	0.002938592
488	1	5.411465	-0.0075	14.95875	0.00293712
3820	3	5.413306	-0.005	14.95375	0.002936138
359	1	5.415782	-0.0075	14.94625	0.002934665
8182	3	5.416793	-0.005	14.94125	0.002933683
2211	2	5.420833	-0.00625	14.935	0.002932456
6053	3	5.421356	-0.005	14.93	0.002931475
2134	2	5.422434	-0.00625	14.92375	0.002930247
61	1	5.424039	-0.0075	14.91625	0.002928775
3100	3	5.424602	-0.005	14.91125	0.002927793
546	1	5.425101	-0.0075	14.90375	0.00292632
4125	3	5.425533	-0.005	14.89875	0.002925339
659	1	5.425603	-0.0075	14.89125	0.002923866
802	1	5.42561	-0.0075	14.88375	0.002922393
8115	3	5.427898	-0.005	14.87875	0.002921412
5927	3	5.428055	-0.005	14.87375	0.00292043
283	1	5.428437	-0.0075	14.86625	0.002918957
8485	3	5.428957	-0.005	14.86125	0.002917976
6068	3	5.43116	-0.005	14.85625	0.002916994
3848	3	5.43151	-0.005	14.85125	0.002916012
1569	1	5.432479	-0.0075	14.84375	0.00291454
6998	3	5.432648	-0.005	14.83875	0.002913558
5847	3	5.432945	-0.005	14.83375	0.002912576
829	1	5.433034	-0.0075	14.82625	0.002911103
5840	3	5.435106	-0.005	14.82125	0.002910122
2884	2	5.435504	-0.00625	14.815	0.002908895
2064	2	5.435642	-0.00625	14.80875	0.002907667
547	1	5.438669	-0.0075	14.80125	0.002906195
7226	3	5.438737	-0.005	14.79625	0.002905213
564	1	5.439197	-0.0075	14.78875	0.00290374
818	1	5.445199	-0.0075	14.78125	0.002902268
2013	2	5.445207	-0.00625	14.775	0.002901041
4305	3	5.445519	-0.005	14.77	0.002900059
4057	3	5.44666	-0.005	14.765	0.002899077
6792	3	5.44677	-0.005	14.76	0.002898095
6231	3	5.449354	-0.005	14.755	0.002897114
5181	3	5.449793	-0.005	14.75	0.002896132
7030	3	5.450682	-0.005	14.745	0.00289515
1863	2	5.452235	-0.00625	14.73875	0.002893923
2473	2	5.457707	-0.00625	14.7325	0.002892696
7002	3	5.459932	-0.005	14.7275	0.002891714
2029	2	5.459971	-0.00625	14.72125	0.002890487

7394	3	5.462792	-0.005	14.71625	0.002889505
2193	2	5.464537	-0.00625	14.71	0.002888278
6999	3	5.466477	0.01	14.72	0.002890242
2299	2	5.46819	-0.00625	14.71375	0.002889014
1626	1	5.469089	-0.0075	14.70625	0.002887542
5877	3	5.47097	-0.005	14.70125	0.00288656
8289	3	5.471239	-0.005	14.69625	0.002885578
7518	3	5.474449	-0.005	14.69125	0.002884597
7788	3	5.478566	-0.005	14.68625	0.002883615
2702	2	5.479003	-0.00625	14.68	0.002882388
3043	3	5.48313	-0.005	14.675	0.002881406
9335	4	5.483949	-0.005	14.67	0.002880424
8632	3	5.485193	-0.005	14.665	0.002879442
8623	3	5.486834	-0.005	14.66	0.002878461
5883	3	5.488373	-0.005	14.655	0.002877479
221	1	5.488616	-0.0075	14.6475	0.002876006
2745	2	5.488682	0.0125	14.66	0.002878461
2595	2	5.490021	-0.00625	14.65375	0.002877233
5018	3	5.491155	-0.005	14.64875	0.002876252
6436	3	5.491192	-0.005	14.64375	0.00287527
8623	3	5.491918	-0.005	14.63875	0.002874288
423	1	5.492523	-0.0075	14.63125	0.002872816
7846	3	5.493323	-0.005	14.62625	0.002871834
6265	3	5.495875	-0.005	14.62125	0.002870852
6216	3	5.497661	-0.005	14.61625	0.00286987
3585	3	5.497663	-0.005	14.61125	0.002868889
6394	3	5.498129	-0.005	14.60625	0.002867907
4255	3	5.498269	-0.005	14.60125	0.002866925
6559	3	5.501681	-0.005	14.59625	0.002865943
1182	1	5.502494	-0.0075	14.58875	0.002864471
2207	2	5.503777	0.0125	14.60125	0.002866925
5320	3	5.50488	0.01	14.61125	0.002868889
2647	2	5.505659	-0.00625	14.605	0.002867661
5624	3	5.506279	-0.005	14.6	0.00286668
845	1	5.5086	-0.0075	14.5925	0.002865207
1601	1	5.51107	-0.0075	14.585	0.002863735
3032	3	5.511363	-0.005	14.58	0.002862753
643	1	5.51194	-0.0075	14.5725	0.00286128
4495	3	5.516709	-0.005	14.5675	0.002860298
5756	3	5.517467	-0.005	14.5625	0.002859317
2805	2	5.517614	-0.00625	14.55625	0.00285809
6083	3	5.518563	-0.005	14.55125	0.002857108
1453	1	5.521461	0.015	14.56625	0.002860053
7458	3	5.522398	-0.005	14.56125	0.002859071
349	1	5.523892	-0.0075	14.55375	0.002857599
605	1	5.523936	-0.0075	14.54625	0.002856126
3630	3	5.527184	-0.005	14.54125	0.002855144
2350	2	5.528342	-0.00625	14.535	0.002853917
2637	2	5.53054	-0.00625	14.52875	0.00285269
7003	3	5.531551	-0.005	14.52375	0.002851708
3855	3	5.532955	-0.005	14.51875	0.002850726
2300	2	5.533305	-0.00625	14.5125	0.002849499

3854	3	5.533818	-0.005	14.5075	0.002848518
303	1	5.533919	-0.0075	14.5	0.002847045
3820	3	5.537045	-0.005	14.495	0.002846063
2457	2	5.53854	-0.00625	14.48875	0.002844836
1201	1	5.541778	-0.0075	14.48125	0.002843363
458	1	5.544134	-0.0075	14.47375	0.002841891
6116	3	5.544345	-0.005	14.46875	0.002840909
1223	1	5.545393	-0.0075	14.46125	0.002839436
1979	2	5.546673	-0.00625	14.455	0.002838209
5910	3	5.54868	-0.005	14.45	0.002837228
3916	3	5.548832	-0.005	14.445	0.002836246
1072	1	5.550516	-0.0075	14.4375	0.002834773
6700	3	5.551481	-0.005	14.4325	0.002833791
440	1	5.552858	-0.0075	14.425	0.002832319
1915	2	5.553493	-0.00625	14.41875	0.002831092
4858	3	5.557057	-0.005	14.41375	0.00283011
2464	2	5.55748	-0.00625	14.4075	0.002828883
6368	3	5.557485	-0.005	14.4025	0.002827901
8083	3	5.558033	-0.005	14.3975	0.002826919
8084	3	5.558239	-0.005	14.3925	0.002825938
5800	3	5.559155	-0.005	14.3875	0.002824956
1270	1	5.562111	-0.0075	14.38	0.002823483
3349	3	5.564179	-0.005	14.375	0.002822501
102	1	5.564709	-0.0075	14.3675	0.002821029
644	1	5.565718	0.015	14.3825	0.002823974
2749	2	5.56944	0.0125	14.395	0.002826428
6835	3	5.569613	-0.005	14.39	0.002825447
8696	3	5.570149	-0.005	14.385	0.002824465
822	1	5.570896	-0.0075	14.3775	0.002822992
73	1	5.572818	-0.0075	14.37	0.00282152
2608	2	5.57409	-0.00625	14.36375	0.002820293
1329	1	5.575377	-0.0075	14.35625	0.00281882
1850	2	5.575393	-0.00625	14.35	0.002817593
2159	2	5.576271	-0.00625	14.34375	0.002816366
3206	3	5.576517	-0.005	14.33875	0.002815384
238	1	5.584524	-0.0075	14.33125	0.002813911
454	1	5.58511	-0.0075	14.32375	0.002812439
5354	3	5.588106	-0.005	14.31875	0.002811457
1134	1	5.598478	-0.0075	14.31125	0.002809984
1729	1	5.600704	-0.0075	14.30375	0.002808512
6922	3	5.601274	-0.005	14.29875	0.00280753
8742	3	5.605757	-0.005	14.29375	0.002806548
7164	3	5.606644	-0.005	14.28875	0.002805566
8296	3	5.610324	-0.005	14.28375	0.002804585
8713	3	5.613668	-0.005	14.27875	0.002803603
7540	3	5.61467	-0.005	14.27375	0.002802621
6377	3	5.615577	-0.005	14.26875	0.00280164
335	1	5.617078	-0.0075	14.26125	0.002800167
5470	3	5.617717	-0.005	14.25625	0.002799185
533	1	5.617725	-0.0075	14.24875	0.002797713
4948	3	5.618251	-0.005	14.24375	0.002796731
2748	2	5.618319	-0.00625	14.2375	0.002795504

4468	3	5.618543	-0.005	14.2325	0.002794522
6715	3	5.619959	0.01	14.2425	0.002796485
2202	2	5.620701	-0.00625	14.23625	0.002795258
3212	3	5.625741	-0.005	14.23125	0.002794276
7188	3	5.62752	-0.005	14.22625	0.002793295
7109	3	5.627807	-0.005	14.22125	0.002792313
4006	3	5.632659	-0.005	14.21625	0.002791331
7349	3	5.63504	-0.005	14.21125	0.002790349
815	1	5.635603	-0.0075	14.20375	0.002788877
267	1	5.637042	-0.0075	14.19625	0.002787404
2874	2	5.638033	-0.00625	14.19	0.002786177
7127	3	5.641018	-0.005	14.185	0.002785195
9716	4	5.642112	-0.005	14.18	0.002784214
5308	3	5.643641	-0.005	14.175	0.002783232
875	1	5.646205	-0.0075	14.1675	0.002781759
3320	3	5.649298	-0.005	14.1625	0.002780778
7727	3	5.649539	-0.005	14.1575	0.002779796
7157	3	5.652011	-0.005	14.1525	0.002778814
7447	3	5.653191	0.01	14.1625	0.002780778
9295	4	5.654847	-0.005	14.1575	0.002779796
5373	3	5.656331	-0.005	14.1525	0.002778814
4885	3	5.660365	0.01	14.1625	0.002780778
1701	1	5.66161	-0.0075	14.155	0.002779305
1453	1	5.662555	-0.0075	14.1475	0.002777832
801	1	5.664354	-0.0075	14.14	0.00277636
5278	3	5.665933	-0.005	14.135	0.002775378
5389	3	5.667097	-0.005	14.13	0.002774396
528	1	5.668254	-0.0075	14.1225	0.002772924
8004	3	5.672391	-0.005	14.1175	0.002771942
3730	3	5.672644	-0.005	14.1125	0.00277096
2170	2	5.673988	-0.00625	14.10625	0.002769733
2713	2	5.674418	-0.00625	14.1	0.002768506
909	1	5.676326	-0.0075	14.0925	0.002767033
4939	3	5.67812	-0.005	14.0875	0.002766051
1200	1	5.678545	-0.0075	14.08	0.002764579
7174	3	5.680621	-0.005	14.075	0.002763597
995	1	5.68143	-0.0075	14.0675	0.002762124
837	1	5.683963	-0.0075	14.06	0.002760652
3815	3	5.688691	-0.005	14.055	0.00275967
9632	4	5.689622	-0.005	14.05	0.002758688
8254	3	5.692577	-0.005	14.045	0.002757707
4731	3	5.693332	-0.005	14.04	0.002756725
9353	4	5.693806	-0.005	14.035	0.002755743
143	1	5.694325	-0.0075	14.0275	0.002754271
2321	2	5.695055	-0.00625	14.02125	0.002753043
3705	3	5.696282	-0.005	14.01625	0.002752062
1910	2	5.697153	-0.00625	14.01	0.002750834
6504	3	5.702318	-0.005	14.005	0.002749853
5302	3	5.703186	0.01	14.015	0.002751816
6141	3	5.712253	-0.005	14.01	0.002750834
2704	2	5.712877	-0.00625	14.00375	0.002749607
6759	3	5.714294	-0.005	13.99875	0.002748626

2680	2	5.715619	-0.00625	13.9925	0.002747398
6206	3	5.721848	-0.005	13.9875	0.002746417
766	1	5.722146	-0.0075	13.98	0.002744944
6999	3	5.722589	-0.005	13.975	0.002743962
7201	3	5.729214	-0.005	13.97	0.002742981
297	1	5.730327	-0.0075	13.9625	0.002741508
6753	3	5.730875	-0.005	13.9575	0.002740526
8232	3	5.732129	-0.005	13.9525	0.002739544
623	1	5.736358	-0.0075	13.945	0.002738072
7088	3	5.739137	-0.005	13.94	0.00273709
7012	3	5.74008	-0.005	13.935	0.002736108
2262	2	5.741365	-0.00625	13.92875	0.002734881
4100	3	5.74297	-0.005	13.92375	0.002733899
2088	2	5.744948	-0.00625	13.9175	0.002732672
6570	3	5.749782	-0.005	13.9125	0.002731691
206	1	5.751601	-0.0075	13.905	0.002730218
7162	3	5.756563	-0.005	13.9	0.002729236
7513	3	5.757219	-0.005	13.895	0.002728254
653	1	5.758518	-0.0075	13.8875	0.002726782
9132	4	5.762016	-0.005	13.8825	0.0027258
7045	3	5.762321	-0.005	13.8775	0.002724818
7923	3	5.765438	-0.005	13.8725	0.002723837
4494	3	5.765729	-0.005	13.8675	0.002722855
7273	3	5.767564	-0.005	13.8625	0.002721873
5213	3	5.769419	-0.005	13.8575	0.002720891
2623	2	5.769514	-0.00625	13.85125	0.002719664
1764	1	5.771047	-0.0075	13.84375	0.002718192
2851	2	5.772022	-0.00625	13.8375	0.002716964
2511	2	5.773691	-0.00625	13.83125	0.002715737
6581	3	5.775012	-0.005	13.82625	0.002714756
8915	4	5.777406	-0.005	13.82125	0.002713774
3599	3	5.779493	-0.005	13.81625	0.002712792
2636	2	5.782495	-0.00625	13.81	0.002711565
3704	3	5.782716	-0.005	13.805	0.002710583
3717	3	5.785355	-0.005	13.8	0.002709601
2588	2	5.790069	-0.00625	13.79375	0.002708374
1081	1	5.790408	-0.0075	13.78625	0.002706902
6090	3	5.794051	-0.005	13.78125	0.00270592
6869	3	5.797742	-0.005	13.77625	0.002704938
7996	3	5.798059	-0.005	13.77125	0.002703956
6888	3	5.799959	-0.005	13.76625	0.002702975
8392	3	5.799991	-0.005	13.76125	0.002701993
5869	3	5.801107	-0.005	13.75625	0.002701011
2168	2	5.801291	-0.00625	13.75	0.002699784
6460	3	5.802061	-0.005	13.745	0.002698802
662	1	5.804155	-0.0075	13.7375	0.00269733
4052	3	5.804889	-0.005	13.7325	0.002696348
2908	3	5.807927	-0.005	13.7275	0.002695366
2348	2	5.808913	-0.00625	13.72125	0.002694139
823	1	5.812768	-0.0075	13.71375	0.002692666
2590	2	5.81331	-0.00625	13.7075	0.002691439
5772	3	5.813388	-0.005	13.7025	0.002690457

298	1	5.81432	-0.0075	13.695	0.002688985
961	1	5.815526	-0.0075	13.6875	0.002687512
1199	1	5.818741	-0.0075	13.68	0.00268604
9835	4	5.820784	-0.005	13.675	0.002685058
1799	2	5.827693	-0.00625	13.66875	0.002683831
2644	2	5.83245	-0.00625	13.6625	0.002682604
1662	1	5.832453	-0.0075	13.655	0.002681131
1006	1	5.834764	-0.0075	13.6475	0.002679658
2136	2	5.835469	-0.00625	13.64125	0.002678431
2457	2	5.835583	-0.00625	13.635	0.002677204
4486	3	5.837711	-0.005	13.63	0.002676222
1317	1	5.840733	-0.0075	13.6225	0.00267475
3655	3	5.84131	-0.005	13.6175	0.002673768
2222	2	5.843873	-0.00625	13.61125	0.002672541
3333	3	5.844059	-0.005	13.60625	0.002671559
3168	3	5.846856	-0.005	13.60125	0.002670577
6539	3	5.847255	-0.005	13.59625	0.002669596
7971	3	5.847297	-0.005	13.59125	0.002668614
3934	3	5.848493	-0.005	13.58625	0.002667632
1587	1	5.849285	-0.0075	13.57875	0.002666159
6715	3	5.85164	-0.005	13.57375	0.002665178
9350	4	5.852626	-0.005	13.56875	0.002664196
7681	3	5.852726	-0.005	13.56375	0.002663214
377	1	5.853054	-0.0075	13.55625	0.002661742
488	1	5.853469	-0.0075	13.54875	0.002660269
2871	2	5.855855	-0.00625	13.5425	0.002659042
87	1	5.860292	-0.0075	13.535	0.002657569
2111	2	5.860726	-0.00625	13.52875	0.002656342
3127	3	5.862082	-0.005	13.52375	0.00265536
9387	4	5.863482	-0.005	13.51875	0.002654379
284	1	5.865284	-0.0075	13.51125	0.002652906
340	1	5.86746	-0.0075	13.50375	0.002651433
2886	2	5.867551	-0.00625	13.4975	0.002650206
5639	3	5.867668	-0.005	13.4925	0.002649224
2669	2	5.87157	-0.00625	13.48625	0.002647997
4380	3	5.873255	-0.005	13.48125	0.002647016
1707	1	5.873505	-0.0075	13.47375	0.002645543
1984	2	5.874222	-0.00625	13.4675	0.002644316
3348	3	5.875422	-0.005	13.4625	0.002643334
2750	2	5.876592	-0.00625	13.45625	0.002642107
7146	3	5.87799	-0.005	13.45125	0.002641125
1493	1	5.878048	-0.0075	13.44375	0.002639652
4785	3	5.881201	0.01	13.45375	0.002641616
4071	3	5.881962	-0.005	13.44875	0.002640634
3913	3	5.886301	-0.005	13.44375	0.002639652
9558	4	5.888253	-0.005	13.43875	0.002638671
6519	3	5.888395	-0.005	13.43375	0.002637689
3839	3	5.891136	-0.005	13.42875	0.002636707
3567	3	5.892422	-0.005	13.42375	0.002635726
2402	2	5.8929	-0.00625	13.4175	0.002634498
9576	4	5.896067	-0.005	13.4125	0.002633517
3564	3	5.898424	-0.005	13.4075	0.002632535

1683	1	5.89971	-0.0075	13.4	0.002631062
1881	2	5.899815	-0.00625	13.39375	0.002629835
2258	2	5.901264	-0.00625	13.3875	0.002628608
3622	3	5.902365	-0.005	13.3825	0.002627626
1196	1	5.903277	-0.0075	13.375	0.002626154
6827	3	5.904288	-0.005	13.37	0.002625172
3182	3	5.904911	-0.005	13.365	0.00262419
5489	3	5.905341	-0.005	13.36	0.002623208
7706	3	5.90615	-0.005	13.355	0.002622227
4569	3	5.906894	-0.005	13.35	0.002621245
397	1	5.90864	-0.0075	13.3425	0.002619772
8619	3	5.908666	-0.005	13.3375	0.00261879
2619	2	5.911846	-0.00625	13.33125	0.002617563
2882	2	5.917725	-0.00625	13.325	0.002616336
7099	3	5.919027	-0.005	13.32	0.002615354
2726	2	5.922332	-0.00625	13.31375	0.002614127
8465	3	5.92307	-0.005	13.30875	0.002613145
5055	3	5.923276	-0.005	13.30375	0.002612164
2162	2	5.923681	-0.00625	13.2975	0.002610937
1267	1	5.924253	-0.0075	13.29	0.002609464
6236	3	5.926709	-0.005	13.285	0.002608482
1002	1	5.928189	-0.0075	13.2775	0.00260701
7125	3	5.928687	-0.005	13.2725	0.002606028
2404	2	5.934591	-0.00625	13.26625	0.002604801
1313	1	5.93829	-0.0075	13.25875	0.002603328
357	1	5.939755	-0.0075	13.25125	0.002601855
6740	3	5.940543	-0.005	13.24625	0.002600874
4885	3	5.940852	-0.005	13.24125	0.002599892
1895	2	5.941808	-0.00625	13.235	0.002598665
8118	3	5.942633	-0.005	13.23	0.002597683
722	1	5.943155	-0.0075	13.2225	0.00259621
1237	1	5.944743	-0.0075	13.215	0.002594738
4269	3	5.945494	-0.005	13.21	0.002593756
1049	1	5.946683	-0.0075	13.2025	0.002592284
3848	3	5.948838	-0.005	13.1975	0.002591302
3668	3	5.949046	-0.005	13.1925	0.00259032
8713	3	5.949203	-0.005	13.1875	0.002589338
6199	3	5.949227	-0.005	13.1825	0.002588357
5142	3	5.952646	-0.005	13.1775	0.002587375
5041	3	5.953541	-0.005	13.1725	0.002586393
1931	2	5.955916	-0.00625	13.16625	0.002585166
767	1	5.957458	-0.0075	13.15875	0.002583693
9044	4	5.958759	-0.005	13.15375	0.002582712
2944	3	5.958794	-0.005	13.14875	0.00258173
6364	3	5.958878	-0.005	13.14375	0.002580748
921	1	5.961352	-0.0075	13.13625	0.002579275
7488	3	5.96177	-0.005	13.13125	0.002578294
9572	4	5.962579	-0.005	13.12625	0.002577312
2943	3	5.96268	-0.005	13.12125	0.00257633
5515	3	5.96393	-0.005	13.11625	0.002575349
3046	3	5.969895	-0.005	13.11125	0.002574367
6544	3	5.971813	-0.005	13.10625	0.002573385

803	1	5.974681	-0.0075	13.09875	0.002571912
1587	1	5.974904	-0.0075	13.09125	0.00257044
7843	3	5.976467	-0.005	13.08625	0.002569458
6858	3	5.985266	-0.005	13.08125	0.002568476
2294	2	5.989624	-0.00625	13.075	0.002567249
7107	3	5.98993	-0.005	13.07	0.002566267
8666	3	5.991935	-0.005	13.065	0.002565286
849	1	5.992608	-0.0075	13.0575	0.002563813
5908	3	5.995162	-0.005	13.0525	0.002562831
9770	4	5.995498	-0.005	13.0475	0.00256185
395	1	5.995533	-0.0075	13.04	0.002560377
213	1	6.000114	-0.0075	13.0325	0.002558904
21	1	6.000749	-0.0075	13.025	0.002557432
5465	3	6.001458	-0.005	13.02	0.00255645
1628	1	6.002033	-0.0075	13.0125	0.002554977
4946	3	6.002081	-0.005	13.0075	0.002553996
275	1	6.005481	0.015	13.0225	0.002556941
7864	3	6.007121	-0.005	13.0175	0.002555959
4785	3	6.008384	-0.005	13.0125	0.002554977
2781	2	6.009241	-0.00625	13.00625	0.00255375
9375	4	6.011754	-0.005	13.00125	0.002552769
7202	3	6.020305	-0.005	12.99625	0.002551787
5892	3	6.020552	-0.005	12.99125	0.002550805
6118	3	6.022463	-0.005	12.98625	0.002549823
5499	3	6.022787	-0.005	12.98125	0.002548842
4617	3	6.026117	-0.005	12.97625	0.00254786
3166	3	6.033026	-0.005	12.97125	0.002546878
5708	3	6.0384	-0.005	12.96625	0.002545896
1383	1	6.038795	-0.0075	12.95875	0.002544424
4386	3	6.039953	-0.005	12.95375	0.002543442
1364	1	6.042078	-0.0075	12.94625	0.002541969
7317	3	6.042222	-0.005	12.94125	0.002540988
3959	3	6.044283	-0.005	12.93625	0.002540006
2709	2	6.044875	-0.00625	12.93	0.002538779
7071	3	6.048923	-0.005	12.925	0.002537797
2112	2	6.050628	-0.00625	12.91875	0.00253657
2652	2	6.05065	-0.00625	12.9125	0.002535343
452	1	6.051789	-0.0075	12.905	0.00253387
6268	3	6.054095	-0.005	12.9	0.002532888
5561	3	6.054441	-0.005	12.895	0.002531907
5374	3	6.056299	-0.005	12.89	0.002530925
6829	3	6.056528	-0.005	12.885	0.002529943
235	1	6.058495	-0.0075	12.8775	0.00252847
6594	3	6.059806	-0.005	12.8725	0.002527489
9161	4	6.061791	-0.005	12.8675	0.002526507
5458	3	6.06626	-0.005	12.8625	0.002525525
1634	1	6.06886	-0.0075	12.855	0.002524053
4712	3	6.07031	-0.005	12.85	0.002523071
2328	2	6.071476	-0.00625	12.84375	0.002521844
2467	2	6.07185	-0.00625	12.8375	0.002520617
85	1	6.072514	-0.0075	12.83	0.002519144
5271	3	6.07847	-0.005	12.825	0.002518162

8419	3	6.0806	-0.005	12.82	0.00251718
6154	3	6.081081	-0.005	12.815	0.002516199
2145	2	6.081454	-0.00625	12.80875	0.002514972
728	1	6.082304	-0.0075	12.80125	0.002513499
2405	2	6.082451	-0.00625	12.795	0.002512272
4875	3	6.082653	-0.005	12.79	0.00251129
1602	1	6.08469	-0.0075	12.7825	0.002509817
4446	3	6.085054	-0.005	12.7775	0.002508836
1546	1	6.08544	-0.0075	12.77	0.002507363
7983	3	6.090319	-0.005	12.765	0.002506381
168	1	6.090693	-0.0075	12.7575	0.002504909
5147	3	6.091541	-0.005	12.7525	0.002503927
6381	3	6.091958	-0.005	12.7475	0.002502945
106	1	6.092988	-0.0075	12.74	0.002501473
2888	2	6.093509	-0.00625	12.73375	0.002500245
113	1	6.094748	-0.0075	12.72625	0.002498773
2301	2	6.09732	-0.00625	12.72	0.002497546
6178	3	6.097636	-0.005	12.715	0.002496564
3558	3	6.098277	-0.005	12.71	0.002495582
5170	3	6.098443	-0.005	12.705	0.0024946
6060	3	6.098555	-0.005	12.7	0.002493619
9857	4	6.101203	-0.005	12.695	0.002492637
663	1	6.101411	-0.0075	12.6875	0.002491164
9463	4	6.105514	-0.005	12.6825	0.002490183
1648	1	6.105784	-0.0075	12.675	0.00248871
1873	2	6.113465	-0.00625	12.66875	0.002487483
2818	2	6.114637	-0.00625	12.6625	0.002486256
5642	3	6.11655	-0.005	12.6575	0.002485274
817	1	6.117168	-0.0075	12.65	0.002483801
1288	1	6.117595	-0.0075	12.6425	0.002482329
5981	3	6.119612	-0.005	12.6375	0.002481347
3193	3	6.120505	-0.005	12.6325	0.002480365
1529	1	6.122914	-0.0075	12.625	0.002478893
400	1	6.123684	-0.0075	12.6175	0.00247742
8446	3	6.124472	-0.005	12.6125	0.002476438
2921	3	6.125251	-0.005	12.6075	0.002475457
7447	3	6.125962	-0.005	12.6025	0.002474475
6730	3	6.128936	-0.005	12.5975	0.002473493
1	1	6.1293	-0.0075	12.59	0.00247202
7715	3	6.130429	-0.005	12.585	0.002471039
4714	3	6.131697	-0.005	12.58	0.002470057
5153	3	6.132369	-0.005	12.575	0.002469075
6580	3	6.132936	-0.005	12.57	0.002468093
5418	3	6.135482	-0.005	12.565	0.002467112
5359	3	6.137552	0.01	12.575	0.002469075
6569	3	6.150436	-0.005	12.57	0.002468093
8062	3	6.153664	-0.005	12.565	0.002467112
240	1	6.155051	-0.0075	12.5575	0.002465639
7168	3	6.155357	-0.005	12.5525	0.002464657
8078	3	6.165474	-0.005	12.5475	0.002463676
4838	3	6.166049	-0.005	12.5425	0.002462694
3708	3	6.166897	-0.005	12.5375	0.002461712

6964	3	6.167284	-0.005	12.5325	0.00246073
2254	2	6.168194	-0.00625	12.52625	0.002459503
1916	2	6.168757	-0.00625	12.52	0.002458276
1466	1	6.168815	-0.0075	12.5125	0.002456803
9953	4	6.16892	-0.005	12.5075	0.002455822
6964	3	6.169068	-0.005	12.5025	0.00245484
1849	2	6.17102	-0.00625	12.49625	0.002453613
8561	3	6.171392	-0.005	12.49125	0.002452631
5652	3	6.174297	-0.005	12.48625	0.002451649
66	1	6.17596	-0.0075	12.47875	0.002450177
3746	3	6.181586	-0.005	12.47375	0.002449195
9019	4	6.185855	-0.005	12.46875	0.002448213
8792	4	6.186239	-0.005	12.46375	0.002447231
4853	3	6.192698	-0.005	12.45875	0.00244625
477	1	6.194463	-0.0075	12.45125	0.002444777
5456	3	6.196292	-0.005	12.44625	0.002443795
391	1	6.197911	-0.0075	12.43875	0.002442323
2570	2	6.200636	-0.00625	12.4325	0.002441096
2237	2	6.201646	-0.00625	12.42625	0.002439868
1071	1	6.206692	-0.0075	12.41875	0.002438396
1837	2	6.209207	-0.00625	12.4125	0.002437169
3063	3	6.217562	-0.005	12.4075	0.002436187
7405	3	6.217872	-0.005	12.4025	0.002435205
2724	2	6.217988	-0.00625	12.39625	0.002433978
2118	2	6.218217	-0.00625	12.39	0.002432751
1731	1	6.221566	-0.0075	12.3825	0.002431278
8275	3	6.222471	-0.005	12.3775	0.002430296
3301	3	6.22364	-0.005	12.3725	0.002429315
1960	2	6.225127	-0.00625	12.36625	0.002428088
1722	1	6.225201	-0.0075	12.35875	0.002426615
6484	3	6.226657	-0.005	12.35375	0.002425633
7793	3	6.230016	-0.005	12.34875	0.002424651
8095	3	6.232854	-0.005	12.34375	0.00242367
1028	1	6.233315	-0.0075	12.33625	0.002422197
4903	3	6.237571	-0.005	12.33125	0.002421215
5459	3	6.238419	-0.005	12.32625	0.002420234
2539	2	6.240688	-0.00625	12.32	0.002419006
9082	4	6.248853	-0.005	12.315	0.002418025
3100	3	6.249198	-0.005	12.31	0.002417043
2804	2	6.249705	-0.00625	12.30375	0.002415816
1034	1	6.251604	-0.0075	12.29625	0.002414343
7862	3	6.252382	-0.005	12.29125	0.002413361
3658	3	6.252606	-0.005	12.28625	0.00241238
811	1	6.258171	-0.0075	12.27875	0.002410907
6367	3	6.258352	-0.005	12.27375	0.002409925
3450	3	6.260551	-0.005	12.26875	0.002408944
2753	2	6.268032	-0.00625	12.2625	0.002407716
1035	1	6.268486	-0.0075	12.255	0.002406244
3690	3	6.269471	-0.005	12.25	0.002405262
6663	3	6.269675	-0.005	12.245	0.00240428
5823	3	6.271271	-0.005	12.24	0.002403299
5023	3	6.272214	-0.005	12.235	0.002402317

774	1	6.274093	-0.0075	12.2275	0.002400844
182	1	6.274365	-0.0075	12.22	0.002399372
8683	3	6.275999	-0.005	12.215	0.00239839
7320	3	6.276473	-0.005	12.21	0.002397408
1551	1	6.279895	-0.0075	12.2025	0.002395936
6170	3	6.28469	-0.005	12.1975	0.002394954
7763	3	6.284731	-0.005	12.1925	0.002393972
1610	1	6.285214	-0.0075	12.185	0.0023925
1151	1	6.285468	-0.0075	12.1775	0.002391027
3334	3	6.286444	-0.005	12.1725	0.002390045
13	1	6.289114	-0.0075	12.165	0.002388573
9344	4	6.290218	-0.005	12.16	0.002387591
3098	3	6.294264	-0.005	12.155	0.002386609
8174	3	6.296635	-0.005	12.15	0.002385627
7467	3	6.298477	-0.005	12.145	0.002384646
9090	4	6.300052	-0.005	12.14	0.002383664
1669	1	6.303712	-0.0075	12.1325	0.002382191
7370	3	6.305116	-0.005	12.1275	0.00238121
4382	3	6.305138	-0.005	12.1225	0.002380228
1838	2	6.307935	-0.00625	12.11625	0.002379001
4044	3	6.308646	-0.005	12.11125	0.002378019
5320	3	6.309857	-0.005	12.10625	0.002377037
4130	3	6.309911	-0.005	12.10125	0.002376055
6299	3	6.312071	-0.005	12.09625	0.002375074
7954	3	6.313858	-0.005	12.09125	0.002374092
5579	3	6.314197	-0.005	12.08625	0.00237311
2175	2	6.318234	-0.00625	12.08	0.002371883
7483	3	6.319582	-0.005	12.075	0.002370901
6092	3	6.322667	-0.005	12.07	0.002369919
6396	3	6.328474	-0.005	12.065	0.002368938
6048	3	6.329469	-0.005	12.06	0.002367956
2010	2	6.330045	-0.00625	12.05375	0.002366729
5524	3	6.330849	-0.005	12.04875	0.002365747
177	1	6.332755	-0.0075	12.04125	0.002364274
9865	4	6.334263	-0.005	12.03625	0.002363293
1706	1	6.334541	-0.0075	12.02875	0.00236182
6982	3	6.33517	-0.005	12.02375	0.002360838
1792	2	6.33636	-0.00625	12.0175	0.002359611
4217	3	6.341452	-0.005	12.0125	0.002358629
542	1	6.343246	-0.0075	12.005	0.002357157
3192	3	6.345556	-0.005	12	0.002356175
6244	3	6.34864	-0.005	11.995	0.002355193
9353	4	6.348902	-0.005	11.99	0.002354212
6302	3	6.349272	-0.005	11.985	0.00235323
2782	2	6.349559	-0.00625	11.97875	0.002352003
8305	3	6.350411	-0.005	11.97375	0.002351021
416	1	6.351054	-0.0075	11.96625	0.002349548
3916	3	6.351964	-0.005	11.96125	0.002348567
8856	4	6.351987	-0.005	11.95625	0.002347585
2210	2	6.353727	-0.00625	11.95	0.002346358
2701	2	6.357606	-0.00625	11.94375	0.002345131
3129	3	6.358766	-0.005	11.93875	0.002344149

8070	3	6.362419	-0.005	11.93375	0.002343167
1894	2	6.364283	-0.00625	11.9275	0.00234194
330	1	6.365058	-0.0075	11.92	0.002340467
674	1	6.367515	-0.0075	11.9125	0.002338995
1806	2	6.369657	-0.00625	11.90625	0.002337768
8090	3	6.370994	-0.005	11.90125	0.002336786
6158	3	6.372662	-0.005	11.89625	0.002335804
3863	3	6.37451	-0.005	11.89125	0.002334822
3202	3	6.375815	-0.005	11.88625	0.002333841
8986	4	6.378712	-0.005	11.88125	0.002332859
753	1	6.380489	-0.0075	11.87375	0.002331386
7594	3	6.383739	-0.005	11.86875	0.002330404
5678	3	6.385117	-0.005	11.86375	0.002329423
2232	2	6.388921	-0.00625	11.8575	0.002328196
3394	3	6.389726	-0.005	11.8525	0.002327214
976	1	6.391057	-0.0075	11.845	0.002325741
604	1	6.392785	-0.0075	11.8375	0.002324269
7100	3	6.392827	-0.005	11.8325	0.002323287
1376	1	6.394284	-0.0075	11.825	0.002321814
243	1	6.396111	-0.0075	11.8175	0.002320342
7969	3	6.396509	-0.005	11.8125	0.00231936
3248	3	6.399321	-0.005	11.8075	0.002318378
181	1	6.403112	-0.0075	11.8	0.002316906
2668	2	6.407076	-0.00625	11.79375	0.002315678
2143	2	6.410201	-0.00625	11.7875	0.002314451
4732	3	6.412913	-0.005	11.7825	0.002313469
8907	4	6.413284	-0.005	11.7775	0.002312488
869	1	6.413425	-0.0075	11.77	0.002311015
1191	1	6.414311	-0.0075	11.7625	0.002309543
426	1	6.414725	-0.0075	11.755	0.00230807
222	1	6.41475	-0.0075	11.7475	0.002306597
3787	3	6.416618	-0.005	11.7425	0.002305616
2319	2	6.417537	-0.00625	11.73625	0.002304388
4766	3	6.418311	-0.005	11.73125	0.002303407
6600	3	6.418537	-0.005	11.72625	0.002302425
8449	3	6.420065	-0.005	11.72125	0.002301443
4590	3	6.420708	-0.005	11.71625	0.002300461
868	1	6.427432	-0.0075	11.70875	0.002298989
2450	2	6.42778	-0.00625	11.7025	0.002297762
1272	1	6.428144	-0.0075	11.695	0.002296289
1642	1	6.432092	-0.0075	11.6875	0.002294816
2251	2	6.436	-0.00625	11.68125	0.002293589
1920	2	6.437049	-0.00625	11.675	0.002292362
4175	3	6.43873	-0.005	11.67	0.00229138
8376	3	6.440425	-0.005	11.665	0.002290399
1062	1	6.441481	-0.0075	11.6575	0.002288926
1879	2	6.441562	-0.00625	11.65125	0.002287699
1739	1	6.444357	-0.0075	11.64375	0.002286226
858	1	6.444934	-0.0075	11.63625	0.002284754
298	1	6.446639	-0.0075	11.62875	0.002283281
125	1	6.447978	-0.0075	11.62125	0.002281808
2793	2	6.449299	-0.00625	11.615	0.002280581

1004	1	6.450815	-0.0075	11.6075	0.002279109
5359	3	6.453525	-0.005	11.6025	0.002278127
580	1	6.454139	-0.0075	11.595	0.002276654
4934	3	6.454534	-0.005	11.59	0.002275672
697	1	6.454759	-0.0075	11.5825	0.0022742
8530	3	6.45492	-0.005	11.5775	0.002273218
716	1	6.455837	-0.0075	11.57	0.002271746
2071	2	6.456529	-0.00625	11.56375	0.002270518
338	1	6.457051	-0.0075	11.55625	0.002269046
1609	1	6.457353	-0.0075	11.54875	0.002267573
7950	3	6.46018	-0.005	11.54375	0.002266591
8845	4	6.465556	-0.005	11.53875	0.00226561
3116	3	6.46713	-0.005	11.53375	0.002264628
7671	3	6.471995	-0.005	11.52875	0.002263646
753	1	6.477686	-0.0075	11.52125	0.002262174
2522	2	6.480909	-0.00625	11.515	0.002260946
7726	3	6.481061	-0.005	11.51	0.002259965
9343	4	6.481669	-0.005	11.505	0.002258983
1303	1	6.482657	-0.0075	11.4975	0.00225751
1148	1	6.482691	-0.0075	11.49	0.002256038
591	1	6.482815	-0.0075	11.4825	0.002254565
3088	3	6.484258	-0.005	11.4775	0.002253583
2976	3	6.48534	-0.005	11.4725	0.002252602
1408	1	6.486792	-0.0075	11.465	0.002251129
1453	1	6.487205	-0.0075	11.4575	0.002249656
7009	3	6.490272	-0.005	11.4525	0.002248675
2530	2	6.494238	-0.00625	11.44625	0.002247447
2896	2	6.495358	-0.00625	11.44	0.00224622
57	1	6.49837	-0.0075	11.4325	0.002244748
2643	2	6.500169	-0.00625	11.42625	0.002243521
6361	3	6.500427	-0.005	11.42125	0.002242539
6602	3	6.501452	-0.005	11.41625	0.002241557
6103	3	6.502043	-0.005	11.41125	0.002240575
6455	3	6.507852	-0.005	11.40625	0.002239594
8316	3	6.509792	-0.005	11.40125	0.002238612
1333	1	6.513539	-0.0075	11.39375	0.002237139
203	1	6.514359	-0.0075	11.38625	0.002235667
2252	2	6.516628	-0.00625	11.38	0.002234439
4370	3	6.52149	-0.005	11.375	0.002233458
2079	2	6.522629	0.0125	11.3875	0.002235912
2079	2	6.524046	-0.00625	11.38125	0.002234685
5259	3	6.532297	-0.005	11.37625	0.002233703
9470	4	6.535194	-0.005	11.37125	0.002232721
6042	3	6.537867	-0.005	11.36625	0.00223174
4225	3	6.538936	-0.005	11.36125	0.002230758
928	1	6.540452	-0.0075	11.35375	0.002229285
590	1	6.541151	-0.0075	11.34625	0.002227813
2594	2	6.543361	-0.00625	11.34	0.002226586
1087	1	6.552864	-0.0075	11.3325	0.002225113
7789	3	6.553714	-0.005	11.3275	0.002224131
2079	2	6.554773	-0.00625	11.32125	0.002222904
5250	3	6.555492	-0.005	11.31625	0.002221922

6867	3	6.555847	-0.005	11.31125	0.002220941
1994	2	6.556572	-0.00625	11.305	0.002219713
6351	3	6.557598	-0.005	11.3	0.002218732
206	1	6.557617	-0.0075	11.2925	0.002217259
5648	3	6.557632	-0.005	11.2875	0.002216277
539	1	6.557922	-0.0075	11.28	0.002214805
5688	3	6.559487	-0.005	11.275	0.002213823
2398	2	6.560782	-0.00625	11.26875	0.002212596
4953	3	6.563403	-0.005	11.26375	0.002211614
3106	3	6.564727	-0.005	11.25875	0.002210632
449	1	6.566928	-0.0075	11.25125	0.00220916
3834	3	6.567128	-0.005	11.24625	0.002208178
7965	3	6.567558	-0.005	11.24125	0.002207196
6925	3	6.568828	-0.005	11.23625	0.002206214
5299	3	6.569665	-0.005	11.23125	0.002205233
1809	2	6.570547	-0.00625	11.225	0.002204005
2591	2	6.571441	-0.00625	11.21875	0.002202778
1136	1	6.57364	-0.0075	11.21125	0.002201306
964	1	6.575031	-0.0075	11.20375	0.002199833
7777	3	6.57823	-0.005	11.19875	0.002198851
7441	3	6.579175	-0.005	11.19375	0.00219787
9532	4	6.588557	-0.005	11.18875	0.002196888
2729	2	6.593837	-0.00625	11.1825	0.002195661
6429	3	6.594292	-0.005	11.1775	0.002194679
4384	3	6.594815	-0.005	11.1725	0.002193697
2707	2	6.599413	-0.00625	11.16625	0.00219247
1244	1	6.600798	-0.0075	11.15875	0.002190997
8290	3	6.601801	-0.005	11.15375	0.002190016
5190	3	6.602955	-0.005	11.14875	0.002189034
2767	2	6.603612	-0.00625	11.1425	0.002187807
8259	3	6.60465	-0.005	11.1375	0.002186825
11	1	6.609552	-0.0075	11.13	0.002185352
4194	3	6.610753	-0.005	11.125	0.002184371
1656	1	6.611065	-0.0075	11.1175	0.002182898
8654	3	6.615498	-0.005	11.1125	0.002181916
1093	1	6.615561	-0.0075	11.105	0.002180444
5510	3	6.618269	-0.005	11.1	0.002179462
3891	3	6.622857	-0.005	11.095	0.00217848
9192	4	6.623883	-0.005	11.09	0.002177499
4558	3	6.62799	-0.005	11.085	0.002176517
2074	2	6.629393	-0.00625	11.07875	0.00217529
5863	3	6.630549	-0.005	11.07375	0.002174308
2838	2	6.633269	-0.00625	11.0675	0.002173081
8399	3	6.634851	-0.005	11.0625	0.002172099
8550	3	6.635365	-0.005	11.0575	0.002171117
1219	1	6.636015	-0.0075	11.05	0.002169645
3346	3	6.639238	-0.005	11.045	0.002168663
119	1	6.639355	-0.0075	11.0375	0.00216719
5483	3	6.643641	-0.005	11.0325	0.002166209
5317	3	6.646139	-0.005	11.0275	0.002165227
6016	3	6.648967	-0.005	11.0225	0.002164245
4682	3	6.652153	-0.005	11.0175	0.002163263

1671	1	6.653351	-0.0075	11.01	0.002161791
9158	4	6.654457	-0.005	11.005	0.002160809
2465	2	6.654573	-0.00625	10.99875	0.002159582
4691	3	6.654809	-0.005	10.99375	0.0021586
7068	3	6.654908	-0.005	10.98875	0.002157618
8747	3	6.655394	-0.005	10.98375	0.002156637
2783	2	6.65673	-0.00625	10.9775	0.002155409
7396	3	6.658271	-0.005	10.9725	0.002154428
1369	1	6.659361	-0.0075	10.965	0.002152955
82	1	6.659839	-0.0075	10.9575	0.002151482
5554	3	6.660287	-0.005	10.9525	0.002150501
6742	3	6.665508	-0.005	10.9475	0.002149519
884	1	6.671771	-0.0075	10.94	0.002148046
8152	3	6.673078	-0.005	10.935	0.002147065
7644	3	6.677856	-0.005	10.93	0.002146083
1796	2	6.679821	-0.00625	10.92375	0.002144856
2749	2	6.682926	-0.00625	10.9175	0.002143629
2286	2	6.684231	-0.00625	10.91125	0.002142401
7663	3	6.686029	-0.005	10.90625	0.00214142
5912	3	6.688184	-0.005	10.90125	0.002140438
5094	3	6.688579	-0.005	10.89625	0.002139456
8588	3	6.688918	-0.005	10.89125	0.002138474
3486	3	6.693069	-0.005	10.88625	0.002137493
5235	3	6.699363	-0.005	10.88125	0.002136511
4660	3	6.70049	-0.005	10.87625	0.002135529
9500	4	6.701342	-0.005	10.87125	0.002134547
1484	1	6.702695	-0.0075	10.86375	0.002133075
5943	3	6.712073	-0.005	10.85875	0.002132093
1499	1	6.713185	-0.0075	10.85125	0.00213062
820	1	6.719813	-0.0075	10.84375	0.002129148
7116	3	6.720258	-0.005	10.83875	0.002128166
4161	3	6.723334	-0.005	10.83375	0.002127184
6862	3	6.727791	-0.005	10.82875	0.002126203
1963	2	6.729209	-0.00625	10.8225	0.002124975
2519	2	6.731346	-0.00625	10.81625	0.002123748
3846	3	6.731347	-0.005	10.81125	0.002122767
163	1	6.731457	-0.0075	10.80375	0.002121294
1592	1	6.731546	-0.0075	10.79625	0.002119821
7301	3	6.731688	-0.005	10.79125	0.00211884
402	1	6.732301	-0.0075	10.78375	0.002117367
1557	1	6.733247	-0.0075	10.77625	0.002115894
7440	3	6.737313	-0.005	10.77125	0.002114913
3623	3	6.738161	-0.005	10.76625	0.002113931
3311	3	6.740595	0.01	10.77625	0.002115894
6646	3	6.741906	-0.005	10.77125	0.002114913
306	1	6.750962	-0.0075	10.76375	0.00211344
8157	3	6.75706	-0.005	10.75875	0.002112458
1023	1	6.757879	-0.0075	10.75125	0.002110986
344	1	6.7647	-0.0075	10.74375	0.002109513
8115	3	6.772807	-0.005	10.73875	0.002108531
4010	3	6.779873	-0.005	10.73375	0.00210755
7893	3	6.781763	-0.005	10.72875	0.002106568

736	1	6.785167	-0.0075	10.72125	0.002105095
2057	2	6.785342	-0.00625	10.715	0.002103868
47	1	6.785475	-0.0075	10.7075	0.002102395
4435	3	6.786547	-0.005	10.7025	0.002101414
1290	1	6.789949	-0.0075	10.695	0.002099941
5371	3	6.79005	-0.005	10.69	0.002098959
3861	3	6.793014	-0.005	10.685	0.002097978
2105	2	6.796462	-0.00625	10.67875	0.00209675
8664	3	6.804488	-0.005	10.67375	0.002095769
794	1	6.821474	-0.0075	10.66625	0.002094296
4224	3	6.823849	-0.005	10.66125	0.002093314
207	1	6.829268	-0.0075	10.65375	0.002091842
9263	4	6.830629	-0.005	10.64875	0.00209086
4461	3	6.83253	-0.005	10.64375	0.002089878
2822	2	6.836115	-0.00625	10.6375	0.002088651
721	1	6.837971	-0.0075	10.63	0.002087178
4785	3	6.838481	-0.005	10.625	0.002086197
5703	3	6.840377	-0.005	10.62	0.002085215
6879	3	6.842885	-0.005	10.615	0.002084233
5164	3	6.85032	-0.005	10.61	0.002083252
7305	3	6.855396	-0.005	10.605	0.00208227
576	1	6.86123	-0.0075	10.5975	0.002080797
2444	2	6.861851	-0.00625	10.59125	0.00207957
304	1	6.863079	-0.0075	10.58375	0.002078097
7472	3	6.864922	-0.005	10.57875	0.002077116
8518	3	6.867781	-0.005	10.57375	0.002076134
2166	2	6.870794	-0.00625	10.5675	0.002074907
2432	2	6.871112	-0.00625	10.56125	0.00207368
7084	3	6.872411	-0.005	10.55625	0.002072698
921	1	6.873937	-0.0075	10.54875	0.002071225
4872	3	6.875291	-0.005	10.54375	0.002070243
6803	3	6.875836	-0.005	10.53875	0.002069262
2378	2	6.876216	-0.00625	10.5325	0.002068035
7742	3	6.877287	-0.005	10.5275	0.002067053
3855	3	6.879146	-0.005	10.5225	0.002066071
4885	3	6.879807	-0.005	10.5175	0.002065089
1777	2	6.88043	-0.00625	10.51125	0.002063862
3085	3	6.882123	-0.005	10.50625	0.00206288
286	1	6.883392	-0.0075	10.49875	0.002061408
7258	3	6.884318	-0.005	10.49375	0.002060426
329	1	6.884922	-0.0075	10.48625	0.002058953
1158	1	6.89123	-0.0075	10.47875	0.002057481
147	1	6.897991	-0.0075	10.47125	0.002056008
9769	4	6.898476	-0.005	10.46625	0.002055027
3323	3	6.90036	-0.005	10.46125	0.002054045
2097	2	6.904281	-0.00625	10.455	0.002052818
5210	3	6.910027	-0.005	10.45	0.002051836
813	1	6.912862	-0.0075	10.4425	0.002050363
2420	2	6.918821	-0.00625	10.43625	0.002049136
5368	3	6.919903	-0.005	10.43125	0.002048154
419	1	6.921827	-0.0075	10.42375	0.002046682
6011	3	6.923148	-0.005	10.41875	0.0020457

9687	4	6.924102	-0.005	10.41375	0.002044718
2563	2	6.924301	-0.00625	10.4075	0.002043491
7869	3	6.926417	-0.005	10.4025	0.002042509
3567	3	6.9278	-0.005	10.3975	0.002041528
8093	3	6.929024	-0.005	10.3925	0.002040546
4567	3	6.930185	-0.005	10.3875	0.002039564
9750	4	6.935045	-0.005	10.3825	0.002038582
572	1	6.937027	-0.0075	10.375	0.00203711
680	1	6.937386	-0.0075	10.3675	0.002035637
8379	3	6.939972	-0.005	10.3625	0.002034655
2445	2	6.942022	-0.00625	10.35625	0.002033428
4838	3	6.942088	-0.005	10.35125	0.002032446
703	1	6.943195	-0.0075	10.34375	0.002030974
2912	3	6.94858	-0.005	10.33875	0.002029992
6640	3	6.949041	-0.005	10.33375	0.00202901
74	1	6.958747	-0.0075	10.32625	0.002027538
2236	2	6.960438	-0.00625	10.32	0.002026311
7376	3	6.961396	-0.005	10.315	0.002025329
1550	1	6.962446	-0.0075	10.3075	0.002023856
192	1	6.965315	-0.0075	10.3	0.002022384
1791	2	6.967017	-0.00625	10.29375	0.002021156
463	1	6.967343	-0.0075	10.28625	0.002019684
1229	1	6.967857	-0.0075	10.27875	0.002018211
2311	2	6.968132	-0.00625	10.2725	0.002016984
3345	3	6.969685	-0.005	10.2675	0.002016002
490	1	6.969994	-0.0075	10.26	0.00201453
1020	1	6.973582	-0.0075	10.2525	0.002013057
9437	4	6.973984	-0.005	10.2475	0.002012075
9944	4	6.975565	-0.005	10.2425	0.002011094
741	1	6.977721	-0.0075	10.235	0.002009621
1867	2	6.977752	-0.00625	10.22875	0.002008394
9718	4	6.978471	-0.005	10.22375	0.002007412
7022	3	6.979444	-0.005	10.21875	0.00200643
2639	2	6.980701	-0.00625	10.2125	0.002005203
2172	2	6.982784	-0.00625	10.20625	0.002003976
4017	3	6.983347	-0.005	10.20125	0.002002994
5884	3	6.985108	-0.005	10.19625	0.002002013
7905	3	6.985756	-0.005	10.19125	0.002001031
1604	1	6.991219	-0.0075	10.18375	0.001999558
8488	3	6.992566	-0.005	10.17875	0.001998576
8276	3	6.993624	-0.005	10.17375	0.001997595
808	1	6.997002	-0.0075	10.16625	0.001996122
3426	3	7.000135	-0.005	10.16125	0.00199514
2548	2	7.002946	-0.00625	10.155	0.001993913
8230	3	7.005728	-0.005	10.15	0.001992931
7796	3	7.011139	-0.005	10.145	0.00199195
9481	4	7.011244	-0.005	10.14	0.001990968
2719	2	7.015563	-0.00625	10.13375	0.001989741
8122	3	7.016252	-0.005	10.12875	0.001988759
7051	3	7.01926	-0.005	10.12375	0.001987777
5936	3	7.021054	-0.005	10.11875	0.001986796
4805	3	7.02109	-0.005	10.11375	0.001985814

2357	2	7.024649	-0.00625	10.1075	0.001984587
9997	4	7.025052	-0.005	10.1025	0.001983605
5895	3	7.029764	-0.005	10.0975	0.001982623
7123	3	7.031938	-0.005	10.0925	0.001981641
8766	4	7.03358	-0.005	10.0875	0.00198066
9729	4	7.043255	-0.005	10.0825	0.001979678
3237	3	7.044201	-0.005	10.0775	0.001978696
2648	2	7.044519	-0.00625	10.07125	0.001977469
4091	3	7.048262	-0.005	10.06625	0.001976487
1629	1	7.049231	-0.0075	10.05875	0.001975015
1877	2	7.049616	-0.00625	10.0525	0.001973788
1842	2	7.049697	-0.00625	10.04625	0.00197256
4597	3	7.056124	-0.005	10.04125	0.001971579
6921	3	7.059573	-0.005	10.03625	0.001970597
2708	2	7.060262	-0.00625	10.03	0.00196937
2715	2	7.062835	-0.00625	10.02375	0.001968143
1023	1	7.067858	-0.0075	10.01625	0.00196667
6568	3	7.069275	-0.005	10.01125	0.001965688
5078	3	7.070401	-0.005	10.00625	0.001964706
756	1	7.073137	-0.0075	9.99875	0.001963234
8284	3	7.074523	-0.005	9.99375	0.001962252
7917	3	7.077512	-0.005	9.98875	0.00196127
8431	3	7.080965	-0.005	9.98375	0.001960289
327	1	7.080995	-0.0075	9.97625	0.001958816
2682	2	7.081578	-0.00625	9.97	0.001957589
644	1	7.082264	-0.0075	9.9625	0.001956116
6890	3	7.085352	-0.005	9.9575	0.001955134
2911	3	7.094625	-0.005	9.9525	0.001954153
9475	4	7.09798	-0.005	9.9475	0.001953171
6250	3	7.099763	-0.005	9.9425	0.001952189
170	1	7.099855	-0.0075	9.935	0.001950717
3826	3	7.099946	-0.005	9.93	0.001949735
4922	3	7.104429	-0.005	9.925	0.001948753
255	1	7.107383	-0.0075	9.9175	0.001947281
5235	3	7.108652	-0.005	9.9125	0.001946299
5364	3	7.108838	-0.005	9.9075	0.001945317
446	1	7.108884	-0.0075	9.9	0.001943844
155	1	7.115861	-0.0075	9.8925	0.001942372
2862	2	7.121287	-0.00625	9.88625	0.001941145
5166	3	7.121334	-0.005	9.88125	0.001940163
2407	2	7.125264	-0.00625	9.875	0.001938936
8752	4	7.128824	-0.005	9.87	0.001937954
5210	3	7.13268	-0.005	9.865	0.001936972
6389	3	7.139616	-0.005	9.86	0.001935991
1926	2	7.141217	-0.00625	9.85375	0.001934763
4061	3	7.146893	-0.005	9.84875	0.001933782
2321	2	7.148971	-0.00625	9.8425	0.001932554
7635	3	7.153123	-0.005	9.8375	0.001931573
8702	3	7.159621	-0.005	9.8325	0.001930591
7849	3	7.160898	-0.005	9.8275	0.001929609
76	1	7.162531	0.015	9.8425	0.001932554
5764	3	7.164286	-0.005	9.8375	0.001931573

4769	3	7.165312	-0.005	9.8325	0.001930591
2830	2	7.167644	-0.00625	9.82625	0.001929364
2012	2	7.170744	-0.00625	9.82	0.001928137
4887	3	7.172355	-0.005	9.815	0.001927155
7273	3	7.176682	-0.005	9.81	0.001926173
3809	3	7.177738	-0.005	9.805	0.001925191
3124	3	7.179097	-0.005	9.8	0.00192421
6564	3	7.182659	-0.005	9.795	0.001923228
6945	3	7.184639	-0.005	9.79	0.001922246
7336	3	7.185553	-0.005	9.785	0.001921264
8694	3	7.186562	-0.005	9.78	0.001920283
7973	3	7.191113	-0.005	9.775	0.001919301
8108	3	7.192087	-0.005	9.77	0.001918319
4916	3	7.195344	-0.005	9.765	0.001917338
2276	2	7.195501	-0.00625	9.75875	0.00191611
8321	3	7.196119	-0.005	9.75375	0.001915129
5709	3	7.197513	-0.005	9.74875	0.001914147
4268	3	7.197823	-0.005	9.74375	0.001913165
1184	1	7.199905	-0.0075	9.73625	0.001911693
8960	4	7.201015	-0.005	9.73125	0.001910711
6536	3	7.205058	-0.005	9.72625	0.001909729
1606	1	7.206186	-0.0075	9.71875	0.001908256
337	1	7.206903	-0.0075	9.71125	0.001906784
4584	3	7.208869	-0.005	9.70625	0.001905802
1856	2	7.213514	-0.00625	9.7	0.001904575
4811	3	7.213552	-0.005	9.695	0.001903593
3744	3	7.219666	-0.005	9.69	0.001902611
8757	4	7.223559	-0.005	9.685	0.00190163
135	1	7.228684	-0.0075	9.6775	0.001900157
9551	4	7.228856	-0.005	9.6725	0.001899175
2650	2	7.229887	-0.00625	9.66625	0.001897948
1131	1	7.235211	-0.0075	9.65875	0.001896476
958	1	7.236081	-0.0075	9.65125	0.001895003
1292	1	7.236316	-0.0075	9.64375	0.00189353
3331	3	7.2376	-0.005	9.63875	0.001892549
6871	3	7.2401	-0.005	9.63375	0.001891567
8026	3	7.241195	-0.005	9.62875	0.001890585
7657	3	7.241981	-0.005	9.62375	0.001889603
8062	3	7.242521	-0.005	9.61875	0.001888622
254	1	7.244324	-0.0075	9.61125	0.001887149
3516	3	7.24926	-0.005	9.60625	0.001886167
787	1	7.253215	-0.0075	9.59875	0.001884695
2855	2	7.255399	-0.00625	9.5925	0.001883468
2031	2	7.25708	-0.00625	9.58625	0.00188224
5253	3	7.259953	-0.005	9.58125	0.001881259
8043	3	7.260215	-0.005	9.57625	0.001880277
2414	2	7.262658	-0.00625	9.57	0.00187905
6503	3	7.266155	-0.005	9.565	0.001878068
8566	3	7.269676	-0.005	9.56	0.001877086
1082	1	7.271261	-0.0075	9.5525	0.001875614
5396	3	7.271829	-0.005	9.5475	0.001874632
2561	2	7.27247	-0.00625	9.54125	0.001873405

2769	2	7.272738	-0.00625	9.535	0.001872177
3566	3	7.273261	-0.005	9.53	0.001871196
6084	3	7.273996	-0.005	9.525	0.001870214
1752	1	7.276351	-0.0075	9.5175	0.001868741
4631	3	7.281294	-0.005	9.5125	0.00186776
3669	3	7.283301	-0.005	9.5075	0.001866778
7539	3	7.286593	-0.005	9.5025	0.001865796
8089	3	7.286947	-0.005	9.4975	0.001864814
9045	4	7.28753	-0.005	9.4925	0.001863833
7482	3	7.287687	-0.005	9.4875	0.001862851
6145	3	7.292242	-0.005	9.4825	0.001861869
4021	3	7.292601	-0.005	9.4775	0.001860887
8182	3	7.292671	-0.005	9.4725	0.001859906
2452	2	7.296635	-0.00625	9.46625	0.001858679
7812	3	7.298721	-0.005	9.46125	0.001857697
2763	2	7.299348	-0.00625	9.455	0.00185647
483	1	7.300024	-0.0075	9.4475	0.001854997
630	1	7.300404	-0.0075	9.44	0.001853524
7137	3	7.302493	-0.005	9.435	0.001852543
8722	3	7.304391	-0.005	9.43	0.001851561
315	1	7.307014	-0.0075	9.4225	0.001850088
2597	2	7.310843	-0.00625	9.41625	0.001848861
2365	2	7.313781	-0.00625	9.41	0.001847634
496	1	7.318736	-0.0075	9.4025	0.001846161
1110	1	7.31993	-0.0075	9.395	0.001844689
366	1	7.323179	-0.0075	9.3875	0.001843216
5763	3	7.323348	-0.005	9.3825	0.001842234
1795	2	7.326529	-0.00625	9.37625	0.001841007
3526	3	7.329124	-0.005	9.37125	0.001840026
5714	3	7.329228	-0.005	9.36625	0.001839044
518	1	7.33147	-0.0075	9.35875	0.001837571
3831	3	7.336552	-0.005	9.35375	0.001836589
241	1	7.337241	-0.0075	9.34625	0.001835117
1682	1	7.3377	-0.0075	9.33875	0.001833644
2257	2	7.344051	-0.00625	9.3325	0.001832417
6612	3	7.347996	-0.005	9.3275	0.001831435
4738	3	7.349457	-0.005	9.3225	0.001830454
602	1	7.349732	-0.0075	9.315	0.001828981
5866	3	7.35544	-0.005	9.31	0.001827999
8726	3	7.356618	-0.005	9.305	0.001827017
1913	2	7.35702	-0.00625	9.29875	0.00182579
3355	3	7.357249	-0.005	9.29375	0.001824809
5302	3	7.360108	-0.005	9.28875	0.001823827
9206	4	7.361148	-0.005	9.28375	0.001822845
284	1	7.366349	-0.0075	9.27625	0.001821372
1922	2	7.366594	-0.00625	9.27	0.001820145
76	1	7.368639	-0.0075	9.2625	0.001818673
8087	3	7.372243	-0.005	9.2575	0.001817691
492	1	7.379555	-0.0075	9.25	0.001816218
1395	1	7.385091	-0.0075	9.2425	0.001814746
2336	2	7.38635	-0.00625	9.23625	0.001813519
1325	1	7.394542	-0.0075	9.22875	0.001812046

7936	3	7.394636	-0.005	9.22375	0.001811064
7218	3	7.396739	-0.005	9.21875	0.001810082
6521	3	7.400292	-0.005	9.21375	0.001809101
1365	1	7.402277	-0.0075	9.20625	0.001807628
4523	3	7.403129	-0.005	9.20125	0.001806646
1554	1	7.405346	-0.0075	9.19375	0.001805174
6200	3	7.405761	-0.005	9.18875	0.001804192
4995	3	7.406922	-0.005	9.18375	0.00180321
522	1	7.408571	-0.0075	9.17625	0.001801738
124	1	7.409283	-0.0075	9.16875	0.001800265
4289	3	7.409566	-0.005	9.16375	0.001799283
503	1	7.414259	-0.0075	9.15625	0.001797811
6739	3	7.414272	-0.005	9.15125	0.001796829
1646	1	7.417481	-0.0075	9.14375	0.001795356
1422	1	7.418648	-0.0075	9.13625	0.001793884
7570	3	7.418717	-0.005	9.13125	0.001792902
2370	2	7.418754	-0.00625	9.125	0.001791675
4050	3	7.419431	-0.005	9.12	0.001790693
3452	3	7.422078	-0.005	9.115	0.001789711
8867	4	7.42793	-0.005	9.11	0.00178873
1950	2	7.431692	-0.00625	9.10375	0.001787502
5893	3	7.433502	-0.005	9.09875	0.001786521
2106	2	7.441822	-0.00625	9.0925	0.001785294
4431	3	7.444335	-0.005	9.0875	0.001784312
4762	3	7.447566	-0.005	9.0825	0.00178333
6035	3	7.451954	-0.005	9.0775	0.001782348
778	1	7.452234	-0.0075	9.07	0.001780876
6634	3	7.452744	-0.005	9.065	0.001779894
4183	3	7.453672	-0.005	9.06	0.001778912
2955	3	7.454803	-0.005	9.055	0.00177793
4168	3	7.455619	-0.005	9.05	0.001776949
2914	3	7.458387	-0.005	9.045	0.001775967
3082	3	7.458418	-0.005	9.04	0.001774985
5832	3	7.462491	-0.005	9.035	0.001774004
2774	2	7.463344	-0.00625	9.02875	0.001772776
2583	2	7.467974	-0.00625	9.0225	0.001771549
6696	3	7.470112	-0.005	9.0175	0.001770567
8000	3	7.471257	-0.005	9.0125	0.001769586
4841	3	7.473011	-0.005	9.0075	0.001768604
4417	3	7.476491	-0.005	9.0025	0.001767622
3575	3	7.478237	-0.005	8.9975	0.00176664
536	1	7.478734	-0.0075	8.99	0.001765168
7569	3	7.481162	-0.005	8.985	0.001764186
1509	1	7.482219	-0.0075	8.9775	0.001762714
165	1	7.487275	-0.0075	8.97	0.001761241
75	1	7.490121	-0.0075	8.9625	0.001759768
8304	3	7.493339	-0.005	8.9575	0.001758787
2664	2	7.499382	-0.00625	8.95125	0.001757559
2856	2	7.499796	-0.00625	8.945	0.001756332
939	1	7.500546	-0.0075	8.9375	0.00175486
7567	3	7.501784	-0.005	8.9325	0.001753878
8073	3	7.503382	-0.005	8.9275	0.001752896

1932	2	7.505586	-0.00625	8.92125	0.001751669
2833	2	7.508626	-0.00625	8.915	0.001750442
7394	3	7.508794	-0.005	8.91	0.00174946
8213	3	7.512468	-0.005	8.905	0.001748478
6761	3	7.513455	-0.005	8.9	0.001747497
3112	3	7.516035	-0.005	8.895	0.001746515
7147	3	7.519399	-0.005	8.89	0.001745533
6890	3	7.520732	-0.005	8.885	0.001744551
3174	3	7.522834	-0.005	8.88	0.00174357
886	1	7.522911	-0.0075	8.8725	0.001742097
3709	3	7.52378	-0.005	8.8675	0.001741115
4024	3	7.528399	-0.005	8.8625	0.001740134
8320	3	7.539869	-0.005	8.8575	0.001739152
8483	3	7.540246	-0.005	8.8525	0.00173817
577	1	7.541937	-0.0075	8.845	0.001736697
2552	2	7.543742	-0.00625	8.83875	0.00173547
8299	3	7.54702	-0.005	8.83375	0.001734489
8902	4	7.547354	-0.005	8.82875	0.001733507
137	1	7.548952	-0.0075	8.82125	0.001732034
9032	4	7.549093	-0.005	8.81625	0.001731052
437	1	7.555477	-0.0075	8.80875	0.00172958
5077	3	7.559102	-0.005	8.80375	0.001728598
3235	3	7.561864	-0.005	8.79875	0.001727616
1274	1	7.563435	-0.0075	8.79125	0.001726144
93	1	7.568549	-0.0075	8.78375	0.001724671
760	1	7.57034	-0.0075	8.77625	0.001723199
5954	3	7.572129	-0.005	8.77125	0.001722217
5873	3	7.573935	-0.005	8.76625	0.001721235
9549	4	7.574704	-0.005	8.76125	0.001720253
1705	1	7.574757	-0.0075	8.75375	0.001718781
5697	3	7.585679	-0.005	8.74875	0.001717799
9856	4	7.588753	-0.005	8.74375	0.001716817
8784	4	7.58923	-0.005	8.73875	0.001715835
8384	3	7.589296	-0.005	8.73375	0.001714854
1602	1	7.594321	-0.0075	8.72625	0.001713381
2708	2	7.596558	-0.00625	8.72	0.001712154
5288	3	7.598513	-0.005	8.715	0.001711172
293	1	7.598803	-0.0075	8.7075	0.0017097
3006	3	7.59978	-0.005	8.7025	0.001708718
6908	3	7.604208	-0.005	8.6975	0.001707736
5243	3	7.606336	-0.005	8.6925	0.001706754
3878	3	7.607061	0.01	8.7025	0.001708718
9946	4	7.607369	-0.005	8.6975	0.001707736
4672	3	7.621118	-0.005	8.6925	0.001706754
8530	3	7.622223	-0.005	8.6875	0.001705773
3818	3	7.624086	-0.005	8.6825	0.001704791
6990	3	7.627591	-0.005	8.6775	0.001703809
9268	4	7.627986	-0.005	8.6725	0.001702827
7182	3	7.630055	-0.005	8.6675	0.001701846
7453	3	7.630845	-0.005	8.6625	0.001700864
8392	3	7.632668	-0.005	8.6575	0.001699882
66	1	7.634573	-0.0075	8.65	0.00169841

9018	4	7.635058	-0.005	8.645	0.001697428
3092	3	7.6355	-0.005	8.64	0.001696446
190	1	7.636542	-0.0075	8.6325	0.001694973
3805	3	7.637541	-0.005	8.6275	0.001693992
3145	3	7.647317	-0.005	8.6225	0.00169301
2686	2	7.651124	-0.00625	8.61625	0.001691783
8866	4	7.652332	-0.005	8.61125	0.001690801
1636	1	7.653847	-0.0075	8.60375	0.001689328
8426	3	7.657072	-0.005	8.59875	0.001688347
8795	4	7.659736	-0.005	8.59375	0.001687365
4658	3	7.66167	-0.005	8.58875	0.001686383
7210	3	7.663939	-0.005	8.58375	0.001685402
1073	1	7.664684	-0.0075	8.57625	0.001683929
5011	3	7.666484	-0.005	8.57125	0.001682947
6146	3	7.668644	-0.005	8.56625	0.001681965
1788	2	7.669188	-0.00625	8.56	0.001680738
2810	2	7.675096	-0.00625	8.55375	0.001679511
9769	4	7.67604	-0.005	8.54875	0.001678529
4656	3	7.681493	-0.005	8.54375	0.001677548
382	1	7.683987	-0.0075	8.53625	0.001676075
2685	2	7.68434	-0.00625	8.53	0.001674848
9401	4	7.685112	-0.005	8.525	0.001673866
3878	3	7.686476	-0.005	8.52	0.001672884
9794	4	7.689599	-0.005	8.515	0.001671903
2745	2	7.689987	-0.00625	8.50875	0.001670675
2207	2	7.690147	-0.00625	8.5025	0.001669448
3640	3	7.695578	-0.005	8.4975	0.001668467
8586	3	7.696521	-0.005	8.4925	0.001667485
1052	1	7.699453	-0.0075	8.485	0.001666012
8110	3	7.700733	-0.005	8.48	0.00166503
3110	3	7.70372	-0.005	8.475	0.001664049
952	1	7.704741	-0.0075	8.4675	0.001662576
64	1	7.704997	-0.0075	8.46	0.001661103
2391	2	7.706454	-0.00625	8.45375	0.001659876
1954	2	7.710074	-0.00625	8.4475	0.001658649
2983	3	7.714867	-0.005	8.4425	0.001657667
1718	1	7.716704	-0.0075	8.435	0.001656195
9972	4	7.717716	-0.005	8.43	0.001655213
9655	4	7.718324	-0.005	8.425	0.001654231
4001	3	7.719536	-0.005	8.42	0.00165325
5512	3	7.720316	-0.005	8.415	0.001652268
8150	3	7.72298	-0.005	8.41	0.001651286
1859	2	7.724105	-0.00625	8.40375	0.001650059
840	1	7.724211	-0.0075	8.39625	0.001648586
6709	3	7.726567	-0.005	8.39125	0.001647605
1791	2	7.728367	-0.00625	8.385	0.001646377
1645	1	7.73049	-0.0075	8.3775	0.001644905
4441	3	7.734768	-0.005	8.3725	0.001643923
7540	3	7.737566	-0.005	8.3675	0.001642941
4869	3	7.738089	-0.005	8.3625	0.00164196
7584	3	7.740983	-0.005	8.3575	0.001640978
294	1	7.741685	-0.0075	8.35	0.001639505

3019	3	7.744879	-0.005	8.345	0.001638523
4844	3	7.745095	-0.005	8.34	0.001637542
8246	3	7.74629	-0.005	8.335	0.00163656
963	1	7.751354	-0.0075	8.3275	0.001635087
2369	2	7.75586	-0.00625	8.32125	0.00163386
859	1	7.756538	-0.0075	8.31375	0.001632388
2655	2	7.756936	-0.00625	8.3075	0.00163116
3311	3	7.763111	-0.005	8.3025	0.001630179
513	1	7.763819	-0.0075	8.295	0.001628706
1588	1	7.764573	-0.0075	8.2875	0.001627233
8631	3	7.76558	-0.005	8.2825	0.001626252
5402	3	7.769875	-0.005	8.2775	0.00162527
7373	3	7.769977	-0.005	8.2725	0.001624288
3842	3	7.772587	-0.005	8.2675	0.001623306
875	1	7.777611	-0.0075	8.26	0.001621834
1697	1	7.779348	-0.0075	8.2525	0.001620361
562	1	7.781793	-0.0075	8.245	0.001618889
2063	2	7.792465	-0.00625	8.23875	0.001617661
8483	3	7.797306	-0.005	8.23375	0.00161668
7033	3	7.799122	-0.005	8.22875	0.001615698
4088	3	7.801527	-0.005	8.22375	0.001614716
3853	3	7.807266	-0.005	8.21875	0.001613735
7448	3	7.80867	-0.005	8.21375	0.001612753
4935	3	7.809657	-0.005	8.20875	0.001611771
4461	3	7.813686	-0.005	8.20375	0.001610789
4113	3	7.826121	-0.005	8.19875	0.001609808
2812	2	7.826182	-0.00625	8.1925	0.00160858
5137	3	7.826496	-0.005	8.1875	0.001607599
5831	3	7.826605	-0.005	8.1825	0.001606617
5461	3	7.829384	-0.005	8.1775	0.001605635
25	1	7.833797	-0.0075	8.17	0.001604163
2566	2	7.83413	-0.00625	8.16375	0.001602935
7057	3	7.837463	-0.005	8.15875	0.001601954
3183	3	7.841914	-0.005	8.15375	0.001600972
5936	3	7.843841	-0.005	8.14875	0.00159999
5213	3	7.850635	-0.005	8.14375	0.001599008
4589	3	7.854932	-0.005	8.13875	0.001598027
8891	4	7.858969	-0.005	8.13375	0.001597045
661	1	7.859589	-0.0075	8.12625	0.001595572
421	1	7.862905	-0.0075	8.11875	0.0015941
6581	3	7.865975	-0.005	8.11375	0.001593118
2428	2	7.867904	-0.00625	8.1075	0.001591891
6724	3	7.876437	-0.005	8.1025	0.001590909
2329	2	7.877029	-0.00625	8.09625	0.001589682
6658	3	7.880726	-0.005	8.09125	0.0015887
3016	3	7.884192	-0.005	8.08625	0.001587718
9127	4	7.884392	-0.005	8.08125	0.001586737
6689	3	7.88482	-0.005	8.07625	0.001585755
5079	3	7.887065	-0.005	8.07125	0.001584773
7265	3	7.887401	-0.005	8.06625	0.001583791
1180	1	7.889261	-0.0075	8.05875	0.001582319
887	1	7.890838	-0.0075	8.05125	0.001580846

4736	3	7.891521	-0.005	8.04625	0.001579865
7037	3	7.895711	-0.005	8.04125	0.001578883
7686	3	7.896145	-0.005	8.03625	0.001577901
962	1	7.900479	-0.0075	8.02875	0.001576428
842	1	7.903981	-0.0075	8.02125	0.001574956
2721	2	7.905405	-0.00625	8.015	0.001573729
6730	3	7.907062	-0.005	8.01	0.001572747
1843	2	7.911102	-0.00625	8.00375	0.00157152
7282	3	7.912941	-0.005	7.99875	0.001570538
807	1	7.917629	-0.0075	7.99125	0.001569065
3150	3	7.91916	-0.005	7.98625	0.001568084
1381	1	7.920854	-0.0075	7.97875	0.001566611
1279	1	7.923015	-0.0075	7.97125	0.001565138
7375	3	7.924421	-0.005	7.96625	0.001564157
6666	3	7.932747	-0.005	7.96125	0.001563175
3753	3	7.936012	-0.005	7.95625	0.001562193
9901	4	7.939209	-0.005	7.95125	0.001561211
1119	1	7.939565	-0.0075	7.94375	0.001559739
60	1	7.942683	-0.0075	7.93625	0.001558266
277	1	7.943511	-0.0075	7.92875	0.001556794
259	1	7.94402	-0.0075	7.92125	0.001555321
2389	2	7.947895	-0.00625	7.915	0.001554094
337	1	7.950158	-0.0075	7.9075	0.001552621
9233	4	7.950506	-0.005	7.9025	0.00155164
4043	3	7.953927	-0.005	7.8975	0.001550658
644	1	7.955156	-0.0075	7.89	0.001549185
8133	3	7.955476	-0.005	7.885	0.001548203
214	1	7.955609	-0.0075	7.8775	0.001546731
2576	2	7.956526	-0.00625	7.87125	0.001545504
6234	3	7.958043	-0.005	7.86625	0.001544522
1572	1	7.958552	-0.0075	7.85875	0.001543049
6803	3	7.960533	-0.005	7.85375	0.001542068
2953	3	7.968226	-0.005	7.84875	0.001541086
2697	2	7.969178	-0.00625	7.8425	0.001539859
1670	1	7.974416	-0.0075	7.835	0.001538386
6808	3	7.974634	-0.005	7.83	0.001537404
3436	3	7.975017	-0.005	7.825	0.001536423
6947	3	7.978341	-0.005	7.82	0.001535441
2725	2	7.979736	-0.00625	7.81375	0.001534214
5216	3	7.980955	-0.005	7.80875	0.001533232
1935	2	7.981238	-0.00625	7.8025	0.001532005
2523	2	7.981544	-0.00625	7.79625	0.001530778
180	1	7.992361	-0.0075	7.78875	0.001529305
763	1	7.99625	-0.0075	7.78125	0.001527832
5460	3	8.001542	-0.005	7.77625	0.001526851
7808	3	8.003249	-0.005	7.77125	0.001525869
7730	3	8.003293	-0.005	7.76625	0.001524887
6576	3	8.003575	-0.005	7.76125	0.001523905
6323	3	8.004007	-0.005	7.75625	0.001522924
5566	3	8.004405	-0.005	7.75125	0.001521942
8917	4	8.009404	-0.005	7.74625	0.00152096
1331	1	8.018289	-0.0075	7.73875	0.001519488

3293	3	8.023899	-0.005	7.73375	0.001518506
6783	3	8.02603	-0.005	7.72875	0.001517524
1424	1	8.031237	-0.0075	7.72125	0.001516051
112	1	8.03241	-0.0075	7.71375	0.001514579
3624	3	8.034895	-0.005	7.70875	0.001513597
6985	3	8.039047	-0.005	7.70375	0.001512615
7447	3	8.040098	-0.005	7.69875	0.001511634
5008	3	8.040837	-0.005	7.69375	0.001510652
7312	3	8.047099	-0.005	7.68875	0.00150967
6614	3	8.049416	-0.005	7.68375	0.001508688
535	1	8.051019	-0.0075	7.67625	0.001507216
8418	3	8.054961	-0.005	7.67125	0.001506234
4730	3	8.06016	-0.005	7.66625	0.001505252
2051	2	8.060623	-0.00625	7.66	0.001504025
7469	3	8.069862	-0.005	7.655	0.001503043
5905	3	8.072606	-0.005	7.65	0.001502062
8060	3	8.083386	-0.005	7.645	0.00150108
3429	3	8.084105	-0.005	7.64	0.001500098
1241	1	8.084877	-0.0075	7.6325	0.001498626
4514	3	8.096219	-0.005	7.6275	0.001497644
3839	3	8.09848	-0.005	7.6225	0.001496662
1878	2	8.100295	-0.00625	7.61625	0.001495435
5195	3	8.110257	-0.005	7.61125	0.001494453
777	1	8.110538	-0.0075	7.60375	0.001492981
6835	3	8.111964	-0.005	7.59875	0.001491999
80	1	8.114959	-0.0075	7.59125	0.001490526
5915	3	8.118441	-0.005	7.58625	0.001489544
5823	3	8.122555	-0.005	7.58125	0.001488563
677	1	8.122706	-0.0075	7.57375	0.00148709
4663	3	8.126922	-0.005	7.56875	0.001486108
275	1	8.127798	-0.0075	7.56125	0.001484636
5958	3	8.138448	-0.005	7.55625	0.001483654
2267	2	8.139206	-0.00625	7.55	0.001482427
9084	4	8.14201	-0.005	7.545	0.001481445
8352	3	8.144577	-0.005	7.54	0.001480463
650	1	8.145635	-0.0075	7.5325	0.001478991
1313	1	8.14785	-0.0075	7.525	0.001477518
2335	2	8.150956	-0.00625	7.51875	0.001476291
4576	3	8.159053	-0.005	7.51375	0.001475309
745	1	8.160829	-0.0075	7.50625	0.001473837
1992	2	8.164647	-0.00625	7.5	0.001472609
9462	4	8.16831	-0.005	7.495	0.001471628
4422	3	8.169773	-0.005	7.49	0.001470646
882	1	8.177433	-0.0075	7.4825	0.001469173
1494	1	8.177836	-0.0075	7.475	0.001467701
22	1	8.179181	-0.0075	7.4675	0.001466228
4448	3	8.182513	-0.005	7.4625	0.001465246
5916	3	8.184695	-0.005	7.4575	0.001464265
4090	3	8.185167	-0.005	7.4525	0.001463283
6213	3	8.186448	-0.005	7.4475	0.001462301
2847	2	8.19309	-0.00625	7.44125	0.001461074
2745	2	8.193338	-0.00625	7.435	0.001459847

7923	3	8.195667	-0.005	7.43	0.001458865
2535	2	8.198559	-0.00625	7.42375	0.001457638
5600	3	8.199513	-0.005	7.41875	0.001456656
18	1	8.200292	-0.0075	7.41125	0.001455184
1200	1	8.201065	-0.0075	7.40375	0.001453711
7426	3	8.207628	-0.005	7.39875	0.001452729
1660	1	8.209918	-0.0075	7.39125	0.001451257
6766	3	8.210963	-0.005	7.38625	0.001450275
7417	3	8.220897	-0.005	7.38125	0.001449293
7212	3	8.22222	-0.005	7.37625	0.001448311
225	1	8.224316	-0.0075	7.36875	0.001446839
1105	1	8.226729	-0.0075	7.36125	0.001445366
3120	3	8.235574	-0.005	7.35625	0.001444384
341	1	8.236084	-0.0075	7.34875	0.001442912
3442	3	8.238518	-0.005	7.34375	0.00144193
2463	2	8.238678	-0.00625	7.3375	0.001440703
1032	1	8.239553	-0.0075	7.33	0.00143923
2926	3	8.242259	-0.005	7.325	0.001438249
133	1	8.243078	-0.0075	7.3175	0.001436776
2185	2	8.24734	-0.00625	7.31125	0.001435549
7912	3	8.249295	-0.005	7.30625	0.001434567
931	1	8.25228	-0.0075	7.29875	0.001433094
128	1	8.258003	-0.0075	7.29125	0.001431622
3876	3	8.258204	-0.005	7.28625	0.00143064
3976	3	8.260762	-0.005	7.28125	0.001429658
7591	3	8.261627	-0.005	7.27625	0.001428677
2076	2	8.262387	-0.00625	7.27	0.001427449
1025	1	8.264186	-0.0075	7.2625	0.001425977
9667	4	8.264531	-0.005	7.2575	0.001424995
3790	3	8.275147	-0.005	7.2525	0.001424013
26	1	8.284405	-0.0075	7.245	0.001422541
5320	3	8.285389	-0.005	7.24	0.001421559
81	1	8.289886	-0.0075	7.2325	0.001420086
8227	3	8.289959	-0.005	7.2275	0.001419105
2085	2	8.29256	-0.00625	7.22125	0.001417877
1185	1	8.293482	-0.0075	7.21375	0.001416405
1370	1	8.293707	-0.0075	7.20625	0.001414932
833	1	8.29778	-0.0075	7.19875	0.00141346
2193	2	8.302619	-0.00625	7.1925	0.001412232
5156	3	8.303716	-0.005	7.1875	0.001411251
2751	2	8.304547	-0.00625	7.18125	0.001410024
6538	3	8.304919	-0.005	7.17625	0.001409042
1937	2	8.309708	-0.00625	7.17	0.001407815
8095	3	8.32011	-0.005	7.165	0.001406833
184	1	8.327592	-0.0075	7.1575	0.00140536
4879	3	8.329477	-0.005	7.1525	0.001404379
6284	3	8.333448	-0.005	7.1475	0.001403397
482	1	8.338518	-0.0075	7.14	0.001401924
5676	3	8.338858	-0.005	7.135	0.001400942
3883	3	8.346382	-0.005	7.13	0.001399961
1319	1	8.346705	-0.0075	7.1225	0.001398488
7412	3	8.348674	-0.005	7.1175	0.001397506

6551	3	8.353669	-0.005	7.1125	0.001396525
9669	4	8.359725	-0.005	7.1075	0.001395543
3167	3	8.361388	-0.005	7.1025	0.001394561
5075	3	8.366196	-0.005	7.0975	0.001393579
585	1	8.366832	-0.0075	7.09	0.001392107
2836	2	8.367885	-0.00625	7.08375	0.00139088
8260	3	8.375282	-0.005	7.07875	0.001389898
3582	3	8.375455	-0.005	7.07375	0.001388916
1008	1	8.379991	-0.0075	7.06625	0.001387444
6825	3	8.380228	-0.005	7.06125	0.001386462
2139	2	8.384541	-0.00625	7.055	0.001385235
2402	2	8.385205	-0.00625	7.04875	0.001384007
1339	1	8.386459	-0.0075	7.04125	0.001382535
1257	1	8.386913	-0.0075	7.03375	0.001381062
8956	4	8.391443	-0.005	7.02875	0.001380081
3138	3	8.39446	-0.005	7.02375	0.001379099
6507	3	8.394779	-0.005	7.01875	0.001378117
5487	3	8.402731	-0.005	7.01375	0.001377135
618	1	8.405695	-0.0075	7.00625	0.001375663
4118	3	8.40737	-0.005	7.00125	0.001374681
504	1	8.409649	-0.0075	6.99375	0.001373208
3073	3	8.410771	-0.005	6.98875	0.001372227
4480	3	8.412299	-0.005	6.98375	0.001371245
6667	3	8.415956	-0.005	6.97875	0.001370263
178	1	8.416997	-0.0075	6.97125	0.00136879
4910	3	8.418348	-0.005	6.96625	0.001367809
1149	1	8.423341	-0.0075	6.95875	0.001366336
7249	3	8.424963	-0.005	6.95375	0.001365354
1359	1	8.429584	-0.0075	6.94625	0.001363882
5393	3	8.432504	-0.005	6.94125	0.0013629
96	1	8.436416	-0.0075	6.93375	0.001361427
8938	4	8.4386	-0.005	6.92875	0.001360446
7751	3	8.444148	-0.005	6.92375	0.001359464
9527	4	8.445687	-0.005	6.91875	0.001358482
3776	3	8.453437	-0.005	6.91375	0.0013575
7711	3	8.455427	-0.005	6.90875	0.001356519
2259	2	8.456028	-0.00625	6.9025	0.001355292
1135	1	8.456632	-0.0075	6.895	0.001353819
1433	1	8.46458	-0.0075	6.8875	0.001352346
6562	3	8.468371	-0.005	6.8825	0.001351365
4522	3	8.468883	-0.005	6.8775	0.001350383
1174	1	8.47072	-0.0075	6.87	0.00134891
6088	3	8.470929	-0.005	6.865	0.001347929
3858	3	8.479078	-0.005	6.86	0.001346947
3729	3	8.479583	-0.005	6.855	0.001345965
1711	1	8.479903	-0.0075	6.8475	0.001344492
2158	2	8.481265	-0.00625	6.84125	0.001343265
1275	1	8.493024	-0.0075	6.83375	0.001341793
2586	2	8.501728	-0.00625	6.8275	0.001340565
2283	2	8.508302	-0.00625	6.82125	0.001339338
8306	3	8.520042	-0.005	6.81625	0.001338357
8111	3	8.522488	-0.005	6.81125	0.001337375

9451	4	8.5257	-0.005	6.80625	0.001336393
8618	3	8.540329	-0.005	6.80125	0.001335411
2768	2	8.54147	-0.00625	6.795	0.001334184
5035	3	8.549039	-0.005	6.79	0.001333202
735	1	8.551275	-0.0075	6.7825	0.00133173
5942	3	8.552421	-0.005	6.7775	0.001330748
4678	3	8.552868	-0.005	6.7725	0.001329766
1721	1	8.55417	-0.0075	6.765	0.001328294
3757	3	8.554193	-0.005	6.76	0.001327312
299	1	8.561238	-0.0075	6.7525	0.001325839
956	1	8.562736	-0.0075	6.745	0.001324367
8983	4	8.564867	-0.005	6.74	0.001323385
3061	3	8.565355	-0.005	6.735	0.001322403
2848	2	8.569165	-0.00625	6.72875	0.001321176
4870	3	8.569428	-0.005	6.72375	0.001320194
2532	2	8.570976	-0.00625	6.7175	0.001318967
6010	3	8.576901	-0.005	6.7125	0.001317985
4646	3	8.579514	-0.005	6.7075	0.001317004
1813	2	8.580784	-0.00625	6.70125	0.001315777
2565	2	8.58336	-0.00625	6.695	0.001314549
1897	2	8.586195	-0.00625	6.68875	0.001313322
9947	4	8.588197	-0.005	6.68375	0.00131234
7481	3	8.592156	-0.005	6.67875	0.001311359
2520	2	8.599509	-0.00625	6.6725	0.001310132
2045	2	8.604927	-0.00625	6.66625	0.001308904
7575	3	8.607847	-0.005	6.66125	0.001307923
6999	3	8.611554	-0.005	6.65625	0.001306941
1345	1	8.614197	-0.0075	6.64875	0.001305468
4028	3	8.614233	-0.005	6.64375	0.001304487
558	1	8.615737	-0.0075	6.63625	0.001303014
624	1	8.617146	-0.0075	6.62875	0.001301541
1336	1	8.625131	-0.0075	6.62125	0.001300069
1248	1	8.626135	-0.0075	6.61375	0.001298596
1597	1	8.627897	-0.0075	6.60625	0.001297124
5742	3	8.630472	-0.005	6.60125	0.001296142
378	1	8.646119	-0.0075	6.59375	0.001294669
27	1	8.65224	-0.0075	6.58625	0.001293197
4618	3	8.653387	-0.005	6.58125	0.001292215
2624	2	8.653863	-0.00625	6.575	0.001290988
1578	1	8.655109	-0.0075	6.5675	0.001289515
5945	3	8.657609	-0.005	6.5625	0.001288533
4755	3	8.659599	-0.005	6.5575	0.001287552
6346	3	8.659736	-0.005	6.5525	0.00128657
2371	2	8.662537	-0.00625	6.54625	0.001285343
3321	3	8.680157	-0.005	6.54125	0.001284361
1203	1	8.681591	-0.0075	6.53375	0.001282888
7974	3	8.683943	-0.005	6.52875	0.001281907
6766	3	8.687484	-0.005	6.52375	0.001280925
5172	3	8.688112	-0.005	6.51875	0.001279943
3934	3	8.688945	-0.005	6.51375	0.001278961
4731	3	8.690086	-0.005	6.50875	0.00127798
658	1	8.690838	-0.0075	6.50125	0.001276507

5354	3	8.691777	-0.005	6.49625	0.001275525
4145	3	8.693795	-0.005	6.49125	0.001274543
2062	2	8.69773	-0.00625	6.485	0.001273316
1480	1	8.706258	-0.0075	6.4775	0.001271844
2352	2	8.707926	-0.00625	6.47125	0.001270617
7530	3	8.712121	-0.005	6.46625	0.001269635
8494	3	8.718997	-0.005	6.46125	0.001268653
6796	3	8.719612	-0.005	6.45625	0.001267671
8922	4	8.723745	-0.005	6.45125	0.00126669
3644	3	8.724564	-0.005	6.44625	0.001265708
2317	2	8.72686	-0.00625	6.44	0.001264481
7875	3	8.727507	-0.005	6.435	0.001263499
179	1	8.728092	-0.0075	6.4275	0.001262026
8	1	8.729256	-0.0075	6.42	0.001260554
1600	1	8.735037	-0.0075	6.4125	0.001259081
988	1	8.74444	-0.0075	6.405	0.001257608
1684	1	8.748813	-0.0075	6.3975	0.001256136
5768	3	8.757724	-0.005	6.3925	0.001255154
1161	1	8.757759	-0.0075	6.385	0.001253682
2994	3	8.762199	-0.005	6.38	0.0012527
2207	2	8.762927	-0.00625	6.37375	0.001251473
7459	3	8.771633	-0.005	6.36875	0.001250491
281	1	8.777242	-0.0075	6.36125	0.001249018
216	1	8.785667	-0.0075	6.35375	0.001247546
1132	1	8.787557	-0.0075	6.34625	0.001246073
4298	3	8.787977	-0.005	6.34125	0.001245091
2339	2	8.799039	-0.00625	6.335	0.001243864
3973	3	8.7991	-0.005	6.33	0.001242882
1404	1	8.80449	-0.0075	6.3225	0.00124141
5770	3	8.809759	-0.005	6.3175	0.001240428
3261	3	8.811749	-0.005	6.3125	0.001239446
5963	3	8.819187	-0.005	6.3075	0.001238465
5047	3	8.81969	-0.005	6.3025	0.001237483
1010	1	8.831212	-0.0075	6.295	0.00123601
6094	3	8.831529	-0.005	6.29	0.001235028
1177	1	8.842373	-0.0075	6.2825	0.001233556
1909	2	8.844936	-0.00625	6.27625	0.001232329
6578	3	8.848999	-0.005	6.27125	0.001231347
2674	2	8.854219	-0.00625	6.265	0.00123012
6438	3	8.855441	-0.005	6.26	0.001229138
692	1	8.860182	-0.0075	6.2525	0.001227665
3272	3	8.866272	-0.005	6.2475	0.001226684
2515	2	8.879066	-0.00625	6.24125	0.001225457
8037	3	8.882737	-0.005	6.23625	0.001224475
1416	1	8.884887	-0.0075	6.22875	0.001223002
2201	2	8.888029	-0.00625	6.2225	0.001221775
265	1	8.891906	-0.0075	6.215	0.001220302
5032	3	8.892637	-0.005	6.21	0.001219321
7339	3	8.897852	-0.005	6.205	0.001218339
1193	1	8.912989	-0.0075	6.1975	0.001216866
358	1	8.918181	-0.0075	6.19	0.001215394
1031	1	8.920608	-0.0075	6.1825	0.001213921

3665	3	8.921641	-0.005	6.1775	0.001212939
7424	3	8.922035	-0.005	6.1725	0.001211958
1456	1	8.924833	-0.0075	6.165	0.001210485
6930	3	8.928139	-0.005	6.16	0.001209503
586	1	8.92868	-0.0075	6.1525	0.001208031
2602	2	8.934157	-0.00625	6.14625	0.001206803
401	1	8.938877	-0.0075	6.13875	0.001205331
2002	2	8.942969	-0.00625	6.1325	0.001204104
3878	3	8.950605	-0.005	6.1275	0.001203122
2556	2	8.953086	-0.00625	6.12125	0.001201895
4004	3	8.954095	-0.005	6.11625	0.001200913
4650	3	8.955886	-0.005	6.11125	0.001199931
819	1	8.95746	-0.0075	6.10375	0.001198459
2243	2	8.972271	-0.00625	6.0975	0.001197231
1811	2	8.980049	-0.00625	6.09125	0.001196004
2928	3	8.981045	-0.005	6.08625	0.001195023
696	1	8.982953	-0.0075	6.07875	0.00119355
3701	3	8.985324	-0.005	6.07375	0.001192568
2340	2	8.985509	-0.00625	6.0675	0.001191341
114	1	8.989366	-0.0075	6.06	0.001189868
3404	3	8.996714	-0.005	6.055	0.001188887
4227	3	8.99882	-0.005	6.05	0.001187905
2219	2	9.001792	-0.00625	6.04375	0.001186678
9432	4	9.001852	-0.005	6.03875	0.001185696
444	1	9.002765	-0.0075	6.03125	0.001184223
3264	3	9.003556	-0.005	6.02625	0.001183242
1911	2	9.003749	-0.00625	6.02	0.001182015
2766	2	9.004119	-0.00625	6.01375	0.001180787
7019	3	9.005068	-0.005	6.00875	0.001179806
7430	3	9.008121	-0.005	6.00375	0.001178824
5425	3	9.008503	-0.005	5.99875	0.001177842
2826	2	9.010488	-0.00625	5.9925	0.001176615
6413	3	9.01318	-0.005	5.9875	0.001175633
4398	3	9.019052	-0.005	5.9825	0.001174651
8385	3	9.028365	-0.005	5.9775	0.00117367
2773	2	9.030363	-0.00625	5.97125	0.001172443
4981	3	9.030492	-0.005	5.96625	0.001171461
2835	2	9.030685	-0.00625	5.96	0.001170234
348	1	9.039821	-0.0075	5.9525	0.001168761
450	1	9.040201	-0.0075	5.945	0.001167288
6351	3	9.04137	-0.005	5.94	0.001166307
1266	1	9.044789	-0.0075	5.9325	0.001164834
6769	3	9.046317	-0.005	5.9275	0.001163852
2792	2	9.050916	-0.00625	5.92125	0.001162625
2427	2	9.054038	-0.00625	5.915	0.001161398
1775	2	9.061773	-0.00625	5.90875	0.001160171
7649	3	9.062554	-0.005	5.90375	0.001159189
7917	3	9.064541	-0.005	5.89875	0.001158207
4570	3	9.066968	-0.005	5.89375	0.001157226
8310	3	9.070822	-0.005	5.88875	0.001156244
1239	1	9.076136	-0.0075	5.88125	0.001154771
346	1	9.076457	-0.0075	5.87375	0.001153299

2706	2	9.084237	0.0125	5.88625	0.001155753
7026	3	9.090252	-0.005	5.88125	0.001154771
7973	3	9.094597	-0.005	5.87625	0.00115379
7512	3	9.101313	-0.005	5.87125	0.001152808
5167	3	9.10657	-0.005	5.86625	0.001151826
5746	3	9.113105	-0.005	5.86125	0.001150844
5817	3	9.11573	-0.005	5.85625	0.001149863
4852	3	9.12007	-0.005	5.85125	0.001148881
624	1	9.120357	-0.0075	5.84375	0.001147408
4080	3	9.124478	-0.005	5.83875	0.001146426
4438	3	9.126029	-0.005	5.83375	0.001145445
2864	2	9.129584	-0.00625	5.8275	0.001144218
3537	3	9.12959	-0.005	5.8225	0.001143236
39	1	9.132831	-0.0075	5.815	0.001141763
1660	1	9.138446	-0.0075	5.8075	0.001140291
6249	3	9.140416	-0.005	5.8025	0.001139309
2484	2	9.144157	-0.00625	5.79625	0.001138082
2489	2	9.161305	-0.00625	5.79	0.001136855
3720	3	9.168541	-0.005	5.785	0.001135873
3760	3	9.172186	-0.005	5.78	0.001134891
9725	4	9.173005	-0.005	5.775	0.001133909
3730	3	9.174295	-0.005	5.77	0.001132928
2024	2	9.178086	-0.00625	5.76375	0.0011317
1252	1	9.184859	-0.0075	5.75625	0.001130228
1504	1	9.19057	-0.0075	5.74875	0.001128755
2978	3	9.198203	-0.005	5.74375	0.001127773
1828	2	9.199465	-0.00625	5.7375	0.001126546
5107	3	9.200177	-0.005	5.7325	0.001125565
2462	2	9.201298	-0.00625	5.72625	0.001124337
2647	2	9.202442	-0.00625	5.72	0.00112311
1166	1	9.205509	-0.0075	5.7125	0.001121638
1991	2	9.213198	-0.00625	5.70625	0.00112041
1139	1	9.213618	-0.0075	5.69875	0.001118938
4904	3	9.219639	-0.005	5.69375	0.001117956
9888	4	9.220376	-0.005	5.68875	0.001116974
8049	3	9.225834	-0.005	5.68375	0.001115993
9604	4	9.22692	-0.005	5.67875	0.001115011
8589	3	9.227099	-0.005	5.67375	0.001114029
8526	3	9.227841	-0.005	5.66875	0.001113047
4115	3	9.227853	-0.005	5.66375	0.001112066
6584	3	9.230457	-0.005	5.65875	0.001111084
3663	3	9.231128	-0.005	5.65375	0.001110102
3380	3	9.238541	-0.005	5.64875	0.00110912
783	1	9.241322	-0.0075	5.64125	0.001107648
8737	3	9.24191	-0.005	5.63625	0.001106666
1309	1	9.244976	-0.0075	5.62875	0.001105193
599	1	9.250264	-0.0075	5.62125	0.001103721
6156	3	9.250458	-0.005	5.61625	0.001102739
9012	4	9.264321	-0.005	5.61125	0.001101757
314	1	9.264556	-0.0075	5.60375	0.001100285
1562	1	9.267206	-0.0075	5.59625	0.001098812
2453	2	9.269865	-0.00625	5.59	0.001097585

3629	3	9.275708	-0.005	5.585	0.001096603
250	1	9.277462	-0.0075	5.5775	0.001095131
4076	3	9.280126	-0.005	5.5725	0.001094149
7546	3	9.280591	-0.005	5.5675	0.001093167
4166	3	9.280893	-0.005	5.5625	0.001092185
356	1	9.284209	-0.0075	5.555	0.001090713
5087	3	9.285313	-0.005	5.55	0.001089731
1080	1	9.28921	-0.0075	5.5425	0.001088258
4800	3	9.28979	-0.005	5.5375	0.001087277
331	1	9.292792	-0.0075	5.53	0.001085804
3129	3	9.296382	-0.005	5.525	0.001084822
5755	3	9.301916	-0.005	5.52	0.001083841
2754	2	9.303292	-0.00625	5.51375	0.001082613
3873	3	9.314217	-0.005	5.50875	0.001081632
1954	2	9.317664	-0.00625	5.5025	0.001080404
7992	3	9.319356	-0.005	5.4975	0.001079423
754	1	9.33491	-0.0075	5.49	0.00107795
1226	1	9.341291	-0.0075	5.4825	0.001076478
4186	3	9.342971	-0.005	5.4775	0.001075496
164	1	9.345546	-0.0075	5.47	0.001074023
2377	2	9.346104	-0.00625	5.46375	0.001072796
210	1	9.351386	-0.0075	5.45625	0.001071323
8100	3	9.353549	-0.005	5.45125	0.001070342
934	1	9.354711	-0.0075	5.44375	0.001068869
8577	3	9.361528	-0.005	5.43875	0.001067887
7174	3	9.365721	-0.005	5.43375	0.001066906
7360	3	9.366777	-0.005	5.42875	0.001065924
9910	4	9.368474	-0.005	5.42375	0.001064942
6078	3	9.373388	-0.005	5.41875	0.00106396
5128	3	9.37355	-0.005	5.41375	0.001062979
7990	3	9.381636	-0.005	5.40875	0.001061997
1704	1	9.381805	-0.0075	5.40125	0.001060524
5022	3	9.385213	-0.005	5.39625	0.001059543
9667	4	9.38752	-0.005	5.39125	0.001058561
7510	3	9.392919	-0.005	5.38625	0.001057579
5301	3	9.393316	-0.005	5.38125	0.001056597
1154	1	9.396811	-0.0075	5.37375	0.001055125
420	1	9.400211	-0.0075	5.36625	0.001053652
1128	1	9.404633	-0.0075	5.35875	0.001052179
2665	2	9.40529	-0.00625	5.3525	0.001050952
3489	3	9.405379	-0.005	5.3475	0.001049971
2220	2	9.408806	-0.00625	5.34125	0.001048743
6330	3	9.41412	-0.005	5.33625	0.001047762
2404	2	9.418602	-0.00625	5.33	0.001046534
8161	3	9.419742	-0.005	5.325	0.001045553
5500	3	9.430489	-0.005	5.32	0.001044571
2897	2	9.43385	-0.00625	5.31375	0.001043344
2285	2	9.436188	-0.00625	5.3075	0.001042117
3263	3	9.437345	-0.005	5.3025	0.001041135
1502	1	9.441891	-0.0075	5.295	0.001039662
3382	3	9.443151	-0.005	5.29	0.001038681
9648	4	9.447984	-0.005	5.285	0.001037699

6120	3	9.454489	-0.005	5.28	0.001036717
647	1	9.459678	-0.0075	5.2725	0.001035244
8798	4	9.461916	-0.005	5.2675	0.001034263
7186	3	9.46473	-0.005	5.2625	0.001033281
8121	3	9.465158	-0.005	5.2575	0.001032299
2887	2	9.469217	-0.00625	5.25125	0.001031072
5227	3	9.476432	-0.005	5.24625	0.00103009
5767	3	9.476465	-0.005	5.24125	0.001029109
4823	3	9.479252	-0.005	5.23625	0.001028127
2187	2	9.480221	-0.00625	5.23	0.0010269
8039	3	9.482531	-0.005	5.225	0.001025918
7399	3	9.492676	-0.005	5.22	0.001024936
1424	1	9.507193	-0.0075	5.2125	0.001023464
7612	3	9.509566	-0.005	5.2075	0.001022482
3344	3	9.51469	-0.005	5.2025	0.0010215
5546	3	9.515285	-0.005	5.1975	0.001020518
7587	3	9.517023	-0.005	5.1925	0.001019537
2304	2	9.534175	-0.00625	5.18625	0.001018309
610	1	9.539918	-0.0075	5.17875	0.001016837
2956	3	9.540328	-0.005	5.17375	0.001015855
546	1	9.542949	-0.0075	5.16625	0.001014382
3117	3	9.543082	-0.005	5.16125	0.001013401
8534	3	9.546232	-0.005	5.15625	0.001012419
9024	4	9.550349	-0.005	5.15125	0.001011437
806	1	9.556355	-0.0075	5.14375	0.001009965
1608	1	9.560514	-0.0075	5.13625	0.001008492
4444	3	9.570258	-0.005	5.13125	0.00100751
1033	1	9.5752	-0.0075	5.12375	0.001006038
8278	3	9.576799	-0.005	5.11875	0.001005056
9851	4	9.586207	-0.005	5.11375	0.001004074
3780	3	9.591071	-0.005	5.10875	0.001003092
2401	2	9.593648	-0.00625	5.1025	0.001001865
4835	3	9.596745	-0.005	5.0975	0.001000884
1243	1	9.597331	-0.0075	5.09	0.000999411
4606	3	9.602971	-0.005	5.085	0.000998429
148	1	9.607402	-0.0075	5.0775	0.000996957
1952	2	9.607537	-0.00625	5.07125	0.000995729
4924	3	9.613155	-0.005	5.06625	0.000994748
2035	2	9.622349	-0.00625	5.06	0.000993521
2788	2	9.630021	-0.00625	5.05375	0.000992293
3077	3	9.630992	-0.005	5.04875	0.000991312
2235	2	9.631053	-0.00625	5.0425	0.000990084
2917	3	9.632888	-0.005	5.0375	0.000989103
5053	3	9.634188	-0.005	5.0325	0.000988121
6403	3	9.637042	-0.005	5.0275	0.000987139
666	1	9.641938	-0.0075	5.02	0.000985667
4408	3	9.646158	-0.005	5.015	0.000984685
7117	3	9.646572	-0.005	5.01	0.000983703
1998	2	9.647114	-0.00625	5.00375	0.000982476
7482	3	9.653811	-0.005	4.99875	0.000981494
89	1	9.65413	-0.0075	4.99125	0.000980022
6756	3	9.662257	-0.005	4.98625	0.00097904

5359	3	9.665949	-0.005	4.98125	0.000978058
6493	3	9.667003	-0.005	4.97625	0.000977076
371	1	9.677042	-0.0075	4.96875	0.000975604
373	1	9.677121	-0.0075	4.96125	0.000974131
9676	4	9.68843	-0.005	4.95625	0.000973149
530	1	9.690946	-0.0075	4.94875	0.000971677
8746	3	9.691621	-0.005	4.94375	0.000970695
927	1	9.693587	-0.0075	4.93625	0.000969222
1101	1	9.69704	-0.0075	4.92875	0.00096775
1890	2	9.698097	-0.00625	4.9225	0.000966523
5165	3	9.710104	-0.005	4.9175	0.000965541
7310	3	9.714824	-0.005	4.9125	0.000964559
3480	3	9.715581	-0.005	4.9075	0.000963577
3196	3	9.7163	-0.005	4.9025	0.000962596
868	1	9.716895	-0.0075	4.895	0.000961123
8473	3	9.718366	-0.005	4.89	0.000960141
2502	2	9.719416	-0.00625	4.88375	0.000958914
501	1	9.734243	-0.0075	4.87625	0.000957442
1117	1	9.735548	-0.0075	4.86875	0.000955969
570	1	9.73659	-0.0075	4.86125	0.000954496
1107	1	9.7376	-0.0075	4.85375	0.000953024
5713	3	9.74058	-0.005	4.84875	0.000952042
1321	1	9.743511	-0.0075	4.84125	0.000950569
1886	2	9.74377	-0.00625	4.835	0.000949342
1167	1	9.749334	-0.0075	4.8275	0.00094787
2264	2	9.750081	-0.00625	4.82125	0.000946642
1778	2	9.751801	-0.00625	4.815	0.000945415
2273	2	9.754688	-0.00625	4.80875	0.000944188
1264	1	9.755039	-0.0075	4.80125	0.000942715
3643	3	9.75595	-0.005	4.79625	0.000941734
2116	2	9.774525	-0.00625	4.79	0.000940507
441	1	9.774711	-0.0075	4.7825	0.000939034
5337	3	9.776024	-0.005	4.7775	0.000938052
2424	2	9.784467	-0.00625	4.77125	0.000936825
2638	2	9.795358	-0.00625	4.765	0.000935598
1598	1	9.795541	-0.0075	4.7575	0.000934125
2593	2	9.797325	-0.00625	4.75125	0.000932898
4765	3	9.797907	-0.005	4.74625	0.000931916
2010	2	9.802828	-0.00625	4.74	0.000930689
4758	3	9.811536	-0.005	4.735	0.000929707
2547	2	9.814013	-0.00625	4.72875	0.00092848
8476	3	9.814019	-0.005	4.72375	0.000927499
1227	1	9.817239	-0.0075	4.71625	0.000926026
5562	3	9.817565	-0.005	4.71125	0.000925044
453	1	9.826083	-0.0075	4.70375	0.000923572
2140	2	9.826123	-0.00625	4.6975	0.000922344
6617	3	9.829311	-0.005	4.6925	0.000921363
55	1	9.83274	-0.0075	4.685	0.00091989
1375	1	9.833937	-0.0075	4.6775	0.000918417
3232	3	9.836326	-0.005	4.6725	0.000917436
5593	3	9.836346	-0.005	4.6675	0.000916454
2705	2	9.853892	-0.00625	4.66125	0.000915227

430	1	9.860371	-0.0075	4.65375	0.000913754
1323	1	9.870106	-0.0075	4.64625	0.000912282
5998	3	9.872645	-0.005	4.64125	0.0009113
4386	3	9.873514	-0.005	4.63625	0.000910318
1017	1	9.881766	-0.0075	4.62875	0.000908845
969	1	9.88208	-0.0075	4.62125	0.000907373
7694	3	9.88593	-0.005	4.61625	0.000906391
3049	3	9.886175	-0.005	4.61125	0.000905409
9528	4	9.887075	-0.005	4.60625	0.000904428
6677	3	9.896654	-0.005	4.60125	0.000903446
622	1	9.896903	-0.0075	4.59375	0.000901973
7520	3	9.899968	-0.005	4.58875	0.000900992
5387	3	9.901527	-0.005	4.58375	0.00090001
2870	2	9.90441	-0.00625	4.5775	0.000898783
5246	3	9.9134	-0.005	4.5725	0.000897801
6997	3	9.921083	-0.005	4.5675	0.000896819
9182	4	9.931431	-0.005	4.5625	0.000895837
1063	1	9.933097	-0.0075	4.555	0.000894365
2036	2	9.947275	-0.00625	4.54875	0.000893138
9837	4	9.961407	-0.005	4.54375	0.000892156
7857	3	9.961725	-0.005	4.53875	0.000891174
863	1	9.962615	-0.0075	4.53125	0.000889702
5656	3	9.964697	-0.005	4.52625	0.00088872
8731	3	9.97186	-0.005	4.52125	0.000887738
7157	3	9.972849	-0.005	4.51625	0.000886756
3882	3	9.975631	-0.005	4.51125	0.000885775
1124	1	9.981623	-0.0075	4.50375	0.000884302
3897	3	9.982974	-0.005	4.49875	0.00088332
8430	3	9.990437	-0.005	4.49375	0.000882339
6072	3	9.994414	-0.005	4.48875	0.000881357
1861	2	9.998764	-0.00625	4.4825	0.00088013
949	1	10.00054	-0.0075	4.475	0.000878657
383	1	10.00471	-0.0075	4.4675	0.000877184
7810	3	10.00481	-0.005	4.4625	0.000876203
7417	3	10.01042	-0.005	4.4575	0.000875221
7900	3	10.01195	-0.005	4.4525	0.000874239
1378	1	10.02662	-0.0075	4.445	0.000872767
6180	3	10.02803	-0.005	4.44	0.000871785
9722	4	10.03196	-0.005	4.435	0.000870803
127	1	10.04242	-0.0075	4.4275	0.00086933
1344	1	10.04653	-0.0075	4.42	0.000867858
4375	3	10.04937	-0.005	4.415	0.000866876
9116	4	10.05517	-0.005	4.41	0.000865894
6715	3	10.06109	-0.005	4.405	0.000864913
9366	4	10.06808	-0.005	4.4	0.000863931
7522	3	10.07362	-0.005	4.395	0.000862949
679	1	10.07404	-0.0075	4.3875	0.000861477
2746	2	10.09264	-0.00625	4.38125	0.000860249
823	1	10.09655	-0.0075	4.37375	0.000858777
4088	3	10.09705	-0.005	4.36875	0.000857795
6326	3	10.09789	-0.005	4.36375	0.000856813
4653	3	10.09967	-0.005	4.35875	0.000855832

1460	1	10.11168	-0.0075	4.35125	0.000854359
2041	2	10.12539	-0.00625	4.345	0.000853132
7240	3	10.12855	-0.005	4.34	0.00085215
1903	2	10.13209	-0.00625	4.33375	0.000850923
4575	3	10.13452	-0.005	4.32875	0.000849941
5002	3	10.13827	-0.005	4.32375	0.000848959
6359	3	10.14196	-0.005	4.31875	0.000847978
2747	2	10.14326	-0.00625	4.3125	0.00084675
8702	3	10.15124	-0.005	4.3075	0.000845769
1234	1	10.16728	-0.0075	4.3	0.000844296
3570	3	10.16755	-0.005	4.295	0.000843314
4133	3	10.17297	-0.005	4.29	0.000842333
3468	3	10.17717	-0.005	4.285	0.000841351
838	1	10.19051	-0.0075	4.2775	0.000839878
800	1	10.19741	-0.0075	4.27	0.000838406
3018	3	10.20511	-0.005	4.265	0.000837424
2425	2	10.21231	-0.00625	4.25875	0.000836197
2691	2	10.21932	-0.00625	4.2525	0.00083497
8264	3	10.22178	-0.005	4.2475	0.000833988
2179	2	10.2246	-0.00625	4.24125	0.000832761
295	1	10.22604	-0.0075	4.23375	0.000831288
1724	1	10.23781	-0.0075	4.22625	0.000829815
236	1	10.24662	-0.0075	4.21875	0.000828343
6348	3	10.24676	-0.005	4.21375	0.000827361
2174	2	10.24974	-0.00625	4.2075	0.000826134
1440	1	10.2525	-0.0075	4.2	0.000824661
7272	3	10.26056	-0.005	4.195	0.00082368
3156	3	10.27044	-0.005	4.19	0.000822698
8444	3	10.29426	-0.005	4.185	0.000821716
2633	2	10.30253	-0.00625	4.17875	0.000820489
4775	3	10.3043	-0.005	4.17375	0.000819507
1362	1	10.30482	-0.0075	4.16625	0.000818035
246	1	10.30488	-0.0075	4.15875	0.000816562
487	1	10.31817	-0.0075	4.15125	0.000815089
6235	3	10.31876	-0.005	4.14625	0.000814108
2533	2	10.33089	-0.00625	4.14	0.00081288
6877	3	10.33171	-0.005	4.135	0.000811899
5366	3	10.33282	-0.005	4.13	0.000810917
6332	3	10.34563	-0.005	4.125	0.000809935
830	1	10.37098	-0.0075	4.1175	0.000808463
999	1	10.37357	-0.0075	4.11	0.00080699
1106	1	10.37449	-0.0075	4.1025	0.000805517
835	1	10.37739	-0.0075	4.095	0.000804045
4665	3	10.38081	-0.005	4.09	0.000803063
6391	3	10.38134	-0.005	4.085	0.000802081
6048	3	10.39184	-0.005	4.08	0.0008011
2066	2	10.3927	-0.00625	4.07375	0.000799872
1380	1	10.39423	-0.0075	4.06625	0.0007984
4917	3	10.39958	-0.005	4.06125	0.000797418
619	1	10.3999	-0.0075	4.05375	0.000795945
415	1	10.40285	-0.0075	4.04625	0.000794473
1975	2	10.40311	-0.00625	4.04	0.000793246

5008	3	10.40407	-0.005	4.035	0.000792264
8697	3	10.41374	-0.005	4.03	0.000791282
3933	3	10.42131	-0.005	4.025	0.0007903
2741	2	10.433	-0.00625	4.01875	0.000789073
5842	3	10.44975	-0.005	4.01375	0.000788091
9827	4	10.45111	-0.005	4.00875	0.00078711
459	1	10.4602	-0.0075	4.00125	0.000785637
6842	3	10.46777	-0.005	3.99625	0.000784655
7153	3	10.47138	-0.005	3.99125	0.000783674
6794	3	10.47617	-0.005	3.98625	0.000782692
6125	3	10.47865	-0.005	3.98125	0.00078171
1114	1	10.49366	-0.0075	3.97375	0.000780238
1853	2	10.4955	-0.00625	3.9675	0.00077901
4914	3	10.49968	-0.005	3.9625	0.000778029
6548	3	10.51128	-0.005	3.9575	0.000777047
2398	2	10.51287	-0.00625	3.95125	0.00077582
9439	4	10.52479	-0.005	3.94625	0.000774838
6690	3	10.54543	-0.005	3.94125	0.000773856
8363	3	10.54569	-0.005	3.93625	0.000772875
2544	2	10.54863	-0.00625	3.93	0.000771647
2006	2	10.55708	-0.00625	3.92375	0.00077042
1318	1	10.56191	-0.0075	3.91625	0.000768948
786	1	10.56941	-0.0075	3.90875	0.000767475
7594	3	10.56975	-0.005	3.90375	0.000766493
5170	3	10.57901	-0.005	3.89875	0.000765511
4308	3	10.58422	-0.005	3.89375	0.00076453
9761	4	10.59068	-0.005	3.88875	0.000763548
4	1	10.59119	-0.0075	3.88125	0.000762075
5880	3	10.59601	-0.005	3.87625	0.000761094
2891	2	10.59639	-0.00625	3.87	0.000759866
3475	3	10.59976	-0.005	3.865	0.000758885
7331	3	10.61234	-0.005	3.86	0.000757903
3520	3	10.61369	-0.005	3.855	0.000756921
1259	1	10.6149	-0.0075	3.8475	0.000755449
3107	3	10.61572	-0.005	3.8425	0.000754467
1317	1	10.61783	-0.0075	3.835	0.000752994
7514	3	10.6355	-0.005	3.83	0.000752013
1306	1	10.63573	-0.0075	3.8225	0.00075054
2438	2	10.63836	-0.00625	3.81625	0.000749313
671	1	10.64038	-0.0075	3.80875	0.00074784
7712	3	10.64401	-0.005	3.80375	0.000746858
2187	2	10.65197	-0.00625	3.7975	0.000745631
5140	3	10.65489	-0.005	3.7925	0.00074465
1415	1	10.6584	-0.0075	3.785	0.000743177
1431	1	10.65916	-0.0075	3.7775	0.000741704
1254	1	10.66474	-0.0075	3.77	0.000740232
4228	3	10.665	-0.005	3.765	0.00073925
2996	3	10.68009	-0.005	3.76	0.000738268
5357	3	10.69093	-0.005	3.755	0.000737286
7591	3	10.7158	-0.005	3.75	0.000736305
1568	1	10.71611	-0.0075	3.7425	0.000734832
3618	3	10.71778	-0.005	3.7375	0.00073385

5504	3	10.71898	-0.005	3.7325	0.000732869
7178	3	10.71972	-0.005	3.7275	0.000731887
419	1	10.73793	-0.0075	3.72	0.000730414
1554	1	10.73965	-0.0075	3.7125	0.000728942
1876	2	10.75081	-0.00625	3.70625	0.000727715
1262	1	10.75799	-0.0075	3.69875	0.000726242
5062	3	10.76252	-0.005	3.69375	0.00072526
5592	3	10.76524	-0.005	3.68875	0.000724278
2025	2	10.76685	-0.00625	3.6825	0.000723051
7908	3	10.76932	-0.005	3.6775	0.00072207
5328	3	10.78309	-0.005	3.6725	0.000721088
6152	3	10.78753	-0.005	3.6675	0.000720106
5797	3	10.78803	-0.005	3.6625	0.000719124
219	1	10.78819	-0.0075	3.655	0.000717652
784	1	10.78925	-0.0075	3.6475	0.000716179
8282	3	10.79063	-0.005	3.6425	0.000715197
8011	3	10.79359	-0.005	3.6375	0.000714216
77	1	10.79539	-0.0075	3.63	0.000712743
390	1	10.79702	-0.0075	3.6225	0.00071127
7203	3	10.80166	-0.005	3.6175	0.000710289
5469	3	10.81026	-0.005	3.6125	0.000709307
4568	3	10.81791	-0.005	3.6075	0.000708325
4594	3	10.82788	-0.005	3.6025	0.000707343
2703	2	10.82801	-0.00625	3.59625	0.000706116
4443	3	10.84227	-0.005	3.59125	0.000705134
8142	3	10.84538	-0.005	3.58625	0.000704153
6725	3	10.86516	-0.005	3.58125	0.000703171
6222	3	10.87128	-0.005	3.57625	0.000702189
7484	3	10.87148	-0.005	3.57125	0.000701208
6952	3	10.87653	-0.005	3.56625	0.000700226
4099	3	10.87868	-0.005	3.56125	0.000699244
8141	3	10.88362	-0.005	3.55625	0.000698262
28	1	10.88734	-0.0075	3.54875	0.00069679
4168	3	10.90499	-0.005	3.54375	0.000695808
422	1	10.9119	-0.0075	3.53625	0.000694335
5962	3	10.91676	-0.005	3.53125	0.000693354
2270	2	10.91735	-0.00625	3.525	0.000692126
6537	3	10.94731	-0.005	3.52	0.000691145
5466	3	10.96002	-0.005	3.515	0.000690163
6255	3	10.97389	-0.005	3.51	0.000689181
3728	3	10.97512	-0.005	3.505	0.000688199
2899	2	10.97879	-0.00625	3.49875	0.000686972
7224	3	10.97949	-0.005	3.49375	0.000685991
9505	4	10.98796	-0.005	3.48875	0.000685009
1757	1	11.01432	-0.0075	3.48125	0.000683536
2666	2	11.02132	-0.00625	3.475	0.000682309
8918	4	11.02243	-0.005	3.47	0.000681327
5318	3	11.03104	-0.005	3.465	0.000680346
5232	3	11.03218	-0.005	3.46	0.000679364
1443	1	11.05856	-0.0075	3.4525	0.000677891
8704	3	11.06739	-0.005	3.4475	0.000676909
6936	3	11.07236	-0.005	3.4425	0.000675928

7239	3	11.07273	-0.005	3.4375	0.000674946
1172	1	11.07514	-0.0075	3.43	0.000673473
5269	3	11.08043	-0.005	3.425	0.000672492
2992	3	11.08049	-0.005	3.42	0.00067151
3426	3	11.09202	-0.005	3.415	0.000670528
6720	3	11.09307	-0.005	3.41	0.000669546
6867	3	11.09402	-0.005	3.405	0.000668565
4737	3	11.09741	-0.005	3.4	0.000667583
4148	3	11.09945	-0.005	3.395	0.000666601
2149	2	11.11024	-0.00625	3.38875	0.000665374
2245	2	11.1108	-0.00625	3.3825	0.000664147
7920	3	11.12119	-0.005	3.3775	0.000663165
5439	3	11.12509	-0.005	3.3725	0.000662183
392	1	11.12944	-0.0075	3.365	0.000660711
361	1	11.14311	-0.0075	3.3575	0.000659238
1561	1	11.14655	-0.0075	3.35	0.000657766
8412	3	11.15401	-0.005	3.345	0.000656784
8420	3	11.15716	-0.005	3.34	0.000655802
1233	1	11.16738	-0.0075	3.3325	0.000654329
4661	3	11.17063	-0.005	3.3275	0.000653348
1951	2	11.18929	-0.00625	3.32125	0.000652121
1585	1	11.19156	-0.0075	3.31375	0.000650648
1482	1	11.19258	-0.0075	3.30625	0.000649175
3700	3	11.19686	-0.005	3.30125	0.000648194
7668	3	11.20712	-0.005	3.29625	0.000647212
6579	3	11.21522	-0.005	3.29125	0.00064623
9452	4	11.2164	-0.005	3.28625	0.000645248
1463	1	11.21779	-0.0075	3.27875	0.000643776
526	1	11.22682	-0.0075	3.27125	0.000642303
6187	3	11.23589	-0.005	3.26625	0.000641321
4161	3	11.24235	-0.005	3.26125	0.00064034
301	1	11.25733	-0.0075	3.25375	0.000638867
4551	3	11.2578	-0.005	3.24875	0.000637885
8377	3	11.27867	-0.005	3.24375	0.000636904
560	1	11.28147	-0.0075	3.23625	0.000635431
407	1	11.30466	-0.0075	3.22875	0.000633958
349	1	11.31055	-0.0075	3.22125	0.000632486
571	1	11.32272	-0.0075	3.21375	0.000631013
3275	3	11.32312	-0.005	3.20875	0.000630031
1966	2	11.3282	-0.00625	3.2025	0.000628804
8232	3	11.3432	-0.005	3.1975	0.000627823
1436	1	11.35929	-0.0075	3.19	0.00062635
631	1	11.37464	-0.0075	3.1825	0.000624877
2005	2	11.38388	-0.00625	3.17625	0.00062365
3146	3	11.38812	-0.005	3.17125	0.000622668
1638	1	11.39799	-0.0075	3.16375	0.000621196
4881	3	11.41218	-0.005	3.15875	0.000620214
550	1	11.41447	-0.0075	3.15125	0.000618741
5263	3	11.42116	-0.005	3.14625	0.00061776
8622	3	11.43845	-0.005	3.14125	0.000616778
4733	3	11.45099	-0.005	3.13625	0.000615796
258	1	11.47971	-0.0075	3.12875	0.000614324

4740	3	11.48315	-0.005	3.12375	0.000613342
9423	4	11.48347	-0.005	3.11875	0.00061236
6300	3	11.48374	-0.005	3.11375	0.000611378
3481	3	11.48473	-0.005	3.10875	0.000610397
9442	4	11.48709	-0.005	3.10375	0.000609415
1895	2	11.48735	-0.00625	3.0975	0.000608188
2373	2	11.49254	-0.00625	3.09125	0.000606961
149	1	11.49382	-0.0075	3.08375	0.000605488
2802	2	11.50357	-0.00625	3.0775	0.000604261
468	1	11.50568	-0.0075	3.07	0.000602788
1783	2	11.50671	-0.00625	3.06375	0.000601561
140	1	11.52	-0.0075	3.05625	0.000600088
7166	3	11.52531	-0.005	3.05125	0.000599107
1376	1	11.5292	-0.0075	3.04375	0.000597634
3443	3	11.53909	-0.005	3.03875	0.000596652
2957	3	11.54536	-0.005	3.03375	0.000595671
1020	1	11.55808	-0.0075	3.02625	0.000594198
2199	2	11.56626	-0.00625	3.02	0.000592971
2379	2	11.57019	-0.00625	3.01375	0.000591744
3184	3	11.57258	-0.005	3.00875	0.000590762
979	1	11.57913	-0.0075	3.00125	0.000589289
1120	1	11.58207	-0.0075	2.99375	0.000587817
4659	3	11.60148	-0.005	2.98875	0.000586835
9453	4	11.60488	-0.005	2.98375	0.000585853
6044	3	11.60646	-0.005	2.97875	0.000584871
209	1	11.60712	-0.0075	2.97125	0.000583399
2572	2	11.61481	-0.00625	2.965	0.000582172
1640	1	11.6189	-0.0075	2.9575	0.000580699
2568	2	11.61999	-0.00625	2.95125	0.000579472
2880	2	11.6251	-0.00625	2.945	0.000578245
9561	4	11.64827	-0.005	2.94	0.000577263
3446	3	11.65584	-0.005	2.935	0.000576281
4891	3	11.65867	-0.005	2.93	0.000575299
4820	3	11.67549	-0.005	2.925	0.000574318
5608	3	11.67739	-0.005	2.92	0.000573336
3319	3	11.6898	-0.005	2.915	0.000572354
9079	4	11.70102	-0.005	2.91	0.000571372
9934	4	11.70563	-0.005	2.905	0.000570391
2403	2	11.73433	-0.00625	2.89875	0.000569164
8616	3	11.73994	-0.005	2.89375	0.000568182
3648	3	11.75365	-0.005	2.88875	0.0005672
1310	1	11.76611	-0.0075	2.88125	0.000565727
2460	2	11.78033	-0.00625	2.875	0.0005645
275	1	11.79914	-0.0075	2.8675	0.000563028
3123	3	11.80501	-0.005	2.8625	0.000562046
5497	3	11.81007	-0.005	2.8575	0.000561064
2903	3	11.82094	-0.005	2.8525	0.000560082
3064	3	11.8267	-0.005	2.8475	0.000559101
1949	2	11.84717	-0.00625	2.84125	0.000557874
2614	2	11.85369	-0.00625	2.835	0.000556646
3053	3	11.85912	-0.005	2.83	0.000555665
424	1	11.86412	-0.0075	2.8225	0.000554192

1349	1	11.86585	-0.0075	2.815	0.000552719
2223	2	11.87507	-0.00625	2.80875	0.000551492
2967	3	11.87549	-0.005	2.80375	0.000550511
3173	3	11.89973	-0.005	2.79875	0.000549529
2619	2	11.9109	-0.00625	2.7925	0.000548302
1028	1	11.92714	-0.0075	2.785	0.000546829
1582	1	11.92715	-0.0075	2.7775	0.000545356
8324	3	11.9382	-0.005	2.7725	0.000544375
1679	1	11.94023	-0.0075	2.765	0.000542902
1260	1	11.94332	-0.0075	2.7575	0.000541429
6070	3	11.94686	-0.005	2.7525	0.000540448
710	1	11.9481	-0.0075	2.745	0.000538975
5047	3	11.9531	-0.005	2.74	0.000537993
1620	1	11.97285	-0.0075	2.7325	0.000536521
2706	2	11.98313	-0.00625	2.72625	0.000535294
2098	2	11.98957	-0.00625	2.72	0.000534066
2806	2	12.00805	-0.00625	2.71375	0.000532839
5515	3	12.03035	-0.005	2.70875	0.000531857
8433	3	12.03436	-0.005	2.70375	0.000530876
8926	4	12.04358	-0.005	2.69875	0.000529894
507	1	12.06176	-0.0075	2.69125	0.000528421
6476	3	12.07362	-0.005	2.68625	0.00052744
1064	1	12.07763	-0.0075	2.67875	0.000525967
4854	3	12.09402	-0.005	2.67375	0.000524985
1286	1	12.10789	-0.0075	2.66625	0.000523513
2898	2	12.10827	-0.00625	2.66	0.000522285
3187	3	12.11508	-0.005	2.655	0.000521304
2333	2	12.12204	-0.00625	2.64875	0.000520077
1053	1	12.12492	-0.0075	2.64125	0.000518604
7571	3	12.12761	-0.005	2.63625	0.000517622
4789	3	12.1289	-0.005	2.63125	0.00051664
4305	3	12.13459	-0.005	2.62625	0.000515659
5551	3	12.15925	-0.005	2.62125	0.000514677
7505	3	12.17233	-0.005	2.61625	0.000513695
8684	3	12.1891	-0.005	2.61125	0.000512714
9976	4	12.19044	-0.005	2.60625	0.000511732
8008	3	12.19116	-0.005	2.60125	0.00051075
1282	1	12.19642	-0.0075	2.59375	0.000509277
7932	3	12.21179	-0.005	2.58875	0.000508296
8435	3	12.21538	-0.005	2.58375	0.000507314
305	1	12.22348	-0.0075	2.57625	0.000505841
3221	3	12.22445	-0.005	2.57125	0.00050486
8413	3	12.22965	-0.005	2.56625	0.000503878
2461	2	12.23338	-0.00625	2.56	0.000502651
3089	3	12.23968	-0.005	2.555	0.000501669
6216	3	12.26398	-0.005	2.55	0.000500687
5535	3	12.27824	-0.005	2.545	0.000499705
5127	3	12.30231	-0.005	2.54	0.000498724
6647	3	12.31106	-0.005	2.535	0.000497742
2084	2	12.3361	-0.00625	2.52875	0.000496515
9508	4	12.33689	-0.005	2.52375	0.000495533
2117	2	12.33867	-0.00625	2.5175	0.000494306

8312	3	12.34958	-0.005	2.5125	0.000493324
4942	3	12.35204	-0.005	2.5075	0.000492342
4072	3	12.3526	-0.005	2.5025	0.000491361
5443	3	12.35589	-0.005	2.4975	0.000490379
6057	3	12.36033	-0.005	2.4925	0.000489397
3068	3	12.37899	-0.005	2.4875	0.000488415
4488	3	12.40034	-0.005	2.4825	0.000487434
8847	4	12.40111	-0.005	2.4775	0.000486452
1544	1	12.40297	-0.0075	2.47	0.000484979
5824	3	12.41491	-0.005	2.465	0.000483998
7281	3	12.41784	-0.005	2.46	0.000483016
1686	1	12.42711	-0.0075	2.4525	0.000481543
5862	3	12.43057	-0.005	2.4475	0.000480562
6205	3	12.44908	-0.005	2.4425	0.00047958
914	1	12.47416	-0.0075	2.435	0.000478107
739	1	12.48188	-0.0075	2.4275	0.000476635
6128	3	12.50263	-0.005	2.4225	0.000475653
7670	3	12.50683	-0.005	2.4175	0.000474671
6202	3	12.51734	-0.005	2.4125	0.000473689
861	1	12.51896	-0.0075	2.405	0.000472217
4556	3	12.52472	-0.005	2.4	0.000471235
8439	3	12.5469	-0.005	2.395	0.000470253
297	1	12.58047	-0.0075	2.3875	0.000468781
1855	2	12.58823	-0.00625	2.38125	0.000467554
6996	3	12.58851	-0.005	2.37625	0.000466572
6386	3	12.58964	-0.005	2.37125	0.00046559
2216	2	12.59745	-0.00625	2.365	0.000464363
1012	1	12.59796	-0.0075	2.3575	0.00046289
4987	3	12.60244	-0.005	2.3525	0.000461909
3784	3	12.61411	-0.005	2.3475	0.000460927
1058	1	12.61505	-0.0075	2.34	0.000459454
4791	3	12.62817	-0.005	2.335	0.000458472
981	1	12.6343	-0.0075	2.3275	0.000457
2689	2	12.64278	-0.00625	2.32125	0.000455773
3907	3	12.65246	-0.005	2.31625	0.000454791
3044	3	12.65329	-0.005	2.31125	0.000453809
755	1	12.66441	-0.0075	2.30375	0.000452337
3485	3	12.67493	-0.005	2.29875	0.000451355
8069	3	12.68052	-0.005	2.29375	0.000450373
6856	3	12.69025	-0.005	2.28875	0.000449391
7238	3	12.69608	-0.005	2.28375	0.00044841
1635	1	12.70885	-0.0075	2.27625	0.000446937
7914	3	12.7162	-0.005	2.27125	0.000445955
2441	2	12.72331	-0.00625	2.265	0.000444728
4639	3	12.74508	-0.005	2.26	0.000443746
5940	3	12.74917	-0.005	2.255	0.000442765
3571	3	12.76503	-0.005	2.25	0.000441783
3477	3	12.76584	-0.005	2.245	0.000440801
1823	2	12.77043	-0.00625	2.23875	0.000439574
7944	3	12.77734	-0.005	2.23375	0.000438592
6394	3	12.82179	-0.005	2.22875	0.00043761
6448	3	12.82583	-0.005	2.22375	0.000436629

4182	3	12.83547	-0.005	2.21875	0.000435647
744	1	12.83771	-0.0075	2.21125	0.000434174
1	1	12.83996	-0.0075	2.20375	0.000432702
9866	4	12.85771	-0.005	2.19875	0.00043172
1506	1	12.86824	-0.0075	2.19125	0.000430247
3712	3	12.89053	-0.005	2.18625	0.000429266
1215	1	12.90337	-0.0075	2.17875	0.000427793
3980	3	12.9215	-0.005	2.17375	0.000426811
2980	3	12.92216	-0.005	2.16875	0.00042583
9274	4	12.92523	-0.005	2.16375	0.000424848
1862	2	12.93064	-0.00625	2.1575	0.000423621
4662	3	12.95971	-0.005	2.1525	0.000422639
9521	4	12.9691	-0.005	2.1475	0.000421657
2868	2	12.98019	-0.00625	2.14125	0.00042043
8411	3	12.99149	-0.005	2.13625	0.000419448
566	1	13.00705	-0.0075	2.12875	0.000417976
5042	3	13.01318	-0.005	2.12375	0.000416994
2248	2	13.01923	-0.00625	2.1175	0.000415767
4529	3	13.10989	-0.005	2.1125	0.000414785
7732	3	13.11298	-0.005	2.1075	0.000413803
1908	2	13.12687	-0.00625	2.10125	0.000412576
5304	3	13.14061	-0.005	2.09625	0.000411594
4031	3	13.15785	-0.005	2.09125	0.000410613
2706	2	13.15966	-0.00625	2.085	0.000409385
8057	3	13.16221	-0.005	2.08	0.000408404
8915	4	13.17593	-0.005	2.075	0.000407422
1427	1	13.19024	-0.0075	2.0675	0.000405949
8650	3	13.21161	-0.005	2.0625	0.000404968
1633	1	13.22786	-0.0075	2.055	0.000403495
1150	1	13.26347	-0.0075	2.0475	0.000402022
7775	3	13.26865	-0.005	2.0425	0.000401041
120	1	13.29082	-0.0075	2.035	0.000399568
443	1	13.3453	-0.0075	2.0275	0.000398095
529	1	13.34793	-0.0075	2.02	0.000396623
1832	2	13.3931	-0.00625	2.01375	0.000395396
4196	3	13.39663	-0.005	2.00875	0.000394414
1011	1	13.42009	-0.0075	2.00125	0.000392941
3195	3	13.43284	-0.005	1.99625	0.00039196
6582	3	13.43382	-0.005	1.99125	0.000390978
4926	3	13.44203	-0.005	1.98625	0.000389996
1700	1	13.45353	-0.0075	1.97875	0.000388523
6560	3	13.45937	-0.005	1.97375	0.000387542
8044	3	13.4671	-0.005	1.96875	0.00038656
3502	3	13.46795	-0.005	1.96375	0.000385578
761	1	13.47395	-0.0075	1.95625	0.000384106
2690	2	13.48175	-0.00625	1.95	0.000382878
8021	3	13.50975	-0.005	1.945	0.000381897
5311	3	13.55346	-0.005	1.94	0.000380915
6719	3	13.59227	-0.005	1.935	0.000379933
1729	1	13.59734	-0.0075	1.9275	0.000378461
9440	4	13.60292	-0.005	1.9225	0.000377479
556	1	13.61052	-0.0075	1.915	0.000376006

1905	2	13.61929	-0.00625	1.90875	0.000374779
5218	3	13.63062	-0.005	1.90375	0.000373797
4275	3	13.64547	-0.005	1.89875	0.000372816
8061	3	13.64831	-0.005	1.89375	0.000371834
1169	1	13.65055	-0.0075	1.88625	0.000370361
1820	2	13.66526	-0.00625	1.88	0.000369134
991	1	13.66576	-0.0075	1.8725	0.000367661
7350	3	13.67962	-0.005	1.8675	0.00036668
2550	2	13.68089	-0.00625	1.86125	0.000365453
1501	1	13.70168	-0.0075	1.85375	0.00036398
5446	3	13.70822	-0.005	1.84875	0.000362998
651	1	13.72303	-0.0075	1.84125	0.000361526
7604	3	13.73309	-0.005	1.83625	0.000360544
161	1	13.74331	-0.0075	1.82875	0.000359071
8471	3	13.74534	-0.005	1.82375	0.00035809
9218	4	13.75483	-0.005	1.81875	0.000357108
4683	3	13.7824	-0.005	1.81375	0.000356126
1970	2	13.80277	-0.00625	1.8075	0.000354899
232	1	13.82036	-0.0075	1.8	0.000353426
1906	2	13.83344	-0.00625	1.79375	0.000352199
711	1	13.85342	-0.0075	1.78625	0.000350726
1977	2	13.85691	-0.00625	1.78	0.000349499
1142	1	13.86284	-0.0075	1.7725	0.000348027
6806	3	13.86375	-0.005	1.7675	0.000347045
3620	3	13.89075	-0.005	1.7625	0.000346063
9007	4	13.91478	-0.005	1.7575	0.000345081
6610	3	13.91913	-0.005	1.7525	0.0003441
1540	1	13.92149	-0.0075	1.745	0.000342627
2799	2	13.92331	-0.00625	1.73875	0.0003414
41	1	13.94637	-0.0075	1.73125	0.000339927
9258	4	13.95176	-0.005	1.72625	0.000338946
1406	1	13.95456	-0.0075	1.71875	0.000337473
5292	3	13.98005	-0.005	1.71375	0.000336491
7483	3	13.98923	-0.005	1.70875	0.00033551
1465	1	13.99019	-0.0075	1.70125	0.000334037
409	1	13.99894	-0.0075	1.69375	0.000332564
4636	3	14.0173	-0.005	1.68875	0.000331583
2481	2	14.02394	-0.00625	1.6825	0.000330355
5302	3	14.03048	-0.005	1.6775	0.000329374
5116	3	14.03482	-0.005	1.6725	0.000328392
5468	3	14.03659	-0.005	1.6675	0.00032741
9748	4	14.04596	-0.005	1.6625	0.000326428
8105	3	14.04881	-0.005	1.6575	0.000325447
8484	3	14.0492	-0.005	1.6525	0.000324465
607	1	14.07857	-0.0075	1.645	0.000322992
3880	3	14.09426	-0.005	1.64	0.000322011
4015	3	14.10202	-0.005	1.635	0.000321029
4426	3	14.10933	-0.005	1.63	0.000320047
3467	3	14.12923	-0.005	1.625	0.000319065
5667	3	14.13428	-0.005	1.62	0.000318084
5092	3	14.158	-0.005	1.615	0.000317102
986	1	14.2025	-0.0075	1.6075	0.000315629

8240	3	14.20323	-0.005	1.6025	0.000314648
3457	3	14.20566	-0.005	1.5975	0.000313666
6687	3	14.21608	-0.005	1.5925	0.000312684
455	1	14.21972	-0.0075	1.585	0.000311211
1830	2	14.22232	-0.00625	1.57875	0.000309984
5550	3	14.23494	-0.005	1.57375	0.000309003
623	1	14.29929	-0.0075	1.56625	0.00030753
688	1	14.29987	-0.0075	1.55875	0.000306057
2498	2	14.31725	-0.00625	1.5525	0.00030483
2623	2	14.31786	-0.00625	1.54625	0.000303603
2295	2	14.34224	-0.00625	1.54	0.000302376
1039	1	14.34502	-0.0075	1.5325	0.000300903
3060	3	14.35389	-0.005	1.5275	0.000299921
70	1	14.39027	-0.0075	1.52	0.000298449
5870	3	14.40427	-0.005	1.515	0.000297467
7400	3	14.41193	-0.005	1.51	0.000296485
91	1	14.41887	-0.0075	1.5025	0.000295013
3545	3	14.41972	-0.005	1.4975	0.000294031
829	1	14.43221	-0.0075	1.49	0.000292558
2722	2	14.44084	-0.00625	1.48375	0.000291331
484	1	14.44471	-0.0075	1.47625	0.000289859
2827	2	14.44584	-0.00625	1.47	0.000288631
5296	3	14.45058	-0.005	1.465	0.00028765
5438	3	14.47083	-0.005	1.46	0.000286668
8156	3	14.47892	-0.005	1.455	0.000285686
6961	3	14.52447	-0.005	1.45	0.000284704
4931	3	14.57474	-0.005	1.445	0.000283723
890	1	14.58234	-0.0075	1.4375	0.00028225
9123	4	14.58717	-0.005	1.4325	0.000281268
6360	3	14.59464	-0.005	1.4275	0.000280287
5221	3	14.59913	-0.005	1.4225	0.000279305
2562	2	14.60711	-0.00625	1.41625	0.000278078
6107	3	14.61691	-0.005	1.41125	0.000277096
54	1	14.63857	-0.0075	1.40375	0.000275623
2385	2	14.6451	-0.00625	1.3975	0.000274396
17	1	14.65438	-0.0075	1.39	0.000272924
5747	3	14.66237	-0.005	1.385	0.000271942
8422	3	14.69614	-0.005	1.38	0.00027096
119	1	14.6977	-0.0075	1.3725	0.000269488
1076	1	14.71414	-0.0075	1.365	0.000268015
1486	1	14.73199	-0.0075	1.3575	0.000266542
3997	3	14.75666	-0.005	1.3525	0.000265561
7686	3	14.77063	-0.005	1.3475	0.000264579
339	1	14.77135	-0.0075	1.34	0.000263106
3863	3	14.80767	-0.005	1.335	0.000262124
627	1	14.81697	-0.0075	1.3275	0.000260652
8305	3	14.84174	-0.005	1.3225	0.00025967
762	1	14.8659	-0.0075	1.315	0.000258198
5997	3	14.90316	-0.005	1.31	0.000257216
1733	1	14.92245	-0.0075	1.3025	0.000255743
1468	1	14.92271	-0.0075	1.295	0.000254271
4295	3	14.95928	-0.005	1.29	0.000253289

2693	2	14.96561	-0.00625	1.28375	0.000252062
3072	3	14.97136	-0.005	1.27875	0.00025108
1558	1	14.97268	-0.0075	1.27125	0.000249607
6857	3	14.98379	-0.005	1.26625	0.000248626
2678	2	15.01187	-0.00625	1.26	0.000247398
8909	4	15.01571	-0.005	1.255	0.000246417
1163	1	15.01648	-0.0075	1.2475	0.000244944
6378	3	15.02355	-0.005	1.2425	0.000243962
5411	3	15.02549	-0.005	1.2375	0.000242981
1418	1	15.03596	-0.0075	1.23	0.000241508
4012	3	15.07376	-0.005	1.225	0.000240526
152	1	15.08619	-0.0075	1.2175	0.000239054
3324	3	15.10532	-0.005	1.2125	0.000238072
3198	3	15.11297	-0.005	1.2075	0.00023709
9809	4	15.11373	-0.005	1.2025	0.000236108
9206	4	15.14452	-0.005	1.1975	0.000235127
6155	3	15.15305	-0.005	1.1925	0.000234145
1311	1	15.19518	-0.0075	1.185	0.000232672
4421	3	15.1981	-0.005	1.18	0.000231691
4781	3	15.21814	-0.005	1.175	0.000230709
1680	1	15.22424	-0.0075	1.1675	0.000229236
3266	3	15.23523	-0.005	1.1625	0.000228254
758	1	15.26762	-0.0075	1.155	0.000226782
2759	2	15.27816	-0.00625	1.14875	0.000225555
6986	3	15.36812	-0.005	1.14375	0.000224573
7525	3	15.36909	-0.005	1.13875	0.000223591
234	1	15.38636	-0.0075	1.13125	0.000222119
24	1	15.3927	-0.0075	1.12375	0.000220646
1220	1	15.41668	-0.0075	1.11625	0.000219173
1526	1	15.41693	-0.0075	1.10875	0.000217701
2770	2	15.42105	-0.00625	1.1025	0.000216474
841	1	15.42433	-0.0075	1.095	0.000215001
797	1	15.43008	-0.0075	1.0875	0.000213528
9815	4	15.43142	-0.005	1.0825	0.000212547
8836	4	15.49913	-0.005	1.0775	0.000211565
1434	1	15.51489	-0.0075	1.07	0.000210092
6334	3	15.53294	-0.005	1.065	0.000209111
7824	3	15.54435	-0.005	1.06	0.000208129
7929	3	15.59612	-0.005	1.055	0.000207147
5700	3	15.65267	-0.005	1.05	0.000206165
137	1	15.66776	-0.0075	1.0425	0.000204693
3102	3	15.68241	-0.005	1.0375	0.000203711
2522	2	15.69907	-0.00625	1.03125	0.000202484
9078	4	15.70815	-0.005	1.02625	0.000201502
525	1	15.73648	-0.0075	1.01875	0.000200029
1723	1	15.76464	-0.0075	1.01125	0.000198557
5719	3	15.79713	-0.005	1.00625	0.000197575
3621	3	15.80548	-0.005	1.00125	0.000196593
2044	2	15.81526	-0.00625	0.995	0.000195366
1576	1	15.81996	-0.0075	0.9875	0.000193894
1657	1	15.84613	-0.0075	0.98	0.000192421
6960	3	15.85016	-0.005	0.975	0.000191439

1514	1	15.92965	-0.0075	0.9675	0.000189967
5316	3	15.95591	-0.005	0.9625	0.000188985
8549	3	15.97783	-0.005	0.9575	0.000188003
2815	2	15.99295	-0.00625	0.95125	0.000186776
2772	2	15.99325	-0.00625	0.945	0.000185549
4007	3	16.06693	-0.005	0.94	0.000184567
6781	3	16.08714	-0.005	0.935	0.000183585
2599	2	16.09207	-0.00625	0.92875	0.000182358
706	1	16.11727	-0.0075	0.92125	0.000180886
1776	2	16.12424	-0.00625	0.915	0.000179658
4042	3	16.12913	-0.005	0.91	0.000178677
7460	3	16.14141	-0.005	0.905	0.000177695
1003	1	16.14657	-0.0075	0.8975	0.000176222
290	1	16.21529	-0.0075	0.89	0.00017475
4036	3	16.33961	-0.005	0.885	0.000173768
4517	3	16.35054	-0.005	0.88	0.000172786
977	1	16.39065	-0.0075	0.8725	0.000171314
2182	2	16.40143	-0.00625	0.86625	0.000170086
8372	3	16.41404	-0.005	0.86125	0.000169105
8929	4	16.43422	-0.005	0.85625	0.000168123
403	1	16.45385	-0.0075	0.84875	0.00016665
825	1	16.45486	-0.0075	0.84125	0.000165178
6201	3	16.45539	-0.005	0.83625	0.000164196
1953	2	16.46163	-0.00625	0.83	0.000162969
5188	3	16.46281	-0.005	0.825	0.000161987
6020	3	16.50436	-0.005	0.82	0.000161005
1964	2	16.57099	-0.00625	0.81375	0.000159778
1121	1	16.59584	-0.0075	0.80625	0.000158306
714	1	16.62946	-0.0075	0.79875	0.000156833
7418	3	16.63795	-0.005	0.79375	0.000155851
495	1	16.64007	-0.0075	0.78625	0.000154379
3900	3	16.65844	-0.005	0.78125	0.000153397
2423	2	16.66668	-0.00625	0.775	0.00015217
3731	3	16.7466	-0.005	0.77	0.000151188
280	1	16.76233	-0.0075	0.7625	0.000149715
1109	1	16.7799	-0.0075	0.755	0.000148243
1570	1	16.79336	-0.0075	0.7475	0.00014677
634	1	16.81132	-0.0075	0.74	0.000145297
682	1	16.85401	-0.0075	0.7325	0.000143825
5309	3	16.90594	-0.005	0.7275	0.000142843
9684	4	16.9501	-0.005	0.7225	0.000141861
1360	1	16.9802	-0.0075	0.715	0.000140389
1165	1	16.99958	-0.0075	0.7075	0.000138916
5733	3	17.01259	-0.005	0.7025	0.000137934
9965	4	17.02308	-0.005	0.6975	0.000136953
9609	4	17.08553	-0.005	0.6925	0.000135971
2563	2	17.09406	-0.00625	0.68625	0.000134744
1663	1	17.12258	-0.0075	0.67875	0.000133271
2846	2	17.15917	-0.00625	0.6725	0.000132044
3153	3	17.18619	-0.005	0.6675	0.000131062
1826	2	17.30109	-0.00625	0.66125	0.000129835
8997	4	17.31583	-0.005	0.65625	0.000128853

1961	2	17.47238	-0.00625	0.65	0.000127626
8173	3	17.48111	-0.005	0.645	0.000126644
5488	3	17.53485	-0.005	0.64	0.000125663
2341	2	17.53677	-0.00625	0.63375	0.000124435
76	1	17.54568	-0.0075	0.62625	0.000122963
3796	3	17.58796	-0.005	0.62125	0.000121981
6899	3	17.65628	-0.005	0.61625	0.000120999
4833	3	17.70713	-0.005	0.61125	0.000120018
2456	2	17.76436	-0.00625	0.605	0.00011879
1958	2	17.81451	-0.00625	0.59875	0.000117563
4937	3	17.90905	-0.005	0.59375	0.000116582
8551	3	17.92522	-0.005	0.58875	0.0001156
1441	1	17.9329	-0.0075	0.58125	0.000114127
2241	2	17.94427	-0.00625	0.575	0.0001129
1354	1	17.99458	-0.0075	0.5675	0.000111427
3804	3	17.99524	-0.005	0.5625	0.000110446
628	1	17.99632	-0.0075	0.555	0.000108973
649	1	18.10667	-0.0075	0.5475	0.0001075
1959	2	18.1446	-0.00625	0.54125	0.000106273
5152	3	18.17986	-0.005	0.53625	0.000105292
4011	3	18.2668	-0.005	0.53125	0.00010431
1696	1	18.29476	-0.0075	0.52375	0.000102837
9083	4	18.30456	-0.005	0.51875	0.000101855
8025	3	18.38476	-0.005	0.51375	0.000100874
7162	3	18.38845	-0.005	0.50875	9.9892E-05
263	1	18.39595	-0.0075	0.50125	9.84194E-05
5793	3	18.458	-0.005	0.49625	9.74377E-05
3902	3	18.48847	-0.005	0.49125	9.64559E-05
176	1	18.54279	-0.0075	0.48375	9.49833E-05
3341	3	18.55767	-0.005	0.47875	9.40016E-05
3311	3	18.58107	-0.005	0.47375	9.30198E-05
2408	2	18.63779	-0.00625	0.4675	9.17927E-05
1054	1	18.68766	-0.0075	0.46	9.032E-05
5517	3	18.82999	-0.005	0.455	8.93383E-05
3873	3	18.85455	-0.005	0.45	8.83566E-05
960	1	18.93149	-0.0075	0.4425	8.6884E-05
8223	3	19.00422	-0.005	0.4375	8.59022E-05
9269	4	19.03748	-0.005	0.4325	8.49205E-05
2740	2	19.03929	-0.00625	0.42625	8.36933E-05
4600	3	19.12382	-0.005	0.42125	8.27116E-05
5855	3	19.33639	-0.005	0.41625	8.17298E-05
2302	2	19.39266	-0.00625	0.41	8.05027E-05
2575	2	19.41745	-0.00625	0.40375	7.92755E-05
1251	1	19.41891	-0.0075	0.39625	7.78029E-05
2923	3	19.44636	-0.005	0.39125	7.68211E-05
8958	4	19.45637	-0.005	0.38625	7.58394E-05
4122	3	19.49336	-0.005	0.38125	7.48576E-05
2680	2	19.57679	-0.00625	0.375	7.36305E-05
5117	3	19.64219	-0.005	0.37	7.26487E-05
5582	3	19.69284	-0.005	0.365	7.1667E-05
7703	3	19.74231	-0.005	0.36	7.06853E-05
7999	3	19.74646	-0.005	0.355	6.97035E-05

844	1	19.77047	-0.0075	0.3475	6.82309E-05
2785	2	19.85366	-0.00625	0.34125	6.70037E-05
922	1	19.96103	-0.0075	0.33375	6.55311E-05
4964	3	20.09615	-0.005	0.32875	6.45494E-05
9635	4	20.10864	-0.005	0.32375	6.35676E-05
2308	2	20.24804	-0.00625	0.3175	6.23405E-05
1956	2	20.30495	-0.00625	0.31125	6.11133E-05
4810	3	20.36168	-0.005	0.30625	6.01316E-05
559	1	20.44941	-0.0075	0.29875	5.86589E-05
9834	4	20.48783	-0.005	0.29375	5.76772E-05
2851	2	20.63084	-0.00625	0.2875	5.645E-05
229	1	20.7117	-0.0075	0.28	5.49774E-05
9092	4	20.85014	-0.005	0.275	5.39957E-05
132	1	20.91738	-0.0075	0.2675	5.25231E-05
3171	3	20.9793	-0.005	0.2625	5.15413E-05
5032	3	20.99587	-0.005	0.2575	5.05596E-05
8176	3	21.20481	-0.005	0.2525	4.95779E-05
3595	3	21.22278	-0.005	0.2475	4.85961E-05
183	1	21.30857	-0.0075	0.24	4.71235E-05
4232	3	21.40367	-0.005	0.235	4.61418E-05
3332	3	21.75919	-0.005	0.23	4.516E-05
6304	3	21.79471	-0.005	0.225	4.41783E-05
3982	3	21.8394	-0.005	0.22	4.31965E-05
1263	1	21.91538	-0.0075	0.2125	4.17239E-05
1818	2	22.08586	-0.00625	0.20625	4.04968E-05
6247	3	22.12113	-0.005	0.20125	3.9515E-05
4892	3	22.13589	-0.005	0.19625	3.85333E-05
1737	1	22.38997	-0.0075	0.18875	3.70607E-05
9295	4	22.41298	-0.005	0.18375	3.60789E-05
2560	2	22.4709	-0.00625	0.1775	3.48518E-05
8427	3	22.64964	-0.005	0.1725	3.387E-05
4249	3	22.7042	-0.005	0.1675	3.28883E-05
2853	2	22.76918	-0.00625	0.16125	3.16611E-05
449	1	22.87632	-0.0075	0.15375	3.01885E-05
1860	2	23.06783	-0.00625	0.1475	2.89613E-05
233	1	23.308	-0.0075	0.14	2.74887E-05
325	1	23.35923	-0.0075	0.1325	2.60161E-05
4120	3	23.5151	-0.005	0.1275	2.50344E-05
1340	1	23.59223	-0.0075	0.12	2.35618E-05
3439	3	24.15173	-0.005	0.115	2.258E-05
7626	3	24.27021	-0.005	0.11	2.15983E-05
7576	3	24.54742	-0.005	0.105	2.06165E-05
4058	3	25.45023	-0.005	0.1	1.96348E-05
865	1	25.65276	-0.0075	0.0925	1.81622E-05
3740	3	25.6687	-0.005	0.0875	1.71804E-05
790	1	25.71759	-0.0075	0.08	1.57078E-05
6384	3	25.71791	-0.005	0.075	1.47261E-05
1335	1	25.79579	-0.0075	0.0675	1.32535E-05
4199	3	25.83791	-0.005	0.0625	1.22717E-05
1800	2	26.68382	-0.00625	0.05625	1.10446E-05
5809	3	26.81195	-0.005	0.05125	1.00628E-05
2715	2	28.45475	-0.00625	0.045	8.83566E-06

5968	3	28.63158	-0.005	0.04	7.85392E-06
7787	3	28.83151	-0.005	0.035	6.87218E-06
2749	2	29.10637	-0.00625	0.02875	5.645E-06
7110	3	29.37463	-0.005	0.02375	4.66326E-06
8503	3	29.73232	-0.005	0.01875	3.68152E-06
1188	1	31.25833	-0.0075	0.01125	2.20891E-06
1967	2	32.3164	-0.00625	0.005	9.8174E-07
6905	3	32.7029	-0.005	2.39282E-12	4.69825E-16

Population Infectivity (1,1,4)
Infectivity
0.01
0.008
0.006
0.004
0.002
0
0.00
1.00
2.00
3.00
4.00
5.00
6.00
7.00
8.00
Time (days)

10.00
15.00
20.00
25.00
30.00
35.00

Series1

Root Entry
⌋
⌉
□
□

&
Root Entry
⌋
⌉
│
□
□
●
♬

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.20077-000008

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.20077-000009

Root Entry
1
Root Entry
C
OlePres000

Compliance with Social Distancing of Children & Teens in non-households (with 100% school closure, household contacts doubled, implemented after 10 symptomatic detected)
% Reduction of Infectious Attack Rate
100.00
90.00
80.00
70.00
60.00
50.00
40.00
30.00
20.00
10.00
0.00
0
10
20
30
40
50
60
70
80
90
100
% Compliance
ID 0.01
ID 0.0125
ID 0.015

Root Entry
9
:
Root Entry
2
OlePres000

Modeling Parameters

Interventions/Parameters	Compliance/Efficacy
% infected individuals developing clinical symptoms	50%, 67%
Diagnosis	60%, 80% of symptomatic
Diagnosis on clinical grounds	All ILI treated as influenza
Treatment	All patients with diagnosis receive oseltamivir BID x 5 days (= 1 treatment course)
Isolation in home	All diagnosed patients (reduces all other contacts by compliance rate) (60%, 90% compliance)
Prophylaxis	Household +/- workplace contacts of diagnosed patients receive oseltamivir QD x 10 days (= 1 treatment course)
Quarantine	Household contacts of patients quarantined x 10 days (doubles household contact rate, reduces all other contacts by compliance rate) (30%, 60%, 90% compliance)
School Closure	Reactive school closure after 10 cases diagnosed in individual school or After 10th, 100th, or 1000th case diagnosed in community [or at 0.01%, 0.1%, 1% community prevalence]
Keeping children home	All children up to age 18 stay home after school closure (doubles household contact rate, reduces all other contacts by compliance rate) (30%, 60%, 90% compliance)
Social distancing
Generic social distancing	Decrease household cluster/neighborhood/community contacts by 50%
Workplace social distancing	Decrease workplace contacts by 50%
Enhanced social distancing	Generic social distancing for all plus reduction of non-household contacts by additional 50% or 95% for compliant population (30%, 60% compliance)
Liberal leave policies	Symptomatic individuals retire from workplace 1 day after becoming ill

Outcomes of Interest

Parameter	Expressed as
Clinical attack rate (% symptomatic)	Percent of population
Age-specific attack rates	Clinical attack rate per age group and as percent of total infected
Peak daily attack rate	Percent of population
Duration of epidemic	Days
Time to peak	Days
Antiviral stockpile required	Number of treatment courses expressed as percent of total population
Antiviral usage	Daily requirement and cumulative requirement
Compartment within which transmission occurs	Percent of total transmission per simulation occurring in each compartment
Response-related absenteeism	Symptomatic infected adults + Quarantined adults + 1 adult member of all households with children < age 11 at home (by class and in aggregate, by day)
Cumulative attack rate prior to vaccine	Clinical attack rate at 120 and 180 days after epidemic begins (or as continuous output)
Variables that change through time	1) Effective reproductive number, overall and by age class 2) Age-specific attack rates 3) Compartments within which transmission occurs (by week or as continuous output)

Prioritized List of Simulations

All simulation outcomes should report averages of 10 iterations for Chicago simulations or 5 iterations for national simulations (including ranges and standard deviations) as well as percent of iterations producing outbreak exceeding 1% of population. Please perform runs with infectivity adjusted to produce Ro = 1.9, 2.4, 3.0 in base case. If Ro = 3.0 well controlled, please perform runs at Ro = 4.0, 5.0, etc., till control fails.

1.	Chicago Base Case	Unattenuated epidemic
2.	"30/60% Chicago"	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	60% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	30% compliance
		School closure after 1000th case
		Keeping children home	30% compliance
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace social distancing
		Liberal leave
3.	"60/60% Chicago"	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	60% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	60% compliance
		School closure after 100th case
		Keeping children home	60% compliance
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace social distancing
		Liberal leave
4.	"60/80% Chicago"	80% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	60% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	60% compliance
		School closure after 10th case
		Keeping children home	60% compliance
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace social distancing
		Liberal leave
5.	"90/60% Chicago"	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	90% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	90% compliance
		School closure after 100th case
		Keeping children home	90% compliance
		Generic social distancing

		Workplace social distancing
		Liberal leave
6.	"90/80% Chicago"	80% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	90% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	90% compliance
		School closure after 10th case
		Keeping children home	90% compliance
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace social distancing
		Liberal leave

National Simulations with travel restrictions

7.	Base case U.S.	Unattentuated epidemic
8.	"60/60% U.S."	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	60% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	60% compliance
		School closure after 100th case
		Keeping children home	60% compliance
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace distancing
		Liberal leave
9.	"60/60/50% U.S."	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	60% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	60% compliance
		School closure after 100th case
		Keeping children home	60% compliance
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace distancing
		Liberal leave
		50% Reduction in long-distance travel beginning d30
10.	"60/60/90% U.S."	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	60% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	60% compliance
		School closure after 100th case
		Keeping children home	60% compliance
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace distancing

		Liberal leave
		90% Reduction in long-distance travel beginning d30
11.	"90/60% U.S."	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	90% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	90% compliance
		School closure after 100th case
		Keeping children home	90% compliance
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace distancing
		Liberal leave
12.	"90/60/50% U.S."	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	90% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	90% compliance
		School closure after 100th case
		Keeping children home	90% compliance
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace distancing
		Liberal leave
		50% Reduction in long-distance travel beginning d30
13.	"90/60/90% U.S."	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	90% compliance
		Prophylaxis of household contacts
		Quarantine of households	90% compliance
		School closure after 100th case
		Keeping children home	90% compliance
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace distancing
		Liberal leave
		90% Reduction in long-distance travel beginning d30

National Simulations with travel restrictions, "conventional response" at Ro = 1.9, 2.4

14.	"60/60/50% U.S."	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases
		Home isolation of cases	60% compliance
		School closure after 10% absenteeism
		Generic social distancing
		Workplace distancing
		50% Reduction in long-distance travel beginning d30
15.	"60/60/90% U.S."	60% of symptomatic cases diagnosed
		Treatment of symptomatic cases

Home isolation of cases 60% compliance
School closure after 10% absenteeism
Generic social distancing
Workplace distancing
90% Reduction in long-distance travel beginning d30

+ Vaccine

Repeat runs #2 - #6 and #8 above, with addition of vaccine with 50% efficacy and supply sufficient to immunize 7% of TOTAL population, administered ONLY to working adults or ONLY to older adults / seniors.

+ Social prophylaxis (full TAP)

Repeat runs #2 - #6 and #8 above, with addition of workplace prophylaxis.

+ Diagnosis on clinical grounds

Repeat runs #2 - #6 and #8 above, with all ILI treated as influenza.

Substitute reactive school closure

Repeat runs #2 - #6 above, with keeping children home strategy implemented after 100th or 1000th case (or 0.1% or 1% prevalence) as indicated in specific scenario, but keeping schools open until 10th diagnosed case (students + teachers) in individual school. Please report how long schools stay open in this scenario. Schools close if teacher absenteeism exceeds 10%, even if 10th diagnosed case not yet identified. ("Targeted social distancing" focusing on removing children from community circulation but maintaining normal school schedule as long as possible.)

+ Enhanced social distancing

Repeat runs #3 and #6 above, with generic social distancing by all and enhanced social distancing employed by 30% and 60% of the population, in simulations for each scenario where such enhanced social distancing produces an additional gain in terms of reduction of non-household contacts over generic social distancing of 50% and 95%.

All-
I wanted to get this out to all of you quickly as possible per today's meeting discussion. Richard Hatchett would like you to provide any comments to him within the next few days. Please use 'reply all' so that everyone gets to see the comments that are sent out.

Best,
Jenny

Jenny Randall
Economist
Private Sector Office
O: 202.282.9801
F: 202.282.9207

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Tuesday, March 14, 2006 12:28 PM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 3/14/06 Civil Division News

Google, Justice Department face off on search/privacy issue

AP files lawsuit seeking documents of all Guantanamo detainees

German CIA Detainee Testifies Before EU Committee; Khaled el Masri is suing the CIA over his kidnapping and imprisonment

Alleged CIA detainee claims German visited his cell

Appeals court overturns ruling blocking asylum for Ethiopian man

DOE told to pay TVA $34.9M in damages

USA Today
3/14/06

Google, Justice Department face off on search/privacy issue

By Jon Swartz
USA TODAY

SAN FRANCISCO — Google and the Justice Department will square off in federal court today in a seminal Internet privacy case that could touch millions of Americans.

The Bush administration is demanding the results of millions of searches on Google during a random week to buttress an online child-protection law blocked by the U.S. Supreme Court. Its reasoning: Internet filters don't properly shield kids from viewing pornography.

Google has resisted, citing competitive and privacy concerns, in a dispute that has escalated in a series of legal maneuvers since January. The American Civil Liberties Union says it will urge the court to reject the government's bid at a hearing in San Jose, Calif. A ruling could come today .

Privacy advocates are worried Internet search engines could become tools for government snooping and spawn a wave of subpoenas by individuals against search engine companies.

More significantly, the case undercuts the basic Internet tenet of anonymity, says Evan Hendricks, editor of newsletter Privacy Times. If the government has its way, he says, the Internet could be used as a digital microscope to seek out people. A Justice Department spokesman had no comment.

In an 18-page court filing Feb. 24, Justice lawyers argued privacy rights would not be trampled because the information requested would not identify individuals or be traceable.

The brief includes a declaration by Philip Stark, a researcher and statistics professor at the University of California at Berkeley, who says the government specifically asked that Google remove any identifying information from the search requests.

AOL, Yahoo and Microsoft MSN are cooperating with the government. They say that their assistance is limited and that the privacy of their users has not been violated.

But as the largest and most influential search engine, Google has significantly more at stake. “This case will make it clear how much information is collected and stored on Google searches,” says Paul Schiff Berman, an expert in cyberlaw at the University of Connecticut School of Law.

Berman and other legal experts say the consequences could be far-reaching for U.S. residents on several levels. The government might delve into the vast stores of Web-browsing data to look for individuals who are national security risks or engaged in criminal activity. Divorce lawyers also could subpoena search-engine providers for e-mail and browsing records to investigate the fidelity of a spouse.

“It creates a logistical problem for Google by putting it in the position of being an extension of law enforcement,” Berman says. “Of course, because Google is mining data for commercial purposes, it could put an end to its troubles if it stopped collecting data.”

END

AP

March 14, 2006

AP files lawsuit seeking documents of all Guantanamo detainees

By LARRY NEUMEISTER

Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK_The Associated Press sued\l "l" the Defense Department on Monday for the release of records identifying all past and current detainees at a U.S\l "l". military base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"Given the significant public interest in understanding the actions taken by the U.S. government with respect to the individuals held at Guantanamo Bay," the information is urgently needed, said the AP, the nation's largest news gathering organization.

The lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, where a judge last month ordered the Pentagon to release to the AP the identities of several hundred detainees who had participated in hearings.

The AP, which serves more than 15,000 news outlets, filed the new lawsuit after the Pentagon failed to respond to a Freedom of Information Act request for documents that would help identify the more than 750 past and current detainees.

The request, submitted Jan. 18, was necessary to obtain information critical to the AP's ability to interpret transcripts of proceedings involving some detainees that were provided by the Defense Department, the lawsuit said.

The public has "an intense and legitimate interest" in learning the detainees' identities, but the Defense Department has been unable or unwilling to state when or if it will provide the requested identifying information, the AP said.

Heather Tasker, a spokeswoman for the Manhattan U.S. attorney's office, which must respond to the lawsuit, declined comment Monday.

In February, U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff ordered the military to turn over uncensored copies of transcripts and other documents from 317 military hearings for detainees at the prison camp. The Defense Department said no transcripts exist of the hearings for another 241 detainees who refused to participate in the Combatant Status Review Tribunals.

U.S. authorities hold about 490 prisoners at Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban. Most have been held without charges since the detention center opened four years ago, prompting human rights groups to complain.

The Defense Department earlier released transcripts to the AP in response to a similar lawsuit, but the names and other details of detainees were blacked out, prompting the judge to order the names released.

The judge has not ruled whether the government must release uncensored transcripts from a second round of hearings to decide whether detainees remain threats to the United States.

END

Deutsche Welle

3/13/06

German CIA Detainee Testifies Before EU Committee; Khaled el Masri is suing the CIA over his kidnapping and imprisonment

Khaled el Masri, a German citizen who was kidnapped by the CIA, told the special committee of the EU Parliament that he identified the German man who allegedly interrogated him during his imprisonment in Afghanistan.

After two hours of grilling by the special committee of the European Parliament on Monday, Khaled el Masri seemed quite exhausted. He spoke with a soft voice and gave only a few details of his ordeal. The bulk of the information came from his lawyer who took over when el Masri mixed up the facts and did not understand the questions.

El Masri, who was abducted in Macedonia in late 2003, said that a man called "Sam" questioned him three or four times during his imprisonment in Afghanistan. He said he recognized this man on a photograph and during a line-up and identity check in a police station in Germany recently.

"'Sam' is German, I am sure," el Masri said. "I saw a picture of Gerhard Lehman, I am absolutely convinced that he was 'Sam'."

A man called Gerhard Lehman does indeed exist. He works for the German Federal Criminal Police, but the German police authorities said that Lehman had nothing to do with el Masri's kidnapping.

Truth or dare

The parliamentarians wanted to know why el Masri was so sure that he was actually held in Afghanistan by the CIA. They also asked him why he had traveled to Macedonia when the rendition started. The answers el Masri gave were not very convincing for everybody.

"I've never been to a hearing in which the words 'I don't know,' 'I assume,' and 'maybe' were used so frequently," said Elmar Brok, a German EU parliamentarian and member of the European People's Party. "No clear evidence was produced."

Brok added he is convinced that the German authorities are telling the truth.

"Obviously, the Americans conducted the abduction," he said. "Nobody is contesting that, but there is no evidence that the authorities of a member state of the European parliament participated or covered it up."

Lack of empathy

Germany's EU parliamentarian Cem Özdemir of the Green party said he had no doubt that el Masri was abducted and illegally held.

"We don't have to believe literally everything he says," Özdemir said. "But a parliamentarian should empathize with the fact that he was kidnapped and taken to Afghanistan, that he was obviously robbed of his freedom. Some Christian Democrat colleagues from Germany behaved here in a way which was unworthy of a parliament."

Now the authorities in Germany and Macedonia will have to answer tough questions and would have to prove that they did not cover up the kidnapping.

"I think Macedonia owes us an explanation, whether and when it informed Germany," Özdemir said. "Clearly, this did not happen, and that's not right."

The German parliament will start its own investigation into the matter shortly. Khaled el Masri filed a suit against the CIA in Virginia. The state prosecutor in Munich is also investigating the case after el Masri brought charges against the German authorities.

END

AP

March 13, 2006, 8:52PM

Alleged CIA detainee claims German visited his cell

Associated Press

STRASBOURG, FRANCE - A German national who claims CIA agents kidnapped him and held him for months at a secret prison in Afghanistan told a European Parliament committee on Monday that a German "with no foreign accent at all" visited him several times at the prison.

Khalid al-Masri, who is suing the CIA for alleged wrongful imprisonment and torture, spoke before a committee investigating whether the United States shipped prisoners through European airports to secret detention centers.

German officials have insisted the government learned of al-Masri's case only after his release, and that they quickly informed police and prosecutors.

Al-Masri has said in the past that the German identified himself only as "Sam." Earlier this year, he picked the man from a lineup staged by German officials, but he did not identify him by name then.

On Monday, however, he told the committee that the German was named Gerhard Lehmann and that he was a senior official of Germany's Federal Criminal Office.

Al-Masri, who was born in Kuwait, grew up in Lebanon and moved to Germany, said he learned the name of the official from a journalist on what he described as an "electronic newspaper," who has since vanished.

Al-Masri claims that U.S. agents captured him on Dec. 31, 2003, while he was on a trip to Macedonia.

END

AP

March 14, 2006

Appeals court overturns ruling blocking asylum for Ethiopian man

RICHMOND, Virginia_A federal appeals court said an immigration\l "l" judge\l "l" and appeals board erred in denying asylum to a former Ethiopian security official who fled his country rather than face persecution for not arresting anti-government protesters.

An immigration\l "l" judge\l "l" had denied Simmon Menghesha's request for asylum in 2001 based on the belief that he faced rightful prosecution for obstruction of justice in Ethiopia. The Board of Immigration Appeals upheld the decision in 2004.

On Monday, the three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals vacated the board's decision, ordering that Menghesha's appeal be reviewed.

Judges Roger Gregory and Robert King said the board and immigration\l "l" judge\l "l" failed to consider the Ethiopian government's political motives for seeking Menghesha's return and held him to an unusually stringent standard of proving the government's intentions.

In a dissenting opinion, Judge Karen Williams argued that the previous judge had properly applied the laws and that Menghesha failed to prove he would likely be persecuted on the basis of his political beliefs _ one of numerous requirements when seeking political asylum.

Menghesha, 29, fled Ethiopia in July 2001 after failing to obey orders to arrest a group of anti-government student protesters he had been ordered to spy on in his job with a government security detail.

The Department of Justice still is determining whether to pursue the case further.

END

Knoxville News-Sentinel, The (TN) (KRT)

March 11, 2006

DOE told to pay TVA $34.9M in damages

Rebecca Ferrar

The Knoxville News-Sentinel, Tenn.

Mar. 11--A federal judge has ordered the U.S. Department of Energy to pay TVA $34.9 million in damages for failing to meet a 1998 deadline to store nuclear waste from two of TVA's nuclear power plants.

It's the first ruling in which the department was ordered to pay damages to a utility for the failure to house the highly radioactive spent nuclear fuel generated on site at the nuclear plants.

That fuel is intended to be stored at the Yucca Mountain Repository in Nevada, but controversy over the location of the facility has delayed its opening even though it has been approved by Congress and signed into law by President Bush.

DOE was supposed to store spent nuclear fuel from TVA's Browns Ferry plant in northern Alabama and the Sequoyah plant near Chattanooga.

The ruling in favor of TVA was handed down by Judge Charles Lettow in the U.S. Court\l "l" of\l "l" Federal\l "l" Claims\l "l" on Jan. 31.

In the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1983, Congress authorized DOE to enter into contracts with nuclear plants generating high-level radioactive waste. Congress mandated that the nation's nuclear plants enter into contracts with DOE for fuel storage as a prerequisite to maintaining their operating licenses.

One of the goals of the act was to reduce the backlog of spent nuclear fuel accumulating at nuclear facilities around the nation, the court ruling says. The government announced in 1994 that construction delays at Yucca Mountain would postpone collection of waste until 2010.

Utilities that run the nation's 103 nuclear plants have filed 61 lawsuits seeking similar damages to that received by TVA.

David Lochbaum, nuclear safety engineer at the Union of Concerned Scientists, said there's a potential for billions of dollars in damages to be awarded because of similar lawsuits.

The fuel has been stored in wet storage pools at the nuclear plants. Once those pools were full, plants including Browns Ferry and Sequoyah began storing waste in dry steel and concrete casks that are approximately 10 feet in diameter and 20 feet in height and may weigh 270 tons each when filled with spent nuclear fuel assemblies.

The government's waste disposal program included a goal of avoiding utilities' need to provide storage of spent fuel outside the pools.

TVA, recognizing that DOE would not be able to accept its waste, began planning the alternative of building dry storage casks in 1998.

TVA was awarded $34,893,207 for labor costs, contract services, engineering work, overhead and travel associated with constructing and operating the dry storage casks.

The ruling concluded that TVA would not have been required to build dry storage facilities if DOE had lived up to its contract to begin accepting waste.

The damages TVA was awarded cover the cost of storing fuel at Browns Ferry and Sequoyah through Sept. 30, 2004. The ruling said TVA retains the right to bring subsequent actions on damages incurred after that date.

END

[redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov

From: [redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov
Sent: Wednesday, March 15, 2006 6:30 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: Ginsburg speech on foreign law citation
Attachments: tmp.htm

Neil: fyi, in the speech attached below, Justice Ginsburg comments briefly on the Hamdan case and the DTA. (Sixth paragraph from the end.)

From: redacted
Sent: Wednesday, March 15, 2006 5:07 PM
Subject: Ginsburg speech on foreign law citation

March 15, 2006

To: Judiciary Analysts/Counsels

Fr: [redacted]udiciary Policy Analyst/Counsel

RE: Ginsburg speech on foreign law

Copied below is the text of a speech that Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg gave in South Africa last month. In it, she defends the Supreme Court's citation to foreign law for the interpretation of the U.S. Constitution and suggests, unsubtly, that those who oppose the Supreme Court's reliance on foreign authority should be thought of in the same breath as former Chief Justice Roger Taney (author of the Dred Scott decision) and that their political opposition to citing foreign authority "fuel[s] the irrational fringe" that has apparently threatened her life, and the life of former Justice O'Connor. She predicts that the Supreme Court will continue to rely on foreign law in making constitutional judgments.

(It is worth recalling that both Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito said during their confirmation hearings that foreign law should have no role in U.S. constitutional analysis and interpretation.)

[redacted]

http://www.supremecourtus.gov/publicinfo/speeches/sp_02-07b-06.html
<http://www.supremecourtus.gov/publicinfo/speeches/sp_02-07b-06.html>

"A decent Respect to the Opinions of [Human]kind": The Value of a Comparative Perspective in

Constitutional Adjudication Constitutional Court of South Africa February 7, 2006 Ruth Bader Ginsburg Associate Justice to the Supreme Court of the United States

South Africa's 1996 Constitution famously provides in Section 39: "When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court . . . must consider international law; and may consider foreign law." Other modern Constitutions have similar provisions, India's and Spain's, for example.
In the United States the question whether and when courts may seek enlightenment from the laws and decisions of other nations has provoked heated debate. I will speak of that controversy in these remarks. At the outset, I should disclose the view I have long held: If U.S. experience and decisions can be instructive to systems that have more recently instituted or invigorated judicial review for constitutionality, so we can learn from others including Canada, South Africa, and most recently the U. K. - now engaged in measuring ordinary laws and executive actions against charters securing basic rights.

Exposing laws to judicial review for constitutionality was once uncommon outside the United States. In the United Kingdom, not distant from France, Spain, Germany, and other civil law countries in this regard, court review of legislation for compatibility with a fundamental charter was considered off limits, undemocratic, irreconcilable with the doctrine of parliamentary supremacy. That was once true of South Africa, is that not so? But particularly in the years following World War II, many nations installed constitutional review by courts as one safeguard against oppressive government and stirred-up majorities. National, multinational, and international human rights charters and courts today play a prominent part in our world. The U.S. judicial system will be the poorer, I have urged, if we do not both share our experience with, and learn from, legal systems with values and a commitment to democracy similar to our own.

In the value I place on comparative dialogue - on sharing with and learning from others - I draw on counsel from the founders of the United States. The drafters and signers of the Declaration of Independence cared about the opinions of other peoples; they placed before the world the reasons why the States, joining together to become the United States of America, were impelled to separate from Great Britain. The Declarants stated their reasons out of "a decent Respect to the Opinions of Mankind." They set out in the Declaration a long list of grievances, in order to submit the "Facts" - the "long Train of [the British Crown's] Abuses" - to the scrutiny of "a candid World."

The U.S. Supreme Court, early on, expressed a complementary view: The judicial power of the United States, the Court said in 1816, includes cases "in the correct adjudication of which foreign nations are deeply interested . . . [and] in which the principles of the law and comity of nations often form an essential inquiry." "Far from [exhibiting hostility] to foreign countries' views and laws," Professor Vicki Jackson of the Georgetown University law faculty recently reminded us:
"[T]he founding generation showed concern for how adjudication in our courts would affect other countries' regard for the United States." A similar concern is evident today in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of South Africa. As Justice O'Regan put it, writing separately in Kaunda v. President of the Republic of South Africa: "[O]ur Constitution recognizes and asserts that, after decades of isolation, South Africa is now a member of the community of nations, and a bearer of obligations and responsibilities in terms of international law." [2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at 222.] Even more so than when the United States was a new nation, the USA today, no less than South Africa, is subject to the scrutiny of "a candid World."

John Jay, one of the authors of The Federalist Papers promoting ratification of the U.S. Constitution, and George Washington's appointee as first Chief Justice of the United States, wrote of the new nation in 1793 much as Justice O'Regan did in 2004 of the new Republic. The United States, Jay observed, "by taking a place among the nations of the earth, bec[a]me amenable to the laws of nations," the core of what we today call international law. Eleven years later, the great Chief Justice John Marshall cautioned: "[A]n act of Congress ought never to be construed to violate the law of nations if any other possible construction remains." South Africa installed just such a guide in its 1996 Constitution. Section 233 instructs: "When interpreting . . . legislation, every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation . . . consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation . . . inconsistent with international law."

True, there are generations-old and still persistent discordant views on recourse to the "Opinions of Mankind." A mid-19th century U.S. Chief Justice expressed opposition to such recourse in an extreme statement.
He wrote:

No one, we presume, supposes that any change in public opinion or feeling . . . in the civilized nations of Europe or in this country, should induce the [U.S. Supreme Court] to give to the words of the Constitution a more liberal construction . . . than they were intended to bear when the instrument was framed and adopted.

Those words were penned in 1857. They appear in Chief Justice Roger Taney's opinion for a divided Court in Dred Scott v. Sandford, an infamous opinion that invoked the majestic Due Process Clause to uphold one human's right to hold another in bondage. The Dred Scott decision declared that no "descendants of Africans [imported into the United States], and sold as slaves" could ever become citizens of the United States.

While the Civil War and the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution reversed the Dred Scott judgment, U.S. jurists and political actors today divide sharply on the propriety of looking beyond our nation's borders, particularly on matters touching fundamental human rights. Some have expressed spirited opposition.
Justice Scalia counsels: The Court "should cease putting forth foreigners' views as part of the reasoned basis of its decisions. To invoke alien law when it agrees with one's own thinking, and ignore it otherwise, is not reasoned decisionmaking, but sophistry."

Another trenchant critic, Seventh Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Richard Posner, commented not long ago: "To cite foreign law as authority is to flirt with the discredited . . . idea of a universal natural law; or to suppose fantastically that the world's judges constitute a single, elite community of wisdom and conscience." Judge Posner's view rests, in part, on the concern that U.S. judges do not comprehend the social, historical, political, and institutional background from which foreign opinions emerge. Nor do we even understand the language in which laws and judgments, outside the common law realm, are written.

Judge Posner is right, of course, to this extent: Foreign opinions are not authoritative; they set no binding precedent for the U.S. judge. But they can add to the store of knowledge relevant to the solution of trying questions. Yes, we should approach foreign legal materials with sensitivity to our differences, deficiencies, and imperfect understanding, but imperfection, I believe, should not lead us to abandon the effort to learn what we can from the experience and good thinking foreign sources may convey.

Representative of the perspective I share with four of my current colleagues, Patricia M. Wald, once Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and former Judge on the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, last year said with characteristic wisdom: "It's hard for me to see that the use of foreign decisional law is an up-or-down proposition. I see it rather as a pool of potential and useful information and thought that must be mined with caution and restraint."

Many current members of the U.S. Congress would terminate all debate over whether federal courts should refer to foreign or international legal materials. For the most part, they would respond to the question with a resounding "No." Two identical Resolutions reintroduced last year, one in the House of Representatives and the other in the Senate, declare that "judicial interpretations regarding the meaning of the Constitution of the United States should not be based on judgments, laws, or pronouncements of foreign institutions unless such [materials] inform an understanding of the original meaning of the Constitution." As of December 2005, the House Resolution had attracted support from 83 cosponsors. Two 2005-proposed Acts would do more than "resolve." They would positively prohibit federal courts, when interpreting the U.S.
Constitution, from referring to "any constitution, law, administrative rule, Executive order, directive, policy, judicial decision, or any other action of any foreign state or international organization or agency, other than English constitutional and common law up to the time of the adoption of the [U.S.] Constitution." [Even reference to a Scottish verdict, i.e., a verdict of not proved, it seems, would be out of order.]

These measures recycle similar resolutions and bills proposed before the 2004 elections in the United States, but never put to a vote. Although I doubt the current measures will garner sufficient votes to pass, it is disquieting that they have attracted sizable support. And one not-so-small concern - they fuel the irrational fringe. A personal example. The U.S. Supreme Court's Marshal alerted Justice O'Connor and me to a February 28, 2005, web posting on a "chat" site. It opened:

Okay commandoes, here is your first patriotic assignment . . . an easy one. Supreme Court Justices Ginsburg and O'Connor have publicly stated that they use [foreign] laws and rulings to decide how to rule on American cases.

This is a huge threat to our Republic and Constitutional freedom. . . .
If you are what you say you are, and NOT armchair patriots, then those two justices will not live another week.

Nearly a year has passed since that posting. Justice O'Connor, though to my great sorrow retired just last week from the Court's bench, remains alive and well. As for me, you can judge for yourself.

To a large extent, I believe, the critics in Congress and in the media misperceive how and why U.S. courts refer to foreign and international court decisions. We refer to decisions rendered abroad, it bears repetition, not as controlling authorities, but for their indication, in Judge Wald's words, of "common denominators of basic fairness governing relationships between the governors and the governed."

In a November 2005 Harvard Law Review comment, Georgetown's Professor Jackson usefully identified three responses to transnational sources:
resistance, convergence, and engagement. South Africa's apartheid regime fit the "Resistance Model," an approach that "relishes resistance . . .
to outside influence." Professor Jackson suggested that South Africa's 1996 Constitution fits the "Convergence Model," in that it "explicitly incorporate[s] international law as a controlling legal norm." But perhaps the Constitutional Court's emerging jurisprudence comes closer to the third approach, the "Engagement Model." That Model comprehends transnational sources "as interlocutors," a means to test "understanding of one's own traditions and possibilities by examining them in the [reflected light cast by other legal systems]."

The jurisprudence of South Africa's Constitutional Court offers many examples, among them, Justice Kriegler's cautionary note in Sanderson v.
Attorney-General, Eastern Cape. The question in that case: Did a two-year delay in bringing a prosecution for alleged sexual offenses violate the defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial. In determining that the defendant's rights were not violated, Justice Kriegler canvassed foreign precedents, especially U.S. and Canadian decisions; he prefaced his examination, however, by warning that "the use of foreign precedent requires circumspection." [1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at 26.] In State v. Makwanyane, then Chief Justice Chaskalson earlier cautioned, in presenting his comparative survey decisions on capital punishment: "We can derive assistance from . . . foreign case law, but we are in no way bound to follow it." [1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at 39.] I agree. Some U.S. practices, I fully appreciate, are not suitably exported: the use of juries in civil cases is one example.

In testimony prepared for a congressional hearing, Professor Jackson made a point critics of comparative sideglances perhaps overlook: the "negative authority" foreign experience sometimes may have. She referred in this regard to the "Steel Seizure Case" decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1952. There, Justice Jackson, in his separate opinion, pointed to features of the Weimar Constitution in Germany that allowed Adolf Hitler to assume dictatorial powers. He contrasted Germany's situation with that of Great Britain, a country in which legislative authorization was required for the exercise of emergency powers. Justice Jackson drew from that comparison support for the conclusion that, without more specific congressional authorization, the U.S. President could not seize private property (in that case, the steel mills) even in aid of a war effort. The U.S. President's wartime authority, you no doubt know, is today a hotly debated issue in U.S. political and legal circles.

At the time Justice Jackson cast a comparative sideglance at Weimar Germany, the United States itself was a source of "negative authority." The Attorney General pressed that point in an amicus brief for the United States in Brown v. Board of Education. Urging the Court to put an end to the "separate but equal doctrine," the Attorney General wrote:

The existence of discrimination against minority groups in the United States has an adverse effect upon our relations with other countries.
Racial discrimination . . . raises doubts even among friendly nations as to the intensity of our devotion to the democratic faith.

The U.S. Constitution, Justice Scalia has remarked, contains no instruction resembling South Africa's Section 39 prescription. So U.S. courts, he thinks, have no warrant from our fundamental instrument of government to consider foreign law. I would demur to that observation.
Judges in the United States are free to consult all manner of commentary - Restatements, Treatises, what law professors or even law students write copiously in law reviews, for example. If we can consult those writings, why not the analysis of a question similar to the one we confront contained in an opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Constitutional Court of South Africa, the German Constitutional Court, or the European Court of Human Rights?

A case in point. On December 16, 2004, in a controversy precipitated by the fight against terrorism, the Lords of Appeal (the U.K. counterpart to the U.S. Supreme Court) issued a waypaving decision, one that looks beyond the United Kingdom's borders. The case was brought by aliens held in custody in Belmarsh Prison. A nine-member panel ruled, 8-to-1, that the British government's indefinite detention of foreigners suspected of terrorism, without charging or trying them, is incompatible with the European Convention on Human Rights, incorporated into domestic law by the U. K. Human Rights Act.

Lord Bingham's lead opinion draws not only on domestic decisions and decisions of the European Court of Human Rights. It also refers to opinions of the Supreme Court of Canada and U.S. Court of Appeals opinions (although not U.S. Supreme Court opinions). Finding the differential treatment of nationals and non-nationals impermissible under the Human Rights Act, Lord Bingham also referred to several U. N. instruments, commencing with the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights and including the 1965 International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

Lord Bingham did make the observation, gently, that contemporary "U.S. authority does not provide evidence of general international practice." That comment may have figured in the New York Times' characterization of the Lords' ruling as "a strong example of the increasing interdependence of domestic and international law, at least outside of the United States." Parliament reacted swiftly to the Lord's decision. In March 2005, it enacted a measure allowing placement of terrorist suspects under a highly restrictive form of house arrest, in lieu of imprisonment, again without charging or trying them.

One year later, in December 2005, the Law Lords resolved another headline case involving the Belmarsh detainees. A seven-member panel ruled unanimously that evidence obtained through torture was inadmissible in British courts to establish criminal liability or eligibility for deportation "irrespective of where, or by whom, or on whose authority the torture was inflicted." Lord Bingham's lead opinion again surveyed U.N. instruments, including the Convention against Torture, as well as judicial decisions from other nations, including the United States, Germany, and Israel. These sources afforded confirmation for his ringing declaration: "The English common law has regarded torture and its fruits with abhorrence for over 500 years, and that abhorrence is now shared by over 140 countries which have acceded to the Torture Convention." Some of the Lords' speeches cast a critical eye across the sea. Lord Hoffman ventured that "many people in the United States, heirs to the common law tradition, have felt their country dishonoured by the use of torture outside the jurisdiction."

Later in December, recognizing the nation's obligations under the Convention against Torture, the U.S. Congress banned cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment of detainees in U.S. custody. The legislation, however, stops short of explicitly banning evidence elicited by torture from consideration by a military tribunal charged with determining whether a detainee is an enemy combatant.

The notion that it is improper to look beyond the borders of the United States in grappling with hard questions, as my quotation from Chief Justice Taney suggested, is in line with the view of the U.S. Constitution as a document essentially frozen in time as of the date of its ratification. I am not a partisan of that view. U.S. jurists honor the Framers' intent "to create a more perfect Union," I believe, if they read the Constitution as belonging to a global 21st century, not as fixed forever by 18th-century understandings.

A key 1958 plurality opinion, Trop v. Dulles, makes just that point. At issue in that case, whether stripping a wartime deserter of citizenship violated the Eighth Amendment's ban on "cruel and unusual punishments." "The basic concept underlying the . . . Amendment," the opinion observed, "is nothing less than the dignity of man." Therefore the Constitution's text "must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." In that regard, the plurality reported: "The civilized nations of the world are in virtual unanimity that statelessness is not to be imposed as punishment for crime." (The primacy of human dignity notably is not left to inference in South Africa's Constitution, for Section 10 prescribes:
"Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected.")

Turning from frozen-in-time interpretation, I will take up another shortfall or insularity in current U.S.

jurisprudence, at least as I see it. The Bill of Rights, few would disagree, is the hallmark and pride of the United States. One might therefore assume that it guides and controls U.S. officialdom wherever in the world they carry the flag of the United States or their credentials. But that is not the currently prevailing view. For example, absent an express ban by treaty, a U.S.
officer may abduct a foreigner and forcibly transport him to the United States to stand trial. The U.S. Supreme Court so held, 6-to-3, in 1992.
Just a year earlier, South Africa's Supreme Court of Appeal had ruled the other way. It determined that under South Africa's common law, a trial court has no jurisdiction to hear a case against a defendant when the State had acted lawlessly in apprehending him by participating in an abduction across international borders.

Another case in point, one in which I was a participant, involving civil litigation: Interpreting U.S. Supreme Court precedent, a divided U.S.
Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit held in 1989, during my tenure on that court, that foreign plaintiffs acting abroad - plaintiffs were Indian family planning organizations - had no First Amendment rights, and therefore no standing to assert a violation of such rights by U.S. officials. In particular, the Indian organizations complained of a condition on U.S. grant money: the recipients could not engage in any abortion counseling, even in a separate entity funded by non-U.S. sources. In dissent, I resisted the notion that in an encounter between the United States and the people of another land, "the amendment we prize as 'first' has no force in court." I expressed the expectation that the position taken in the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations would one day accurately describe our law. "[W]herever the United States acts," the Restatement projects, "'it can only act in accordance with the limitations imposed by the Constitution.'"

Returning to my main theme, I will recount briefly and chronologically the Supreme Court's most recent decisions involving foreign or international legal sources as an aid to the resolution of constitutional questions. In a headline 2002 decision, Atkins v.
Virginia, a six-member majority (all save the Chief Justice and Justices Scalia and Thomas) held unconstitutional the execution of a mentally retarded offender. The Court noted that "within the world community, the imposition of the death penalty for crimes committed by mentally retarded offenders is overwhelmingly disapproved." (South Africa, of course, figures prominently in the worldwide disapproval, the Constitutional Court having held a decade ago that capital punishment in any case is unconstitutional.)

New York Times reporter Linda Greenhouse wrote of the following, 2002-2003, Term: The Court has "displayed a [steadily growing] attentiveness to legal developments in the rest of the world and to the [C]ourt's role in keeping the United States in step with them." Among examples from that Term, I would include the Michigan University affirmative action cases decided June 23, 2003. Although the Court splintered, it upheld the Michigan Law School program. In separate opinions, I looked to two United Nations Conventions: the 1965 Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination, which the United States has ratified; and the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, which, sadly, the United States has not yet ratified. Both Conventions distinguish between impermissible policies of oppression or exclusion, and permissible policies of inclusion, "temporary special measures aimed at accelerating de facto equality." The U.S. Supreme Court's decision in the Michigan Law School case, I observed, "accords with the international understanding of the [purpose and propriety] of affirmative action." (South Africa's Constitution is clear on that matter; Section 9(2) provides: "To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.")

A better indicator from the U.S. Supreme Court's 2002-2003 Term, because it attracted a majority, is

A better indicator from the U.S. Supreme Court's 2002-2003 Term, because it attracted a majority, is Justice Kennedy's opinion for the Court in Lawrence v. Texas, announced June 26, 2003. Overruling a 1986 decision, Lawrence declared unconstitutional a Texas statute prohibiting two adult persons of the same sex from engaging, voluntarily, in intimate sexual conduct. (I think it highly unlikely, however, that we will soon see a U.S. Supreme Court decision resembling the very recent decision of the Constitutional Court of South Africa in Minister of Home Affairs v.
Fourie.) On the question of dynamic versus static, frozen-in-time constitutional interpretation, the Court's Lawrence v. Texas opinion instructs:

Had those who drew and ratified the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment known the components of liberty in its manifold possibilities, they might have been more specific. They did not presume to have this insight. They knew times can blind us to certain truths and later generations can see that laws once thought necessary and proper in fact serve only to oppress. As the Constitution endures, persons in every generation can invoke its principles in their own search for greater freedom.

On respect for "the Opinions of [Human]kind," the Lawrence Court emphasized: "The right the petitioners seek in this case has been accepted as an integral part of human freedom in many other countries." In support, the Court cited the leading 1981 European Court of Human Rights decision, Dudgeon v. United Kingdom, and subsequent European Human Rights Court decisions affirming the protected right of homosexual adults to engage in intimate, consensual conduct.

In the 2003-2004 Term, foreign and international legal sources again figured in several decisions. These included, most notably, two June 2004 decisions in cases arising out of the war on terror. One, Hamdi v.
Rumsfeld, concerned a U.S. citizen, held incommunicado in a Navy brig in South Carolina pursuant to an executive decree declaring him an "enemy combatant." Ruling some six months before the Law Lords' decision in the 2004 Belmarsh case, the Court held, 8-to-1, that the petitioner was entitled to a "meaningful opportunity" to contest the factual basis for his detention before an impartial adjudicator. Even in "our most challenging and uncertain moments" when "our Nation's commitment to due process is most severely tested," Justice O'Connor wrote for a four-Justice plurality, "we must preserve our commitment at home to the principles for which we fight abroad." "[H]istory and common sense," she reminded, "teach us that an unchecked system of detention carries the potential to become a means for oppression and abuse." On that theme, the U.K.'s Lord Hoffman wrote in his separate opinion in the 2004 Belmarsh case:

The real threat to the life of the nation, in the sense of a people living in accordance with its traditional laws and political values, comes not from terrorism but from laws [or executive measures, such as the one at issue in Belmarsh, authorizing indefinite imprisonment without charge or trial]. That is the true measure of what terrorism may achieve.

He hoped, after the Lords of Appeal ruling, that Parliament would not "give the terrorists such a victory." (I should add that two University of Chicago Law School professors (Eric A. Posner and Adrian Vermeule) recently inveighed against Justice O'Connor's and Lord Hoffman's statements as "absurdities." People do not prefer liberty to death, they urged. A government that does not contract civil liberties in face of terrorist threats, they said, "is pathologically rigid, not enlightened." They queried whether the Lords would have come out the same way had the terrorist carnage in London's underground preceded the Belmarsh decision. The Law Lords, I note, have not relented. Their December 2005 decision excluding evidence obtained through torture post-dates the London underground bombing.)

The other "enemy combatant" case decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in June 2004, Rasul v. Bush, held that U.S. courts have jurisdiction to consider challenges to the legality of the detention of foreign nationals captured in hostilities abroad, then transported to the U.S.
naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Court wrote narrowly; it said nothing about what claims, if any, would succeed once the detainees get to a federal court. [Britian's Lord Steyn, before this decision, called Guantanamo a "legal black hole."] The Supreme Court has so far written only chapter one on the Guantanamo Bay incarcerations. Federal district court judges have split on chapter two. One judge held that foreigners detained at Guantanamo Bay, though they had access to court, could gain no judicial relief. Another ruled that the detainees were entitled to a fair hearing on the question whether their incarceration meets due process demands. Both cases are currently on appeal.

Just a few months ago, the Supreme Court agreed to hear a case, titled Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, posing these questions: (1) Does the President have authority to establish a military commission to try Guantanamo Bay detainees for alleged war crimes; and (2) Is the writ of habeas corpus in federal court an available means to determine Guantanamo Bay detainees' alleged rights under the 1949 Geneva Convention? The end of December legislation I earlier mentioned severely narrows Guantanamo Bay detainees' access to courts. The impact of that legislation on Hamdan's petition, and on scores of filings in the federal district court in the District of Columbia, remains uncertain.

To conclude my account of recent decisions in which the U.S. Supreme Court cast comparative sideglances, the March 2005 decision in Roper v.
Simmons presents perhaps the fullest expressions to date on the propriety and utility of looking to "the opinions of [human]kind." Holding unconstitutional the execution of persons under the age of 18 when they committed capital crimes, the Court declared it fitting to acknowledge "the overwhelming weight of international opinion against the juvenile death penalty." Justice Kennedy wrote for the Court that the opinion of the world community provides "respected and significant confirmation of our own conclusions." "It does not lessen our fidelity to the Constitution," he explained, to recognize "the express affirmation of certain fundamental rights by other nations and peoples." (Among the dozens of amici curiae submissions in Roper, an impressive brief bears the names of several Nobel Peace Prize winners, including former U.S. President Jimmy Carter, South Africa's former President Willem de Klerk, and Archbishop Desmond Tutu. The Nobel laureates urged the Court to "consider the opinion of the international community, which has rejected the death penalty for child offenders worldwide.")

[Justice O'Connor, although she dissented from the Court's categorical ruling in Roper, agreed with the Court on the relevance of "foreign and international law to [an] assessment of evolving standards of decency." The other dissenters, for whom Justice Scalia spoke, vigorously contended that foreign and international law have no place in determining what punishments are "cruel and unusual" within the meaning of the U.S. Constitution's Eighth Amendment.]

Recognizing that forecasts are risky, I nonetheless believe the U.S.
Supreme Court will continue to accord "a decent Respect to the Opinions of [Human]kind" as a matter of comity and in a spirit of humility.
Comity, because projects vital to our well being - combating international terrorism is a prime example - require trust and cooperation of nations the world over. And humility because, in Justice O'Connor's words: "Other legal systems continue to innovate, to experiment, and to find new solutions to the new legal problems that arise each day, from which we can learn and benefit."

In this regard, I was impressed by an observation made in September 2003 by Israel's Chief Justice Aharon Barak. September 11, he noted, confronts the United States with the dilemma of conducting a war on terrorism without sacrificing the nation's most cherished values, including our respect for human dignity. "We in Israel," Barak said, "have our September 11, and September 12 and so on." He human dignity. "We in Israel," Barak said, "have our September 11, and September 12 and so on." He spoke of his own Court's efforts to balance the government's no doubt compelling need to secure the safety of the State and of its citizens on the one hand, and the nation's high regard for "human dignity and freedom on the other hand." He referred, particularly, to a question presented to his Court: "Is it lawful to use violence (less euphemistically, torture) in interrogat[ing] [a] terrorist in a 'ticking bomb' situation." His Court's answer: No, "[n]ever use violence." He elaborated:

[It] is the fate of a democracy [that] not all means are acceptable to it, . . . not all methods employed by its enemies are open to it.
Sometimes, a democracy must fight with one hand tied behind its back.
Nonetheless, it has the upper hand. Preserving the rule of law and recognition of individual liberties constitute an important component of [a democracy's] understanding of security. At the end of the day, [those values buoy up] its spirit and strength [and its capacity to] overcome [the] difficulties.

In that opinion, I concur without reservation.

Judiciary Policy Analyst/Counsel

Senate Republican Policy Committee

Neil: fyi, in the speech attached below, Justice Ginsburg comments briefly on the Hamdan case and the DTA. (Sixth paragraph from the end.)

From: [redacted] (RPC)
Sent: Wednesday, March 15, 2006 5:07 PM
Subject: Ginsburg speech on foreign law citation

March 15, 2006

To: Judiciary Analysts/Counsels

Fr: [redacted] Judiciary Policy Analyst/Counsel

RE: Ginsburg speech on foreign law

Copied below is the text of a speech that Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg gave in South Africa last month. In it, she defends the Supreme Court's citation to foreign law for the interpretation of the U.S. Constitution and suggests, unsubtly, that those who oppose the Supreme Court's reliance on foreign authority should be thought of in the same breath as former Chief Justice Roger Taney (author of the Dred Scott decision) and that their political opposition to citing foreign authority "fuel[s] the irrational fringe" that has apparently threatened her life, and the life of former Justice O'Connor. She predicts that the Supreme Court will continue to rely on foreign law in making constitutional judgments.

(It is worth recalling that both Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito said during their confirmation hearings that foreign law should have no role in U.S. constitutional analysis and interpretation.)

[redacted]

http://www.supremecourtus.gov/publicinfo/speeches/sp_02-07b-06.html

"A decent Respect to the Opinions of [Human]kind": The Value of a Comparative Perspective in Constitutional Adjudication
Constitutional Court of South Africa
February 7, 2006
Ruth Bader Ginsburg
Associate Justice to the Supreme Court of the United States

South Africa's 1996 Constitution famously provides in Section 39: "When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court . . . must consider international law; and may consider foreign law." Other modern Constitutions have similar provisions, India's and Spain's, for example. In the United States the question whether and when courts may seek enlightenment from the laws and decisions of other nations has provoked heated debate. I will speak of that controversy in these remarks. At the outset, I should disclose the view I have long held: If U.S. experience and decisions can be instructive to systems that have more recently instituted or invigorated judicial review for constitutionality, so we can learn from others including Canada, South Africa, and most recently the U. K. - now engaged in measuring ordinary laws and executive actions against charters securing basic rights.

Exposing laws to judicial review for constitutionality was once uncommon outside the United States. In the United Kingdom, not distant from France, Spain, Germany, and other civil law countries in this regard, court review of legislation for compatibility with a fundamental charter was considered off limits, undemocratic, irreconcilable with the doctrine of parliamentary supremacy. That was once true of South Africa, is that not so? But particularly in the years following World War II, many nations installed constitutional review by courts as one safeguard against oppressive government and stirred-up majorities. National, multinational, and international human rights charters and courts today play a prominent part in our world. The U.S. judicial system will be the poorer, I have urged, if we do not both share our experience with, and learn from, legal systems with values and a commitment to democracy similar to our own.

In the value I place on comparative dialogue - on sharing with and learning from others - I draw on counsel from the founders of the United States. The drafters and signers of the Declaration of Independence cared about the opinions of other peoples; they placed before the world the reasons why the States, joining together to become the United States of America, were impelled to separate from Great Britain. The Declarants stated their reasons out of "a decent Respect to the Opinions of Mankind." They set out in the Declaration a long list of grievances, in order to submit the "Facts" - the "long Train of [the British Crown's] Abuses" - to the scrutiny of "a candid World."

The U.S. Supreme Court, early on, expressed a complementary view: The judicial power of the United States, the Court said in 1816, includes cases "in the correct adjudication of which foreign nations are deeply interested . . . [and] in which the principles of the law and comity of nations often form an essential inquiry." "Far from [exhibiting hostility] to foreign countries' views and laws," Professor Vicki Jackson of the Georgetown University law faculty recently reminded us: "[T]he founding generation showed concern for how adjudication in our courts would affect other countries' regard for the United States." A similar concern is evident today in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of South Africa. As Justice O'Regan put it, writing separately in Kaunda v. President of the Republic of South Africa: "[O]ur Constitution recognizes and asserts that, after decades of isolation, South Africa is now a member of the community of nations, and a bearer of obligations and responsibilities in terms of international law." [2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at 222.] Even more so than when the United States was a new nation, the USA today, no less than South Africa, is subject to the scrutiny of "a candid World."

John Jay, one of the authors of The Federalist Papers promoting ratification of the U.S. Constitution, and George Washington's appointee as first Chief Justice of the United States, wrote of the new nation in 1793 much as Justice O'Regan did in 2004 of the new Republic. The United States, Jay observed, "by taking a place among the nations of the earth, bec[a]me amenable to the laws of nations," the core of what we today call international law. Eleven years later, the great Chief Justice John Marshall cautioned: "[A]n act of Congress ought never to be construed to violate the law of nations if any other possible construction remains." South Africa installed just such a guide in its 1996 Constitution. Section 233 instructs: "When interpreting . . . legislation, every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation . . . consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation . . . inconsistent with international law."

True, there are generations-old and still persistent discordant views on recourse to the "Opinions of Mankind." A mid-19th century U.S. Chief Justice expressed opposition to such recourse in an extreme statement. He wrote:

> No one, we presume, supposes that any change in public opinion or feeling . . . in the civilized nations of Europe or in this country, should induce the [U.S. Supreme Court] to give to the words of the Constitution a more liberal construction . . . than they were intended to bear when the instrument was framed and adopted.

Those words were penned in 1857. They appear in Chief Justice Roger Taney's opinion for a divided Court in Dred Scott v. Sandford, an infamous opinion that invoked the majestic Due Process Clause to uphold one human's right to hold another in bondage. The Dred Scott decision declared that no "descendants of Africans [imported into the United States], and sold as slaves" could ever become citizens of the United States.

While the Civil War and the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution reversed the Dred Scott judgment, U.S. jurists and political actors today divide sharply on the propriety of looking beyond our nation's borders, particularly on matters touching fundamental human rights. Some have expressed spirited opposition. Justice Scalia counsels: The Court "should cease putting forth foreigners' views as part of the reasoned basis of its decisions. To invoke alien law when it agrees with one's own thinking, and ignore it otherwise, is not reasoned decisionmaking, but sophistry."

Another trenchant critic, Seventh Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Richard Posner, commented not long ago: "To cite foreign law as authority is to flirt with the discredited . . . idea of a universal natural law; or to suppose fantastically that the world's judges constitute a single, elite community of wisdom and conscience." Judge Posner's view rests, in part, on the concern that U.S. judges do not comprehend the social, historical, political, and institutional background from which foreign opinions emerge. Nor do we even understand the language in which laws and judgments, outside the common law realm, are written.

Judge Posner is right, of course, to this extent: Foreign opinions are not authoritative; they set no binding precedent for the U.S. judge. But they can add to the store of knowledge relevant to the solution of trying questions. Yes, we should approach foreign legal materials with sensitivity to our differences, deficiencies, and imperfect understanding, but imperfection, I believe, should not lead us to abandon the effort to learn what we can from the experience and good thinking foreign sources may convey.

Representative of the perspective I share with four of my current colleagues, Patricia M. Wald, once Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and former Judge on the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, last year said with characteristic wisdom: "It's hard for me to see that the use of foreign decisional law is an up-or-down proposition. I see it rather as a pool of potential and useful information and thought that must be mined with caution and restraint."

Many current members of the U.S. Congress would terminate all debate over whether federal courts should refer to foreign or international legal materials. For the most part, they would respond to the question with a resounding "No." Two identical Resolutions reintroduced last year, one in the House of Representatives and the other in the Senate, declare that "judicial interpretations regarding the meaning of the Constitution of the United States should not be based on judgments, laws, or pronouncements of foreign institutions unless such [materials] inform an understanding of the original meaning of the Constitution." As of December 2005, the House Resolution had attracted support from 83 cosponsors. Two 2005-proposed Acts would do more than "resolve." They would positively prohibit federal courts, when interpreting the U.S. Constitution, from referring to "any constitution, law, administrative rule, Executive order, directive, policy, judicial decision, or any other action of any foreign state or international organization or agency, other than English constitutional and common law up to the time of the adoption of the [U.S.] Constitution." [Even reference to a Scottish verdict, i.e., a verdict of not proved, it seems, would be out of order.]

These measures recycle similar resolutions and bills proposed before the 2004 elections in the United States, but never put to a vote. Although I doubt the current measures will garner sufficient votes to pass, it is disquieting that they have attracted sizable support. And one not-so-small concern - they fuel the irrational fringe. A personal example. The U.S. Supreme Court's Marshal alerted Justice O'Connor and me to a February 28, 2005, web posting on a "chat" site. It opened:

> Okay commandoes, here is your first patriotic assignment . . . an easy one. Supreme Court Justices Ginsburg and O'Connor have publicly stated that they use [foreign] laws and rulings to decide how to rule on American cases.

> This is a huge threat to our Republic and Constitutional freedom. . . . If you are what you say you are, and NOT armchair patriots, then those two justices will not live another week.

Nearly a year has passed since that posting. Justice O'Connor, though to my great sorrow retired just last week from the Court's bench, remains alive and well. As for me, you can judge for yourself.

To a large extent, I believe, the critics in Congress and in the media misperceive how and why U.S. courts refer to foreign and international court decisions. We refer to decisions rendered abroad, it bears repetition, not as controlling authorities, but for their indication, in Judge Wald's words, of "common denominators of basic fairness governing relationships between the governors and the governed."

In a November 2005 Harvard Law Review comment, Georgetown's Professor Jackson usefully identified three responses to transnational sources: resistance, convergence, and engagement. South Africa's apartheid regime fit the "Resistance Model," an approach that "relishes resistance . . . to outside influence." Professor Jackson suggested that South Africa's 1996 Constitution fits the "Convergence Model," in that it "explicitly incorporate[s] international law as a controlling legal norm." But perhaps the Constitutional Court's emerging jurisprudence comes closer to the third approach, the "Engagement Model." That Model comprehends transnational sources "as interlocutors," a means to test "understanding of one's own traditions and possibilities by examining them in the [reflected light cast by other legal systems]."

The jurisprudence of South Africa's Constitutional Court offers many examples, among them, Justice Kriegler's cautionary note in Sanderson v. Attorney-General, Eastern Cape. The question in that case: Did a two-year delay in bringing a prosecution for alleged sexual offenses violate the defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial. In determining that the defendant's rights were not violated, Justice Kriegler canvassed foreign precedents, especially U.S. and Canadian decisions; he prefaced his examination, however, by warning that "the use of foreign precedent requires circumspection." [1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at 26.] In State v. Makwanyane, then Chief Justice Chaskalson earlier cautioned, in presenting his comparative survey decisions on capital punishment: "We can derive assistance from . . . foreign case law, but we are in no way bound to follow it." [1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at 39.] I agree. Some U.S. practices, I fully appreciate, are not suitably exported: the use of juries in civil cases is one example.

In testimony prepared for a congressional hearing, Professor Jackson made a point critics of comparative sideglances perhaps overlook: the "negative authority" foreign experience sometimes may have. She referred in this regard to the "Steel Seizure Case" decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1952. There, Justice Jackson, in his separate opinion, pointed to features of the Weimar Constitution in Germany that allowed Adolf Hitler to assume dictatorial powers. He contrasted Germany's situation with that of Great Britain, a country in which legislative authorization was required for the exercise of emergency powers. Justice Jackson drew from that comparison support for the conclusion that, without more specific congressional authorization, the U.S. President could not seize private property (in that case, the steel mills) even in aid of a war effort. The U.S. President's wartime authority, you no doubt know, is today a hotly debated issue in U.S. political and legal circles.

At the time Justice Jackson cast a comparative sideglance at Weimar Germany, the United States itself was a source of "negative authority." The Attorney General pressed that point in an amicus brief for the United States in Brown v. Board of Education. Urging the Court to put an end to the "separate but equal doctrine," the Attorney General wrote:

> The existence of discrimination against minority groups in the United States has an adverse effect upon our relations with other countries. Racial discrimination . . . raises doubts even among friendly nations as to the intensity of our devotion to the democratic faith.

The U.S. Constitution, Justice Scalia has remarked, contains no instruction resembling South Africa's Section 39 prescription. So U.S. courts, he thinks, have no warrant from our fundamental instrument of government to consider foreign law. I would demur to that observation. Judges in the United States are free to consult all manner of commentary - Restatements, Treatises, what law professors or even law students write copiously in law reviews, for example. If we can consult those writings, why not the analysis of a question similar to the one we confront contained in an opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Constitutional Court of South Africa, the German Constitutional Court, or the European Court of Human Rights?

A case in point. On December 16, 2004, in a controversy precipitated by the fight against terrorism, the Lords of Appeal (the U.K. counterpart to the U.S. Supreme Court) issued a waypaving decision, one that looks beyond the United Kingdom's borders. The case was brought by aliens held in custody in Belmarsh Prison. A nine-member panel ruled, 8-to-1, that the British government's indefinite detention of foreigners suspected of terrorism, without charging or trying them, is incompatible with the European Convention on Human Rights, incorporated into domestic law by the U. K. Human Rights Act. Lord Bingham's lead opinion draws not only on domestic decisions and decisions of the European Court of Human Rights. It also refers to opinions of the Supreme Court of Canada and U.S. Court of Appeals opinions (although not U.S. Supreme Court opinions). Finding the differential treatment of nationals and non-nationals impermissible under the Human Rights Act, Lord Bingham also referred to several U. N. instruments, commencing with the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights and including the 1965 International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

Lord Bingham did make the observation, gently, that contemporary "U.S. authority does not provide evidence of general international practice." That comment may have figured in the New York Times' characterization of the Lords' ruling as "a strong example of the increasing interdependence of domestic and international law, at least outside of the United States." Parliament reacted swiftly to the Lord's decision. In March 2005, it enacted a measure allowing placement of terrorist suspects under a highly restrictive form of house arrest, in lieu of imprisonment, again without charging or trying them.

One year later, in December 2005, the Law Lords resolved another headline case involving the Belmarsh detainees. A seven-member panel ruled unanimously that evidence obtained through torture was inadmissible in British courts to establish criminal liability or eligibility for deportation "irrespective of where, or by whom, or on whose authority the torture was inflicted." Lord Bingham's lead opinion again surveyed U.N. instruments, including the Convention against Torture, as well as judicial decisions from other nations, including the United States, Germany, and Israel. These sources afforded confirmation for his ringing declaration: "The English common law has regarded torture and its fruits with abhorrence for over 500 years, and that abhorrence is now shared by over 140 countries which have acceded to the Torture Convention." Some of the Lords' speeches cast a critical eye across the sea. Lord Hoffman ventured that "many people in the United States, heirs to the common law tradition, have felt their country dishonoured by the use of torture outside the jurisdiction."

Later in December, recognizing the nation's obligations under the Convention against Torture, the U.S. Congress banned cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment of detainees in U.S. custody. The legislation, however, stops short of explicitly banning evidence elicited by torture from consideration by a military tribunal charged with determining whether a detainee is an enemy combatant.

The notion that it is improper to look beyond the borders of the United States in grappling with hard questions, as my quotation from Chief Justice Taney suggested, is in line with the view of the U.S. Constitution as a document essentially frozen in time as of the date of its ratification. I am not a partisan of that view. U.S. jurists honor the Framers' intent "to create a more perfect Union," I believe, if they read the Constitution as belonging to a global 21st century, not as fixed forever by 18th-century understandings.

A key 1958 plurality opinion, Trop v. Dulles, makes just that point. At issue in that case, whether stripping a wartime deserter of citizenship violated the Eighth Amendment's ban on "cruel and unusual punishments." "The basic concept underlying the . . . Amendment," the opinion observed, "is nothing less than the dignity of man." Therefore the Constitution's text "must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." In that regard, the plurality reported: "The civilized nations of the world are in virtual unanimity that statelessness is not to be imposed as punishment for crime." (The primacy of human dignity notably is not left to inference in South Africa's Constitution, for Section 10 prescribes: "Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected.")

Turning from frozen-in-time interpretation, I will take up another shortfall or insularity in current U.S. jurisprudence, at least as I see it. The Bill of Rights, few would disagree, is the hallmark and pride of the United States. One might therefore assume that it guides and controls U.S. officialdom wherever in the world they carry the flag of the United States or their credentials. But that is not the currently prevailing view. For example, absent an express ban by treaty, a U.S. officer may abduct a foreigner and forcibly transport him to the United States to stand trial. The U.S. Supreme Court so held, 6-to-3, in 1992. Just a year earlier, South Africa's Supreme Court of Appeal had ruled the other way. It determined that under South Africa's common law, a trial court has no jurisdiction to hear a case against a defendant when the State had acted lawlessly in apprehending him by participating in an abduction across international borders.

Another case in point, one in which I was a participant, involving civil litigation: Interpreting U.S. Supreme Court precedent, a divided U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit held in 1989, during my tenure on that court, that foreign plaintiffs acting abroad - plaintiffs were Indian family planning organizations - had no First Amendment rights, and therefore no standing to assert a violation of such rights by U.S. officials. In particular, the Indian organizations complained of a condition on U.S. grant money: the recipients could not engage in any abortion counseling, even in a separate entity funded by non-U.S. sources. In dissent, I resisted the notion that in an encounter between the United States and the people of another land, "the amendment we prize as 'first' has no force in court." I expressed the expectation that the position taken in the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations would one day accurately describe our law. "[W]herever the United States acts," the Restatement projects, "'it can only act in accordance with the limitations imposed by the Constitution.'"

Returning to my main theme, I will recount briefly and chronologically the Supreme Court's most recent decisions involving foreign or international legal sources as an aid to the resolution of constitutional questions. In a headline 2002 decision, Atkins v. Virginia, a six-member majority (all save the Chief Justice and Justices Scalia and Thomas) held unconstitutional the execution of a mentally retarded offender. The Court noted that "within the world community, the imposition of the death penalty for crimes committed by mentally retarded offenders is overwhelmingly disapproved." (South Africa, of course, figures prominently in the worldwide disapproval, the Constitutional Court having held a decade ago that capital punishment in any case is unconstitutional.)

New York Times reporter Linda Greenhouse wrote of the following, 2002-2003, Term: The Court has "displayed a [steadily growing] attentiveness to legal developments in the rest of the world and to the [C]ourt's role in keeping the United States in step with them." Among examples from that Term, I would include the Michigan University affirmative action cases decided June 23, 2003. Although the Court splintered, it upheld the Michigan Law School program. In separate opinions, I looked to two United Nations Conventions: the 1965 Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination, which the United States has ratified; and the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, which, sadly, the United States has not yet ratified. Both Conventions distinguish between impermissible policies of oppression or exclusion, and permissible policies of inclusion, "temporary special measures aimed at accelerating de facto equality." The U.S. Supreme Court's decision in the Michigan Law School case, I observed, "accords with the international understanding of the [purpose and propriety] of affirmative action." (South Africa's Constitution is clear on that matter; Section 9(2) provides: "To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.")

A better indicator from the U.S. Supreme Court's 2002-2003 Term, because it attracted a majority, is Justice Kennedy's opinion for the Court in Lawrence v. Texas, announced June 26, 2003. Overruling a 1986 decision, Lawrence declared unconstitutional a Texas statute prohibiting two adult persons of the same sex from engaging, voluntarily, in intimate sexual conduct. (I think it highly unlikely, however, that we will soon see a U.S. Supreme Court decision resembling the very recent decision of the Constitutional Court of South Africa in Minister of Home Affairs v. Fourie.) On the question of dynamic versus static, frozen-in-time constitutional interpretation, the Court's Lawrence v. Texas opinion instructs:

> Had those who drew and ratified the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment known the components of liberty in its manifold possibilities, they might have been more specific. They did not presume to have this insight. They knew times can blind us to certain truths and later generations can see that laws once thought necessary and proper in fact serve only to oppress. As the Constitution endures, persons in every generation can invoke its principles in their own search for greater freedom.

On respect for "the Opinions of [Human]kind," the Lawrence Court emphasized: "The right the petitioners seek in this case has been accepted as an integral part of human freedom in many other countries." In support, the Court cited the leading 1981 European Court of Human Rights decision, Dudgeon v. United Kingdom, and subsequent European Human Rights Court decisions affirming the protected right of homosexual adults to engage in intimate, consensual conduct.

In the 2003-2004 Term, foreign and international legal sources again figured in several decisions. These included, most notably, two June 2004 decisions in cases arising out of the war on terror. One, Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, concerned a U.S. citizen, held incommunicado in a Navy brig in South Carolina pursuant to an executive decree declaring him an "enemy combatant." Ruling some six months before the Law Lords' decision in the 2004 Belmarsh case, the Court held, 8-to-1, that the petitioner was entitled to a "meaningful opportunity" to contest the factual basis for his detention before an impartial adjudicator. Even in "our most challenging and uncertain moments" when "our Nation's commitment to due process is most severely tested," Justice O'Connor wrote for a four-Justice plurality, "we must preserve our commitment at home to the principles for which we fight abroad." "[H]istory and common sense," she reminded, "teach us that an unchecked system of detention carries the potential to become a means for oppression and abuse." On that theme, the U.K.'s Lord Hoffman wrote in his separate opinion in the 2004 Belmarsh case:

The real threat to the life of the nation, in the sense of a people living in accordance with its traditional laws and political values, comes not from terrorism but from laws [or executive measures, such as the one at issue in Belmarsh, authorizing indefinite imprisonment without charge or trial]. That is the true measure of what terrorism may achieve.

He hoped, after the Lords of Appeal ruling, that Parliament would not "give the terrorists such a victory." (I should add that two University of Chicago Law School professors (Eric A. Posner and Adrian Vermeule) recently inveighed against Justice O'Connor's and Lord Hoffman's statements as "absurdities." People do not prefer liberty to death, they urged. A government that does not contract civil liberties in face of terrorist threats, they said, "is pathologically rigid, not enlightened." They queried whether the Lords would have come out the same way had the terrorist carnage in London's underground preceded the Belmarsh decision. The Law Lords, I note, have not relented. Their December 2005 decision excluding evidence obtained through torture post-dates the London underground bombing.)

The other "enemy combatant" case decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in June 2004, Rasul v. Bush, held that

U.S. courts have jurisdiction to consider challenges to the legality of the detention of foreign nationals captured in hostilities abroad, then transported to the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Court wrote narrowly; it said nothing about what claims, if any, would succeed once the detainees get to a federal court. [Britian's Lord Steyn, before this decision, called Guantanamo a "legal black hole."] The Supreme Court has so far written only chapter one on the Guantanamo Bay incarcerations. Federal district court judges have split on chapter two. One judge held that foreigners detained at Guantanamo Bay, though they had access to court, could gain no judicial relief. Another ruled that the detainees were entitled to a fair hearing on the question whether their incarceration meets due process demands. Both cases are currently on appeal.

Just a few months ago, the Supreme Court agreed to hear a case, titled Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, posing these questions: (1) Does the President have authority to establish a military commission to try Guantanamo Bay detainees for alleged war crimes; and (2) Is the writ of habeas corpus in federal court an available means to determine Guantanamo Bay detainees' alleged rights under the 1949 Geneva Convention? The end of December legislation I earlier mentioned severely narrows Guantanamo Bay detainees' access to courts. The impact of that legislation on Hamdan's petition, and on scores of filings in the federal district court in the District of Columbia, remains uncertain.

To conclude my account of recent decisions in which the U.S. Supreme Court cast comparative sideglances, the March 2005 decision in Roper v. Simmons presents perhaps the fullest expressions to date on the propriety and utility of looking to "the opinions of [human]kind." Holding unconstitutional the execution of persons under the age of 18 when they committed capital crimes, the Court declared it fitting to acknowledge "the overwhelming weight of international opinion against the juvenile death penalty." Justice Kennedy wrote for the Court that the opinion of the world community provides "respected and significant confirmation of our own conclusions." "It does not lessen our fidelity to the Constitution," he explained, to recognize "the express affirmation of certain fundamental rights by other nations and peoples." (Among the dozens of amici curiae submissions in Roper, an impressive brief bears the names of several Nobel Peace Prize winners, including former U.S. President Jimmy Carter, South Africa's former President Willem de Klerk, and Archbishop Desmond Tutu. The Nobel laureates urged the Court to "consider the opinion of the international community, which has rejected the death penalty for child offenders worldwide.")

[Justice O'Connor, although she dissented from the Court's categorical ruling in Roper, agreed with the Court on the relevance of "foreign and international law to [an] assessment of evolving standards of decency." The other dissenters, for whom Justice Scalia spoke, vigorously contended that foreign and international law have no place in determining what punishments are "cruel and unusual" within the meaning of the U.S. Constitution's Eighth Amendment.]

Recognizing that forecasts are risky, I nonetheless believe the U.S. Supreme Court will continue to accord "a decent Respect to the Opinions of [Human]kind" as a matter of comity and in a spirit of humility. Comity, because projects vital to our well being - combating international terrorism is a prime example - require trust and cooperation of nations the world over. And humility because, in Justice O'Connor's words: "Other legal systems continue to innovate, to experiment, and to find new solutions to the new legal problems that arise each day, from which we can learn and benefit."

In this regard, I was impressed by an observation made in September 2003 by Israel's Chief Justice Aharon Barak. September 11, he noted, confronts the United States with the dilemma of conducting a war on terrorism without sacrificing the nation's most cherished values, including our respect for human dignity. "We in Israel," Barak said, "have our September 11, and September 12 and so on." He spoke of his own Court's efforts to balance the government's no doubt compelling need to secure the safety of the State and of its citizens on the one hand, and the nation's high regard for "human dignity and freedom on the other hand." He referred, particularly, to a question presented to his Court: "Is it lawful to use violence (less euphemistically, torture) in interrogat[ing] [a] terrorist in a 'ticking bomb' situation." His Court's answer: No. "[n]ever use violence." He interrogat[ing] [a] terrorist in a 'ticking bomb' situation." His Court's answer: No, "[n]ever use violence." He elaborated:

> [It] is the fate of a democracy [that] not all means are acceptable to it, . . . not all methods employed by its enemies are open to it. Sometimes, a democracy must fight with one hand tied behind its back. Nonetheless, it has the upper hand. Preserving the rule of law and recognition of individual liberties constitute an important component of [a democracy's] understanding of security. At the end of the day, [those values buoy up] its spirit and strength [and its capacity to] overcome [the] difficulties.

In that opinion, I concur without reservation.

[redacted]

Judiciary Policy Analyst/Counsel

Senate Republican Policy Committee

[redacted]

Williams, Jan

From: Williams, Jan

Sent: Wednesday, March 15, 2006 7:28 PM

To: Williams, Jan; Horvath, Jane; Garrett, Paul; Cushmac, Anne Marie; Davis, Michael; Fuentes, Maria; Bradbury, Steve; Brand, Rachel; Clark, John (USMS); Clement, Paul D; Fisher, Alice; Flores, Robert; Gillis, John; Herraiz, Domingo S.; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kim, Wan (CRT); Leonhart, Michele M.; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McNulty, Paul J; Moschella, William; O'Connor, Eileen J. (AAG/TAX); Schofield, Regina; Spagnoli, Deborah A. (USPC); Tamargo, Mauricio J; Tandy, Karen P (DEA); Wooldridge, Sue Ellen (ENRD); '/o=USDOJ/ou=USAPAE/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=SMalloy'; Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Akers, Eric J.; Ames, Andrew; Barnett, Thomas O.; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Beach, Andrew; Beck, Cherith (USAARE); 'Bianco, Joseph F.'; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Boardman, Michelle; Boote, John; Bottner, Andrea; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); 'Burch, Victoria'; Chambers, Shane P; Clinger, James H; Cohen, Brian; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cook, Marita L. (USAWY); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Coppenger, Chesed L. (TAX); Costigan, Michael; Coughlin, Robert; Curtis, O. Benton; Daley, Cybele; 'David, Matt'; Dhillon, Uttam; Dummermuth, Matt (USAVAE); Eisenberg, John; Elwood, Courtney; Elwood, John; Flaherty, Connor; Freeman, Sharee (CRT); Friedrich, Matthew; 'Gambatesa, Donald (USMS)'; Garre, Gregory G; Glut, Martha (USANE); Gober, Chris; 'Golden, Lois'; Goodling, Monica; Gorsuch, Neil M; 'Greg Harris'; Hagle, Timothy; 'Harris, Gregory'; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Hertling, Richard; 'Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX)'; Hoisington, Jana; Holland, Eric W; Irving, John (ODAG); Jaffer, Jamil N; Jezierski, Crystal; Jordan, Theresa (USADE); Jungeblut, Neal P.; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keehner, Laura; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Korn, Jennifer; Lesch, Jaclyn; Little, Kimani (CRT); Longlet, Benjamin; Lonick, Saundra; Luckinbill, Trent W.; Macklin, Kristi R; MacLean, Alex (CRT); Magnuson, Cynthia; Marshall, C. Kevin; Martinson, Wanda; Masoudi, Gerald; McArthur, Patrick; McDonald, Bruce; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); McIntosh, Brent; McKee, Cindy (USAKS); McKeown, Matt (ENRD); McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); McNally, Edward; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Miranda, Matthew; Monheim, Thomas; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Murphy, Sean; 'Neumayr, Mary (ENRD)'; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nichols, Grant W; Nowacki, John; OConnell, James; Otis, Lee L; Otis, William G.; Pagliocca, Theresa; Parsky, Laura; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Peed, Carl; Potter, Janet; Racicot, Tim (USAMT); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Roe, Price (OCIO); Roehrkasse, Brian; Roper, Matt M; Rosenberg, Chuck; Rowe, Kiri; Sampson, Kyle; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Schmitt, Glenn; Schwartz, Arthur; Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Selim, George (CRS); Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Strug, Kerri; Swenson, Lily F; Taylor, Bruce A.; Tenpas, Ronald J (ODAG); Todd, Gordon (SMO); Tomlinson, Linda (USANH); Turner, Donald J. (USAPAM); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Underhill, Deborah; Vargas, Omar (CRT); Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Warren, Julie; Woodruff, William; Lewis, Matthew; Nelson, Ryan (ENRD); Becker, Grace (CRT); Masugi, Ken (OPA); Boente, Dana J. (TAX); Nash, Stuart (ODAG); Oldham, Jeffrey L; Pacold, Martha M; Purpura, Michael M (ODAG); Rowan, Patrick (ODAG); Senger, Jeffrey M; Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Webb, Lauren; White, Clifford

Subject: FW: Easter Egg Roll
Attachments: tmp.htm; Volunteer Spreadsheet.xls
Importance: High

Preparations for the 128th White House Easter Egg Roll are under way.
Impressive performers, special guests, and visitors from all over the country will come to the South Lawn for this historic event. And more than 500 volunteers will help support this event which will be held on Monday, April 17th.

In the past, Presidential Appointees have played a vital role in the success of the event by donating their time and energy. Volunteers assist in a number of areas including: greeters, volunteer check-in, assisting children's activities, Egg Roll assistants, lost and found, crowd supervision and more.

If you are interested in volunteering, please complete the attached for and email it back to Tracy Washington and me by Friday, March 17 at noon.

If you are invited to volunteer, the White House will contact you directly with details.

WHLs:

Preparations for the 128th White House Easter Egg Roll are under way. Impressive performers, special guests, and visitors from all over the country will come to the South Lawn for this historic event. And more than 500 volunteers will help support this event which will be held on Monday, April 17th.

In the past, Presidential Appointees have played a vital role in the success of the event by donating their time and energy. Volunteers assist in a number of areas including: greeters, volunteer check-in, assisting children's activities, Egg Roll assistants, lost and found, crowd supervision and more.

Please pass this information along to the Presidential Appointees within your agency and complete the attached spreadsheet with the names of those Appointees who are interested in volunteering at the event. The completed spreadsheet should be e-mailed back to me at jwebster@who.eop.gov by Friday, March 31, 2006. Please do not forward this e-mail to anyone other than Appointees. Volunteers will be selected on a first-come, first-served basis so please encourage people to RSVP as soon as possible. Due to the volume of interest in volunteering, we are unable to include friends or family of Appointees. There are 2 different volunteer shifts, but volunteers should plan to be available between the hours of 6 a.m. and 4 p.m. Selected volunteers will receive information about their assigned shift times and other details via email prior to the event.

We appreciate your support of this annual White House tradition.

Jocelyn Webster, White House Office of Political Affairs

Suffix	Last Name	First Name	DOB	SSN	Home Address	City	State	Zip	Email

Phone (preferably cell)	Organization

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, March 16, 2006 8:38 AM
To: [redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov'
Subject: RE: Ginsburg speech on foreign law citation

Thanks for passing this along

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov [mailto: [redacted]@judiciary-rep.senate.gov]
Sent: Wednesday, March 15, 2006 5:30 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: Ginsburg speech on foreign law citation

Neil: fyi, in the speech attached below, Justice Ginsburg comments briefly on the Hamdan case and the DTA. (Sixth paragraph from the end.)

From: [redacted] (RPC)
Sent: Wednesday, March 15, 2006 5:07 PM
Subject: Ginsburg speech on foreign law citation

March 15, 2006

To: Judiciary Analysts/Counsels

Fr: [redacted] Judiciary Policy Analyst/Counsel

RE: Ginsburg speech on foreign law

Copied below is the text of a speech that Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg gave in South Africa last month. In it, she defends the Supreme Court's citation to foreign law for the interpretation of the U.S. Constitution and suggests, unsubtly, that those who oppose the Supreme Court's reliance on foreign authority should be thought of in the same breath as former Chief Justice Roger Taney (author of the Dred Scott decision) and that their political opposition to citing foreign authority "fuel[s] the irrational fringe" that has apparently threatened her life, and the life of former Justice O'Connor. She predicts that the Supreme Court will continue to rely on foreign law in making constitutional judgments.

(It is worth recalling that both Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito said during their confirmation hearings that foreign law should have no role in U.S. constitutional analysis and interpretation.)

http://www.supremecourtus.gov/publicinfo/speeches/sp_02-07b-06.html
<http://www.supremecourtus.gov/publicinfo/speeches/sp_02-07b-06.html>

"A decent Respect to the Opinions of [Human]kind": The Value of a Comparative Perspective in Constitutional Adjudication Constitutional Court of South Africa February 7, 2006 Ruth Bader Ginsburg Associate Justice to the Supreme Court of the United States

South Africa's 1996 Constitution famously provides in Section 39: "When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court . . . must consider international law; and may consider foreign law." Other modern Constitutions have similar provisions, India's and Spain's, for example.
In the United States the question whether and when courts may seek enlightenment from the laws and decisions of other nations has provoked heated debate. I will speak of that controversy in these remarks. At the outset, I should disclose the view I have long held: If U.S. experience and decisions can be instructive to systems that have more recently instituted or invigorated judicial review for constitutionality, so we can learn from others including Canada, South Africa, and most recently the U. K. - now engaged in measuring ordinary laws and executive actions against charters securing basic rights.

Exposing laws to judicial review for constitutionality was once uncommon outside the United States. In the United Kingdom, not distant from France, Spain, Germany, and other civil law countries in this regard, court review of legislation for compatibility with a fundamental charter was considered off limits, undemocratic, irreconcilable with the doctrine of parliamentary supremacy. That was once true of South Africa, is that not so? But particularly in the years following World War II, many nations installed constitutional review by courts as one safeguard against oppressive government and stirred-up majorities. National, multinational, and international human rights charters and courts today play a prominent part in our world. The U.S. judicial system will be the poorer, I have urged, if we do not both share our experience with, and learn from, legal systems with values and a commitment to democracy similar to our own.

In the value I place on comparative dialogue - on sharing with and learning from others - I draw on counsel from the founders of the United States. The drafters and signers of the Declaration of Independence cared about the opinions of other peoples; they placed before the world the reasons why the States, joining together to become the United States of America, were impelled to separate from Great Britain. The Declarants stated their reasons out of "a decent Respect to the Opinions of Mankind." They set out in the Declaration a long list of grievances, in order to submit the "Facts" - the "long Train of [the British Crown's] Abuses" - to the scrutiny of "a candid World."

The U.S. Supreme Court, early on, expressed a complementary view: The judicial power of the United States, the Court said in 1816, includes cases "in the correct adjudication of which foreign nations are deeply interested . . . [and] in which the principles of the law and comity of nations often form an essential inquiry." "Far from [exhibiting hostility] to foreign countries' views and laws," Professor Vicki Jackson of the Georgetown University law faculty recently reminded us:
"[T]he founding generation showed concern for how adjudication in our courts would affect other countries' regard for the United States." A similar concern is evident today in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of South Africa. As Justice O'Regan put it, writing separately in Kaunda v. President of the Republic of South Africa: "[O]ur Constitution recognizes and asserts that, after decades of isolation, South Africa is now a member of the community of nations, and a bearer of obligations and responsibilities in terms of international law." [2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at 222.] Even more so than when the United States was a new nation, the USA today, no less than South Africa, is subject to the scrutiny of "a candid World."

John Jay, one of the authors of The Federalist Papers promoting ratification of the U.S. Constitution, and George Washington's appointee as first Chief Justice of the United States, wrote of the new nation in 1793 much as Justice O'Regan did in 2004 of the new Republic. The United States, Jay observed, "by taking a place among the nations of the earth, bec[a]me amenable to the laws of nations," the core of what we today call international law. Eleven years later, the great Chief Justice John Marshall cautioned: "[A]n act of Congress ought never to be construed to violate the law of nations if any other possible construction remains." South Africa installed just such a guide in its 1996 Constitution. Section 233 instructs: "When interpreting . . . legislation, every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation . . . consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation . . . inconsistent with international law."

True, there are generations-old and still persistent discordant views on recourse to the "Opinions of Mankind." A mid-19th century U.S. Chief Justice expressed opposition to such recourse in an extreme statement.
He wrote:

No one, we presume, supposes that any change in public opinion or feeling . . . in the civilized nations of Europe or in this country, should induce the [U.S. Supreme Court] to give to the words of the Constitution a more liberal construction . . . than they were intended to bear when the instrument was framed and adopted.

Those words were penned in 1857. They appear in Chief Justice Roger Taney's opinion for a divided Court in Dred Scott v. Sandford, an infamous opinion that invoked the majestic Due Process Clause to uphold one human's right to hold another in bondage. The Dred Scott decision declared that no "descendants of Africans [imported into the United States], and sold as slaves" could ever become citizens of the United States.

While the Civil War and the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution reversed the Dred Scott judgment, U.S. jurists and political actors today divide sharply on the propriety of looking beyond our nation's borders, particularly on matters touching fundamental human rights. Some have expressed spirited opposition.
Justice Scalia counsels: The Court "should cease putting forth foreigners' views as part of the reasoned basis of its decisions. To invoke alien law when it agrees with one's own thinking, and ignore it otherwise, is not reasoned decisionmaking, but sophistry."

Another trenchant critic, Seventh Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Richard Posner, commented not long ago: "To cite foreign law as authority is to flirt with the discredited . . . idea of a universal natural law; or to suppose fantastically that the world's judges constitute a single, elite community of wisdom and conscience." Judge Posner's view rests, in part, on the concern that U.S. judges do not comprehend the social, historical, political, and institutional background from which foreign opinions emerge. Nor do we even understand the language in which laws and judgments, outside the common law realm, are written.

Judge Posner is right, of course, to this extent: Foreign opinions are not authoritative; they set no binding precedent for the U.S. judge. But they can add to the store of knowledge relevant to the solution of trying questions. Yes, we should approach foreign legal materials with sensitivity to our differences, deficiencies, and imperfect understanding, but imperfection, I believe, should not lead us to abandon the effort to learn what we can from the experience and good thinking foreign sources may to abandon the effort to learn what we can from the experience and good thinking foreign sources may convey.

Representative of the perspective I share with four of my current colleagues, Patricia M. Wald, once Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and former Judge on the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, last year said with characteristic wisdom: "It's hard for me to see that the use of foreign decisional law is an up-or-down proposition. I see it rather as a pool of potential and useful information and thought that must be mined with caution and restraint."

Many current members of the U.S. Congress would terminate all debate over whether federal courts should refer to foreign or international legal materials. For the most part, they would respond to the question with a resounding "No." Two identical Resolutions reintroduced last year, one in the House of Representatives and the other in the Senate, declare that "judicial interpretations regarding the meaning of the Constitution of the United States should not be based on judgments, laws, or pronouncements of foreign institutions unless such [materials] inform an understanding of the original meaning of the Constitution." As of December 2005, the House Resolution had attracted support from 83 cosponsors. Two 2005-proposed Acts would do more than "resolve." They would positively prohibit federal courts, when interpreting the U.S.
Constitution, from referring to "any constitution, law, administrative rule, Executive order, directive, policy, judicial decision, or any other action of any foreign state or international organization or agency, other than English constitutional and common law up to the time of the adoption of the [U.S.] Constitution." [Even reference to a Scottish verdict, i.e., a verdict of not proved, it seems, would be out of order.]

These measures recycle similar resolutions and bills proposed before the 2004 elections in the United States, but never put to a vote. Although I doubt the current measures will garner sufficient votes to pass, it is disquieting that they have attracted sizable support. And one not-so-small concern - they fuel the irrational fringe. A personal example. The U.S. Supreme Court's Marshal alerted Justice O'Connor and me to a February 28, 2005, web posting on a "chat" site. It opened:

Okay commandoes, here is your first patriotic assignment . . . an easy one. Supreme Court Justices Ginsburg and O'Connor have publicly stated that they use [foreign] laws and rulings to decide how to rule on American cases.

This is a huge threat to our Republic and Constitutional freedom. . . .
If you are what you say you are, and NOT armchair patriots, then those two justices will not live another week.

Nearly a year has passed since that posting. Justice O'Connor, though to my great sorrow retired just last week from the Court's bench, remains alive and well. As for me, you can judge for yourself.

To a large extent, I believe, the critics in Congress and in the media misperceive how and why U.S. courts refer to foreign and international court decisions. We refer to decisions rendered abroad, it bears repetition, not as controlling authorities, but for their indication, in Judge Wald's words, of "common denominators of basic fairness governing relationships between the governors and the governed."

In a November 2005 Harvard Law Review comment, Georgetown's Professor Jackson usefully identified three responses to transnational sources:
resistance, convergence, and engagement. South Africa's apartheid regime fit the "Resistance Model," an approach that "relishes resistance . . .

to outside influence." Professor Jackson suggested that South Africa's 1996 Constitution fits the "Convergence Model," in that it "explicitly incorporate[s] international law as a controlling legal norm." But perhaps the Constitutional Court's emerging jurisprudence comes closer to the third approach, the "Engagement Model." That Model comprehends transnational sources "as interlocutors," a means to test "understanding of one's own traditions and possibilities by examining them in the [reflected light cast by other legal systems]."

The jurisprudence of South Africa's Constitutional Court offers many examples, among them, Justice Kriegler's cautionary note in Sanderson v.
Attorney-General, Eastern Cape. The question in that case: Did a two-year delay in bringing a prosecution for alleged sexual offenses violate the defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial. In determining that the defendant's rights were not violated, Justice Kriegler canvassed foreign precedents, especially U.S. and Canadian decisions; he prefaced his examination, however, by warning that "the use of foreign precedent requires circumspection." [1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at 26.] In State v. Makwanyane, then Chief Justice Chaskalson earlier cautioned, in presenting his comparative survey decisions on capital punishment: "We can derive assistance from . . . foreign case law, but we are in no way bound to follow it." [1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at 39.] I agree. Some U.S. practices, I fully appreciate, are not suitably exported: the use of juries in civil cases is one example.

In testimony prepared for a congressional hearing, Professor Jackson made a point critics of comparative sideglances perhaps overlook: the "negative authority" foreign experience sometimes may have. She referred in this regard to the "Steel Seizure Case" decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1952. There, Justice Jackson, in his separate opinion, pointed to features of the Weimar Constitution in Germany that allowed Adolf Hitler to assume dictatorial powers. He contrasted Germany's situation with that of Great Britain, a country in which legislative authorization was required for the exercise of emergency powers. Justice Jackson drew from that comparison support for the conclusion that, without more specific congressional authorization, the U.S. President could not seize private property (in that case, the steel mills) even in aid of a war effort. The U.S. President's wartime authority, you no doubt know, is today a hotly debated issue in U.S. political and legal circles.

At the time Justice Jackson cast a comparative sideglance at Weimar Germany, the United States itself was a source of "negative authority." The Attorney General pressed that point in an amicus brief for the United States in Brown v. Board of Education. Urging the Court to put an end to the "separate but equal doctrine," the Attorney General wrote:

The existence of discrimination against minority groups in the United States has an adverse effect upon our relations with other countries.
Racial discrimination . . . raises doubts even among friendly nations as to the intensity of our devotion to the democratic faith.

The U.S. Constitution, Justice Scalia has remarked, contains no instruction resembling South Africa's Section 39 prescription. So U.S.
courts, he thinks, have no warrant from our fundamental instrument of government to consider foreign law. I would demur to that observation.
Judges in the United States are free to consult all manner of commentary - Restatements, Treatises, what law professors or even law students write copiously in law reviews, for example. If we can consult those writings, why not the analysis of a question similar to the one we confront contained in an opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Constitutional Court of South Africa, the German Constitutional Court, or the European Court of Human Rights?

A case in point. On December 16, 2004, in a controversy precipitated by the fight against terrorism, the Lords of Appeal (the U.K. counterpart to the U.S. Supreme Court) issued a waypaving decision, one that looks beyond the United Kingdom's borders. The case was brought by aliens held in custody in Belmarsh Prison. A nine-member panel ruled, 8-to-1, that the British government's indefinite detention of foreigners suspected of terrorism, without charging or trying them, is incompatible with the European Convention on Human Rights, incorporated into domestic law by the U. K. Human Rights Act. Lord Bingham's lead opinion draws not only on domestic decisions and decisions of the European Court of Human Rights. It also refers to opinions of the Supreme Court of Canada and U.S. Court of Appeals opinions (although not U.S. Supreme Court opinions). Finding the differential treatment of nationals and non-nationals impermissible under the Human Rights Act, Lord Bingham also referred to several U. N. instruments, commencing with the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights and including the 1965 International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

Lord Bingham did make the observation, gently, that contemporary "U.S. authority does not provide evidence of general international practice." That comment may have figured in the New York Times' characterization of the Lords' ruling as "a strong example of the increasing interdependence of domestic and international law, at least outside of the United States." Parliament reacted swiftly to the Lord's decision. In March 2005, it enacted a measure allowing placement of terrorist suspects under a highly restrictive form of house arrest, in lieu of imprisonment, again without charging or trying them.

One year later, in December 2005, the Law Lords resolved another headline case involving the Belmarsh detainees. A seven-member panel ruled unanimously that evidence obtained through torture was inadmissible in British courts to establish criminal liability or eligibility for deportation "irrespective of where, or by whom, or on whose authority the torture was inflicted." Lord Bingham's lead opinion again surveyed U.N. instruments, including the Convention against Torture, as well as judicial decisions from other nations, including the United States, Germany, and Israel. These sources afforded confirmation for his ringing declaration: "The English common law has regarded torture and its fruits with abhorrence for over 500 years, and that abhorrence is now shared by over 140 countries which have acceded to the Torture Convention." Some of the Lords' speeches cast a critical eye across the sea. Lord Hoffman ventured that "many people in the United States, heirs to the common law tradition, have felt their country dishonoured by the use of torture outside the jurisdiction."

Later in December, recognizing the nation's obligations under the Convention against Torture, the U.S. Congress banned cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment of detainees in U.S. custody. The legislation, however, stops short of explicitly banning evidence elicited by torture from consideration by a military tribunal charged with determining whether a detainee is an enemy combatant.

The notion that it is improper to look beyond the borders of the United States in grappling with hard questions, as my quotation from Chief Justice Taney suggested, is in line with the view of the U.S. Constitution as a document essentially frozen in time as of the date of its ratification. I am not a partisan of that view. U.S. jurists honor the Framers' intent "to create a more perfect Union," I believe, if they read the Constitution as belonging to a global 21st century, not as fixed forever by 18th-century understandings.

A key 1958 plurality opinion, Trop v. Dulles, makes just that point. At issue in that case, whether stripping a wartime deserter of citizenship violated the Eighth Amendment's ban on "cruel and unusual punishments." "The basic concept underlying the . . . Amendment," the opinion observed, "is nothing less than the dignity of man." Therefore the Constitution's text "must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." In that regard, the plurality reported: "The civilized nations of the world are in virtual unanimity that statelessness is not to be imposed as punishment for crime." (The primacy of human dignity notably is not left to inference in South Africa's Constitution, for Section 10 prescribes:

"Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected.")

Turning from frozen-in-time interpretation, I will take up another shortfall or insularity in current U.S. jurisprudence, at least as I see it. The Bill of Rights, few would disagree, is the hallmark and pride of the United States. One might therefore assume that it guides and controls U.S. officialdom wherever in the world they carry the flag of the United States or their credentials. But that is not the currently prevailing view. For example, absent an express ban by treaty, a U.S.
officer may abduct a foreigner and forcibly transport him to the United States to stand trial. The U.S. Supreme Court so held, 6-to-3, in 1992.
Just a year earlier, South Africa's Supreme Court of Appeal had ruled the other way. It determined that under South Africa's common law, a trial court has no jurisdiction to hear a case against a defendant when the State had acted lawlessly in apprehending him by participating in an abduction across international borders.

Another case in point, one in which I was a participant, involving civil litigation: Interpreting U.S. Supreme Court precedent, a divided U.S.
Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit held in 1989, during my tenure on that court, that foreign plaintiffs acting abroad - plaintiffs were Indian family planning organizations - had no First Amendment rights, and therefore no standing to assert a violation of such rights by U.S. officials. In particular, the Indian organizations complained of a condition on U.S. grant money: the recipients could not engage in any abortion counseling, even in a separate entity funded by non-U.S. sources. In dissent, I resisted the notion that in an encounter between the United States and the people of another land, "the amendment we prize as 'first' has no force in court." I expressed the expectation that the position taken in the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations would one day accurately describe our law. "[W]herever the United States acts," the Restatement projects, "'it can only act in accordance with the limitations imposed by the Constitution.'"

Returning to my main theme, I will recount briefly and chronologically the Supreme Court's most recent decisions involving foreign or international legal sources as an aid to the resolution of constitutional questions. In a headline 2002 decision, Atkins v.
Virginia, a six-member majority (all save the Chief Justice and Justices Scalia and Thomas) held unconstitutional the execution of a mentally retarded offender. The Court noted that "within the world community, the imposition of the death penalty for crimes committed by mentally retarded offenders is overwhelmingly disapproved." (South Africa, of course, figures prominently in the worldwide disapproval, the Constitutional Court having held a decade ago that capital punishment in any case is unconstitutional.)

New York Times reporter Linda Greenhouse wrote of the following, 2002-2003, Term: The Court has "displayed a [steadily growing] attentiveness to legal developments in the rest of the world and to the [C]ourt's role in keeping the United States in step with them." Among examples from that Term, I would include the Michigan University affirmative action cases decided June 23, 2003. Although the Court splintered, it upheld the Michigan Law School program. In separate opinions, I looked to two United Nations Conventions: the 1965 Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination, which the United States has ratified; and the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, which, sadly, the United States has not yet ratified. Both Conventions distinguish between impermissible policies of oppression or exclusion, and permissible policies of inclusion, "temporary special measures aimed at accelerating de facto equality." The U.S.

policies of inclusion," "temporary special measures aimed at accelerating de facto equality." The U.S. Supreme Court's decision in the Michigan Law School case, I observed, "accords with the international understanding of the [purpose and propriety] of affirmative action." (South Africa's Constitution is clear on that matter; Section 9(2) provides: "To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.")

A better indicator from the U.S. Supreme Court's 2002-2003 Term, because it attracted a majority, is Justice Kennedy's opinion for the Court in Lawrence v. Texas, announced June 26, 2003. Overruling a 1986 decision, Lawrence declared unconstitutional a Texas statute prohibiting two adult persons of the same sex from engaging, voluntarily, in intimate sexual conduct. (I think it highly unlikely, however, that we will soon see a U.S. Supreme Court decision resembling the very recent decision of the Constitutional Court of South Africa in Minister of Home Affairs v.
Fourie.) On the question of dynamic versus static, frozen-in-time constitutional interpretation, the Court's Lawrence v. Texas opinion instructs:

Had those who drew and ratified the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment known the components of liberty in its manifold possibilities, they might have been more specific. They did not presume to have this insight. They knew times can blind us to certain truths and later generations can see that laws once thought necessary and proper in fact serve only to oppress. As the Constitution endures, persons in every generation can invoke its principles in their own search for greater freedom.

On respect for "the Opinions of [Human]kind," the Lawrence Court emphasized: "The right the petitioners seek in this case has been accepted as an integral part of human freedom in many other countries." In support, the Court cited the leading 1981 European Court of Human Rights decision, Dudgeon v. United Kingdom, and subsequent European Human Rights Court decisions affirming the protected right of homosexual adults to engage in intimate, consensual conduct.

In the 2003-2004 Term, foreign and international legal sources again figured in several decisions. These included, most notably, two June 2004 decisions in cases arising out of the war on terror. One, Hamdi v.
Rumsfeld, concerned a U.S. citizen, held incommunicado in a Navy brig in South Carolina pursuant to an executive decree declaring him an "enemy combatant." Ruling some six months before the Law Lords' decision in the 2004 Belmarsh case, the Court held, 8-to-1, that the petitioner was entitled to a "meaningful opportunity" to contest the factual basis for his detention before an impartial adjudicator. Even in "our most challenging and uncertain moments" when "our Nation's commitment to due process is most severely tested," Justice O'Connor wrote for a four-Justice plurality, "we must preserve our commitment at home to the principles for which we fight abroad." "[H]istory and common sense," she reminded, "teach us that an unchecked system of detention carries the potential to become a means for oppression and abuse." On that theme, the U.K.'s Lord Hoffman wrote in his separate opinion in the 2004 Belmarsh case:

The real threat to the life of the nation, in the sense of a people living in accordance with its traditional laws and political values, comes not from terrorism but from laws [or executive measures, such as the one at issue in Belmarsh, authorizing indefinite imprisonment without charge or trial]. That is the true measure of what terrorism may achieve.

He hoped, after the Lords of Appeal ruling, that Parliament would not "give the terrorists such a victory." (I should add that two University of Chicago Law School professors (Eric A. Posner and Adrian Vermeule) recently inveighed against Justice O'Connor's and Lord Hoffman's statements as "absurdities." People do not prefer liberty to death, they urged. A government that does not contract civil liberties in face of terrorist threats, they said, "is pathologically rigid, not enlightened." They queried whether the Lords would have come out the same way had the terrorist carnage in London's underground preceded the Belmarsh decision. The Law Lords, I note, have not relented. Their December 2005 decision excluding evidence obtained through torture post-dates the London underground bombing.)

The other "enemy combatant" case decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in June 2004, Rasul v. Bush, held that U.S. courts have jurisdiction to consider challenges to the legality of the detention of foreign nationals captured in hostilities abroad, then transported to the U.S.
naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Court wrote narrowly; it said nothing about what claims, if any, would succeed once the detainees get to a federal court. [Britian's Lord Steyn, before this decision, called Guantanamo a "legal black hole."] The Supreme Court has so far written only chapter one on the Guantanamo Bay incarcerations. Federal district court judges have split on chapter two. One judge held that foreigners detained at Guantanamo Bay, though they had access to court, could gain no judicial relief. Another ruled that the detainees were entitled to a fair hearing on the question whether their incarceration meets due process demands. Both cases are currently on appeal.

Just a few months ago, the Supreme Court agreed to hear a case, titled Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, posing these questions: (1) Does the President have authority to establish a military commission to try Guantanamo Bay detainees for alleged war crimes; and (2) Is the writ of habeas corpus in federal court an available means to determine Guantanamo Bay detainees' alleged rights under the 1949 Geneva Convention? The end of December legislation I earlier mentioned severely narrows Guantanamo Bay detainees' access to courts. The impact of that legislation on Hamdan's petition, and on scores of filings in the federal district court in the District of Columbia, remains uncertain.

To conclude my account of recent decisions in which the U.S. Supreme Court cast comparative sideglances, the March 2005 decision in Roper v.
Simmons presents perhaps the fullest expressions to date on the propriety and utility of looking to "the opinions of [human]kind." Holding unconstitutional the execution of persons under the age of 18 when they committed capital crimes, the Court declared it fitting to acknowledge "the overwhelming weight of international opinion against the juvenile death penalty." Justice Kennedy wrote for the Court that the opinion of the world community provides "respected and significant confirmation of our own conclusions." "It does not lessen our fidelity to the Constitution," he explained, to recognize "the express affirmation of certain fundamental rights by other nations and peoples." (Among the dozens of amici curiae submissions in Roper, an impressive brief bears the names of several Nobel Peace Prize winners, including former U.S. President Jimmy Carter, South Africa's former President Willem de Klerk, and Archbishop Desmond Tutu. The Nobel laureates urged the Court to "consider the opinion of the international community, which has rejected the death penalty for child offenders worldwide.")

[Justice O'Connor, although she dissented from the Court's categorical ruling in Roper, agreed with the Court on the relevance of "foreign and international law to [an] assessment of evolving standards of decency." The other dissenters, for whom Justice Scalia spoke, vigorously contended that foreign and international law have no place in determining what punishments are "cruel and unusual" within the meaning of the U.S. Constitution's Eighth Amendment.]

Recognizing that forecasts are risky, I nonetheless believe the U.S.
Supreme Court will continue to accord "a decent Respect to the Opinions of [Human]kind" as a matter of comity and in a spirit of humility.
Comity, because projects vital to our well being - combating international terrorism is a prime example - require trust and cooperation of nations the world over. And humility because, in Justice example "require trust and cooperation of nations the world over. And humility because, in Justice O'Connor's words: "Other legal systems continue to innovate, to experiment, and to find new solutions to the new legal problems that arise each day, from which we can learn and benefit."

In this regard, I was impressed by an observation made in September 2003 by Israel's Chief Justice Aharon Barak. September 11, he noted, confronts the United States with the dilemma of conducting a war on terrorism without sacrificing the nation's most cherished values, including our respect for human dignity. "We in Israel," Barak said, "have our September 11, and September 12 and so on." He spoke of his own Court's efforts to balance the government's no doubt compelling need to secure the safety of the State and of its citizens on the one hand, and the nation's high regard for "human dignity and freedom on the other hand." He referred, particularly, to a question presented to his Court: "Is it lawful to use violence (less euphemistically, torture) in interrogat[ing] [a] terrorist in a 'ticking bomb' situation." His Court's answer: No, "[n]ever use violence." He elaborated:

[It] is the fate of a democracy [that] not all means are acceptable to it, . . . not all methods employed by its enemies are open to it.
Sometimes, a democracy must fight with one hand tied behind its back.
Nonetheless, it has the upper hand. Preserving the rule of law and recognition of individual liberties constitute an important component of [a democracy's] understanding of security. At the end of the day, [those values buoy up] its spirit and strength [and its capacity to] overcome [the] difficulties.

In that opinion, I concur without reservation.

[redacted]

Judiciary Policy Analyst/Counsel

Senate Republican Policy Committee

[redacted]

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, March 16, 2006 8:54 AM
To: Elwood, Courtney
Bcc: McCallum, Robert (SMO)
Subject: A few matters

Courtney - Do you have maybe 15 mins after the morning mtg or sometime else today to catch up on a few matters percolating around here? I know you were out yesterday and I just want to make sure you're caught up on the latest developments in Everglades, MTBE, Darby, Paul Weiss, Turmen, et al. Thanks! NMG

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, March 16, 2006 8:58 AM
To: Elwood, Courtney
Subject: RE: A few matters

Perfect

-----Original Message-----
From: Elwood, Courtney
Sent: Thursday, March 16, 2006 7:57 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Re: A few matters

Yes, let's try to get together today. I have a couple things I'd like to discuss with you. How about 10:30?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Elwood, Courtney <Courtney.Elwood@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Thu Mar 16 07:53:52 2006
Subject: A few matters

Courtney - Do you have maybe 15 mins after the morning mtg or sometime else today to catch up on a few matters percolating around here? I know you were out yesterday and I just want to make sure you're caught up on the latest developments in Everglades, MTBE, Darby, Paul Weiss, Turmen, et al. Thanks! NMG

Michael_Allen@nsc.eop.gov

From:	Michael_Allen@nsc.eop.gov
Sent:	Sunday, March 19, 2006 4:43 PM
To:	Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject:	Supreme Court
Attachments:	tmp.htm

Neil: Good to see you the other week at the CFR event. Any advice on how I might get a seat for the Hamdan oral arguments? Does anyone at DoJ know how to arrange this?

Thanks,
Michael

Neil: Good to see you the other week at the CFR event. Any advice on how I might get a seat for the Hamdan oral arguments? Does anyone at DoJ know how to arrange this?

Thanks,
Michael

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, March 20, 2006 12:03 AM
To: [redacted]@nsc.eop.gov'; Garre, Gregory G
Subject: Re: Supreme Court

[redacted] - My recollection is that if you're a member of the sct bar you can pretty easily get a seat in the section reserved for bar members just so long as you arrive early. If you're not a member of the bar you can still get a seat but need to arrive earlier still. Am adding Greg Garre, Principal Depty SG, for any further/better info bc he's the real expert here. Greg - [redacted] is head of leg for the NSC and he led the charge on the DTA through many long days and nights.

-----Original Message-----
From [redacted]@nsc.eop.gov
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Sun Mar 19 15:43:23 2006
Subject: Supreme Court

Neil: Good to see you the other week at the CFR event. Any advice on how I might get a seat for the Hamdan oral arguments? Does anyone at DoJ know how to arrange this?

Thanks,
[redacted]

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, March 20, 2006 9:09 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Monday, March 20, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060320.pdf; agnb060320.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, MARCH 20, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Administration Lawyers Suggested Warrantless FBI Searches....3
Durbin Won't Rule Out Bush Impeachment....3
Administration Document Outlines Agency Roles In War On Terror....4
9th Circuit Orders Sri Lankan Freed From Border Jail....4
High Court To Hear Arguments On Military Tribunals....4
Army IG Exonerates Gitmo Commandant....5
Martin Was Never Meant To Be Player In Moussaoui Case....5
Credibility Of FBI Witness Called Into Question....5

Homeland Response:

DPW Plans To Sell US Holdings Could Face Hurdles....5
Negroponte Probing Pentagon Trend Toward Outsourcing Intelligence Work....6
WTC Talks To Restart Next Week....6
Contractor Profits Found To Be Major Factor In Post-Katrina Waste....6

War News:

Bush Administration Defends Iraq Policy On Third Anniversary Of War....7
Allawi Says Iraq Already In Civil War....10
US Military Deaths Down As Iraqi Deaths Increase....10
Creation Of Iraqi Policy Council Called Step Forward....10
If Convicted, Saddam Could Be Executed Quickly....11
Military Investigating Deaths Of 15 Iraqi Civilians As Possible Crime....11
New Analyses Of Vietnam War Shaping US Military Approach In Iraq....11
Both Iran, US Said To Have Much At Stake In Iraq Talks....11
Violence Hinders Iraqi TV Station's Efforts To Entertain....12
Small College Radio News Program Reports On Iraq War....12
Afghan Christian Could Be Put To Death For Renouncing Islam....13
WSJournal Praises National Security Strategy....13

DOJ:

Veteran Federal Prosecutor Joins Arent Fox....13

Corporate Scandals:

Former Enron Treasurer To Testify In Lay, Skilling Trial....13
Study Finds Executive Pay Growth Has Slowed....13

Criminal Law:

Libby's Lawyers Expected To Focus On WMD Debate....14
DC Cop's Case Could Make Prosecutions Harder In Abramoff Scandal....14
"Mafia Cops" Prosecution Witness Seen As "Complex Character."....14
California Businessman Pleads Guilty In Pellicano Investigation....14
"Innocence Lost" Uncovered Toledo Teen Prostitution Ring In Pennsylvania....14
Corruption Probe Shuts Down Texas Town's Police Force....15
Child Services Workers Facing More Danger....15
Friends, Family Of Slain Man Question Sheriff's Account Of Shooting....15
Victim Of Priest Abuse Returns To Face Past....15
Supreme Court To Hear Cases Crucial To Domestic Violence Prosecutions....16

Civil Law:

Google Gets Win On Government's Subpoena For Web Search Data....16
Chicago Alderman Seeks To Close Smoking Ban Loophole 16

Civil Rights:

Oakland Nearly Finished Paying Out Over War Protestors' Injuries....16
Studies Warn Of Difficult Plight For Black Men In US....16
Schools Called Front Line In Culture War Over Homosexuality....17

Antitrust:
Zurich American To Pay $171.7 Million In Bid Rigging Case 17
UK Insurer Prudential PLC Rejects Aviva Takeover Proposal 17
Roche, Amgen Engaged In Fierce Lobbying Battle Over Patents ... 17
Supreme Court Patent Case Could Have Far-Reaching Implications ... 18

Environment/Indian Affairs:
Kempthorne Known To Work With Those Who Disagree With Him ... 18
Firm Offers DOE Space To Store Spent Fuel ... 18
Offshore Drilling Advocates Push Revenue Sharing Plan ... 18
Court Rules Older Sites Must Meet Same Emission Requirements As New Facilities ... 18
Interior Department Urged To Endorse Settlement On North Carolina Road Project ... 19
Law Firms Rolling Dice On Indian Law ... 19

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Funding Constraints Leave New York FBI Agents Without Email, BlackBerrys ... 19
12 Face Charges In California For Making Marijuana-Laced Candy, Soda ... 20
Eight New Jersey Residents Accused Of Running "Major" Heroin Ring ... 20
Attorney Accuses DEA Of "Lukewarm" Response To Death Threat ... 20
Detroit Drug Dealers Said To Be Infiltrating West Virginia Town ... 20
Washington Post Profiles "Prince Of Pot" ... 20
Poppy Crops Said To Threaten Afghan Democracy ... 21

Congress-Administration:
Cheney Downplays Calls For Staff Changes At White House 21
Bush Has Been Taking More Questions From Audiences ... 22
Cheney Discusses Hunting Accident ... 22
House Expected To Be In Session Only 97 Days This Year ... 22
Republicans Unable To Craft Unified Political, Policy Agenda ... 22
Senate Voted Against Social Security Accounts Last Week ... 23
MZM Founder Used Several Tools To Win Lucrative Federal Contracts ... 23
E-Mail Uses TSP's Name In Credit Card Scam ... 23
Krugman Dismisses Notion That Bush Is Big Spender ... 23
Hebert Criticizes Proposed Cuts In Cancer Detection Program ... 24
WPost Criticizes FCC Ruling On Scorsese Documentary ... 24
GOP Unity Said To Have "Fallen Apart." ... 24

Other News:
Snow Says Americans Broadly Sharing In Economic Expansion ... 24
Medicare Drug Plan Is Growing Issue In Congressional Races ... 25
Boehlert To Retire ... 25
Sabo To Retires From Safe Democratic Seat In Minnesota ... 25
Rice Wins Luntz's California Presidential Straw Poll ... 26
Giuliani Said To Be Ready For Presidential Bid ... 26
New York Races Seen As Indicators Of Potential Democratic Wave ... 26
WSJournal Says Republicans Behaving "Like Democrats." ... 26
Former GOP White House Aide Raises Funds For Clinton ... 26
Massachusetts' Share Of Faith Based Grants Has Fallen ... 26
Construction Set To Begin On Islamic School Near Annapolis ... 27
Hamas Holds Key Ministries In Proposed Cabinet ... 27
UAE Gave Money To Families Of Palestinian Militants ... 27
Egyptian Pop Culture Increasingly Anti-American ... 27
Senators Urge Mexico To Crack Down On Border Tunnels ... 28
Opposition Charges Belarus Election Was Fraudulent ... 28
Serbs Searching For War Criminals Mladic, Karadzic ... 28
Calm Returns To Paris After Massive Labor Riot ... 28
Energy To Top Agenda As Putin Visits China ... 29
Beijing Won't Intervene In Talks Over Iron Ore ... 29
Latin American, Caribbean Economies Expected To Grow In 2006 ... 29
Consumers In EU, Japan Showing Willingness To Spend Again ... 29
EU Criticizes Pace Of Turkish Reforms ... 29
East African Drought Forces Changes In Cultural Traditions 29
Private Water Management Efforts Losing Support ... 29
Annan Makes Case For New UN Human Rights Council ... 30
Liberian President Says She Can Offer Bush A Success Story ... 30
NYTimes Urges US To Aid UN Efforts In Darfur ... 30
WSJournal Criticizes Chinese Officials' Anti-Democracy Tirade ... 30
Abdullah Praised As "Distinguished Statesman." ... 30

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 30

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington ... 31

DOJ_NMG_0018376

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration Lawyers Suggested Warrantless FBI Searches. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Ragavan) reports that following the 9/11 attacks, Bush Administration lawyers discussed with senior FBI officials the possibility of using the same legal authority used to conduct the warrantless eavesdropping approved by President Bush to "conduct physical searches of homes and businesses of terrorism suspects -- also without court approval." US News adds that "in a little-noticed white paper submitted by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to Congress on January 19 justifying the legality of the NSA eavesdropping, Justice Department lawyers made a tacit case that President Bush also has the inherent authority to order such physical searches. In order to fulfill his duties as commander in chief, the 42-page white paper says, 'a consistent understanding has developed that the president has inherent constitutional authority to conduct warrantless searches and surveillance within the United States for foreign intelligence purposes.'"

Mueller "Troubled By Domestic Spying Program. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Ragavan) reports that government officials say FBI Director Robert Mueller and then Deputy Attorney General James Comey, "who also questioned the NSA spying program, both believed that while it was a close call legally, the president did have authority to conduct electronic surveillance of terrorism suspects in the United States without court approval; both men, however, raised grave concerns about the possible use of any information obtained from any warrantless surveillance in a court of law." US News adds, "White House lawyers, in particular, Vice President Cheney's counsel David Addington (who is now Cheney's chief of staff), pressed Mueller to use information from the NSA program in court cases, without disclosing the origin of the information, and told Mueller to be prepared to drop prosecutions if judges demanded to know the sourcing, according to several government officials. Mueller, backed by Comey, resisted the administration's efforts." US News also reports, "Sources say Mueller and his general counsel, Valerie Caproni, continue to remain troubled by the domestic spying program."

Cheney Says NSA Domestic Surveillance Program Has Been "Major Success." On CBS' Face the Nation (3/19, Schieffer), Vice President Cheney said the Administration is "working with" Congress "to give them broad oversight with respect to" the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program. Cheney added, "It's a very important program. It is totally in compliance with the laws and Constitution of the United States. It's been a major success in preventing attacks against the United States. And it needs to be preserved and protected."

Durbin Won't Rule Out Bush Impeachment. On Fox News Sunday (3/19), host Chris Wallace asked Sen. Richard Durbin if he ruled out "impeachment of the president if the Democrats regain control of Congress." Durbin said, "I don't believe that that is even a valuable discussion at this point. But I do believe it's valuable that Sen. Feingold is moving us forward to finally be a catalyst to have the kind of hearings and the kind of deliberations as to what lies behind this warrantless wiretap situation, how this President can avoid the law, which is very clear on the subject." Asked if he was not ruling out impeachment, Durbin said, "I can't rule anything out until the investigation is complete. I don't want to prejudge it. But if this President or any president violates the law, he has to be held accountable, and that accountability, of course, is in the hands of the United States House of Representative and the Senate." USA Today (3/20, 2.31M) runs a brief report on Durbin's comments, including his remark "I don't want to prejudge it," referring to Bush's possible impeachment. The AP (3/20) notes Durbin "said he so far has not heard a valid legal justification for the spy program that was put in place after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks."

On Fox News Sunday's roundtable discussion (3/19), Brit Hume said Durbin's remarks "illustrates as clearly as anything yet has, the fact that if the Democrats get control of one House or the other -- they're more likely to get the House, I assume, and that's, of course, where impeachments occur -- that the impeachment will be on the agenda. The Republicans are claiming this. Senator Durbin, while not ruling it out, as other Democrats have -- and he is, after all, the assistant leader, has come pretty close to confirming that, indeed, it is there." NPR's Mara Liasson said, "Most of the Democrats I talked to this week felt that Feingold's effort was terribly unhelpful, to put it mildly, that he changed the subject from Republicans being on the defensive to Democrats' effort to get the President. And I was actually surprised, too, that Durbin left the door open as much as he did." The Washington Times (3/20, Bellantoni, 90K) makes a similar point, reporting "congressional Democrats say…Feingold's move… is a distraction from their quest to take back Congress in the fall." Rep. James P. Moran, Virginia Democrat, told The Washington Times, "Every time we get in a great strategic position, we manage to energize the Republican base. … Everything is going well for the Democrats and President Bush is tanking in the polls, and then Russ Feingold comes up with the idea of censure, which is going to go nowhere and is not just quixotic but is somewhat self-serving."

DOJ_NMG_0018377

Likewise, Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (3/20), "The best thing that can be said about the call by…Feingold (D-Wis.) to censure President Bush is that practically none of his colleagues is backing him up." They "don't want to distract attention from the main Democratic assaults on Bush and the GOP -- that he's 'incompetent' and that Republicans are in 'disarray.'" Feingold's move "reinforces the party's image as 'McGovernite' -- weak on national security -- at a time when Bush's inept Hurricane Katrina response and the Dubai ports disaster has given Democrats an opening to knock Bush on homeland security."

Also on Fox News Sunday's roundtable discussion (3/19), the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol said, "I think Feingold is smarter than the Democratic leadership in the House and the Senate, and I think he deserves some credit for taking a principled stand. And I honestly believe that, in fact, he's winning this debate right now."

Murtha Declines To Endorse Feingold Resolution. On NBC's Meet the Press (3/19, Russert), Democratic Rep. John Murtha declined to offer support for Sen. Russ Feingold's resolution to censure Bush for the National Security Agency domestic intelligence program, saying, "I had a briefing the other day, I'm satisfied the safeguards that are in place are significant, but we have to look at whether it's illegal or not. I'm hesitant to say the President ought to be censured before a committee looks at it and really investigates it and comes up with some real conclusions."

Administration Document Outlines Agency Roles In War On Terror. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Robinson), "The Bush administration released a key document last week, following on the signing of a classified directive that gives new orders to government agencies about their roles in the war on terrorism. … The National Security Presidential Directive gives new marching orders to each agency for its role in the war on terrorism. … A major goal of the new NSPD is to resolve discrepancies among previous presidential directives and chronic conflicts among agencies with overlapping responsibilities."

9th Circuit Orders Sri Lankan Freed From Border Jail. The AP (3/20, Prengaman) reports, "After more than four years in a U.S. detention center, Ahilan Nadarajah will soon gain the freedom he sought when he fled Sri Lanka and the government forces there that he says repeatedly jailed and tortured him." The AP continues, 'He had reached the United States in October 2001 only to be detained on the same accusations that almost got him killed in his home country: He was suspected of being a member of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a separatist group listed as a terrorist organization by the U.S. State Department." The AP adds, "Nadarajah denies the claims, and immigration judges have twice granted him asylum. But the federal government refused to release him. … The latest order came Friday from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, telling the U.S. government it was violating federal law by continuing to hold him even though he wasn't criminally charged and couldn't be deported in the foreseeable future. His lawyers said they now expect him to be freed in a few days."

High Court To Hear Arguments On Military Tribunals. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Halloran) reports that the Supreme Court is set to hear arguments next week over the legality of US military tribunals for foreigners designated as enemy combatants. The High Court "will finally have to weigh in on some of the most contentious and polarizing issues in the post-9/11 world: How should the United States treat non-American prisoners whose allegiances lie not with a country but an ideology? Does the president have the power to unilaterally decide not only which prisoners qualify as enemy combatants but what rights they have and under what justice system they should be tried? And, at the heart of it all, should past rules of war apply, or does the war on terrorism…require its own special standards?"

NYTimes Urges High Court To Rule In Favor Of Guantanamo Detainee. The New York Times (3/20, 1.19M) editorializes, "Since the Republican majority has decided to allow President Bush to usurp Congress's role in matters of national security, the battle to save the constitutional balance of powers moves to the judiciary. A critical test of judicial independence will come this month, when the Supreme Court hears arguments in a case that has become a focus of Mr. Bush's imperial vision of the presidency." Salim Ahmed Hamdan, "accused of having been a bodyguard and driver for Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan," has been "detained since 2002 in Guantánamo Bay. He filed suit to challenge the legitimacy of the military commission that upheld his designation as an 'unlawful enemy combatant.'" Hamdan "argued, rightly, that the commissions are not legitimate because prisoners are routinely barred from seeing evidence, much less confronting their accusers or having access to real legal representation. But his case has now become a much larger battle over the principle of habeas corpus, which is embedded in the Constitution and says that a prisoner cannot be denied the right to challenge his detention."

DOJ_NMG_0018378

Army IG Exonerates Gitmo Commandant. Time (3/27, Zagorin, Donnelly) reports, "Did Major General Geoffrey Miller -- commandant at Guantanamo Bay and a top adviser on interrogations at Abu Ghraib -- do wrong? No, says a new report by Lieut. General Stanley Green, the Army Inspector General (IG), that TIME obtained last week." According to Time, "A Pentagon panel recommended last summer that Miller be reprimanded for poor oversight of a high-value prisoner at Gitmo." Time adds, "Miller's exoneration may only inflame his critics. At a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing last week, chairman John Warner pointedly suggested to one of Miller's superiors that he 'go back over this entire matter,' warning that Miller will be recalled before the panel to explain himself. Sources close to the powerful committee say that anger at Miller has escalated sharply since he invoked his right to avoid self-incrimination and refused to testify in the detainee-abuse trial of an Abu Ghraib dog handler."

Martin Was Never Meant To Be Player In Moussaoui Case. Time (3/27, Waller) reports on Carla Martin, the "government lawyer with a small role in the sentencing trial of confessed 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui," who has been placed on paid administrative leave by the TSA for coaching witnesses in the sentencing phase of Moussaoui's trial. Time adds that Martin "was never meant to be a player. In court documents filed after the blowup, prosecutors painted her as a misguided 'miscreant' with only a bit part in the government's case preparation -- arranging witness interviews and retrieving aviation documents for prosecutors."

WPost Says Moussaoui Case Part Of Pattern Of Government Misconduct. Under the headline "Another Blown Case?," the Washington Post (3/20, A14, 744K) editorializes, "The death penalty case against accused Sept. 11 conspirator Zacharias Moussaoui has barely survived the government's latest bout of incompetence." This case "joins a line of big terrorism prosecutions marred by government misconduct, overzealousness, hyping of charges or just plain ineffectiveness. … Prosecuting terrorists isn't easy…but much of this is the Bush administration's fault. The administration failed to work with Congress to create viable legal structures to handle these cases, proceeding in whatever way seemed most convenient in any given situation. The results are abysmal. And, ironically, they undermine the case for the more secretive military trial procedures the government is trying to create."

Credibility Of FBI Witness Called Into Question. Newsweek (3/27) reports in its "Periscope" column that in addition to the case against accused 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, which "is in trouble," the Justice Department also has "a problem in another case. The credibility of the FBI's star witness against a Pakistani-American accused of Qaeda ties is under fire after he testified he saw Ayman al-Zawahiri at a mosque attended by the defendant in Lodi, Calif., in 1999." The testimony "startled counterterrorism experts: Zawahiri, Osama bin Laden's chief deputy, was in Afghanistan at the time, under indictment for the bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa." A Justice official "said prosecutors are still confident about the case against Hamid Hayat, 23, accused of attending a Qaeda camp in Pakistan, and his father, Umer Hayat, 48, who allegedly lied to the FBI about his son's travels."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DPW Plans To Sell US Holdings Could Face Hurdles. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, Machalaba, 2.11M) reports, "SSA Marine Inc.'s decision to explore a sale of the company could complicate Dubai Ports World's plans to sell its U.S. holdings to an American buyer." SSA Marine, "the largest US container terminal operator, has been considered one of the possible bidders for DP World's terminal operations in the US. With SSA Marine disclosing that it is a potential acquisition target itself, the number of viable US purchasers for DP World's U.S. holdings could be reduced."

DOJ_NMG_0018379

Hunter Criticizes Original DPW Deal. GOP Rep. Duncan Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, writes in USA Today (3/20, 2.31M), "In the post-9/11 world, America's No. 1 priority must be national security. But the process that OK'd government-owned Dubai Ports World's takeover of terminal operations at major US ports was geared less toward national security and more toward economic opportunity. … Today, we can take nothing for granted. We must continue to enhance our security instead of creating even greater vulnerabilities. To those who say this smacks of protectionism, I say this: America is worth protecting." In an editorial, USA Today (3/20, 2.31M) disagrees, and says that Hunter "would like to set a series of draconian standards for any company wishing to buy a part of the nation's "critical infrastructure." Its chairman and CEO would have to be American, as would at least half of its board. The secretary of Defense would have to approve half of the board members and the company would have to keep tabs on the citizenship of its shareholders to make sure that no more than half were non-U.S. citizens. The idea that the government would be allowed to choose who controls private companies is bizarre by itself. More so coming from a Republican."

Negroponte Probing Pentagon Trend Toward Outsourcing Intelligence Work. The Washington Post (3/20, A3, Pincus, 744K) reports on "a growing trend at the Pentagon to contract out intelligence jobs that were formerly done primarily by service personnel and civil service employees." By "using contract employees," government agencies "lose control over those doing this sensitive work and an element of profit is inserted into what is being done. Also, as investigations have revealed, politics and corruption may be introduced into the process." The office of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte "has quietly begun to study the contracting issue because 'it already is a problem,' a senior intelligence official said in a recent interview." The Post adds, "A related concern for intelligence agencies inside and outside the Pentagon is that the government is training people and getting them security clearances, but they then leave for better pay offered by contractors, sometimes to do the same work."

WTC Talks To Restart Next Week. The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Frangos, 2.11M) reports, "Talks to resolve how to rebuild the World Trade Center will restart next week after private developer Larry Silverstein offered a revised proposal Friday for his role in the long-troubled project." The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, "which owns the site, said it would respond to Mr. Silverstein's proposal."

Contractor Profits Found To Be Major Factor In Post-Katrina Waste. A study by the GAO has found that millions of dollars have been wasted in post-Katrina government contracts. The Washington Post (3/20, A1, Warrick, 744K) reports in a front page article that cleanup in the Gulf region often involves "at least four" contractors: "a contractor, his subcontractor, the subcontractor's subcontractor, and finally, the local man" to do the work. "For the thousands of contractors in the Katrina recovery business, this is the way the system works -- a system that federal officials say is the same after every major disaster but that local government officials, watchdog groups and the contractors themselves say is one reason that costs for the hurricane cleanup continue to swell." Meanwhile, "each week, many more millions are paid to contractors who get a cut of the profits from a job performed by someone else. In instances reviewed by The Washington Post, the difference between the job's actual price and the fee charged to taxpayers ranged from 40 percent to as high as 1,700 percent."

Powell Credited With Securing $4.2 Billion Plan For Louisiana Homeowners. Under the headline "Behind Louisiana Aid Package, A Change Of Heart By One Man," the New York Times (3/20, Dewan, 1.19M) reports that though President Bush's Gulf Coast rebuilding coordinator, Donald E. Powell, and the administration had originally "rejected Louisiana's housing recovery plan," prompting a call for Powell's dismissal from the Baton Rouge Advocate, he "did an about-face that turned many of his critics into fans, showing that not only had he listened to the locals, but also that his conclusions had carried weight with Mr. Bush." Powell's work in securing the plan to "seek $4.2 billion more for Louisiana to compensate homeowners — even those in the flood plain — " has "made many Louisianians think that in appointing him, the administration had finally done something right."

FEMA Asking Some Hurricane Victims To Return Erroneous Payments. NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 10, 0:30, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "There could be some bad news this week for the people of the Gulf Coast depending on FEMA to help them rebuild. Thousands who received money from the Federal Government after Hurricanes Katrina, Rita, and Wilma will be asked to send it back. Last week, FEMA started mailing letters asking people to return money the government says they received in error." The AP (3/19) reported, "Some 1.7 million households received FEMA assistance after Hurricanes Rita, Katrina or Wilma. About 2 to 3 percent or 34,000 to 51,000 families will reimburse the agency, Donna Dannels, acting deputy director of FEMA's recovery division."

DOJ_NMG_0018380

"Bring New Orleans Back" Commission To Issue Final Report. The Los Angeles Times (3/20, Quinones, 958K) reports the Bring New Orleans Back Commission, which has been "a magnet for criticism as well as a channel for emerging citizen activism," will formally issue "its final report to Mayor C. Ray Nagin tonight, though the reports of its seven committees have been public for several weeks." The Times adds, "As a post-hurricane entity, the commission went far beyond just storm and flood protection. The committees also have recommended ways to overhaul land-use planning, rebuild neighborhoods, consolidate duplicative elected offices, revive the city's cultural life, reorder its health and public education systems, and modernize the criminal justice system."

Gulf Coast Churches Struggling To Recover From Hurricane Katrina. NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 9, 2:25, Kotb, 9.87M) reported Hurricane Katrina "destroyed houses of worship too, and like the people of the region, the churches are struggling to get by." NBC (Ellis) added, "They have marched into St. Augustine's for 165 years, but now this New Orleans church, one of the oldest African-American Catholic churches in the country, is fighting just to stay open. With $400,000 in damages in a city with a decimated population and archdiocese hurting for cash, St. Augustine has been forced to merge with another parish, its schedule cut to just Sunday masses, its longtime priest reassigned. Many parishioners are worried St. Augustine's rich traditions could be next to disappear." All along "the Gulf Coast, churches are being redefined. And with so many parishioners scattered by the storm, many churches are having a tough time coming back to what they were or even where they were."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Administration Defends Iraq Policy On Third Anniversary Of War. President Bush yesterday delivered a "stay the course" message on Iraq yesterday on the third anniversary of the US military action in Iraq as he returned from Camp David. Administration officials, including Vice President Cheney, sought to reinforce that message on the weekend talk shows. The President is expected to return to that message again this week during a speech in Cleveland. The Akron Beacon Journal (3/19, Abraham, 148K) reported that President Bush will be in Cleveland, O.H. on Monday, where he's "expected to discuss the global war on terror in a speech…at the City Club." Bush "is expected to arrive in Cleveland shortly before noon, and will present the President's Volunteer Service Award to Lois Hagood of Garfield Heights, who volunteers as a reading tutor for first-graders in Cleveland." The Cleveland Plain Dealer (3/20, Eaton) says Bush "will discuss how the United States is 'working with all aspects of Iraqi society' to defeat terrorists, restore order and rebuild Iraq, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said. It is part of a monthlong effort by Bush to update Americans on the war's progress and 'how we're fixing what was not working."

The AP (3/20, Pickler) reports Bush that in his comments yesterday, the President avoided "any mention of the daily violence that rages three years after he ordered an invasion. The president didn't utter the word 'war.'" Other Administration "officials repeated the mantra that progress continues toward building a unified Iraqi government and nation." USA Today (3/20, Diamond, 2.31M) also notes Bush avoided "the word 'war.'"

Meanwhile, touching on a theme present in many newspaper accounts, the Los Angeles Times (3/20, Brownstein, 958K) says the Administration's "upbeat assessments faced sharp skepticism from US legislators from both parties and from a senior Iraqi political leader, former interim Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, who has been a staunch American ally." They "contended that Iraq was now in the midst of a civil war between Shiite and Sunni Muslims." The New York Times (3/20, Sanger, Shanker, 1.19M) also says the officials displayed "a carefully calibrated mix of optimism about eventual victory and caution about how long American troops would be involved." The picture "painted by the administration clashed with that of the former interim prime minister." The Washington Post (3/20, A1, Fletcher, 744K) headlines its story "Bush Still Upbeat On Outcome In Iraq," and reports the Administration "tried to dispel a growing perception that a continuing wave of sectarian violence has pushed Iraq into a full-fledged civil war."

DOJ_NMG_0018381

ABC and NBC both noted Bush's remarks early in their newscasts last night. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, lead story, 2:55, Harris, 8.78M) reports, "As the war in Iraq enters its fourth year, tonight, we heard two, very different views of its successes, its failures and its future. President Bush said the sacrifices that have been made and the ones to come will pay off for Iraq, and the US." t Bush: "We are implementing a strategy that will lead to victory in Iraq. And a victory in Iraq will make this country more secure. And will help lay the foundation of peace for generations to come." ABC World News Tonight (3/19, lead story, 2:55, Yang, 8.78M) reports, "Administration officials were relent relentlessly on-message today, as they marked the war's anniversary. And the tone was set by the President himself." Bush: "The Iraqi leaders are working together to enact a government that reflects the will of the people. And so, I'm encouraged by the progress." Vice President Cheney (from CBS's Face the Nation): "And it continues to improve day-by-day. Those are the facts on the ground. That's the reality." Yang: But "even some Republicans say optimistic words are not enough." Sen. Chuck Hagel: "We're beyond the American people buying into public relations offensives. This is about policy now. This is about hard, cold facts and realities on the ground." NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 3, 2:35, Jordan, 9.87M) also said the President and "his top military advisors launched a full-blown media blitz to convince Americans to stay the course."

On CBS' Face the Nation (3/19, Schieffer), Vice President Cheney said, "There's a constant sort of perception, if you will, that's created because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad. It's not all the work that went on that day in 15 other provinces in terms of making progress towards rebuilding Iraq." Asked to respond to Sen. Edward Kennedy's characterization of the Administration's Iraq policy as "dangerously incompetent," Cheney said, "Well, I would not look to Ted Kennedy for guidance and leadership on how we ought to manage national security. I think what Senator Kennedy reflects is sort of the pre-9/11 mentality about how we ought to deal with the world and that part of the world." Cheney said the Administration's "aggressive, forward-leaning strategy is one of the main reasons we haven't been struck again since 9/11 because we've taken the fight to them. Senator Kennedy's approach would be pack your bags and go home, retreat behind your oceans and assume you can be safe."

On NBC's Meet the Press (3/19, Russert), Gen. George Casey said there has been progress in both the political and security fronts in Iraq, saying that at each election in the last year, "the levels of participation increased, the levels of violence decreased, and each time the terrorists and the foreign fighters -- the same groups that are trying to foment sectarian strife right now -- failed to stop the election, the referendum and the, and the election in December." Casey added that now, there are "two Iraqi divisions, 13 Iraqi brigades and almost 60 Iraqi army and special police battalions that are in charge, in the lead, occupying in battle space and conducting counterinsurgency operations across Iraq. And I will tell you that their performance in this period after the, the bombing of the Samarra Mosque in, on the 22nd, has been generally very good."

On Fox News Sunday (3/19, Wallace), Gen. Casey also emphasized the progress in Iraq, saying, "The new political leaders of Iraq are meeting almost around the clock, discussing how to form a representative government of national unity that will ensure that the rights and the interests of all Iraqis, regardless of ethnic and sectarian group, are met. That's huge progress."

On NBC's Meet the Press (3/19, Russert), Democratic Rep. John Murtha disputed the Administration's claim that progress is being made in Iraq, adding, "I don't see the progress that they're portraying and I don't understand how they can continue to say that and the American public understands that and we understand it."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/20, Peterson, 61K) headlines its report "In Iraq, US Influence Wanes As Full-scale Civil War Looms," and says, "Every day, more violence. And more uncertainty for Iraqis than they have ever known, as they mark three years since American troops invaded." The "wave of optimism that once buoyed Iraqis after the fall of Saddam Hussein" is now being "marked as yet another casualty of the bombs and murders that are part of daily life here."

The Washington Times (3/20, 90K) says "protesters around the world also observed the anniversary of Operation Iraqi Freedom… with anti-American rallies that drew smaller crowds than similar demonstrations in the past." The Financial Times (3/20, Swann) reports "the US capital's historic protest venues were surprisingly serene on Sunday. Outside the White House tourists had their pictures taken next to a cardboard cut-out of the president, families enjoyed the sun on the Mall and several bored-looking policemen stood guard outside the vice-president's DC home. Not a placard in sight or a chant to be heard." Americans "may have turned decisively against the war in Iraq in recent months, but their change of heart has been largely expressed quietly to pollsters rather than in loud public protests." USA Today (3/20, Diamond, 2.31M) says "police in London estimated 15,000 people marched from Parliament to Trafalgar Square; last year's protest drew 45,000. About 800 people rallied in Tokyo compared with about 2,000 last year." In the United States," the biggest rally was in Chicago, where about 7,000 people marched. Smaller protests were held in other cities, including Boston, San Francisco, Pittsburgh and New York."

DOJ_NMG_0018382

Casey Says US Has Begun Reduction Of Troop Level. On Fox News Sunday (3/19, Wallace), Gen. George Casey said the US troop reductions have "already begun. And I think you'll recall that just prior to Christmas, I told the Secretary of Defense and the President that I did not need two of the brigades that were intended to come over here to Iraq, so we actually already have already begun the reductions of our combat forces. … I do believe that over 2006, we will continue to see a gradual reduction in coalition forces."

Rumsfeld's Nazi Analogy Under Fire. On NBC's Meet the Press (3/19, Russert), Democratic Rep. John Murtha said in response to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld claim that leaving Iraq now would be like returning post WWII Germany to the Nazis that the country is in "a civil war. Twenty-five thousand insurgents are fighting with each other inside the country for supremacy. That's the definition of a civil war. There's less than a thousand al Qaida. And when he says turning it over to al-Qaida -- and that's what he means, he, he's inferring it'll be turned over to al-Qaida -- I don't believe that for a minute. The Iraqis will get rid of al-Qaida the minute that we get out of there."

On ABC News' This Week (3/19, Stephanopoulos), Sen. Chuck Hagel disagreed with Secretary Rumsfeld's post-war Germany analogy, saying, "I understand that the secretary has a difficult assignment to try to assign some credibility to the current policy and I don't think the current policy is working. We need some new thinking here. And I think we should not be afraid to think through, which we have never done, we didn't think through this at all before we went into Iraq, but think through consequences, all right, what if we leave at some point? What if all the worst-case scenarios happen?"

On Fox News Sunday's roundtable discussion (3/19), the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol said, "I think reading Don Rumsfeld's op-ed today in the Washington Post makes me even more amazed that Bush has not removed him as Secretary of Defense. I mean, Rumsfeld has an op-ed in which he talks about the situation in post-war Iraq. But we're at war, and he has for three years tried to jump to the post-war Iraq without winning the war in Iraq."

However, on CNN's Late Edition (3/19, Blitzer), Sen. Richard Lugar said Rumsfeld "clearly is correct, and I would say that that is the issue. I think Republicans and Democrats, at least in Congress, a large majority, believe that it would be unthinkable for Iraq to be turned back to the Saddamists and to chaos, and an incubator for terrorism."

Durbin Says Congress Needs To Hold Bush Accountable On Iraq. On Fox News Sunday (3/19), host Chris Wallace asked Sen. Richard Durbin to explain the Democratic plan for Iraq. Durbin said, "What we propose and what Senator John Warner accepted as a bipartisan approach in the Senate includes the following. This year, 2006, a year of transition, where the Iraqis take control of their own security and defense. Secondly, the Iraqis are put on notice they have to form a government that embraces all of the factions within Iraq so that we can see finally a government of unity leading to some sort of progress for the people of Iraq. And finally, we have to have from this president accountability, clear accountability, where he says every three months what progress is being made. His first report, incidentally, was not an encouraging one. It's an indication that despite all the rhetoric, we have not made progress this year."

Reed Says US Needs To Use Troops As Leverage. On ABC News' This Week (3/19, Stephanopoulos), Sen. Jack Reed said, "The only leverage we have is our troop presence, and I think we have to make it clear to the Iraqi political leaders that if they're not able or willing to come together with a political solution that recognizes the differences and pulls together the different factions, that our presence can't be indefinite there."

Iraqis See Mixed Progress On Three Year Anniversary. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, story 5, 2:50, Harris, 8.78M) ran a retrospective report on the developments in Iraq on the three year anniversary, reporting, "Patience is difficult when daily life is a struggle. Since the war, many parents are afraid to let their children out to play. Nearly 13 million fewer Iraqis have drinkable water. In Baghdad, there's electricity for less than four hours a day. And in a country with so much oil, people wait in gas lines up to 12 hours. On the flip side, Saddam's absence means Iraqis can protest, get satellite TV and use cell phones. What's more, the US and its partners have fixed up 825 schools, 13 hospitals and 302 police stations." ABC also interviewed three US officers, who affirmed their continued belief in their mission.

DOJ_NMG_0018383

Iraqis Reportedly Still Hopeful, But More Pessimistic. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, story 8, 2:00, Harris, 8.78M) also profiled an ABC News translator, who was at first optimistic after the fall of Saddam, but his "optimism has largely evaporated." ABC translator: "I was very happy. But now, I feel a bit pessimistic. From day-to-day, it is worse and worse. There's no government. There's no stability. There's no security at all." Harris: "He still says he does have hope that someday, maybe years into the future, Iraq will be the place he once thought it would be. He says he simply cannot survive in Iraq, without hope."

Allawi Says Iraq Already In Civil War. Former Iraqi Prime Minister Ayad Allawi yesterday said he thought his country was in a civil war in interviews with a variety of media outlets. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, lead story, 2:55, Harris, 8.78M) reports, "In an interview with British television, the former prime minister of Iraq, Ayad Allawi, said this country is already in civil war." Former Prime Minister Allawi: "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is." NBC Nightly News (3/19, lead story, 2:40, Engel, 9.87M) showed Allawi saying, "There are no institutions that could protect people. There are definitely ethnic cleansing happening and taking place here and there in the country. So, this is in fact, has a level of a civil war. We should not deny this. We should be brave enough to talk about it." Engel: But Gen. George Casey, "the top US commander in Iraq, General George Casey, disagrees." The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/20) reports Allawi "said playing down the current problems in Iraq would be a mistake, telling the BBC he had warned against a power vacuum and the prevalence of militias." Allawi "said the formation of a national unity government was what Iraq needed to achieve peace."

On CBS' Face the Nation (3/19, Schieffer), Cheney disagreed with Allawi's characterization of Iraq as being in a civil war, saying, "I think the assessment that we get from General George Casey, who's our man commanding in Iraq, from Zal Khalilzad, the ambassador, from John Abizaid, who is the general in charge of Central Command, doesn't square with that. Clearly there is an attempt under way by the terrorists, by Zarqawi and others, to foment civil war. That's been their strategy all along, but my view would be they've reached a stage of desperation from their standpoint."

Meanwhile, on ABC News' This Week (3/19, Stephanopoulos), Sen. Chuck Hagel said Allawi "is correct. I think we have had a low-grade civil war going on in Iraq, certainly the last six months, maybe the last year. Our own generals have told me that privately. So that's a fact."

US Military Deaths Down As Iraqi Deaths Increase. USA Today (3/20, Frank, 2.31M) reports, "US military deaths during the past month have dropped to an average of about one a day, approaching the lowest level since the insurgency began two years ago, according to a USA TODAY analysis of U.S. military data." The decline in US deaths "comes as Iraqi casualties are the highest since the U.S. military began tracking them in 2004. In the past month, nearly five times as many Iraqi forces and civilians were killed as troops in the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, US military data show."

The Washington Post (3/20, A10, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports "tens of thousands of Iraqi civilians have died in the war, from US and Iraqi military actions, insurgent attacks and, increasingly, raids attributed to government-allied Shiite Muslim squads that allegedly operate both inside and outside Iraq's new, Shiite-dominated security forces."

US Death Toll Tops 2,300. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, story 2, 0:20, Harris, 8.78M) reports, "President Bush said today he was reflecting on US servicemen and women. More than 2,300 US troops have been killed in the war. And more than 17,000 injured. The estimate of Iraqis killed varies widely. But it's believed to be well over 33,000."

Creation Of Iraqi Policy Council Called Step Forward. The New York Times (3/20, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "Iraqi officials announced Sunday that they had agreed to form a council of the country's top politicians to make policy on security and economic issues in the new government. The council, which will include the prime minister and president, is an attempt to include all the country's major factions in decision making at a time of rising sectarian tensions." The Times calls the arrangement "a step forward in the snail-paced negotiations over the formation of a full, four-year government. … The political leaders must now tackle other deeply contentious issues in the talks to form a government." PM Ibrahim Al-Jafaari was not present for the discussions. The Los Angeles Times (3/20, Boudreaux, 958K) also reports the story.

DOJ_NMG_0018384

Jafari Says Sadr Needs To Be Included In Political Process. Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari writes in the Washington Post (3/20, A15, 744K), "As the wheels of democracy have begun to turn in Iraq, the people's wishes are becoming clearer and their representatives identified. To this end I am humbled and honored to be chosen by my coalition to lead Iraq's first democratically elected full-term government." He adds, "My government's first challenge will be to stifle the terrorism that has plagued our country and defiled the name of Islam. While we are making good progress in expanding and developing Iraq's security services, the war against the terrorists cannot be won by military means alone. It is paramount that all Iraqis work together to build a democratic, free Iraq." He also writes, "Sidelining Moqtada al-Sadr's group from the Governing Council was a mistake. Had it been integrated into the political process" from the beginning, "events would have turned out differently in the south. I corrected this policy and brought Sadr's group into the democratic process. This inclusive approach resulted in the huge nationwide turnout for the December elections and a parliament that truly reflects Iraq."

If Convicted, Saddam Could Be Executed Quickly. Newsweek (3/27, Nordland) reports on the continuing trial of Saddam Hussein noting that, if he is convicted, "Saddam could well be executed soon after the Dujail case ends, without waiting for other cases against him to proceed." Once "a verdict is rendered by the five-judge panel, 'if any defendant were sentenced to any penalty, no matter whether it were the death penalty or imprisonment, that penalty should be executed within 30 days of the court's verdict,' chief prosecutor Jafar al Musawi told NEWSWEEK. Although there would be an automatic appeal of a death sentence to the court of cassation, that court has no backlog of cases, Musawi says, and an appeal 'would only take days.'"

Military Investigating Deaths Of 15 Iraqi Civilians As Possible Crime. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, story 3, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported that the deaths of 15 Iraqi civilians in November is "now being investigated as a possible crime." ABC (Karl) added, "Military officials now acknowledge the Iraqis were not killed by" a roadside bomb but "by crossfire, as US Marines stormed the surrounding homes. The military did not launch an investigation, until two months after the incident, when Time magazine showed officials this video and eyewitness testimony."

NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 2, 1:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported the Marine unit "was attacked by a roadside bomb. One Marine was killed, the other Marines then stormed several nearby houses, and according to the military officials, the Marines believed they were about to be ambushed and killed 23 people, including 15 non-combatants. Witnesses accused the Marines of killing those civilians out of revenge."

New Analyses Of Vietnam War Shaping US Military Approach In Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, A1, Jaffe, 2.11M) reports on its front-page on "Vietnam histories -- most of them highly critical of the US military in Vietnam -- that are changing the military's views on how to fight guerrilla wars. … The embrace of these Vietnam histories reflects an emerging consensus in the Army that in order to move forward in Iraq, it must better understand the mistakes of Vietnam." The Journal adds, "In the past, it was commonly held in military circles that the Army failed in Vietnam because civilian leaders forced it to fight a limited war instead of the all-out assault it longed to wage. … The newer analyses of Vietnam are now supplanting that theory -- and changing the way the Army fights. The argument that the military must exercise restraint is a central point of the Army's new counterinsurgency doctrine. The doctrine, which runs about 120 pages and is still in draft form, is a handbook on how to wage guerrilla wars."

Both Iran, US Said To Have Much At Stake In Iraq Talks. The Christian Science Monitor (3/20, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "A mutual interest in a stable Iraq is driving Washington and Tehran -- two otherwise increasingly antagonistic capitals -- to sit down and talk. Even as the Bush administration says America 'may face no greater challenge from a single country than from Iran,'" and as "US-backed efforts proceed in the United Nations Security Council to address Iran's nuclear ambitions," the two governments "have agreed to meet in Baghdad." The talks are "an acknowledgment of Iran's pivotal role in Iraqi affairs -- political, social, and religious -- at a particularly difficult moment for the US engagement there." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (3/20, A9, Vick, 744K) reports that Iran's "acceptance of direct talks with the United States over Iraq is being regarded among Iranians as a major foreign policy development, a historic if still tentative departure from 27 years of official enmity that held the government of the 'Great Satan' as one to be spoken against, but never with." In 2002, "a poll found that three-quarters of Iranians surveyed favored talks with the United States. The pollster was thrown in jail, but the reality drove a quiet competition between Iran's two rival political forces."

DOJ_NMG_0018385

US General Says Iran Talks Will Not Advance Mideast Peace. The AP (3/20) reports General George Casey, the US commander in Iraq, "expressed doubt today that negotiations between the United States and Iran over Iraq would help bring peace and stability in the Middle East. 'I don't have a lot of confidence that these will turn out to be productive, but I could be wrong. They're playing, I think, a very delicate balancing act. ... On the one hand, they want a stable neighbor. On the other hand, I don't believe they want to see us succeed here.'"

Security Council Permanent Members Will Try To Break Iran Stalemate. The Washington Post (3/20, A9, Lynch, 744K) reports Under Secretary Nick Burns and other top foreign affairs officials from "the Security Council's five permanent members and Germany will hold a high-level meeting Monday in New York to try to break an impasse over the international response to the Iranian nuclear crisis." US and European officials say they will try to assuage Russian and Chinese fears that the adoption of the statement will inevitably lead to harsh punitive measures. 'We're not hellbent on going to war; we're not hellbent on imposing sanctions,' said a senior State Department official… 'We're hellbent on having the Iranians return to the negotiations, like the Russians and the Chinese want.'"

Tehran Aims For Arab Support. As top diplomats prepare meet in New York, the Washington Post (3/20, A9, Williams, 744K) reports, "Iran has embarked on a charm offensive in the Arab world aimed at expanding economic and political ties and circumventing efforts by the United States and its allies to isolate Iran over its nuclear program. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad traveled this month to Kuwait, the first visit there by a high-ranking Iranian official in more than 25 years. Other Iranian officials toured Persian Gulf states trying to persuade them to endorse Iran's desire to develop nuclear technology, which US officials have called a cover for building weapons." According to the Post, "Arab observers say Iran's diplomatic offensive represents a newly vigorous approach to improving relations with its neighbors. 'Iran is trying to become a player in the region. At least toward the Arabs, Iran is trying to moderate its tone,' said Maha Altorki, an Iran analyst in the Asia section of the Arab League, based in Cairo."

Iranians Prepare For New Year Celebration. The New York Times (3/20, Slackman, 1.19M) reports that Iranians are preparing for the celebration of the Iranian New Year, called Nowruz." According to the Times, "After the Islamic Revolution in 1979, the ruling ayatollahs sought to stamp out many traditions, like Nowruz, a celebration with some Zoroastrian links that stretches back thousands of years to the pre-Islamic era, to mark the arrival of spring. The celebration is considered by many here the most Iranian of holidays. The ayatollahs tried, and failed. Now, nearly three decades later, some people say the increasingly enthusiastic embrace of Nowruz and other ancient traditions represents a resistance against the country's more conservative religious rulers."

Violence Hinders Iraqi TV Station's Efforts To Entertain. ABC News correspondent Jake Tapper writes in the New York Times (3/20, 1.19M) about "the discordant images on Iraqi television: Between the grisly shots of war dead, pools of blood and burnt-out shells of cars came bits of wacky slapstick. … With the newfound freedom of speech here, more than 100 television and radio stations have been licensed. … This has resulted not only in more news and public affairs programming, but many new entertainment shows." Yet "tragedy still has a way of rearing its head." During Tapper's visit to an Iraqi TV station, gunmen assassinated the station's entertainment-division chief, outside his Baghdad home just minutes earlier. Tapper concludes, "It is American journalists' duty to try to look at the broader picture in Iraq — telling the stories about those brave souls who seek to restore normalcy and laughter into the daily routine here. But there is no denying that the horrific violence will often make that task impossible."

Small College Radio News Program Reports On Iraq War. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, story 6, 2:45, Harris, 8.78M) reports a group of Swarthmore College students "say the American media is not getting the whole story. So, they are, quite literally, taking matters into their own hands by picking up the telephone." ABC (Berman) added, "Just over a year ago, students founded War News Radio, hardly your average college show. The goal: To big deeper into the lingering war." Through the "Internet, hard work and a little luck, the students track down Iraqi experts, officials and regular people."

DOJ_NMG_0018386

Afghan Christian Could Be Put To Death For Renouncing Islam. The AP (3/20) reports, "An Afghan man who allegedly converted from Islam to Christianity is being prosecuted in a Kabul court and could be sentenced to death, a judge said Sunday." The defendant, Abdul Rahman, "was arrested last month after his family went to the police and accused him of becoming a Christian, Judge Ansarullah Mawlavezada told Associated Press in an interview. Such a conversion would violate the country's Islamic laws." Rahman "was charged with rejecting Islam when his trial started last week, the judge said." During the hearing, the defendant "allegedly confessed that he converted from Islam to Christianity 16 years ago when he was 25 and working as a medical aid worker for Afghan refugees in neighboring Pakistan, Mawlavezada said." Afghanistan's constitution "is based on Shariah law, which states that any Muslim who rejects their religion should be sentenced to death."

WSJournal Praises National Security Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M) editorializes, "The publication last week of the Bush Administration's National Security Strategy has been greeted with a combination of media indifference and contempt. 'Bush clings to pre-emptive force,' was one news agency's sum-up of the 49-page document. Readers of these columns might prefer to draw their own conclusions by actually reading it: www.whitehouse.gov/nsc/nss/20061. What they'll find is a strategy that's admirably specific and, in the issues that matter most, broadly right." The Bush Doctrine "remains alive and well, despite persistent reports that it had been quietly shelved in favor of...well, no one has yet made clear what."

DOJ:

Veteran Federal Prosecutor Joins Arent Fox. The Washington Post (3/20, Liebert) reports, "Baruch Weiss, a veteran federal prosecutor who most recently was associate general counsel at the Department of Homeland Security, has joined the District office of Arent Fox in the litigation and white-collar defense groups." The Post continues, "From 1984 through 2002, Weiss was senior trial counsel for the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, where he handled cases including a fraud investigation of a major securities firm, appeals involving the first World Trade Center bombing in 1993 and the unsuccessful prosecution of boxing promoter Don King for insurance fraud."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron Treasurer To Testify In Lay, Skilling Trial. The New York Times (3/20, Barrionuevo) reports the government "heads this week into the home stretch of its case against two former Enron chief executives. Prosecutors will be looking to end on a flourish with the testimony of Ben F. Glisan Jr., the only former top executive who has already been sentenced in the Enron debacle." Glisan, Enron's former treasurer, is "the last major witness for the government before the case shifts to the defense and to what promises to be memorable testimony by the defendants, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay." Glisan worked "closely with Andrew S. Fastow, the former chief financial officer, on developing special-purpose entities, like the Raptors group, that both men have said in plea deals were used to inflate earnings and hide debt. The government is also expected to use Mr. Glisan to try to connect the dots for jurors hearing a complex case."

Study Finds Executive Pay Growth Has Slowed. The Financial Times (3/20, Roberts) reports growth in US executive pay "has slowed sharply in spite of record profit growth, according to preliminary findings from an independent corporate governance watchdog," the Corporate Library. The group, which "usually estimates greater pay inflation than most industry studies, calculates that US chief executives took home 11 per cent more money in 2005, compared with a 30 per cent rise the year previously. Among the 500 largest companies, median total compensation reported to date rose by just 3.7 per cent in 2005 to $5.2m."

Survey Shows Large Firms Improving Corporate Governance. USA Today (3/20, Iwata) reports a Business Roundtable survey shows "large U.S. companies are making strides in corporate-governance practices, from creating stronger independent boards to linking more executives' pay packages to their companies' performance." The survey "of 100 CEOs…suggests that leading corporations are taking their watchdog roles more seriously in the wake of Enron and other corporate scandals." Some "57% of companies have increased pay-for-performance elements in their executives' compensation packages. That's up from 40% in 2004." In addition, "at least 91% of the companies have an independent chairman or lead director — up from 71% two years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0018387

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby's Lawyers Expected To Focus On WMD Debate. The AP (3/20, Yost) reports that Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby "seems intent on zeroing in on three little letters: WMD." In their latest court filing, Libby's legal team said the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity is "at most a peripheral issue" to "the media conflagration" over the failure to find WMD in Iraq. The papers suggest that this "media conflagration" and "the resulting finger-pointing among the White House, the CIA and the State Department over who was to blame, that Libby's lawyers want to focus on in a bid to get him off." The papers "underscore the possibility that a criminal trial of Libby could highlight the ongoing debate over whether the White House manipulated intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq."

DC Cop's Case Could Make Prosecutions Harder In Abramoff Scandal. Jeffrey Birnbaum writes in his "K Street Confidential" column in the Washington Post (3/20, D1, 744K) that a appeals court decision involving a D.C. police officer could make it harder for prosecutors to make a case against lawmakers implicated in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. Detective Nelson Valdes "ran license plates through a law enforcement database and provided the vehicle-owner information he collected to a person who paid him cash. He was convicted in 2002 of taking illegal gratuities. But a three-judge appeals court panel recently reversed that decision. It said, in an opinion dated Feb. 24, that his actions weren't a formal part of his duties and therefore weren't covered by the statute. Scholars say that as a result of the Valdes case, the process of charging lawmakers and their aides with wrongdoing in the Abramoff scandal (and others like it) will be more difficult."

"Mafia Cops" Prosecution Witness Seen As "Complex Character." The New York Times (3/18, Feuer, 1.19M) profiles the Burton Kaplan, the top prosecution witness in the trial of alleged "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. "He is a complex character, who, for decades, led a double life. On one hand, he was that stock-in-trade cliché, 'the legitimate businessman,' who owned a discount clothing store in Bensonhurst and a factory for Chinese garment makers in Antigua. On the other hand, he is — or was — an inexhaustible fountainhead of crime. Both sides of Mr. Kaplan's personality were on display this week" at trial, as he "linked the lawmen to at least a dozen killings and kept the courtroom spellbound with his clipped accounts of how the two defendants had once gunned down a gangster on the grass berm of the Belt Parkway and, earlier, had delivered a kidnapped mobster to his rival."

California Businessman Pleads Guilty In Pellicano Investigation. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Krikorian, Blankstein, 958K) reports Valencia businessman George Kalta "admitted Friday to conspiring with Anthony Pellicano to illegally dig up information about a teenager who had accused him of sexual assault, becoming the latest witness cooperating in the federal probe of the indicted private eye. … The plea makes Kalta the fourth person to acknowledge that they hired — or helped — Pellicano to illegally investigate others using wiretaps, confidential police record searches or other methods." Calling Kalta "a minnow" in the FBI investigation, his defense attorney, Leslie Abramson, "said outside court on Friday that Pellicano bragged to her client about listening in on other people's conversations and about having connections within law enforcement."

"Innocence Lost" Uncovered Toledo Teen Prostitution Ring In Pennsylvania. The Toledo Blade (3/19, Erb, de Boer) reports, "In a 102-page indictment unsealed in December, the feds paint a violent picture of pimps and their most trusted prostitutes…who routinely brutalized newer recruits," largely from the Toledo area. The ring operated was centered in Harrisburg, Penn., which much of the activity occurring at a truck stop, which "became one focus of 'Innocence Lost,' a major federal inquiry into underage prostitution." The Blade adds, "'These girls are getting violently abused,' said David Johnson, chief of the FBI's Crimes Against Children unit. Beyond that, maintaining control is a matter of psychological conditioning, especially for girls already fleeing homes of incest, battering, or even simple neglect, said Chip Burrus, the FBI's acting assistant director of the criminal investigative division. … 'For them their normal day is servicing johns, and after a while, this just becomes [her] life, and [she] kind of accepts it … That's what happened to a lot of these girls.' … If they don't adjust or try to escape, Mr. Burrus said, 'the pimps say, "Okay you want to break away? I'll kill your mom," or "I know you have a sister who's 8, and I'll go to her school, and I'll rip her head off."'"

DOJ_NMG_0018388

The AP (3/20) reports on The Blade story, noting "The FBI assigned 16 new agents to the investigation, and the agency is hiring six more this year. The FBI says the interstate ring is organized crime, equating it to drug trafficking. Many of the girls came from backgrounds of abuse or incest, and the pimps conditioned them through abuse and threats against family members to accept their fate, said Chip Burrus."

Corruption Probe Shuts Down Texas Town's Police Force. The Los Angeles Times (3/20, Hart) reports, "It happened without warning. The FBI swooped in, shut down Troup (TX)'s five-man police force and jailed the chief and a sergeant — the 2005 Chamber of Commerce officer of the year, no less — on charges of corruption. " The Times continues, "Startled residents watched in silence as authorities secured the tiny station with yellow crime-scene tape and swarmed the building for evidence. … Sgt. Mark Turner, 47, was charged with delivering marijuana and tampering with or fabricating evidence. According to a search warrant, Turner gave marijuana to an undercover agent, assuring him later that there was more where that came from: the police evidence box. " The Times adds, "Police Chief Chester Kennedy, who led the force for 14 years, also was charged with evidence tampering. He admitted to investigators that he gave Turner 24 cans of light beer from a 30-pack seized in a bootlegging case, but said he planned to buy more if the case went to court. 'Beer is beer,' he said, according to a Sheriff's Department affidavit. … Events unfolded so quickly here that, weeks after the March 3 raid, stunned residents are still talking about it when they meet on the street. Some, however, are less surprised; rumors of police misconduct had circulated for years. … Here in rural East Texas, methamphetamine labs can operate unnoticed. Misdemeanor drug charges in Smith County, about 100 miles southeast of Dallas, are as common as drunk driving arrests, Dist. Atty. Matt Bingham said. But in the last six years, the Troup police force sent just 11 drug cases to the district attorney's office. … Maj. Mike Lusk, head of criminal investigations for the Smith County Sheriff's Department, said Troup police had sent a total of two drug evidence samples to the Texas Department of Public Safety crime lab since 2000."

Child Services Workers Facing More Danger. The New York Times/AP (3/20) reports that "threats are a daily part of the job for caseworkers who investigate accusations of child abuse and neglect and often remove children from their homes. But the killing of a social worker in South Texas last week has prompted" some caseworkers "to re-evaluate the steps they take to keep safe and has raised questions about what the state can do to better protect them." The family of the social worker "who was killed last week, Sally Blackwell," said she "had received threats in her position as program director, overseeing several offices of caseworkers. The authorities have ruled the case a homicide but have not said whether her death was related to her job."

Friends, Family Of Slain Man Question Sheriff's Account Of Shooting. The Washington Post (3/20, B1, Davenport) reports the "22-year-old Oxon Hill man fatally shot by a Charles County sheriff's deputy Saturday morning had drawn a handgun and fired it while three deputies were trying to arrest him on a drunken driving charge, the sheriff's office said yesterday." But the "friends and relatives of the suspect, Jonathon Lyles, offered a starkly different view. They questioned whether Lyles had a gun and said officers targeted him because he was a young African American man who had had previous run-ins with police."

Victim Of Priest Abuse Returns To Face Past. The Washington Post (3/20, B1, Murphy) profiles Michael Donovan, a "63-year-old Vietnam veteran and retired businessman from California" who visited Washington "on a mission into his past, a mission to banish his own anger and regain control." Almost "50 years ago, during Donovan's eighth-grade spring break, he was sexually abused" at Holy Name School "by Thomas S. Schaefer, then a 30-year-old, newly minted Roman Catholic priest. Schaefer went on to molest at least 20 more boys in the Washington Archdiocese, according to church officials, before pleading guilty in 1995 in five of those cases." In 2003, "determined to be counted in a national survey of the church's abuse problem, he informed the archdiocese of Schaefer's 1956 misconduct. He learned then that he was Schaefer's earliest known victim."

DOJ_NMG_0018389

Supreme Court To Hear Cases Crucial To Domestic Violence Prosecutions. In a New York Times op-ed (3/20), attorneys Michael Rips and Amy Lester say the Supreme Court is hearing two cases, Davis v. Washington and Hammon v. Indiana, "that may make domestic violence cases all but impossible to prosecute." The question is "whether statements made to 911 operators can be admitted in prosecutions if those who made the calls refuse to appear in court. Such evidence has become crucial in bringing domestic abusers to justice." In the 1980's and 1990's, "the refusal of victims to cooperate in the prosecution of their batterers may have resulted in the dismissal of as many as 70 percent of all domestic violence cases." Now, authorities "have developed techniques, together known as 'evidence-based prosecution,' that focus on the use of reliable evidence, like 911 tapes, to build cases that do not depend on the cooperation of the victim." But a "significant number of courts have interpreted" another case, Crawford vs. Washington, "to bar the use of 911 tapes and answers to questions posed by police officers unless the witness is available for cross-examination. In so doing, they've overturned convictions in cases of domestic battery."

CIVIL LAW:

Google Gets Win On Government's Subpoena For Web Search Data. The Wall Street Journal (3/20) reports Federal judge James Ware "ruled Google Inc. doesn't have to turn over data about consumer Web-search queries to the Justice Department." Judge Ware "on Friday ordered Google to work with the government to provide 50,000 randomly selected addresses for Web sites from its databases. He denied a request by government lawyers for a sampling of 5,000 search queries entered by Google users, concluding that they essentially duplicated information the government could glean from the Web addresses." In a statement, Google said, "This is a clear victory for our users."

Chicago Alderman Seeks To Close Smoking Ban Loophole. The Washington Post (3/20, A3, Lydersen) reports Marshall McGearty Tobacco Artisans is "a 'tobacco lounge' that has opened in Chicago's trendy Wicker Park neighborhood. It appears every bit the bar or coffeehouse. But appearances can be deceiving: Marshall McGearty is technically a tobacco retail shop with at least 65 percent of its sales in tobacco. And that means it is exempt from Chicago's new ban on smoking in bars, restaurants and other public places." Critics "say the parent company of the lounge, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., is taking advantage of a loophole in the city's anti-smoking ordinance." Last month, "city Alderman Edward M. Burke introduced an ordinance to close the loophole in the smoking ban, stating that venues that serve food and drink cannot be classified as tobacco retail stores."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Oakland Nearly Finished Paying Out Over War Protestors' Injuries. The New York Times (3/20, Marshall) reports, "A clash between the police and antiwar protesters (in Oakland, CA) nearly three years ago will cost the City of Oakland more than $2 million, including dozens of payouts to people injured when officers fired wooden dowels, bean bags and rubber pellets." The Times continues, "The Oakland City Council is scheduled Tuesday to approve the final payments related to the incident, which was the most violent of many protests nationwide in the early weeks of the Iraq war. At least 58 people were injured, including nine longshoremen who were caught in the crossfire on their way to work." The Times adds, "The Oakland Police Department said officers had fired the 'less than lethal' rounds to disperse several hundred demonstrators, some of whom the police said had thrown rocks at them. … The protesters said they had been behaving peacefully and accused the police of using excessive force. A lawsuit against the city, the Police Department and several officers, which led to the settlement payments, accused the authorities of civil rights violations. … Many here say the officers were on edge during the protest because state officials had warned that terrorists or self-described anarchists might try to disrupt the event, which was held at the Port of Oakland on April 7, 2003."

Studies Warn Of Difficult Plight For Black Men In US. Several new studies from Columbia, Harvard, Princeton and other institutions warn that black men in the US face a more difficult situation than is portrayed by employment and education statistics. The New York Times (3/20, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports, "Focusing more closely than ever on the life patterns of young black men, the new studies…show that the huge pool of poorly educated black men are becoming ever more disconnected from the mainstream society, and to a far greater degree than comparable white or Hispanic men. … Although the problems afflicting poor black men have been known for decades, the new data paint a more extensive and sobering picture of the challenges they face."

DOJ_NMG_0018390

Schools Called Front Line In Culture War Over Homosexuality. Charles C. Haynes, a senior scholar at the First Amendment Center in Arlington, Va., writes in USA Today (3/20, 2.31M) that schools "have become front lines in the culture war over homosexuality -- and the biggest losers are the kids caught in the crossfire of incendiary rhetoric and bitter lawsuits." Conflicts involving sexual orientation "are undermining the educational mission of our schools." Haynes adds, "When they begin to listen to one another, most educators, parents and students discover that they want the same thing: public schools that are safe and free for all students. … Once these shared goals are identified, people are ready to tackle other contentious issues such as gay student clubs and the treatment of sexual orientation in the curriculum." If "people on all sides uphold the rights and responsibilities of the First Amendment, they can agree on policies and practices that serve the common good."

ANTITRUST:

Zurich American To Pay $171.7 Million In Bid Rigging Case. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, Pleven) reports Zurich American Insurance Co. "agreed to pay $171.7 million in a settlement with nine states that have been investigating allegations of bid rigging in the commercial-insurance business." The firm, "a unit of Zurich Financial Services of Switzerland, will pay more than $150 million to reimburse policyholders and another $20 million will go to the states to cover investigative and other costs and as payments in lieu of penalties, according to the states."

UK Insurer Prudential PLC Rejects Aviva Takeover Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, A3, Fleming, Wang) reports, "In what is likely to prove the first round in a long-running takeover battle that could affect insurance markets world-wide, United Kingdom life insurer Prudential PLC Saturday rejected an unsolicited £17 billion ($29.87 billion) takeover proposal from larger rival Aviva PLC. Prudential, which isn't related to Newark, N.J., insurer Prudential Financial Inc. but is active in the U.S. through its subsidiary Jackson National Life Insurance Co. of Lansing, Mich., said Saturday it had received a proposal from Aviva about a possible combination of the two London companies. In a statement, Prudential said it had rejected the proposal as not in the best interests of its shareholders." The Journal notes, "People with knowledge of Aviva's overture said the initial proposal was an all-share offer that valued Prudential at about £17 billion, a 6.25% premium to the group's market value. … Although Aviva might improve the proposed terms," Richard Harvey, the company's chief executive, "is seen as unlikely to launch an overtly hostile bid."

Study Of Corporate Takeovers Finds Widespread UK Market Improprieties. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, C4, Patrick) reports, "The U.K. market regulator said it has found widespread signs of improper share-price moves before corporate takeovers are announced. In an effort to assess the deterrent effects of its regulations, the Financial Services Authority studied 1,500 market announcements on takeover bids and company results in various time periods over the past eight years. The researchers found that price movements from nonpublic information may have taken place before 29% of the takeover announcements and before 22% of the trading updates." The Times adds, "The implementation of the Financial Services & Markets Act in 2001, which toughened sanctions for individuals caught insider trading as well as the disclosure requirements for companies, had no apparent change in market cleanliness. … 'The analysis shows that there was no improvement in market cleanliness in the period after the introduction of the FSA's new powers, and before any high-profile enforcement cases were concluded,' said Hector Sants, the FSA's managing director. 'This suggests that visible enforcement action may be the key tool in our work to reduce market abuse,' he said."

Roche, Amgen Engaged In Fierce Lobbying Battle Over Patents. The Roll Call (3/20, Ackley) reports a "furious lobbying effort between F. Hoffmann-La Roche and Amgen Inc. has fueled big spending on K Street and led to both drugmakers hiring heavy-hitting firms and high-profile former government officials." Roche is "pushing for a patent-law change that lobbyists close to the debate say could make it possible for the Swiss-based company to get approval and eventually market in the United States a competing product to Amgen's renal disease treatment, Epogen." Lobbyists "familiar with both sides' strategies now agree that the battle will have much wider implications on patent policy." Sources say Roche has "tapped a bipartisan team that includes Mickey Kantor, the former U.S. trade representative and Commerce secretary under former President Bill Clinton, and Ted Olson, the former U.S. solicitor general in the current Bush administration." Amgen "upped its lobbying spending during the last six months of 2005, after the biotech firm became aware of Roche's quiet lobbying push. Between the first and second halves of 2005, Amgen spending rose by $1 million, from $2.4 million to $3.3 million, according to public filings."

DOJ_NMG_0018391

Supreme Court Patent Case Could Have Far-Reaching Implications. The New York Times (3/20, Pollack) reports for the "first time in a quarter-century, the Supreme Court will hear on Tuesday a case involving the basic question of what type of discoveries and inventions can be patented." Both sides "say the case, which involves a blood test for a vitamin deficiency, could have a wide-ranging impact on the development of diagnostics, perhaps threatening many of the underlying patents for genetic and other medical tests." But the "array of companies filing supporting briefs — including American Express, Bear Stearns and I.B.M. — indicates that intellectual property in other fields might also be affected." Some patent specialists "say they think the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case, against the advice of the United States solicitor general, to rein in patenting."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Kempthorne Known To Work With Those Who Disagree With Him. The Christian Science Monitor (3/20, Knickerbocker, 61K) profiles Interior Secretary nominee Dirk Kempthorne, saying he "has both the experience and the record of collaboration that could help smooth the way in the often-contentious position." Kempthorne "is known to work in concert with those who don't agree with him. He believes that the level of government closest to a problem is the best place to find a solution. And though his environmental record - according to those who score such things - is a pale shade of green, he is not a fire-breathing ideologue likely to dismiss endangered species in the name of corporate ranching or a new highway." The Monitor adds that "the Bush administration and Kempthorne face battles over many issues: development in roadless forest areas; salvage logging of burned timber; the proposed sale of some federal land to lessen the federal budget deficit; changes to the Endangered Species Act; a huge backlog in national parks maintenance; oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and the Outer Continental Shelf; and protections for grizzly bears, wolves, and other recovering species."

Firm Offers DOE Space To Store Spent Fuel. The New York Times (3/20, Wald, 1.19M) reports that Private Fuel Storage "is planning to build a private nuclear waste dump on an Indian reservation in Utah has offered to sell space there to the federal government. The move could help the government avoid billions of dollars in potential legal damages over its failure to build its own repository." The Times adds that while PFS recently "won a license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to open a repository at Skull Valley," the consortium does "not have the permits it needs to transport waste to the site, however, and the State of Utah is trying to block those."

Offshore Drilling Advocates Push Revenue Sharing Plan. USA Today (3/20, Dorell, 2.31M) reports that creators of a new campaign to push drilling for oil along the US coasts "say the time is right to get it done. And they say they've come up with a way of doing it that has statehouses, U.S. industry and even some notable environmental groups on board. … The proposal is simple: States that open their territory to drilling will get a cut of the royalties that currently go 100% to the federal government. A specified chunk of royalties must be spent restoring coastlines." Former Louisiana senator John Breaux, a lobbyist for Patton Boggs, "is hoping to build interest." Breaux "is working on a volunteer basis for the state of Louisiana to give it a share of the royalties from oil and gas off its shores. He's working with a coalition of manufacturers, municipalities and energy companies to bring attention to the plan."

Court Rules Older Sites Must Meet Same Emission Requirements As New Facilities. A US appeals court ruling that aging power plants and industrial sites must meet the same federal pollution standards as new plants may force the EPA to insist that industrial sites upgrade the facilities. The Christian Science Monitor (3/20, Clayton, 61K) calls the ruling "a repudiation of EPA policy under the Bush administration, which sought to exempt plants that predated the 1970 Clean Air Act from compliance with the tougher air-emission standards. It was cheered by environmentalists - especially those who live and work near such power plants. … The ruling could prompt some big utility companies to upgrade pollution controls at the oldest, most polluting power plants, or shut them down." The EPA "could appeal the decision to the US Supreme Court."

DOJ_NMG_0018392

Interior Department Urged To Endorse Settlement On North Carolina Road Project. An editorial in the New York Times (3/20, 1.19M) urges the Interior Department to "resist Representative Charles Taylor of North Carolina" who is proposing $600 million on a road "that few people want and nobody needs." Taylor "runs the subcommittee that controls the Interior Department's budget. For that reason, neither the park service nor Interior's outgoing secretary, Gale Norton, has publicly criticized the idea. But there is more at stake here than pleasing one's paymaster. The road would not only blow a hole in the department's budget; it would also leave a scar on one of the most popular national parks." The road "was promised to the residents of Swain County in 1943 when the Tennessee Valley Authority built a major hydroelectric dam, creating the lake and flooding out an existing road. … A cash settlement of $52 million has been proposed." The Journal says the settlement is "fair, and it won't do lasting damage. Interior should endorse the settlement."

Law Firms Rolling Dice On Indian Law. The New Jersey Law Journal (3/20, Toutant) reports, "Native American law, long a well-established practice area west of the Mississippi, is gaining ground at eastern law firms as tribes displaced in the 19th century seek to reclaim ancestral lands -- and make them instantly profitable." The Journal continues, "After the successful land-claim settlement by the Mashantucket Pequot Tribe in Connecticut, which led to the opening of Foxwoods Resort Casino in 1992, and the Mohegan Tribe's acquisition of land in nearby Uncasville, Conn., for the Mohegan Sun Casino, other tribes have started bringing land-claim suits, and law firms are lining up to help them." The Journal adds, "While tribes' finances are short and the odds of prevailing long, there are still legal fees to be generated. That's because there are casino developers willing to underwrite the tribes' legal costs on the chance that they'll obtain a new site for gaming, say Indian law experts. … 'Part of what's going on these days in Indian country is there are certain forces that are trying to unearth potential claims that might be made to re-establish a tribal homeland and ultimately establish a casino,' says Robert Odawi Porter, director of the Syracuse University Center for Indigenous Law, Governance and Citizenship. … In cases where land-claim suits are funded by outsiders, the tribe is usually a passive participant in the litigation, says Porter. Such arrangements are permitted under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act of 1988, which gives states authority to negotiate revenue-sharing agreements with tribal casinos. … But the process is arduous. Last June, the Shinnecock Indian Nation of Long Island filed a claim for 3,600 acres in the exclusive Hamptons resort area that it says belonged to its ancestors. The casino plan is opposed by New York's governor and senators, as well as by residents of the Hamptons. The tribe's costs are being underwritten by Michigan casino developers Marian Ilitch and Michael Malik. Ilitch, founder of the Little Caesars pizza chain, owns the Motor City casino in Detroit. She and Malik are also building an Indian casino in Barstow, Calif."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Funding Constraints Leave New York FBI Agents Without Email, BlackBerrys. The New York Daily News (3/20, Connor, 729K) reports that "many of New York's FBI agents are fighting crime and terrorists without an Internet-ready phone or even an e-mail account, the New York Daily News has learned," and only about 100 have BlackBerrys under a pilot program, the funding for which also is threatened. Assistant Director Mark Mershon "blamed the technology gap on Washington budget constraints. … 'And as ridiculous as this might sound, we have real money issues right now, and the government is reluctant to give all agents and analysts dot-gov accounts,' he said when asked about the gap at a News editorial board meeting. … FBI officials in Washington…insisted that agents are not at a disadvantage because of cost-cutting. Spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan said about half the FBI employees don't have official accounts because e-mail addresses are still being assigned," but "by the end of the year, the entire bureau should have dot-gov mailboxes, she said." The AP (3/20) reports on the Daily News story.

DOJ_NMG_0018393

NYDaily News Criticizes Lack Of Email Addresses, Blackberrys. Under the headline "FBI Terror Fighters Need Modern Tools," The New York Daily News (3/20, 729K) editorializes, "To say there's not enough money in a $2.5 trillion federal budget to give FBI agents e-mail addresses is patently absurd. Which is why headquarters now says everyone will have official e-mail by the end of the year. That must happen." The Daily News adds, "Every business executive in the country has a BlackBerry. Every assistant to every business executive and every law enforcement agency with which the FBI communicates has BlackBerrys. People who want to blow up the Brooklyn Bridge probably have BlackBerrys. Think this is outrageous? E-mail your congressional representative. Which you can, because Congress has e-mail. And BlackBerrys."

12 Face Charges In California For Making Marijuana-Laced Candy, Soda. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Romney) reports, "A dozen Bay Area residents appeared in federal court Friday on marijuana cultivation and distribution charges in connection with a large-scale operation to make pot-laced candy bars and sodas. … Though the packaging evokes the irreverent Wacky Pack stickers of years past by mocking trademarked products, federal officials say the psychoactive goods are no joke. 'The packaging is so similar to that of the name brand, it has the potential to fall in the hands of children, with potentially tragic consequences,' DEA spokeswoman Casey McEnry said."

The San Francisco Chronicle (3/18, Lee) reports the sweets "had colorful labels and names such as Trippy, Stoney Rancher, Toka-Cola, Pot Tart and Budtella. To federal drug agents, they were dangerous marijuana-laced concoctions that could fall into the hands of children. But to sick patients who rely on cannabis to ease their symptoms, they were just tasty ways to get their medicine -- and legal under California law."

The Contra Costa Times (3/18, Simerman) writes, "A day after federal agents seized thousands of marijuana plants and a booty of pot-laced candy and soda pop in raids on warehouses in Emeryville and Oakland, local medical cannabis advocates reacted coolly -- bitter at another federal plunder on a substance the state deems legal for the sick, but leery of an operation that packaged its products to mimic popular brands of sweets."

Eight New Jersey Residents Accused Of Running "Major" Heroin Ring. The Hoboken (NJ) Reporter (3/19) writes, "Hudson County Prosecutor Edward DeFazio and the Hoboken Police Department have arrested eight Hudson County residents for running a major heroin ring. According to Prosecutor Edward DeFazio, the arrests were the result of a six-month investigation by the Hudson County Prosecutor's Office Municipal Task Force, Hoboken Police Department, and the Drug Enforcement Administration. … The searches resulted in the recovery of 22,000 bags of heroin from 'a sophisticated hidden compartment' in a Ford Explorer."

Attorney Accuses DEA Of "Lukewarm" Response To Death Threat. The New York Times (3/20, Mead) reports in its "New York/Region" section that attorney Thomas Liotti "has been branded a big mouth for his self-promotion and propensity to tongue-lash prosecutors, police officers and even judges. … In a press release on Wednesday…he also criticized the federal Drug Enforcement Agency for what he called its lukewarm response to a death threat against lawyers who defend Colombian drug traffickers. 'I want the U.S. government to realize that they have a responsibility to protect everyone, even criminal defense lawyers,' he said."

Detroit Drug Dealers Said To Be Infiltrating West Virginia Town. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/19, Simonich) writes, "Connections between Detroit and rural America remain strong, but nobody romanticizes about them anymore. Detroit doesn't export cars the way it used to. Instead, say police across the region, it turns out drug dealers who travel hundreds of miles to enrich themselves in smaller towns." The Post-Gazette says in Huntington, West Virginia, detectives have a list with more than 250 names of crack dealers.

Washington Post Profiles "Prince Of Pot". The Washington Post (3/18, C1, Struck) profiles March Emery known as the "Prince of Pot," who the Post says Canadians find harmless, but the DEA does not. According to the Post, Emery said, "'I sold millions of [marijuana] seeds proudly to people all over the world," and perhaps 70 percent of them were mailed to the United States, he concedes. "Everything the DEA said is correct -- except I don't buy the charge that I'm poisoning children of America.'"

DOJ_NMG_0018394

Poppy Crops Said To Threaten Afghan Democracy. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (3/18, Dine) reports that "poppies are invaluable cash crops to farmers seeking to sustain their families, but dangerous to a young Afghan democracy. An unholy alliance is emerging among farmers, drug lords, Taliban remnants and al-Qaida fighters," and "drugs are already the nation's sole export of any magnitude." They "threaten to turn it into a 'narco-state,'" and "Afghan sources say" al-Qaida "has acknowledged in private sessions its satisfaction that expanding heroin use is poisoning 'infidels' in other countries."

Taliban Rebels Said To Be Teaming Up With Drug Lords. The Washington Times (3/18, Duparcq) has included an AFP story on its "World" section that is similar to a story included in a previous briefing. The AFP writes, "Taliban rebels determined to keep southern Afghanistan in chaos have teamed up with drug barons against the government and its opium eradication campaign."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney Downplays Calls For Staff Changes At White House. Asked on CBS' Face the Nation (3/19) by anchor Bob Schieffer about commentators who have said "you need a staff shake-up over at the White House," Vice President Cheney said, "Bob, you know what this reminds me of? It reminds me of 30 years ago when I was Gerry Ford's chief of staff and you were the CBS correspondent covering the White House. … We had the same kind of stories then, the same kinds of controversy. Administrations go through peaks and valleys. It's a tough business that we're involved in, and when you're down in the polls you're going to take shots that you don't deserve, and when you're up in the polls you're probably going to get praise you don't deserve. So I don't think we can pay any attention to that kind of thing. … [President Bush has] got great people around him, and I simply don't give credence to those kinds of comments." Cheney added the "notion that somehow the staff is exhausted -- these are tough jobs, no question about it. But we've got some very good, very able, very talented folks, who are devoted to the president, devoted to trying to do what's right for the country."

In what the AP (3/19, ,Daniel) calls a "rare Sunday morning television interview," Cheney also said again that he will not seek the presidency in 2008 and he "chuckled when asked if he himself had ever considered resigning amid low poll numbers and suggestions by commentators that he was a liability for the administration."

Cheney Has No Plans To Resign. Asked on CBS' Face the Nation (3/19, Schieffer) if he has considered resigning to shield the Administration from unpopular polices or events, Vice President Cheney said, "Well, I made sure both in 2000 and 2004 that the President had other options. I mean, I didn't ask for this job. I didn't campaign for it. I got drafted. And delighted to serve. And it's been the highlight of my career, to be part of this Administration. I've now been elected to a second term; I'll serve out my term."

Murtha Says Rumsfeld, Cheney Should Resign. On NBC's Meet the Press (3/19, Russert), Democratic Rep. John Murtha said President Bush should fire some of the aides responsible for the Administration's mistakes in Iraq, saying Defense Secretary Rumsfeld "should offer his resignation" and "I would accept it." Asked if Vice President Cheney should resign, Murtha said, "Yeah. Well, certainly the Vice President has been the primary force in running, running this war, and many of the mischaracterizations have come about."

Cheney Says He Can Give Bush "Untainted" Advice. The Washington Times (3/20, Hudson, 90K) reports that Cheney's "lack of political ambition to succeed his boss gives him unusual freedom to be a lightning rod for contentious issues and serve as an 'untainted' adviser to the president," he said yesterday. Speaking on CBS' Face the Nation, Cheney said, "This has been a different kind of arrangement than most administrations have between the president and the vice president, primarily because I'm here to serve him; I'm not here to run for higher office," adding, "My advice to him is untainted by any concern I might have about how the folks in Iowa look at me with connection with the 2008 Iowa caucuses."

Barnes Suggests Personnel Changes For Bush Administration. Fred Barnes writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M) that President Bush "can start the equivalent of his third term now, by filling his presidential staff and cabinet with new faces -- or old faces in new positions -- and by concentrating on new or forgotten initiatives. The goal: rejuvenation of his presidency by shocking the media and political community with a sweeping overhaul of his administration." Barnes adds that Vice President Dick Cheney should resign so Bush can appoint Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice as his "presidential successor." Rice, writes Barnes, should be replaced as Secretary of state by Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut. Barnes also writes that Cheney should "move to the Pentagon to replace Donald Rumsfeld as defense secretary." In addition, Barnes recommends Glen Hubbard to replace Treasury Secretary John Snow. Barnes adds that white House Deputy chief of staff Karl Rove should be sent "to the Republican National Committee as chairman," and current chairman Ken Mehlman should be brought "back to the president's staff as communications chief."

DOJ_NMG_0018395

Bush Has Been Taking More Questions From Audiences. The New York Times (3/20, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports in its "White House Letter" column that at the "Riderwood Village retirement community last week in the Washington suburb of Silver Spring, Md.," President Bush "got hit with hardballs by the crowd of 80-somethings. Not only did the retirees, many of them Democrats and former government officials, ask sharp questions about the day's topic, the Medicare prescription drug program, they took on Mr. Bush on global warming and nuclear war." The Times notes that "in the last three months, Mr. Bush has started taking questions, some of them tough, from audiences not stacked with supporters."

Cheney Discusses Hunting Accident. On CBS' Face the Nation (3/19, Schieffer), Vice President Cheney discussed the hunting accident where he shot prominent Texas Republican lawyer Harry Whittington. Cheney said, "Well, I think it's one of those situation or circumstances that is obviously difficult and generates controversy. It's probably the first time the Secret Service ever had to worry about a protectee shooting somebody else instead of being shot at. As the President said the other night, he's at 38 percent in the polls and as a result of this incident I shot the only trial lawyer in Texas who supported him. So people can laugh about it now, but at the time it was deadly serious."

House Expected To Be In Session Only 97 Days This Year. USA Today (3/20, Kiely, 2.31M) reports the House "is on track this year to be in session for fewer days than the Congress Harry Truman labeled as 'do-nothing' during his 1948 re-election campaign." Congress is "taking an entire week off for St. Patrick's Day. It's the latest scheduling innovation to give members more time to meet with constituents." The House "was in session for 19 days, compared with 33 for the Senate. If they stick to their current schedule — including two weeks off in April, a week in May and July, plus all of August — House members will spend 97 days in Washington this year." The House "was in session 108 days in 1948, according to the chamber's archives, compared with 141 days last year."

Republicans Unable To Craft Unified Political, Policy Agenda. The Washington Post (3/20, A1, Balz, Weisman, 744K) reports in a front page story, "Republican efforts to craft a policy and political agenda to carry the party into the midterm elections have stumbled repeatedly as GOP leaders face widespread disaffection and disagreement within the ranks." Lawmakers "involved in the effort" said "anxiety over President Bush's Iraq policy, internal clashes over such divisive issues as immigration, and rising complaints that the party has abandoned conservative principles on spending restraint have all hobbled" the project. While it is "a Republican refrain that Democrats criticize Bush but have no positive vision, for now the governing party also has no national platform around which lawmakers are prepared to rally. Every effort so far to produce such a platform has stumbled." The struggles "reflect philosophical differences among competing factions within the party, but they also underscore the political consequences of holding power. Republicans insist they remain united around core principles of smaller government, lower taxes and a strong national defense, but can no longer agree on how to implement that philosophy and are squabbling over their delivery on those commitments."

Novak Says GOP Lawmakers Attempting "Trial Separation" From Bush. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (3/20) writes, "'Presidents come and go,' Rep. Jerry Lewis told the House Rules Committee last Wednesday. That was a reason Lewis gave, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, for opposing President Bush's proposed line-item veto." Lewis' opposition, along with "similar acts of opposition to" Bush "by Republicans in Congress," is not a "rebellion and is not even a divorce. Rather, it is a trial separation of congressional Republicans from their president." Novak adds, "One of the president's top political operatives is telling the party's members of Congress that they should support Bush, not out of loyalty but for self-preservation. In 1952, Democrats in Congress, accustomed to more than 20 years in power, thought they could survive by separating themselves from" President Harry Truman, whose approval rating was suffering in large part to the "military stalemate in Korea." But "Republicans swept the November elections, which might be an object lesson about abandonment of their president."

DOJ_NMG_0018396

Senate Voted Against Social Security Accounts Last Week. Roll Call (3/20, Pierce) reports that in a "little-noticed vote last Thursday, the Senate went on record, apparently for the first time, against President Bush's proposal to set up personal investment accounts under Social Security, with some unexpected Republicans helping a unified Democratic Caucus defeat the nonbinding proposal." Eight Republicans "joined all 45 Democrats in opposing" an amendment by Sen. Jim DeMint, "which would have directed the creation of a reserve fund for Social Security, but only after the Senate produced legislation allowing younger workers to divert a portion of their Social Security taxes into personal investment accounts or permitting some other type of 'legally binding ownership' of a worker's Social Security money." The Republican centrist votes "in opposition — including Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.), Susan Collins (Maine), Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Olympia Snowe (Maine) — were hardly a surprise. But the amendment also forced the hands of some less likely Republican opponents, including Sens. Conrad Burns (Mont.), Pete Domenici (N.M.), Dick Lugar (Ind.) and Jim Talent (Mo.) — who have typically been more loyal to the GOP leadership."

The Washington Times (3/20, Fagan, 90K) reports Republicans "raised the issue of Social Security reform, and Democrats -- surprised that the issue won't go away -- pledged to make it a major campaign issue this year." Sen. Charles Schumer said, "It's going to be one of the big issues in 2006. They just gave us more fuel." The Times adds Schumer "pledged to tell voters that electing a Democratic Senate is the only way to 'make sure Social Security isn't privatized.'" But Democrats "aren't the only ones who see a campaign issue." Sen. DeMint said, "Those who voted against this amendment voted to raid Social Security. Now, every senator will be on record whether they oppose or support the raid."

MZM Founder Used Several Tools To Win Lucrative Federal Contracts. The Washington Post (3/20, D1, Babcock, Merle, 744K) reports the "recent corruption conviction of former congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham – and" MZM company owner Mitchell Wade's "recent guilty plea for bribing him -- focused attention on Congress's practice of 'earmarking,' or setting aside, federal money for favored interests." But a "review of the rise and fall of Wade and his company, based on interviews and MZM and government documents, shows that bribing Cunningham was only one part of Wade's formula for success. His firm, which had no prime federal contracts in fiscal 2002, collected more than $170 million over the next three years, thanks not just to Cunningham, but also to Wade's ability to take practices common among government contractors and push them to the limit." In a "tight labor market, he paid well above the going rate for workers with security clearances -- wages that left others in the government contracting industry puzzled." He "freely distributed title and rank," and he "aggressively used the 'revolving door' between the government's defense and intelligence bureaucracy and the private industry, attracting top talent and often sending' new hires back to work on contracts at their former agencies and to try to cultivate new business."

E-Mail Uses TSP's Name In Credit Card Scam. The Washington Post (3/20, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Last week's scare at the Thrift Savings Plan is an opportunity to offer this reminder: Do not click on Web links in unsolicited e-mails. Someone, or some group, operating from somewhere, took advantage of the TSP's trusted name in a scam to rip off credit card and bank accounts. The scheme was built around a fictional TSP e-mail and a bogus TSP Web site. … TSP officials have no tally of how many people got the phony e-mail or how many responded and turned over personal financial information. Although it appears that many of the e-mails went to government employees and retirees, TSP officials said they have been contacted by persons who are not TSP enrollees. Some people did fall for the scheme, the officials said."

Krugman Dismisses Notion That Bush Is Big Spender. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (3/20, 1.19M) that "most of the conservatives now rushing to distance themselves from Mr. Bush still can't bring themselves to criticize his actual policies. Instead, they accuse him of policy sins — in particular, of being a big spender on domestic programs — that he has not, in fact, committed. … So where does the notion of Bush the big spender come from? In a direct sense it comes largely from Brian Riedl of the Heritage Foundation, who issued a report last fall alleging that government spending was out of control." Conservatives "fall for the Heritage spin" because it "suits their purposes. They need to repudiate George W. Bush, but they can't admit that when Mr. Bush made his key mistakes — starting an unnecessary war, and using dishonest numbers to justify tax cuts — they were cheering him on."

DOJ_NMG_0018397

Hebert Criticizes Proposed Cuts In Cancer Detection Program. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (3/20, 1.19M), "The federal government has a national breast and cervical cancer early detection program, run by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. It provides screening and other important services to low-income women who do not have health insurance, or are underinsured. … At the moment there is only enough funding to screen one in five eligible women. A sensible policy position for the Bush administration would be to expand funding for the program so that it reached everyone who was eligible. It terms of overall federal spending, the result would be a net decrease. … So what did this president do? He proposed a cut in the program of $1.4 million (a minuscule amount when you're talking about the national budget), which would mean that 4,000 fewer women would have access to early detection. This makes no sense. In human terms, it is cruel. From a budget standpoint, it's self-defeating."

WPost Criticizes FCC Ruling On Scorsese Documentary. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/20, A14, 744K) criticizes the FCC's decision that the Martin Scorsese-produced documentary, "The Blues: Godfathers and Sons," which includes scenes in which "musicians and a producer used numerous profanities," did not satisfy the standard that it set in its decision on that "profanity in 'Saving Private Ryan,' that "'in rare contexts, language that is presumptively profane' will still be allowed 'where it is demonstrably essential to the nature of an artistic or educational work or essential to informing viewers on a matter of public importance.'" The Post continues, "How do they know better than, say, Mr. Scorsese? … This is a dangerous kind of line-drawing -- one better left to filmmakers, or even television executives, than government bureaucrats."

GOP Unity Said To Have "Fallen Apart." Newsweek (3/27, Wolffe, Bailey) reports that the Republican Party's unity has "fallen apart." Lawmakers "have lost faith in the president's political touch." GOP candidates "are uncertain how to pull themselves together in the eight months left before the elections. The toughest question: whether to run, as they have in the past, as W Republicans, or to airbrush the president out of their campaigns." Newsweek adds, "Bush's aides say that it would be suicidal for members to run away from the president. In strategy memos circulated on the Hill, Republican National Committee pollsters argue that disunity will only discourage the base from turning out to vote. But even the party's analysts concede that standing shoulder to shoulder with Bush may not always be the best way to win."

Newsweek Poll Finds Bush Approval Rating At 36%. Newsweek (3/27, Wolffe, Bailey) reports that President Bush "recorded his lowest approval rating in the NEWSWEEK Poll, with 36 percent; congressional Republicans trailed Democrats by 11 points (39 to 50 percent)."

OTHER NEWS:

Snow Says Americans Broadly Sharing In Economic Expansion. In an interview last week, Treasury Secretary John Snow told the Wall Street Journal (3/20, Ip, 2.11M) that "the widening gap between high-paid and low-paid Americans reflects a labor market efficiently rewarding more-productive people. But he insisted Americans are still broadly sharing in the economic expansion." Snow "said the administration intends to publicly challenge perceptions that typical workers and families haven't benefited much from the economic expansion. The extent to which the expansion has been broadly shared is 'the new sort of battle line in the political arena,' he said." The Journal adds, "Mr. Snow distributed a fact sheet that showed after-tax income per person, adjusted for inflation, rose 8.2% from January 2001, when George W. Bush took office as president, through January 2006. The sheet also showed that per-person net worth -- total assets minus debt -- rose 24%, unadjusted for inflation, from early 2001 to the end of 2005."

Slowing Housing Market Could Ripple Through Economy. USA Today (3/20, Hagenbaugh, Knox, 2.31M) reports that during the boom years, thousands of Americans sought work in the real estate industry. Now, as the housing market slows, "there will likely be a lot of stories of people who are bailing out of their real estate jobs and other professions related to housing -- appraisers, mortgage brokers and home construction workers -- and many not by choice. This could send shock waves through the job market and the economy." USA notes, "Almost four out of every 10 jobs created in the past four years were in housing-related fields. At the end of last year, a record 9.8% of U.S. workers were employed in the real estate industry, up from 8.2% a decade ago, according to Moody's Economy.com. Only the health care industry added more jobs. … Existing home sales fell in January for the fifth month in a row, and home builders Toll Bros. and KB Home say more buyers are canceling their orders. In all, home sales are expected to fall 8% from last year's record, according to a group of economists surveyed by USA TODAY in January."

DOJ_NMG_0018398

Medicare Drug Plan Is Growing Issue In Congressional Races. Roll Call (3/20) reports that over the St. Patrick's Day recess, Republicans "are aggressively touting" the Medicare prescription drug program "while responding to criticism from Democrats — and, apparently, from many senior citizens — that the plan is too complex and offers too few benefits." And "building on Democratic efforts to stoke the issue back home, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has unveiled an effort to boost challengers in key 2006 House contests by focusing on the drug benefit. The targeted districts so far include seats held by Republican Reps. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Heather Wilson (N.M.), Steve Chabot (Ohio) and Rob Simmons (Conn.)." Democrats are "optimistic that they have a winning issue." Roll Call notes the Medicare program has become an issue in the FL22 race between Rep. Clay Shaw and Democrat Ron Klein, and the Pennsylvania and Rhode Island Senate races. In addition, "seven of the 10 Congressional districts with the highest percentage of Social Security beneficiaries are held by Republicans, as are two-thirds of the top 25 districts. Of those top seven, five are in Florida, making the Sunshine State ground zero in the fight over Social Security and the Medicare drug benefit." But "so far, Susan MacManus, a political scientist at the University of South Florida, hasn't yet seen frustration with the drug benefit translate directly into anger at Members of Congress."

McClellan's Role As Medicare Administrator Examined. In its "Power Player of the Week" segment, Fox News Sunday (3/19, Wallace) profiled Dr. Mark McClellan, Administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services and brother of the White House press secretary, Scott McClellan. As the Federal Government "prepares for the explosion of baby boomer retirees, McClellan is trying to get ahead of the explosion in costs." McClellan: "We're turning Medicare from a program that people have counted on to pay the bills when they get sick to a program that puts just as much emphasis on helping them stay well." Wallace: "Criticism has been intense that the drug benefit is too complicated, that there are gaps in coverage." McClellan: "Well, I'm very pleased that we're filling millions of prescriptions every day for people who, in many cases, had no coverage before or were paying a lot more for their drugs." Asked he feels "when you see your brother being savaged by the White House press corps," McClellan said, "When you're growing up in a family with politics in the blood, you know you can't take any of this personally."

Boehlert To Retire. Roll Call (3/20, Kurtz, Pershing) reports Republican Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, "the senior Republican in New York's Congressional delegation and a leading House moderate, announced Friday that he would not seek a 13th term." Boehlert's retirement in New York's 24th CD "creates the 18th Republican House vacancy heading into November; his district isn't in the top tier of competitive open GOP seats, but it isn't far down the list."

Sabo To Retires From Safe Democratic Seat In Minnesota. Roll Call (3/20, Duran) reports Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo "announced Saturday that he will retire at the end the 109th Congress instead of seeking a 15th term, as he previously said he would." Sabo's "announcement quickly set off a barrage of interest among potential candidates to succeed him in his heavily Democratic seat and on the Appropriations Committee." But "many Minnesota political observers believe that Sabo's chief of staff, Mike Erlandson, who surrendered the chairmanship of the state Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party last year, is the early frontrunner." Other "potential contenders, according to Minnesota Democratic sources, include: Peter McLauglin, who recently lost the Minneapolis mayoral contest; Sharon Sayles Belton, a former two-term Minneapolis mayor who lost to Mayor P.T. Rybak; state Sens. Scott Dibble and Satveer Chaudhury; state Rep. Keith Ellison; Minnesota House Minority Leader Margaret Anderson Kelliher; Julie Sabo, the Congressman's daughter and a former state Senator; Minneapolis City Council Majority Leader Scott Benson; and City Councilmembers Lisa Goodman and Gary Schiff." Republicans "are not expected to seriously contest the 5th district, which gave Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) 71 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential election."

DOJ_NMG_0018399

Rice Wins Luntz's California Presidential Straw Poll. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice won a 2008 presidential straw poll conducted by pollster Frank Luntz at the recent California GOP convention. Rice received 29%, "followed by Virginia Sen. George Allen at 26 percent and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani at 16 percent. What's it mean? With Rice on the 2008 ticket, even as veep, California could go Republican."

Giuliani Said To Be Ready For Presidential Bid. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that while former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani has not talked about running for president in 2008, "there are hints he's ready. A key Republican senator tells us that Rudy's peeps are already at work in Florida. And we hear that he's making a trip to Iowa…to help raise money for Republican gubernatorial candidate Rep. Jim Nussle."

New York Races Seen As Indicators Of Potential Democratic Wave. In his Roll Call column (3/20), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says New York could be "a sign of whether a big Democratic wave is developing." Democrats are "making a major effort to flip a handful of Congressional districts in the state, and they hope that strong Democratic showings at the top of the ticket, combined with a favorable national environment, could net them a seat or two in Congress." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) "will coast to an easy re-election victory, and state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer is expected to win the Democratic nomination for governor and crush his eventual GOP opponent in November. Democrats also hope to make gains in the state Senate." New York political observers say Republicans "have a chance to swipe only a single statewide office — attorney general — and even there, Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro, once thought of as a rising star, is off to another unimpressive start." Rothenberg says the Democrats "best opportunity" is Rep. John Sweeney's 20th CD, where he faces Democratic attorney Kirsten Gillibrand. Democrats "should have their best shot at GOP Rep. Jim Walsh" in the 25th CD. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert's "retirement creates an open seat in the 24th district (Utica/Rome), while first-term Rep. Randy Kuhl drew an unimpressive 51 percent in the 29th district against a weak opponent last time, making him an obvious target this time." Democrats "think they have a shot against GOP Reps. Sue Kelly in the 19th district, Tom Reynolds in the 26th district and Vito Fossella in the 13th district." Yet while "this crop of Democratic opportunities is better than in the past, Democrats remain distinct underdogs in all of these seats."

WSJournal Says Republicans Behaving "Like Democrats." An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M) says that "last week, while voting to raise the federal-debt ceiling to $8.96 trillion, Senators had a chance to terminate" the "annual Congressional pending raid." The Journal notes, "Every Democrat in the Senate joined with eight Republicans to kill an amendment by GOP Senators Jim DeMint and Mike Crapo that would have stopped the Bonnie and Clyde budgeting. The vote was 53-46, and on the list of those voting to continue the Social Security raid is every potential 2008 Democratic Presidential aspirant in the Senate, including Hillary Clinton, John Kerry and Joe Biden. Worse, the list also includes Republicans Conrad Burns (Montana), Jim Talent (Missouri) and Gordon Smith (Oregon), who are running for re-election this year. Apparently, these Senators want the money stored in a lock box, but only on the condition that they know how to pick the lock." Republicans "aren't learning from their low approval ratings. They think the way out of trouble is simply to spend more money -- that is, to behave like Democrats."

Former GOP White House Aide Raises Funds For Clinton. The Washington Post (3/20, A13, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column on Jeffrey Volk, who once worked in the Nixon White House for speechwriter Patrick J. Buchanan and who helped draft Ronald Reagan 's economic platform in 1980. Volk was in New Orleans with his wife and daughter, a freshman at Tulane University, when Hurricane Katrina struck. Volk "called the White House for help," and he says, "there was no one to talk to." Volk then called the office of his US senator, Hillary Clinton, whose case worker could not send a plane to rescue any New Yorkers in the state, but did call "two or three times a day to make sure we were okay." Volk held a December fundraiser for Clinton and raised nearly $100,000 for her Senate campaign.

Massachusetts' Share Of Faith Based Grants Has Fallen. The Boston Globe (3/20, Helman) reports that Massachusetts' share of faith based grant funding from Washington has fallen by more than a third over the past three years, according to federal figures. Religious groups in the state "took in $19.6 million in federal grants under the program last year, down from $29.9 million in 2003, according to figures released this month by the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. … The 34 percent reduction for Massachusetts from 2003 to 2005, which came as funding to faith-based groups nationwide increased, occurred largely during the tenure of Governor Mitt Romney, a Republican who has touted his ties in Washington, D.C., as a boon for Massachusetts." The Globe adds, "The decline in funding to Massachusetts has come as federal funding nationally to domestic faith-based programs has risen from $1.2 billion in 2003 to $1.6 billion in 2005, according to the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives."

DOJ_NMG_0018400

Construction Set To Begin On Islamic School Near Annapolis. Near Annapolis, construction has begun on a campus that project directors say will house and Islamic high school, television station, athletic facilities and a college. The Washington Post (3/20, B2, De Vise, 744K) reports, "Mohammad Arafa, executive director of the Islamic Society of Annapolis, said the Mekkah Learning Center will be the first Islamic high school in the region. Work will progress on the $8 million project only as fast as donations permit; religious law forbids the society to take out a loan with interest."

Hamas Holds Key Ministries In Proposed Cabinet. The AP (3/20, Barzak) reports, "Hamas presented a proposed government Sunday, giving itself key ministries after failing to persuade more moderate parties to join in a coalition that could have softened its hard-line image and prevented likely economic sanctions." PM Ismail Haniyeh's list includes one woman and one Christian. Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar would be the new foreign minister. USA Today (3/20, Gutman, 2.31M) says the new cabinet "is dominated by veteran members of the militant Islamic group." The Financial Times (3/20, Morris) runs a similar report under the headline "Hamas Likely To Take Key Cabinet Posts," while the Christian Science Monitor (3/20, Prusher, 61K) titled its story "Key Hamas Cabinet Posts Go To Hard-liners." The New York Times (3/20, Myre, 1.19M), Washington Times (3/20, Mitnick, 90K) and Washington Post (3/20, A8, Wilson, 744K) run similar reports.

In a related analysis piece, the New York Times (3/20, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "As Hamas completes its cabinet, there is a sense that the landscape has changed for some time to come. The Hamas victory is not just a little local difficulty. Hamas is the Palestinian part of the Muslim Brotherhood and the first to win an election; its victory has enormous resonance for radical Islam. It is a defeat for secular nationalism, Nasserite corporatism and for Fatah, the chosen partner of Washington and Israel."

US Helps Cement Gaza-Crossing Compromise. The AP (3/20, Barzak) reports, "With Palestinians facing severe shortages of bread, milk and other foods in Gaza, US officials called an emergency meeting Sunday and brokered a compromise with Israeli and Palestinian negotiators in a two-month-old border standoff. Ambassador Richard Jones said cargo traffic might start flowing as soon as Monday at the [Karni] crossing, and a Palestinian official said a second crossing would be discussed at meetings Monday." After meeting with negotiators from both sides on Sunday, Jones "said later there was an agreement to open another crossing, Kerem Shalom at the convergence of Gaza, Israel and Egypt."

UAE Gave Money To Families Of Palestinian Militants. The New York Times (3/20, Preston, 1.19M) reports, "In the last four years the United Arab Emirates has provided substantial financial support, through its Red Crescent Society, to families of Palestinians, militants as well as civilians, who have been wounded or killed by Israeli forces, according to Red Crescent documents." In 2002 and 2003, the United Arab Emirates Red Crescent Society, "a quasi-governmental organization, made donations to Palestinian charities that included social groups associated with Hamas, the radical Islamic organization that won Palestinian parliamentary elections and has long been designated a terrorist organization by the United States." The secretary general of the Emirates Red Crescent, Sanaa Darwish al-Kitbe, "said the goal of its Palestinian programs was to 'influence the negative atmosphere' to build peace."

Egyptian Pop Culture Increasingly Anti-American. The Washington Post (3/20, C1, Williams, 744K) reports from Cairo, "When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited this city last month, Egyptians had an unusual choice: watch her on TV as she expounded on issues of war and peace in the Middle East, or go to a neighborhood movie theater and see her portrayed by a look-alike actress belly-dancing and placed in 'adult' situations." The film "is 'The Night Baghdad Fell,' which depicts Egyptian obsessions with war, sex and the United States. Wildly anti-American, it has done a brisk business for two months, a long screen life for Egyptian-made films. In 'Night,' Egyptians fret about an American invasion of Egypt and the potential destruction of their capital. Americans are bullies, rapists and mindless killers. By the way, 'The Night Baghdad Fell' is a comedy." The film, adds the Post, "is only the latest bit of Egyptian pop culture to display deep unease about Americans."

DOJ_NMG_0018401

Senators Urge Mexico To Crack Down On Border Tunnels. The Washington Times (3/20, Seper, 90K) reports, "A bipartisan group of US senators" has sent "letters to Mexican President Vicente Fox and members of the Mexican Congress" urging the enactment of "legislation to crack down" on those that finance or construct US-Mexico border tunnels. The letter was signed by Dianne Feinstein, "Republican Sens. Pete V. Domenici of New Mexico, Conrad Burns of Montana, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Jim Talent of Missouri, and Democratic Sens. Barbara Boxer of California and Maria Cantwell of Washington. The Department of Homeland Security has said tunnels typically have been built to smuggle drugs, but have quickly transitioned into passages for smuggling illegal aliens. The senators said they were concerned they could also be used to smuggle weapons and terrorists into the United States."

Opposition Charges Belarus Election Was Fraudulent. The Financial Times (3/20, Wagstyl, Buckley) reports, "Up to 5,000 opposition supporters braved blizzards and threats of violence from the Belarus authorities to protest on Sunday in central Minsk against what they called a fraudulent election victory by President Alexander Lukashenko." Initial returns "showed Mr Lukashenko, denounced by the US as Europe's last dictator, winning more than 90 per cent of the vote." The Los Angeles Times (3/20, Murphy, 958K), Washington Post (3/20, A8, Finn, 744K), Wall Street Journal/AP (3/20) and New York Times (3/20, Myers, Chivers, 1.19M) also report the story. A second New York Times story (3/20, Myers), titled "Incumbent Remains Popular In Heartland's Rural Villages," in which it says "villages…offer a window into Mr. Lukashenko's popular support."

Matthew Kaminski, editorial page editor of The Wall Street Journal Europe, writes in Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M), "In the club of democracy's enemies, Mr. Lukashenko is an elder statesman, a Hugo Chavez of the steppes. He is a clever populist who cultivates other pariahs and holds an old Bolshevik's contempt for opposition and political compromise." He "is widely known, thanks to Condi Rice, as 'Europe's last dictator,' though that nickname sells Vladimir Putin and other recent arrivals short." Lukashenko, "like a Milosevic or Saddam, wants nothing more than for the world to resign itself to a few more decades of him. A tyrant's best ally is fatalism."

Serbs Searching For War Criminals Mladic, Karadzic. NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 5, 2:25, Maceda, 9.87M) reported, "The death of Slobodan Milosevic, the so-called 'Butcher of the Balkans,' has only increased pressure on Serbia to hand over his two most infamous protégés." UN Chief Prosecutor Carla Del Ponte: "Now, more than ever, I expect Serbia to finally arrest and transfer Radko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic to The Hague as soon as possible." Maceda: "But where are Karadzic, the former Bosnian Serb leader, and his military commander, Mladic, who orchestrated the siege of Sarajevo in which 12,000 civilians died, and later, the massacre of some 8,000 men and boys in Srebrenica, both indicted on war crimes, including genocide, and both with $5 million bounties on their heads? Karadzic is thought to be hiding in the mountains of Montenegro, but Mladic has been seen in or near Belgrade, protected by just a handful of loyal bodyguards." The Serbian government "says it's hunting for Mladic and will arrest him, if only to keep talks alive that could lead to Serbia's joining Europe, a key goal."

Calm Returns To Paris After Massive Labor Riot. NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 4, 0:30, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "In Paris now today, relative calm after a night of chaos: Police arrested more than 160 people Saturday as demonstrators clashed with police to protest a law that would make it easier for employers to fire younger workers without cause. Today, the nation's powerful labor unions threatened to stage a potentially crippling general strike if the government doesn't withdraw the legislation by tomorrow evening." USA Today (3/20, Sanchez, Stinson, 2.31M) says "crowds estimated by the French Interior Ministry at more than 500,000 turned out in about 150 cities Saturday in the largest of six weeks of anti-government protests." The New York

DOJ_NMG_0018402

Times (3/20, Kanter, 1.19M) and the Wall Street Journal (3/20, Higgins, 2.11M), among other sources, also report on the unrest. USA Today (3/20, Stinson, 2.31M) also runs an analysis piece titled "Jobs Law Means Little In Riot-torn Suburb."

Energy To Top Agenda As Putin Visits China. Energy will be high on the agenda as Russian President Vladimir Putin visits Beijing tomorrow. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, White, Oster, 2.11M) reports that Putin's hosts "are likely to convey growing frustration that Russia hasn't provided as much energy assistance as China has wanted. Beijing is expected to push the Russian leader to commit to specific plans for building oil and gas pipelines to China." The Journal adds, "This week's discussions are expected to center on reviving talks to build a spur that would carry oil directly to China from a $7 billion pipeline Russia plans to build across east Siberia to the Pacific, as well as a stalled gas pipeline."

Beijing Won't Intervene In Talks Over Iron Ore. China's top economic planner said the government won't intervene in continuing negotiations between Chinese steelmakers and foreign mining companies that supply them with iron ore. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, Blumenstein, 2.11M) reports that Ma Kai, head of the National Development and Reform Commission, told a group of US newspaper editors, "The government will not interfere," adding, "This price will be decided on the basis of market and enterprise negotiations."

Latin American, Caribbean Economies Expected To Grow In 2006. The economies of Latin America and the Caribbean are likely to expand 4.3% in 2006, according to the head of a UN regional research group. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M) reports that Jose Luis Machinea, head of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean "said the forecast is based on expectations that Brazil and Mexico, the region's two largest economies, may expand slightly faster than expected. Furthermore, Chile also may perform better than the 5.5% forecast of Eclac, Mr. Machinea said. For now, however, the group isn't changing its estimate."

Consumers In EU, Japan Showing Willingness To Spend Again. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, Whitehouse, Sapsford, 2.11M) reports that "companies and consumers in the euro zone and Japan, the world's second- and third-largest economies after the U.S., have started spending again -- or appear poised to do so -- for the first time in years. The new climate has prompted moves by central bankers in both places to push up interest rates to curb inflation, a policy that could weigh on stock and bond prices everywhere by slowing the flow of cash around the globe." The shift means "the world might be less dependent on the American consumer, whose willingness to borrow and spend has been a primary driver of world growth for the past five years. If U.S. economic growth starts to taper off later this year, as some economists predict, Japanese and Europeans might help pick up the slack, a global rebalancing act that many had hoped for but few had thought probable."

EU Criticizes Pace Of Turkish Reforms. The European Union is criticizing the Turkish government over the pace of its reforms. The Washington Times (3/20, Borowiec, 90K) reports, "Signals from Ankara indicate the problem is likely to surface again as the EU presses Turkey for changes in the treatment of the Kurdish minority and the role of the military." The Times adds, "Tension remained high yesterday in southeastern Turkey, where security forces were reinforced as Kurds prepared to celebrate the Newroz spring holiday tomorrow. Authorities in Diyarbakir, one of the centers of Kurdish unrest, banned civil servants from taking part in the festivities, warning violators of disciplinary action. Newroz is not an official holiday in Turkey. … The EU wants Turkey, a membership candidate, to eliminate all such restrictions."

East African Drought Forces Changes In Cultural Traditions. East Africa's drought is pushing more and more Africans into cities, according to a front page story in the Washington Post (3/20, A1, Wax, 744K). The movement is "putting pressure on already strained resources and changing cultural practices from diet to marriage traditions. The Post adds, "The men of marrying age in East Africa are calling the current dry season 'the drought that killed the dowry.'"

Private Water Management Efforts Losing Support. The New York Times (3/20, Malkin, 1.19M) reports that support is eroding for private water management to bring water to the world's poor. Instead, many "want to return to relying on the local public utilities that still supply 90 percent of the water to those households that have it. There is a 'big-time shift' in tone, said David Boys, a water policy expert with the Public Services International labor federation. Mr. Boys is a member of an advisory panel appointed by United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, that presented its recommendations at the forum, beginning with a call to strengthen local public utilities."

DOJ_NMG_0018403

Annan Makes Case For New UN Human Rights Council. In the Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M), UN Secretary General Kofi Annan argues in favor of the new UN Human Rights Council which will be elected on May 9. Annan writes that there is "every reason to hope that the new Council will combine the best features of the old system with some much-needed changes. All those who want it to fulfill this promise now have seven weeks to make it happen. Let no one who cares about human rights remain on the sidelines of this struggle."

Liberian President Says She Can Offer Bush A Success Story. Fred Hiatt writes in the Washington Post (3/20, A15, 744K) that when Liberia's new President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf was asked during "how she will plead her case for aid to Bush, given draining U.S. commitments to Iraq and Afghanistan, she replies, 'For the reason you said -- he needs a success. Billions are being spent on Iraq, billions are being spent on Afghanistan -- and it will take a fraction of those billions to make Liberia a success story. I think he needs one, and we're going to give him an opportunity to have one.'" Hiatt adds, "When her hour at The Post is over, she waves off the usual pleasantries and asks: What will emerge from this interview? What will Liberia get out of it? … Well, Madam President, I'm afraid this column is the best I can do. I hope you get more out of President Bush tomorrow."

NYTimes Urges US To Aid UN Efforts In Darfur. An editorial in the New York Times (3/20, 1.19M) says that "the Arab militias financed by the government of Sudan to 'cleanse' Darfur of blacks are moving across the border into neighboring Chad." The UN "has described the carnage in Darfur as the world's biggest humanitarian crisis but continues to prove itself completely useless at doing anything to stop it. … That leaves the United States, where the Bush administration has made a few strides. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick appears to be close to getting the United Nations to supplement, if not replace, the woefully ineffective African Union peacekeeping force in the region with United Nations peacekeepers. The United States should also commit to providing specialized reconnaissance and air support for the United Nations force."

WSJournal Criticizes Chinese Officials' Anti-Democracy Tirade. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M) says, "At the Asia Society's annual corporate conference in Mumbai yesterday, we asked [China's Commerce Secretary Bo Xilai] what the Middle Kingdom might learn from India's experience, particularly as the Chinese economy becomes more integrated with the rest of the world. To our surprise, and to the shock of the audience -- save the mainland rent-a-clap crowd who were along to lend a literal hand -- Mr. Bo embarked on a tirade against democratic freedoms." The Journal adds that "despite prolonged contact with open societies, Mr. Bo still doesn't seem to understand the secret of their success. Near the end of his huff, Mr. Bo backtracked and claimed that Beijing is 'listening' to the voices of its people, and that its citizens are gradually gaining more democratic freedoms. If only it were so."

Abdullah Praised As "Distinguished Statesman." S. Rob Sobhani, president of Caspian Energy Consulting, writes in the Washington Times (3/20, 90K) that Saudi Arabia remained "surprisingly silent" as the rest of the Muslim world erupted in violence over the publication of cartoons of the prophet Mohammad. Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah "is a pious and popular leader of the most significant Muslim country in the world, and he has reset the tone and tenure of political life in Saudi Arabia by emphasizing restraint and tolerance." Sobhani adds, "Under the leadership of King Abdullah, Saudi Arabia is undergoing a political and social reformation. It is incumbent upon the United States to work with this distinguished statesman to ensure that his vision becomes a permanent feature of this strategic, yet combustible, region."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Iraq's Factions Agree To Form Security Council."
"Justices May Further Restrict Domestic Violence testimony."
"Playing Out Of Pocket."
"Chicago Schools Offer L.A.A Cautionary Tale."

DOJ_NMG_0018404

"Separation Of Mosque, State Wanes In Indonesia."
"Why May The Chickens Hit The Road?"

USA Today:
"Deaths Fall For U.S., Rise For Iraqis."
"To Head Off Allergies, Expose Your Kids To Pets And Dirt Early. Really."
"Lawmakers Get Out Of The House."

New York Times:
"On Anniversary, Bush And Cheney See Iraq Success."
"Plight Deepens For Black Men, Studies Warn."
"Rumor, Fear And Fatigue Hinder Final Push To End Polio."
"Behind Louisiana Aid Package, A Change Of Heart By One Man."
"Ayatollahs Aside, Iranians Jump For Joy At Spring."
"Cinderella Now Lingers Longer At The N.C.A.A.'s March Dance."

Washington Post:
"Bush Still Upbeat On Outcome Of Iraq."
"George Mason Knocks Out The Champion."
"Dowries Running Dry In Drought-Stricken East Africa."
"GOP Struggles To Define Its Message For 2006 Elections."
"Multiple Layers Of Contractors Drive Up Cost Of Katrina Cleanup."
"Vision For Transit-Friendly Tysons May Slam The Door On Dealer Row."

Washington Times:
"Bush Vows Strategy Will Win In Iraq."
"George Mason Looks Sweet."
"New Orleans Slowly Back To Business."
"Virginia Mulls Bad-Driver Fees To Save Budget."
"Afghan Man Faces Death For Christian Conversion."
"Hamas Party Dominates Palestinian Cabinet Picks."

Detroit Free Press:
"Granholm Agrees To Abortion Regulation."
"Big Features, Small Cars."
"2 Empty Sites Bedevil County."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"America's Disease Sentinels Overtaxed."
"7 Days, But It's Weeks Of Work."
"Your Space On MySpace Isn't So Private."
"Bright Idea Can Be Bad Sign, 2 Cities Say."

Dallas Morning News:
"Too Much, Too Fast."
"Across Texas, Neighborhoods Feeling Torn Up Over Teardowns."

Houston Chronicle:
"Yates Case Rekindles Emotions."
"Deadly Way Stations."
"Bush, Cheney Cite Gains, Deny Claims Of Civil War."
"Investigation Has DeLay Stuck in Legal Limbo."
"Injured Firefighter Recalls Raging Blaze, A Promise Kept."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush-Iraq Progress; Iraq War Casualties; Marines-Civilian Deaths; Shiite Pilgrimage; Iraq Anniversary; College War Reporters; IL6 Race-Iraq Veteran; ABC Iraqi Reporter.
CBS: Preempted By College Basketball.
NBC: Iraq-Allawi Interview; Marines-Civilian Deaths; Bush-Iraq Progress; France-Employment Law Protests; Serbian War Criminals; Australia-Cyclone; Colleges-529 Plans; Texas-Flooding; Gulf Coast Churches; FEMA-Payment Errors; Cuba-World Baseball Classic; Pet Hospital.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Iraq War Anniversary; Midwest Snowstorm.
CBS: Iraq War Anniversary; Australia-Cyclone; Midwest Snow Storm; Miami-Pirate Radio Station; Yates-New Trial; NCAA Tournament;
NPR: Allawi-Iraq Civil War; Iraq War Anniversary; Belarus-Election; France-Employment Reform Protests; Texas-Floods; Midwest Snowstorm.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with NATO Secretary General Jaap De Hoop Scheffer, Oval Office, the White House; makes remarks on the Global War on Terror, Renaissance Cleveland Hotel, Cleveland, Ohio.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY —Delivers remarks at a luncheon for congressional Candidate Chuck Blasdel, Spread Eagle Tavern & Inn, 10150 Historic Plymouth St., Hanoverton, Ohio; delivers remarks at a reception for senatorial candidate Tom Kean. The Washington Square Conference Center, 520 Broad St., Newark, N.J.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

DOJ_NMG_0018405

Other: CITY SCHOOLS _ The Council of the Great City Schools holds its Annual Legislative and Policy Conference. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings discusses how urban schools are making progress under No Child Left Behind and she believes that progress to the next level by advancing the American Competitiveness Initiative. Location: Washington Marriott, 1221 22nd St. NW.

FIREFIGHTERS CONFERENCE _ The International Association of Firefighters holds a legislative conference. Topics to include homeland security, first responder issues, mid-tern elections and challenges facing firefighters. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Remarks by Harold Schaitberger, general president, IAFF. 9:15 a.m. Remarks by Senator Joe Biden, D-Del. 10 a.m. Remarks by Senator Chuck Hagel, R-NE. 10:45 a.m. Remarks by Ken Mehlman, chairman, Republican National Committee. 11:20 a.m. Remarks by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. 2:35 p.m. Remarks by Howard Dean, chairman, Democratic National Committee. 3:45 p.m. Remarks by Andrew Card, Chief of Staff to President Bush. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

SECURITY ISSUES _ American University's Washington College of Law hosts EMININT 2006 (Emerging Issues in National and International Security) to discuss emerging issues in national and international security. Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Session on ``Petro-Security in the Post-9/11 World," with former CIA Director James Woolsey, others. Location: Room 603, American University's Washington College of Law, 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAQ WAR-MARCH _ The National Campaign for Nonviolent Resistance and Military Families Speak Out holds a march from near the Vietnam War Memorial to the Pentagon to mark the three year anniversary of the war in Iraq and call for an end to the war. Highlights: 9 a.m. Rally. Location: Daniel French Drive, near the Lincoln Memorial. Followed by a march across the Arlington Memorial Bridge to the Pentagon. With Stephen Cleghorn, member of Military Families Speak Out from Reynoldsville, PA, whose stepson received a Bronze Star; and Laura Costas of Silver Spring, MD, whose brother served 14 months in the Army Reserves in Iraq in 2003 - 2004 under stop-loss orders. At the Pentagon, organizers plan a ceremony to honor the fallen, and a ``die-in." A delegation will attempt to deliver a coffin, representing the dead killed in Iraq, to Secretary of War Donald Rumsfeld. Pentagon, Arlington, VA.

HAWLEY-AIRPORTS _ 9 a.m. Transportation Security Administration Assistant Secretary Kip Hawley delivers remarks at the Airport Legislative Alliance Spring Washington Conference. Location: L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, 480 L'Enfant Plaza SW.

MOUSSAOUI TRIAL _ 9:30 a.m. Trial of al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui is scheduled to resume at the federal courthouse in Alexandria, Virginia. Location: U.S. Courthouse, 401 Courthouse Square, Alexandria, VA.

IMMIGRANTS-POPULATION _ 10 a.m. The Immigration group FAIR holds a news conference to release a new study, ``U.S. Population Projections to 2050," on the impact of current and proposed immigration policies on U.S. population growth. FAIR says that without significant reductions in overall levels of immigration, U.S. population will climb to more than 450 million by mid-century, while increases in immigration currently under consideration in the Senate will add 200 million people to the U.S. population by 2050. Location: FAIR's national headquarters, 1666 Connecticut Avenue, N.W., Suite 400.

DEMOCRATS-IRAQ WAR _ 11 a.m. Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., joins John Podesta, president and CEO of the Center for American Progress, to mark the third anniversary of the War in Iraq. The Center for American Progress will release a report on ``Progress in Iraq: 2006 1st Quarter Report Card" detailing what it describdes as ``the dangerously incompetent Administration policies that are failing to make 2006 the year of transition to Iraqi sovereignty that Congress called for last year." Location: Room S-211, Capitol.

CHERTOFF-MARITIME SECURITY _ 11:45 p.m. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff Michael Chertoff speaks on ``Charting a Path Forward" following a Heritage Foundation media roundtable, ``Maritime Security: Real Issues, Real Answers." Location: Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

BIRD FLU-CABINET _ 1 p.m. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, Secretary of Health & Human Services, Mike Leavitt, and Secretary of the Interior, Gale Norton, hold a news conference to discuss preparations for avian influenza in the U.S. Location: Jefferson Auditorium, South Building, Wing 5 Entrance, U.S. Department of Agriculture, 1400 Independence Ave., SW.

GUANTANAMO DETAINEES _ 1:30 p.m. - 5:30 p.m. George Washington University Law Center and the Center for Consitutional Rights host a legal forum featuring testimony from former Guantanamo detainees about their detention and treatment. The forum will also include remarks from attorneys who represented detainees, military personnel, and policymakers. Location: GWU Law School, Jacob Burns Moot Court Room, 2000 G St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0018406

LIBERIA _ 2:15 p.m. - 3:45 p.m. The President of the Republic of Liberia, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, will discuss ``Liberia's Progress, Potential, and Challenges for the Future'' in a conversation moderated by Center for Global Development senior fellow Steve Radelet. Location: Peter G. Peterson Conference Center, Institute of International Economics, 1750 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SCIENCE-ECONOMY _ 2:30 p.m. - 4:30 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute sponsors a discussion, ``Scientific Talent and U.S. Economic Leadership.'' Participants are Richard B. Freeman, Harvard University; Steven J. Davis, AEI; David E. Weinstein, Columbia University; and Kevin A. Hassett, AEI. Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

NATO-RIGA SUMMIT _ 3 p.m. NATO Secretary General Jaap De Hoop Scheffer addresses a National Press Club afternoon newsmaker. Topic: ``NATO's Operations, Transformation and the Riga Summit.'' Location: National Press Club.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0018407

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, MARCH 20, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Administration Lawyers Suggested Warrantless FBI Searches 3
Durbin Won't Rule Out Bush Impeachment 3
Administration Document Outlines Agency Roles In War On Terror 4
9th Circuit Orders Sri Lankan Freed From Border Jail 4
High Court To Hear Arguments On Military Tribunals 4
Army IG Exonerates Gitmo Commandant 4
Martin Was Never Meant To Be Player In Moussaoui Case 5
Credibility Of FBI Witness Called Into Question 5

Homeland Response:

DPW Plans To Sell US Holdings Could Face Hurdles 5
Negroponte Probing Pentagon Trend Toward Outsourcing Intelligence Work 5
WTC Talks To Restart Next Week 6
Contractor Profits Found To Be Major Factor In Post-Katrina Waste 6

War News:

Bush Administration Defends Iraq Policy On Third Anniversary Of War 7
Allawi Says Iraq Already In Civil War 9
US Military Deaths Down As Iraqi Deaths Increase 9
Creation Of Iraqi Policy Council Called Step Forward 10
If Convicted, Saddam Could Be Executed Quickly 10
Military Investigating Deaths Of 15 Iraqi Civilians As Possible Crime 10
New Analyses Of Vietnam War Shaping US Military Approach In Iraq 10
Both Iran, US Said To Have Much At Stake In Iraq Talks 10
Violence Hinders Iraqi TV Station's Efforts To Entertain 11
Small College Radio News Program Reports On Iraq War 11
Afghan Christian Could Be Put To Death For Renouncing Islam 11
WSJournal Praises National Security Strategy 12

DOJ:

Veteran Federal Prosecutor Joins Arent Fox 12

Corporate Scandals:

Former Enron Treasurer To Testify In Lay, Skilling Trial 12
Study Finds Executive Pay Growth Has Slowed 12

Criminal Law:

Libby's Lawyers Expected To Focus On WMD Debate 12
DC Cop's Case Could Make Prosecutions Harder In Abramoff Scandal 13
"Mafia Cops" Prosecution Witness Seen As "Complex Character." 13
California Businessman Pleads Guilty In Pellicano Investigation 13
"Innocence Lost" Uncovered Toledo Teen Prostitution Ring In Pennsylvania 13
Corruption Probe Shuts Down Texas Town's Police Force 13
Child Services Workers Facing More Danger 14
Friends, Family Of Slain Man Question Sheriff's Account Of Shooting 14
Victim Of Priest Abuse Returns To Face Past 14
Supreme Court To Hear Cases Crucial To Domestic Violence Prosecutions 14

Civil Law:

Google Gets Win On Government's Subpoena For Web Search Data 14
Chicago Alderman Seeks To Close Smoking Ban Loophole 14

Civil Rights:

Oakland Nearly Finished Paying Out Over War Protestors' Injuries 15
Studies Warn Of Difficult Plight For Black Men In US 15
Schools Called Front Line In Culture War Over Homosexuality .. 15

Antitrust:

Zurich American To Pay $171.7 Million In Bid Rigging Case 15
UK Insurer Prudential PLC Rejects Aviva Takeover Proposal 15
Roche, Amgen Engaged In Fierce Lobbying Battle Over Patents16
Supreme Court Patent Case Could Have Far-Reaching Implications 16

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Kempthorne Known To Work With Those Who Disagree With Him 16
Firm Offers DOE Space To Store Spent Fuel 16
Offshore Drilling Advocates Push Revenue Sharing Plan 16
Court Rules Older Sites Must Meet Same Emission Requirements As New Facilities 17

Interior Department Urged To Endorse Settlement On North Carolina Road Project ... 17
Law Firms Rolling Dice On Indian Law ... 17

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Funding Constraints Leave New York FBI Agents Without Email, BlackBerrys ... 17
12 Face Charges In California For Making Marijuana-Laced Candy, Soda ... 18
Eight New Jersey Residents Accused Of Running "Major" Heroin Ring ... 18
Attorney Accuses DEA Of "Lukewarm" Response To Death Threat ... 18
Detroit Drug Dealers Said To Be Infiltrating West Virginia Town 18
Washington Post Profiles "Prince Of Pot" ... 18
Poppy Crops Said To Threaten Afghan Democracy ... 18

Congress-Administration:

Cheney Downplays Calls For Staff Changes At White House ... 19
Bush Has Been Taking More Questions From Audiences ... 19
Cheney Discusses Hunting Accident ... 20
House Expected To Be In Session Only 97 Days This Year ... 20
Republicans Unable To Craft Unified Political, Policy Agenda ... 20
Senate Voted Against Social Security Accounts Last Week ... 20
MZM Founder Used Several Tools To Win Lucrative Federal Contracts ... 21
E-Mail Uses TSP's Name In Credit Card Scam ... 21
Krugman Dismisses Notion That Bush Is Big Spender ... 21
Hebert Criticizes Proposed Cuts In Cancer Detection Program ... 21
WPost Criticizes FCC Ruling On Scorsese Documentary ... 21
GOP Unity Said To Have "Fallen Apart." ... 21

Other News:

Snow Says Americans Broadly Sharing In Economic Expansion 22
Medicare Drug Plan Is Growing Issue In Congressional Races ... 22
Boehlert To Retire ... 23
Sabo To Retires From Safe Democratic Seat In Minnesota ... 23
Rice Wins Luntz's California Presidential Straw Poll ... 23
Giuliani Said To Be Ready For Presidential Bid ... 23
New York Races Seen As Indicators Of Potential Democratic Wave ... 23
WSJournal Says Republicans Behaving "Like Democrats." ... 23
Former GOP White House Aide Raises Funds For Clinton ... 24
Massachusetts' Share Of Faith Based Grants Has Fallen ... 24
Construction Set To Begin On Islamic School Near Annapolis ... 24
Hamas Holds Key Ministries In Proposed Cabinet ... 24
UAE Gave Money To Families Of Palestinian Militants ... 24
Egyptian Pop Culture Increasingly Anti-American ... 25
Senators Urge Mexico To Crack Down On Border Tunnels ... 25
Opposition Charges Belarus Election Was Fraudulent ... 25
Serbs Searching For War Criminals Mladic, Karadzic ... 25
Calm Returns To Paris After Massive Labor Riot ... 25
Energy To Top Agenda As Putin Visits China ... 26
Beijing Won't Intervene In Talks Over Iron Ore ... 26
Latin American, Caribbean Economies Expected To Grow In 2006 ... 26
Consumers In EU, Japan Showing Willingness To Spend Again 26
EU Criticizes Pace Of Turkish Reforms ... 26
East African Drought Forces Changes In Cultural Traditions ... 26
Private Water Management Efforts Losing Support ... 26
Annan Makes Case For New UN Human Rights Council ... 26
Liberian President Says She Can Offer Bush A Success Story ... 27
NYTimes Urges US To Aid UN Efforts In Darfur ... 27
WSJournal Criticizes Chinese Officials' Anti-Democracy Tirade ... 27
Abdullah Praised As "Distinguished Statesman." ... 27

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 27

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 28

DOJ_NMG_0018409

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration Lawyers Suggested Warrantless FBI Searches. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Ragavan) reports that following the 9/11 attacks, Bush Administration lawyers discussed with senior FBI officials the possibility of using the same legal authority used to conduct the warrantless eavesdropping approved by President Bush to "conduct physical searches of homes and businesses of terrorism suspects -- also without court approval." US News adds that "in a little-noticed white paper submitted by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to Congress on January 19 justifying the legality of the NSA eavesdropping, Justice Department lawyers made a tacit case that President Bush also has the inherent authority to order such physical searches. In order to fulfill his duties as commander in chief, the 42-page white paper says, 'a consistent understanding has developed that the president has inherent constitutional authority to conduct warrantless searches and surveillance within the United States for foreign intelligence purposes.'"

Mueller "Troubled By Domestic Spying Program. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Ragavan) reports that government officials say FBI Director Robert Mueller and then Deputy Attorney General James Comey, "who also questioned the NSA spying program, both believed that while it was a close call legally, the president did have authority to conduct electronic surveillance of terrorism suspects in the United States without court approval; both men, however, raised grave concerns about the possible use of any information obtained from any warrantless surveillance in a court of law." US News adds, "White House lawyers, in particular, Vice President Cheney's counsel David Addington (who is now Cheney's chief of staff), pressed Mueller to use information from the NSA program in court cases, without disclosing the origin of the information, and told Mueller to be prepared to drop prosecutions if judges demanded to know the sourcing, according to several government officials. Mueller, backed by Comey, resisted the administration's efforts." US News also reports, "Sources say Mueller and his general counsel, Valerie Caproni, continue to remain troubled by the domestic spying program."

Cheney Says NSA Domestic Surveillance Program Has Been "Major Success." On CBS' Face the Nation (3/19, Schieffer), Vice President Cheney said the Administration is "working with" Congress "to give them broad oversight with respect to" the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program. Cheney added, "It's a very important program. It is totally in compliance with the laws and Constitution of the United States. It's been a major success in preventing attacks against the United States. And it needs to be preserved and protected."

Durbin Won't Rule Out Bush Impeachment. On Fox News Sunday (3/19), host Chris Wallace asked Sen. Richard Durbin if he ruled out "impeachment of the president if the Democrats regain control of Congress." Durbin said, "I don't believe that that is even a valuable discussion at this point. But I do believe it's valuable that Sen. Feingold is moving us forward to finally be a catalyst to have the kind of hearings and the kind of deliberations as to what lies behind this warrantless wiretap situation, how this President can avoid the law, which is very clear on the subject." Asked if he was not ruling out impeachment, Durbin said, "I can't rule anything out until the investigation is complete. I don't want to prejudge it. But if this President or any president violates the law, he has to be held accountable, and that accountability, of course, is in the hands of the United States House of Representative and the Senate." USA Today (3/20, 2.31M) runs a brief report on Durbin's comments, including his remark "I don't want to prejudge it," referring to Bush's possible impeachment. The AP (3/20) notes Durbin "said he so far has not heard a valid legal justification for the spy program that was put in place after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks."

On Fox News Sunday's roundtable discussion (3/19), Brit Hume said Durbin's remarks "illustrates as clearly as anything yet has, the fact that if the Democrats get control of one House or the other -- they're more likely to get the House, I assume, and that's, of course, where impeachments occur -- that the impeachment will be on the agenda. The Republicans are claiming this. Senator Durbin, while not ruling it out, as other Democrats have -- and he is, after all, the assistant leader, has come pretty close to confirming that, indeed, it is there." NPR's Mara Liasson said, "Most of the Democrats I talked to this week felt that Feingold's effort was terribly unhelpful, to put it mildly, that he changed the subject from Republicans being on the defensive to Democrats' effort to get the President. And I was actually surprised, too, that Durbin left the door open as much as he did." The Washington Times (3/20, Bellantoni, 90K) makes a similar point, reporting "congressional Democrats say…Feingold's move… is a distraction from their quest to take back Congress in the fall." Rep. James P. Moran, Virginia Democrat, told The Washington Times, "Every time we get in a great strategic position, we manage to energize the Republican base. … Everything is going well for the Democrats and President Bush is tanking in the polls, and then Russ Feingold comes up with the idea of censure, which is going to go nowhere and is not just quixotic but is somewhat self-serving."

DOJ_NMG_0018410

Likewise, Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (3/20), "The best thing that can be said about the call by…Feingold (D-Wis.) to censure President Bush is that practically none of his colleagues is backing him up." They "don't want to distract attention from the main Democratic assaults on Bush and the GOP -- that he's 'incompetent' and that Republicans are in 'disarray.'" Feingold's move "reinforces the party's image as 'McGovernite' -- weak on national security -- at a time when Bush's inept Hurricane Katrina response and the Dubai ports disaster has given Democrats an opening to knock Bush on homeland security."

Also on Fox News Sunday's roundtable discussion (3/19), the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol said, "I think Feingold is smarter than the Democratic leadership in the House and the Senate, and I think he deserves some credit for taking a principled stand. And I honestly believe that, in fact, he's winning this debate right now."

Murtha Declines To Endorse Feingold Resolution. On NBC's Meet the Press (3/19, Russert), Democratic Rep. John Murtha declined to offer support for Sen. Russ Feingold's resolution to censure Bush for the National Security Agency domestic intelligence program, saying, "I had a briefing the other day, I'm satisfied the safeguards that are in place are significant, but we have to look at whether it's illegal or not. I'm hesitant to say the President ought to be censured before a committee looks at it and really investigates it and comes up with some real conclusions."

Administration Document Outlines Agency Roles In War On Terror. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Robinson), "The Bush administration released a key document last week, following on the signing of a classified directive that gives new orders to government agencies about their roles in the war on terrorism. … The National Security Presidential Directive gives new marching orders to each agency for its role in the war on terrorism. … A major goal of the new NSPD is to resolve discrepancies among previous presidential directives and chronic conflicts among agencies with overlapping responsibilities."

9th Circuit Orders Sri Lankan Freed From Border Jail. The AP (3/20, Prengaman) reports, "After more than four years in a U.S. detention center, Ahilan Nadarajah will soon gain the freedom he sought when he fled Sri Lanka and the government forces there that he says repeatedly jailed and tortured him." The AP continues, 'He had reached the United States in October 2001 only to be detained on the same accusations that almost got him killed in his home country: He was suspected of being a member of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a separatist group listed as a terrorist organization by the U.S. State Department." The AP adds, "Nadarajah denies the claims, and immigration judges have twice granted him asylum. But the federal government refused to release him. … The latest order came Friday from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, telling the U.S. government it was violating federal law by continuing to hold him even though he wasn't criminally charged and couldn't be deported in the foreseeable future. His lawyers said they now expect him to be freed in a few days."

High Court To Hear Arguments On Military Tribunals. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Halloran) reports that the Supreme Court is set to hear arguments next week over the legality of US military tribunals for foreigners designated as enemy combatants. The High Court "will finally have to weigh in on some of the most contentious and polarizing issues in the post-9/11 world: How should the United States treat non-American prisoners whose allegiances lie not with a country but an ideology? Does the president have the power to unilaterally decide not only which prisoners qualify as enemy combatants but what rights they have and under what justice system they should be tried? And, at the heart of it all, should past rules of war apply, or does the war on terrorism…require its own special standards?"

NYTimes Urges High Court To Rule In Favor Of Guantanamo Detainee. The New York Times (3/20, 1.19M) editorializes, "Since the Republican majority has decided to allow President Bush to usurp Congress's role in matters of national security, the battle to save the constitutional balance of powers moves to the judiciary. A critical test of judicial independence will come this month, when the Supreme Court hears arguments in a case that has become a focus of Mr. Bush's imperial vision of the presidency." Salim Ahmed Hamdan, "accused of having been a bodyguard and driver for Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan," has been "detained since 2002 in Guantánamo Bay. He filed suit to challenge the legitimacy of the military commission that upheld his designation as an 'unlawful enemy combatant.'" Hamdan "argued, rightly, that the commissions are not legitimate because prisoners are routinely barred from seeing evidence, much less confronting their accusers or having access to real legal representation. But his case has now become a much larger battle over the principle of habeas corpus, which is embedded in the Constitution and says that a prisoner cannot be denied the right to challenge his detention."

Army IG Exonerates Gitmo Commandant. Time (3/27, Zagorin, Donnelly) reports, "Did Major General Geoffrey Miller -- commandant at Guantanamo Bay and a top adviser on interrogations at Abu Ghraib -- do wrong? No, says a new report by Lieut. General Stanley Green, the Army Inspector General (IG), that TIME obtained last week."

DOJ_NMG_0018411

According to Time, "A Pentagon panel recommended last summer that Miller be reprimanded for poor oversight of a high-value prisoner at Gitmo." Time adds, "Miller's exoneration may only inflame his critics. At a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing last week, chairman John Warner pointedly suggested to one of Miller's superiors that he 'go back over this entire matter,' warning that Miller will be recalled before the panel to explain himself. Sources close to the powerful committee say that anger at Miller has escalated sharply since he invoked his right to avoid self-incrimination and refused to testify in the detainee-abuse trial of an Abu Ghraib dog handler."

Martin Was Never Meant To Be Player In Moussaoui Case. Time (3/27, Waller) reports on Carla Martin, the "government lawyer with a small role in the sentencing trial of confessed 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui," who has been placed on paid administrative leave by the TSA for coaching witnesses in the sentencing phase of Moussaoui's trial. Time adds that Martin "was never meant to be a player. In court documents filed after the blowup, prosecutors painted her as a misguided 'miscreant' with only a bit part in the government's case preparation -- arranging witness interviews and retrieving aviation documents for prosecutors."

WPost Says Moussaoui Case Part Of Pattern Of Government Misconduct. Under the headline "Another Blown Case?," the Washington Post (3/20, A14, 744K) editorializes, "The death penalty case against accused Sept. 11 conspirator Zacharias Moussaoui has barely survived the government's latest bout of incompetence." This case "joins a line of big terrorism prosecutions marred by government misconduct, overzealousness, hyping of charges or just plain ineffectiveness. … Prosecuting terrorists isn't easy…but much of this is the Bush administration's fault. The administration failed to work with Congress to create viable legal structures to handle these cases, proceeding in whatever way seemed most convenient in any given situation. The results are abysmal. And, ironically, they undermine the case for the more secretive military trial procedures the government is trying to create."

Credibility Of FBI Witness Called Into Question. Newsweek (3/27) reports in its "Periscope" column that in addition to the case against accused 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, which "is in trouble," the Justice Department also has "a problem in another case. The credibility of the FBI's star witness against a Pakistani-American accused of Qaeda ties is under fire after he testified he saw Ayman al-Zawahiri at a mosque attended by the defendant in Lodi, Calif., in 1999." The testimony "startled counterterrorism experts: Zawahiri, Osama bin Laden's chief deputy, was in Afghanistan at the time, under indictment for the bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa." A Justice official "said prosecutors are still confident about the case against Hamid Hayat, 23, accused of attending a Qaeda camp in Pakistan, and his father, Umer Hayat, 48, who allegedly lied to the FBI about his son's travels."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DPW Plans To Sell US Holdings Could Face Hurdles. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, Machalaba, 2.11M) reports, "SSA Marine Inc.'s decision to explore a sale of the company could complicate Dubai Ports World's plans to sell its U.S. holdings to an American buyer." SSA Marine, "the largest US container terminal operator, has been considered one of the possible bidders for DP World's terminal operations in the US. With SSA Marine disclosing that it is a potential acquisition target itself, the number of viable US purchasers for DP World's U.S. holdings could be reduced."

Hunter Criticizes Original DPW Deal. GOP Rep. Duncan Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, writes in USA Today (3/20, 2.31M), "In the post-9/11 world, America's No. 1 priority must be national security. But the process that OK'd government-owned Dubai Ports World's takeover of terminal operations at major US ports was geared less toward national security and more toward economic opportunity. … Today, we can take nothing for granted. We must continue to enhance our security instead of creating even greater vulnerabilities. To those who say this smacks of protectionism, I say this: America is worth protecting." In an editorial, USA Today (3/20, 2.31M) disagrees, and says that Hunter "would like to set a series of draconian standards for any company wishing to buy a part of the nation's "critical infrastructure." Its chairman and CEO would have to be American, as would at least half of its board. The secretary of Defense would have to approve half of the board members and the company would have to keep tabs on the citizenship of its shareholders to make sure that no more than half were non-U.S. citizens. The idea that the government would be allowed to choose who controls private companies is bizarre by itself. More so coming from a Republican."

Negroponte Probing Pentagon Trend Toward Outsourcing Intelligence Work. The Washington Post (3/20, A3, Pincus, 744K) reports on "a growing trend at the Pentagon to contract out intelligence jobs that were formerly done primarily by service personnel and civil service employees." By "using contract employees," government agencies "lose control over those doing this sensitive work and an element of profit is inserted into what is being done. Also, as investigations have revealed, politics and corruption may be introduced into the process." The office of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte "has quietly begun to study the contracting issue because 'it already is a problem,' a senior intelligence official said in a recent interview." The Post adds, "A related concern for intelligence agencies inside and outside the Pentagon is that the government is training people and getting them security clearances, but they then leave for better pay offered by contractors, sometimes to do the same work."

DOJ_NMG_0018412

WTC Talks To Restart Next Week. The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Frangos, 2.11M) reports, "Talks to resolve how to rebuild the World Trade Center will restart next week after private developer Larry Silverstein offered a revised proposal Friday for his role in the long-troubled project." The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, "which owns the site, said it would respond to Mr. Silverstein's proposal."

Contractor Profits Found To Be Major Factor In Post-Katrina Waste. A study by the GAO has found that millions of dollars have been wasted in post-Katrina government contracts. The Washington Post (3/20, A1, Warrick, 744K) reports in a front page article that cleanup in the Gulf region often involves "at least four" contractors: "a contractor, his subcontractor, the subcontractor's subcontractor, and finally, the local man" to do the work. "For the thousands of contractors in the Katrina recovery business, this is the way the system works -- a system that federal officials say is the same after every major disaster but that local government officials, watchdog groups and the contractors themselves say is one reason that costs for the hurricane cleanup continue to swell." Meanwhile, "each week, many more millions are paid to contractors who get a cut of the profits from a job performed by someone else. In instances reviewed by The Washington Post, the difference between the job's actual price and the fee charged to taxpayers ranged from 40 percent to as high as 1,700 percent."

Powell Credited With Securing $4.2 Billion Plan For Louisiana Homeowners. Under the headline "Behind Louisiana Aid Package, A Change Of Heart By One Man," the New York Times (3/20, Dewan, 1.19M) reports that though President Bush's Gulf Coast rebuilding coordinator, Donald E. Powell, and the administration had originally "rejected Louisiana's housing recovery plan," prompting a call for Powell's dismissal from the Baton Rouge Advocate, he "did an about-face that turned many of his critics into fans, showing that not only had he listened to the locals, but also that his conclusions had carried weight with Mr. Bush." Powell's work in securing the plan to "seek $4.2 billion more for Louisiana to compensate homeowners — even those in the flood plain — " has "made many Louisianians think that in appointing him, the administration had finally done something right."

FEMA Asking Some Hurricane Victims To Return Erroneous Payments. NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 10, 0:30, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "There could be some bad news this week for the people of the Gulf Coast depending on FEMA to help them rebuild. Thousands who received money from the Federal Government after Hurricanes Katrina, Rita, and Wilma will be asked to send it back. Last week, FEMA started mailing letters asking people to return money the government says they received in error." The AP (3/19) reported, "Some 1.7 million households received FEMA assistance after Hurricanes Rita, Katrina or Wilma. About 2 to 3 percent or 34,000 to 51,000 families will reimburse the agency, Donna Dannels, acting deputy director of FEMA's recovery division."

"Bring New Orleans Back" Commission To Issue Final Report. The Los Angeles Times (3/20, Quinones, 958K) reports the Bring New Orleans Back Commission, which has been "a magnet for criticism as well as a channel for emerging citizen activism," will formally issue "its final report to Mayor C. Ray Nagin tonight, though the reports of its seven committees have been public for several weeks." The Times adds, "As a post-hurricane entity, the commission went far beyond just storm and flood protection. The committees also have recommended ways to overhaul land-use planning, rebuild neighborhoods, consolidate duplicative elected offices, revive the city's cultural life, reorder its health and public education systems, and modernize the criminal justice system."

Gulf Coast Churches Struggling To Recover From Hurricane Katrina. NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 9, 2:25, Kotb, 9.87M) reported Hurricane Katrina "destroyed houses of worship too, and like the people of the region, the churches are struggling to get by." NBC (Ellis) added, "They have marched into St. Augustine's for 165 years, but now this New Orleans church, one of the oldest African-American Catholic churches in the country, is fighting just to stay open. With $400,000 in damages in a city with a decimated population and archdiocese hurting for cash, St. Augustine has been forced to merge with another parish, its schedule cut to just Sunday masses, its longtime priest reassigned. Many parishioners are worried St. Augustine's rich traditions could be next to disappear." All along "the Gulf Coast, churches are being redefined. And with so many parishioners scattered by the storm, many churches are having a tough time coming back to what they were or even where they were."

DOJ_NMG_0018413

WAR NEWS:

Bush Administration Defends Iraq Policy On Third Anniversary Of War. President Bush yesterday delivered a "stay the course" message on Iraq yesterday on the third anniversary of the US military action in Iraq as he returned from Camp David. Administration officials, including Vice President Cheney, sought to reinforce that message on the weekend talk shows. The President is expected to return to that message again this week during a speech in Cleveland. The Akron Beacon Journal (3/19, Abraham, 148K) reported that President Bush will be in Cleveland, O.H. on Monday, where he's "expected to discuss the global war on terror in a speech…at the City Club." Bush "is expected to arrive in Cleveland shortly before noon, and will present the President's Volunteer Service Award to Lois Hagood of Garfield Heights, who volunteers as a reading tutor for first-graders in Cleveland." The Cleveland Plain Dealer (3/20, Eaton) says Bush "will discuss how the United States is 'working with all aspects of Iraqi society' to defeat terrorists, restore order and rebuild Iraq, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said. It is part of a monthlong effort by Bush to update Americans on the war's progress and 'how we're fixing what was not working."

The AP (3/20, Pickler) reports Bush that in his comments yesterday, the President avoided "any mention of the daily violence that rages three years after he ordered an invasion. The president didn't utter the word 'war.'" Other Administration "officials repeated the mantra that progress continues toward building a unified Iraqi government and nation." USA Today (3/20, Diamond, 2.31M) also notes Bush avoided "the word 'war.'"

Meanwhile, touching on a theme present in many newspaper accounts, the Los Angeles Times (3/20, Brownstein, 958K) says the Administration's "upbeat assessments faced sharp skepticism from US legislators from both parties and from a senior Iraqi political leader, former interim Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, who has been a staunch American ally." They "contended that Iraq was now in the midst of a civil war between Shiite and Sunni Muslims." The New York Times (3/20, Sanger, Shanker, 1.19M) also says the officials displayed "a carefully calibrated mix of optimism about eventual victory and caution about how long American troops would be involved." The picture "painted by the administration clashed with that of the former interim prime minister." The Washington Post (3/20, A1, Fletcher, 744K) headlines its story "Bush Still Upbeat On Outcome In Iraq," and reports the Administration "tried to dispel a growing perception that a continuing wave of sectarian violence has pushed Iraq into a full-fledged civil war."

ABC and NBC both noted Bush's remarks early in their newscasts last night. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, lead story, 2:55, Harris, 8.78M) reports, "As the war in Iraq enters its fourth year, tonight, we heard two, very different views of its successes, its failures and its future. President Bush said the sacrifices that have been made and the ones to come will pay off for Iraq, and the US." t Bush: "We are implementing a strategy that will lead to victory in Iraq. And a victory in Iraq will make this country more secure. And will help lay the foundation of peace for generations to come." ABC World News Tonight (3/19, lead story, 2:55, Yang, 8.78M) reports, "Administration officials were relent relentlessly on-message today, as they marked the war's anniversary. And the tone was set by the President himself." Bush: "The Iraqi leaders are working together to enact a government that reflects the will of the people. And so, I'm encouraged by the progress." Vice President Cheney (from CBS's Face the Nation): "And it continues to improve day-by-day. Those are the facts on the ground. That's the reality." Yang: But "even some Republicans say optimistic words are not enough." Sen. Chuck Hagel: "We're beyond the American people buying into public relations offensives. This is about policy now. This is about hard, cold facts and realities on the ground." NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 3, 2:35, Jordan, 9.87M) also said the President and "his top military advisors launched a full-blown media blitz to convince Americans to stay the course."

On CBS' Face the Nation (3/19, Schieffer), Vice President Cheney said, "There's a constant sort of perception, if you will, that's created because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad. It's not all the work that went on that day in 15 other provinces in terms of making progress towards rebuilding Iraq." Asked to respond to Sen. Edward Kennedy's characterization of the Administration's Iraq policy as "dangerously incompetent," Cheney said, "Well, I would not look to Ted Kennedy for guidance and leadership on how we ought to manage national security. I think what Senator Kennedy reflects is sort of the pre-9/11 mentality about how we ought to deal with the world and that part of the world." Cheney said the Administration's "aggressive, forward-leaning strategy is one of the main reasons we haven't been struck again since 9/11 because we've taken the fight to them. Senator Kennedy's approach would be pack your bags and go home, retreat behind your oceans and assume you can be safe."

On NBC's Meet the Press (3/19, Russert), Gen. George Casey said there has been progress in both the political and security fronts in Iraq, saying that at each election in the last year, "the levels of participation increased, the levels of violence decreased, and each time the terrorists and the foreign fighters -- the same groups that are trying to foment sectarian strife right now -- failed to stop the election, the referendum and the, and the election in December." Casey added that now, there are "two Iraqi divisions, 13 Iraqi brigades and almost 60 Iraqi army and special police battalions that are in charge, in the lead, occupying in battle space and conducting counterinsurgency operations across Iraq. And I will tell you that their performance in this period after the, the bombing of the Samarra Mosque in, on the 22nd, has been generally very good."

DOJ_NMG_0018414

On Fox News Sunday (3/19, Wallace), Gen. Casey also emphasized the progress in Iraq, saying, "The new political leaders of Iraq are meeting almost around the clock, discussing how to form a representative government of national unity that will ensure that the rights and the interests of all Iraqis, regardless of ethnic and sectarian group, are met. That's huge progress."

On NBC's Meet the Press (3/19, Russert), Democratic Rep. John Murtha disputed the Administration's claim that progress is being made in Iraq, adding, "I don't see the progress that they're portraying and I don't understand how they can continue to say that and the American public understands that and we understand it."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/20, Peterson, 61K) headlines its report "In Iraq, US Influence Wanes As Full-scale Civil War Looms," and says, "Every day, more violence. And more uncertainty for Iraqis than they have ever known, as they mark three years since American troops invaded." The "wave of optimism that once buoyed Iraqis after the fall of Saddam Hussein" is now being "marked as yet another casualty of the bombs and murders that are part of daily life here."

The Washington Times (3/20, 90K) says "protesters around the world also observed the anniversary of Operation Iraqi Freedom… with anti-American rallies that drew smaller crowds than similar demonstrations in the past." The Financial Times (3/20, Swann) reports "the US capital's historic protest venues were surprisingly serene on Sunday. Outside the White House tourists had their pictures taken next to a cardboard cut-out of the president, families enjoyed the sun on the Mall and several bored-looking policemen stood guard outside the vice-president's DC home. Not a placard in sight or a chant to be heard." Americans "may have turned decisively against the war in Iraq in recent months, but their change of heart has been largely expressed quietly to pollsters rather than in loud public protests." USA Today (3/20, Diamond, 2.31M) says "police in London estimated 15,000 people marched from Parliament to Trafalgar Square; last year's protest drew 45,000. About 800 people rallied in Tokyo compared with about 2,000 last year." In the United States," the biggest rally was in Chicago, where about 7,000 people marched. Smaller protests were held in other cities, including Boston, San Francisco, Pittsburgh and New York."

Casey Says US Has Begun Reduction Of Troop Level. On Fox News Sunday (3/19, Wallace), Gen. George Casey said the US troop reductions have "already begun. And I think you'll recall that just prior to Christmas, I told the Secretary of Defense and the President that I did not need two of the brigades that were intended to come over here to Iraq, so we actually already have already begun the reductions of our combat forces. … I do believe that over 2006, we will continue to see a gradual reduction in coalition forces."

Rumsfeld's Nazi Analogy Under Fire. On NBC's Meet the Press (3/19, Russert), Democratic Rep. John Murtha said in response to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld claim that leaving Iraq now would be like returning post WWII Germany to the Nazis that the country is in "a civil war. Twenty-five thousand insurgents are fighting with each other inside the country for supremacy. That's the definition of a civil war. There's less than a thousand al Qaida. And when he says turning it over to al-Qaida -- and that's what he means, he, he's inferring it'll be turned over to al-Qaida -- I don't believe that for a minute. The Iraqis will get rid of al-Qaida the minute that we get out of there."

On ABC News' This Week (3/19, Stephanopoulos), Sen. Chuck Hagel disagreed with Secretary Rumsfeld's post-war Germany analogy, saying, "I understand that the secretary has a difficult assignment to try to assign some credibility to the current policy and I don't think the current policy is working. We need some new thinking here. And I think we should not be afraid to think through, which we have never done, we didn't think through this at all before we went into Iraq, but think through consequences, all right, what if we leave at some point? What if all the worst-case scenarios happen?"

On Fox News Sunday's roundtable discussion (3/19), the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol said, "I think reading Don Rumsfeld's op-ed today in the Washington Post makes me even more amazed that Bush has not removed him as Secretary of Defense. I mean, Rumsfeld has an op-ed in which he talks about the situation in post-war Iraq. But we're at war, and he has for three years tried to jump to the post-war Iraq without winning the war in Iraq."

However, on CNN's Late Edition (3/19, Blitzer), Sen. Richard Lugar said Rumsfeld "clearly is correct, and I would say that that is the issue. I think Republicans and Democrats, at least in Congress, a large majority, believe that it would be unthinkable for Iraq to be turned back to the Saddamists and to chaos, and an incubator for terrorism."

Durbin Says Congress Needs To Hold Bush Accountable On Iraq. On Fox News Sunday (3/19), host Chris Wallace asked Sen. Richard Durbin to explain the Democratic plan for Iraq. Durbin said, "What we propose and what Senator John Warner accepted as a bipartisan approach in the Senate includes the following. This year, 2006, a year of transition, where the Iraqis take control of their own security and defense. Secondly, the Iraqis are put on notice they have to form a government that embraces all of the factions within Iraq so that we can see finally a government of unity leading to some sort of progress for the people of Iraq. And finally, we have to have from this president accountability, clear accountability, where he says every three months what progress is being made. His first report, incidentally, was not an encouraging one. It's an indication that despite all the rhetoric, we have not made progress this year."

DOJ_NMG_0018415

Reed Says US Needs To Use Troops As Leverage. On ABC News' This Week (3/19, Stephanopoulos), Sen. Jack Reed said, "The only leverage we have is our troop presence, and I think we have to make it clear to the Iraqi political leaders that if they're not able or willing to come together with a political solution that recognizes the differences and pulls together the different factions, that our presence can't be indefinite there."

Iraqis See Mixed Progress On Three Year Anniversary. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, story 5, 2:50, Harris, 8.78M) ran a retrospective report on the developments in Iraq on the three year anniversary, reporting, "Patience is difficult when daily life is a struggle. Since the war, many parents are afraid to let their children out to play. Nearly 13 million fewer Iraqis have drinkable water. In Baghdad, there's electricity for less than four hours a day. And in a country with so much oil, people wait in gas lines up to 12 hours. On the flip side, Saddam's absence means Iraqis can protest, get satellite TV and use cell phones. What's more, the US and its partners have fixed up 825 schools, 13 hospitals and 302 police stations." ABC also interviewed three US officers, who affirmed their continued belief in their mission.

Iraqis Reportedly Still Hopeful, But More Pessimistic. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, story 8, 2:00, Harris, 8.78M) also profiled an ABC News translator, who was at first optimistic after the fall of Saddam, but his "optimism has largely evaporated." ABC translator: "I was very happy. But now, I feel a bit pessimistic. From day-to-day, it is worse and worse. There's no government. There's no stability. There's no security at all." Harris: "He still says he does have hope that someday, maybe years into the future, Iraq will be the place he once thought it would be. He says he simply cannot survive in Iraq, without hope."

Allawi Says Iraq Already In Civil War. Former Iraqi Prime Minister Ayad Allawi yesterday said he thought his country was in a civil war in interviews with a variety of media outlets. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, lead story, 2:55, Harris, 8.78M) reports, "In an interview with British television, the former prime minister of Iraq, Ayad Allawi, said this country is already in civil war." Former Prime Minister Allawi: "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is." NBC Nightly News (3/19, lead story, 2:40, Engel, 9.87M) showed Allawi saying, "There are no institutions that could protect people. There are definitely ethnic cleansing happening and taking place here and there in the country. So, this is in fact, has a level of a civil war. We should not deny this. We should be brave enough to talk about it." Engel: But Gen. George Casey, "the top US commander in Iraq, General George Casey, disagrees." The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/20) reports Allawi "said playing down the current problems in Iraq would be a mistake, telling the BBC he had warned against a power vacuum and the prevalence of militias." Allawi "said the formation of a national unity government was what Iraq needed to achieve peace."

On CBS' Face the Nation (3/19, Schieffer), Cheney disagreed with Allawi's characterization of Iraq as being in a civil war, saying, "I think the assessment that we get from General George Casey, who's our man commanding in Iraq, from Zal Khalilzad, the ambassador, from John Abizaid, who is the general in charge of Central Command, doesn't square with that. Clearly there is an attempt under way by the terrorists, by Zarqawi and others, to foment civil war. That's been their strategy all along, but my view would be they've reached a stage of desperation from their standpoint."

Meanwhile, on ABC News' This Week (3/19, Stephanopoulos), Sen. Chuck Hagel said Allawi "is correct. I think we have had a low-grade civil war going on in Iraq, certainly the last six months, maybe the last year. Our own generals have told me that privately. So that's a fact."

US Military Deaths Down As Iraqi Deaths Increase. USA Today (3/20, Frank, 2.31M) reports, "US military deaths during the past month have dropped to an average of about one a day, approaching the lowest level since the insurgency began two years ago, according to a USA TODAY analysis of U.S. military data." The decline in US deaths "comes as Iraqi casualties are the highest since the U.S. military began tracking them in 2004. In the past month, nearly five times as many Iraqi forces and civilians were killed as troops in the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, US military data show."

The Washington Post (3/20, A10, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports "tens of thousands of Iraqi civilians have died in the war, from US and Iraqi military actions, insurgent attacks and, increasingly, raids attributed to government-allied Shiite Muslim squads that allegedly operate both inside and outside Iraq's new, Shiite-dominated security forces."

US Death Toll Tops 2,300. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, story 2, 0:20, Harris, 8.78M) reports, "President Bush said today he was reflecting on US servicemen and women. More than 2,300 US troops have been killed in the war. And more than 17,000 injured. The estimate of Iraqis killed varies widely. But it's believed to be well over 33,000."

DOJ_NMG_0018416

Creation Of Iraqi Policy Council Called Step Forward. The New York Times (3/20, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "Iraqi officials announced Sunday that they had agreed to form a council of the country's top politicians to make policy on security and economic issues in the new government. The council, which will include the prime minister and president, is an attempt to include all the country's major factions in decision making at a time of rising sectarian tensions." The Times calls the arrangement "a step forward in the snail-paced negotiations over the formation of a full, four-year government. … The political leaders must now tackle other deeply contentious issues in the talks to form a government." PM Ibrahim Al-Jafaari was not present for the discussions. The Los Angeles Times (3/20, Boudreaux, 958K) also reports the story.

Jafari Says Sadr Needs To Be Included In Political Process. Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari writes in the Washington Post (3/20, A15, 744K), "As the wheels of democracy have begun to turn in Iraq, the people's wishes are becoming clearer and their representatives identified. To this end I am humbled and honored to be chosen by my coalition to lead Iraq's first democratically elected full-term government." He adds, "My government's first challenge will be to stifle the terrorism that has plagued our country and defiled the name of Islam. While we are making good progress in expanding and developing Iraq's security services, the war against the terrorists cannot be won by military means alone. It is paramount that all Iraqis work together to build a democratic, free Iraq." He also writes, "Sidelining Moqtada al-Sadr's group from the Governing Council was a mistake. Had it been integrated into the political process" from the beginning, "events would have turned out differently in the south. I corrected this policy and brought Sadr's group into the democratic process. This inclusive approach resulted in the huge nationwide turnout for the December elections and a parliament that truly reflects Iraq."

If Convicted, Saddam Could Be Executed Quickly. Newsweek (3/27, Nordland) reports on the continuing trial of Saddam Hussein noting that, if he is convicted, "Saddam could well be executed soon after the Dujail case ends, without waiting for other cases against him to proceed." Once "a verdict is rendered by the five-judge panel, 'if any defendant were sentenced to any penalty, no matter whether it were the death penalty or imprisonment, that penalty should be executed within 30 days of the court's verdict,' chief prosecutor Jafar al Musawi told NEWSWEEK. Although there would be an automatic appeal of a death sentence to the court of cassation, that court has no backlog of cases, Musawi says, and an appeal 'would only take days.'"

Military Investigating Deaths Of 15 Iraqi Civilians As Possible Crime. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, story 3, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported that the deaths of 15 Iraqi civilians in November is "now being investigated as a possible crime." ABC (Karl) added, "Military officials now acknowledge the Iraqis were not killed by" a roadside bomb but "by crossfire, as US Marines stormed the surrounding homes. The military did not launch an investigation, until two months after the incident, when Time magazine showed officials this video and eyewitness testimony."

NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 2, 1:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported the Marine unit "was attacked by a roadside bomb. One Marine was killed, the other Marines then stormed several nearby houses, and according to the military officials, the Marines believed they were about to be ambushed and killed 23 people, including 15 non-combatants. Witnesses accused the Marines of killing those civilians out of revenge."

New Analyses Of Vietnam War Shaping US Military Approach In Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, A1, Jaffe, 2.11M) reports on its front-page on "Vietnam histories -- most of them highly critical of the US military in Vietnam -- that are changing the military's views on how to fight guerrilla wars. … The embrace of these Vietnam histories reflects an emerging consensus in the Army that in order to move forward in Iraq, it must better understand the mistakes of Vietnam." The Journal adds, "In the past, it was commonly held in military circles that the Army failed in Vietnam because civilian leaders forced it to fight a limited war instead of the all-out assault it longed to wage. … The newer analyses of Vietnam are now supplanting that theory -- and changing the way the Army fights. The argument that the military must exercise restraint is a central point of the Army's new counterinsurgency doctrine. The doctrine, which runs about 120 pages and is still in draft form, is a handbook on how to wage guerrilla wars."

Both Iran, US Said To Have Much At Stake In Iraq Talks. The Christian Science Monitor (3/20, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "A mutual interest in a stable Iraq is driving Washington and Tehran -- two otherwise increasingly antagonistic capitals -- to sit down and talk. Even as the Bush administration says America 'may face no greater challenge from a single country than from Iran,'" and as "US-backed efforts proceed in the United Nations Security Council to address Iran's nuclear ambitions," the two governments "have agreed to meet in Baghdad." The talks are "an acknowledgment of Iran's pivotal role in Iraqi affairs -- political, social, and religious -- at a particularly difficult moment for the US engagement there." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (3/20, A9, Vick, 744K) reports that Iran's

DOJ_NMG_0018417

"acceptance of direct talks with the United States over Iraq is being regarded among Iranians as a major foreign policy development, a historic if still tentative departure from 27 years of official enmity that held the government of the 'Great Satan' as one to be spoken against, but never with." In 2002, "a poll found that three-quarters of Iranians surveyed favored talks with the United States. The pollster was thrown in jail, but the reality drove a quiet competition between Iran's two rival political forces."

US General Says Iran Talks Will Not Advance Mideast Peace. The AP (3/20) reports General George Casey, the US commander in Iraq, "expressed doubt today that negotiations between the United States and Iran over Iraq would help bring peace and stability in the Middle East. 'I don't have a lot of confidence that these will turn out to be productive, but I could be wrong. They're playing, I think, a very delicate balancing act. ... On the one hand, they want a stable neighbor. On the other hand, I don't believe they want to see us succeed here.'"

Security Council Permanent Members Will Try To Break Iran Stalemate. The Washington Post (3/20, A9, Lynch, 744K) reports Under Secretary Nick Burns and other top foreign affairs officials from "the Security Council's five permanent members and Germany will hold a high-level meeting Monday in New York to try to break an impasse over the international response to the Iranian nuclear crisis." US and European officials say they will try to assuage Russian and Chinese fears that the adoption of the statement will inevitably lead to harsh punitive measures. 'We're not hellbent on going to war; we're not hellbent on imposing sanctions,' said a senior State Department official… 'We're hellbent on having the Iranians return to the negotiations, like the Russians and the Chinese want.'"

Tehran Aims For Arab Support. As top diplomats prepare meet in New York, the Washington Post (3/20, A9, Williams, 744K) reports, "Iran has embarked on a charm offensive in the Arab world aimed at expanding economic and political ties and circumventing efforts by the United States and its allies to isolate Iran over its nuclear program. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad traveled this month to Kuwait, the first visit there by a high-ranking Iranian official in more than 25 years. Other Iranian officials toured Persian Gulf states trying to persuade them to endorse Iran's desire to develop nuclear technology, which US officials have called a cover for building weapons." According to the Post, "Arab observers say Iran's diplomatic offensive represents a newly vigorous approach to improving relations with its neighbors. 'Iran is trying to become a player in the region. At least toward the Arabs, Iran is trying to moderate its tone,' said Maha Altorki, an Iran analyst in the Asia section of the Arab League, based in Cairo."

Iranians Prepare For New Year Celebration. The New York Times (3/20, Slackman, 1.19M) reports that Iranians are preparing for the celebration of the Iranian New Year, called Nowruz." According to the Times, "After the Islamic Revolution in 1979, the ruling ayatollahs sought to stamp out many traditions, like Nowruz, a celebration with some Zoroastrian links that stretches back thousands of years to the pre-Islamic era, to mark the arrival of spring. The celebration is considered by many here the most Iranian of holidays. The ayatollahs tried, and failed. Now, nearly three decades later, some people say the increasingly enthusiastic embrace of Nowruz and other ancient traditions represents a resistance against the country's more conservative religious rulers."

Violence Hinders Iraqi TV Station's Efforts To Entertain. ABC News correspondent Jake Tapper writes in the New York Times (3/20, 1.19M) about "the discordant images on Iraqi television: Between the grisly shots of war dead, pools of blood and burnt-out shells of cars came bits of wacky slapstick. … With the newfound freedom of speech here, more than 100 television and radio stations have been licensed. … This has resulted not only in more news and public affairs programming, but many new entertainment shows." Yet "tragedy still has a way of rearing its head." During Tapper's visit to an Iraqi TV station, gunmen assassinated the station's entertainment-division chief, outside his Baghdad home just minutes earlier. Tapper concludes, "It is American journalists' duty to try to look at the broader picture in Iraq — telling the stories about those brave souls who seek to restore normalcy and laughter into the daily routine here. But there is no denying that the horrific violence will often make that task impossible."

Small College Radio News Program Reports On Iraq War. ABC World News Tonight (3/19, story 6, 2:45, Harris, 8.78M) reports a group of Swarthmore College students "say the American media is not getting the whole story. So, they are, quite literally, taking matters into their own hands by picking up the telephone." ABC (Berman) added, "Just over a year ago, students founded War News Radio, hardly your average college show. The goal: To big deeper into the lingering war." Through the "Internet, hard work and a little luck, the students track down Iraqi experts, officials and regular people."

Afghan Christian Could Be Put To Death For Renouncing Islam. The AP (3/20) reports, "An Afghan man who allegedly converted from Islam to Christianity is being prosecuted in a Kabul court and could be sentenced to death, a judge said Sunday." The defendant, Abdul Rahman, "was arrested last month after his family went to the police and accused him of becoming a Christian, Judge Ansarullah Mawlavezada told Associated Press in an interview. Such a conversion would violate the country's Islamic laws." Rahman "was charged with rejecting Islam when his trial started last week, the judge said." During the hearing, the defendant "allegedly confessed that he converted from Islam to Christianity 16 years ago when he was 25 and working as a medical aid worker for Afghan refugees in neighboring Pakistan, Mawlavezada said." Afghanistan's constitution "is based on Shariah law, which states that any Muslim who rejects their religion should be sentenced to death."

DOJ_NMG_0018418

WSJournal Praises National Security Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M) editorializes, "The publication last week of the Bush Administration's National Security Strategy has been greeted with a combination of media indifference and contempt. 'Bush clings to pre-emptive force,' was one news agency's sum-up of the 49-page document. Readers of these columns might prefer to draw their own conclusions by actually reading it: www.whitehouse.gov/nsc/nss/20061. What they'll find is a strategy that's admirably specific and, in the issues that matter most, broadly right." The Bush Doctrine "remains alive and well, despite persistent reports that it had been quietly shelved in favor of...well, no one has yet made clear what."

DOJ:

Veteran Federal Prosecutor Joins Arent Fox. The Washington Post (3/20, Liebert) reports, "Baruch Weiss, a veteran federal prosecutor who most recently was associate general counsel at the Department of Homeland Security, has joined the District office of Arent Fox in the litigation and white-collar defense groups." The Post continues, "From 1984 through 2002, Weiss was senior trial counsel for the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, where he handled cases including a fraud investigation of a major securities firm, appeals involving the first World Trade Center bombing in 1993 and the unsuccessful prosecution of boxing promoter Don King for insurance fraud."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron Treasurer To Testify In Lay, Skilling Trial. The New York Times (3/20, Barrionuevo) reports the government "heads this week into the home stretch of its case against two former Enron chief executives. Prosecutors will be looking to end on a flourish with the testimony of Ben F. Glisan Jr., the only former top executive who has already been sentenced in the Enron debacle." Glisan, Enron's former treasurer, is "the last major witness for the government before the case shifts to the defense and to what promises to be memorable testimony by the defendants, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay." Glisan worked "closely with Andrew S. Fastow, the former chief financial officer, on developing special-purpose entities, like the Raptors group, that both men have said in plea deals were used to inflate earnings and hide debt. The government is also expected to use Mr. Glisan to try to connect the dots for jurors hearing a complex case."

Study Finds Executive Pay Growth Has Slowed. The Financial Times (3/20, Roberts) reports growth in US executive pay "has slowed sharply in spite of record profit growth, according to preliminary findings from an independent corporate governance watchdog," the Corporate Library. The group, which "usually estimates greater pay inflation than most industry studies, calculates that US chief executives took home 11 per cent more money in 2005, compared with a 30 per cent rise the year previously. Among the 500 largest companies, median total compensation reported to date rose by just 3.7 per cent in 2005 to $5.2m."

Survey Shows Large Firms Improving Corporate Governance. USA Today (3/20, Iwata) reports a Business Roundtable survey shows "large U.S. companies are making strides in corporate-governance practices, from creating stronger independent boards to linking more executives' pay packages to their companies' performance." The survey "of 100 CEOs…suggests that leading corporations are taking their watchdog roles more seriously in the wake of Enron and other corporate scandals." Some "57% of companies have increased pay-for-performance elements in their executives' compensation packages. That's up from 40% in 2004." In addition, "at least 91% of the companies have an independent chairman or lead director — up from 71% two years ago."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby's Lawyers Expected To Focus On WMD Debate. The AP (3/20, Yost) reports that Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby "seems intent on zeroing in on three little letters: WMD." In their latest court filing, Libby's legal team said the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity is "at most a peripheral issue" to "the media conflagration" over the failure to find WMD in Iraq. The papers suggest that this "media conflagration" and "the resulting finger-pointing among the White House, the CIA and the State Department over who was to blame, that Libby's lawyers want to focus on in a bid to get him off." The papers "underscore the possibility that a criminal trial of Libby could highlight the ongoing debate over whether the White House manipulated intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0018419

DC Cop's Case Could Make Prosecutions Harder In Abramoff Scandal. Jeffrey Birnbaum writes in his "K Street Confidential" column in the Washington Post (3/20, D1, 744K) that a appeals court decision involving a D.C. police officer could make it harder for prosecutors to make a case against lawmakers implicated in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. Detective Nelson Valdes "ran license plates through a law enforcement database and provided the vehicle-owner information he collected to a person who paid him cash. He was convicted in 2002 of taking illegal gratuities. But a three-judge appeals court panel recently reversed that decision. It said, in an opinion dated Feb. 24, that his actions weren't a formal part of his duties and therefore weren't covered by the statute. Scholars say that as a result of the Valdes case, the process of charging lawmakers and their aides with wrongdoing in the Abramoff scandal (and others like it) will be more difficult."

"Mafia Cops" Prosecution Witness Seen As "Complex Character." The New York Times (3/18, Feuer, 1.19M) profiles the Burton Kaplan, the top prosecution witness in the trial of alleged "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. "He is a complex character, who, for decades, led a double life. On one hand, he was that stock-in-trade cliché, 'the legitimate businessman,' who owned a discount clothing store in Bensonhurst and a factory for Chinese garment makers in Antigua. On the other hand, he is — or was — an inexhaustible fountainhead of crime. Both sides of Mr. Kaplan's personality were on display this week" at trial, as he "linked the lawmen to at least a dozen killings and kept the courtroom spellbound with his clipped accounts of how the two defendants had once gunned down a gangster on the grass berm of the Belt Parkway and, earlier, had delivered a kidnapped mobster to his rival."

California Businessman Pleads Guilty In Pellicano Investigation. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Krikorian, Blankstein, 958K) reports Valencia businessman George Kalta "admitted Friday to conspiring with Anthony Pellicano to illegally dig up information about a teenager who had accused him of sexual assault, becoming the latest witness cooperating in the federal probe of the indicted private eye. … The plea makes Kalta the fourth person to acknowledge that they hired — or helped — Pellicano to illegally investigate others using wiretaps, confidential police record searches or other methods." Calling Kalta "a minnow" in the FBI investigation, his defense attorney, Leslie Abramson, "said outside court on Friday that Pellicano bragged to her client about listening in on other people's conversations and about having connections within law enforcement."

"Innocence Lost" Uncovered Toledo Teen Prostitution Ring In Pennsylvania. The Toledo Blade (3/19, Erb, de Boer) reports, "In a 102-page indictment unsealed in December, the feds paint a violent picture of pimps and their most trusted prostitutes…who routinely brutalized newer recruits," largely from the Toledo area. The ring operated was centered in Harrisburg, Penn., which much of the activity occurring at a truck stop, which "became one focus of 'Innocence Lost,' a major federal inquiry into underage prostitution." The Blade adds, "'These girls are getting violently abused,' said David Johnson, chief of the FBI's Crimes Against Children unit. Beyond that, maintaining control is a matter of psychological conditioning, especially for girls already fleeing homes of incest, battering, or even simple neglect, said Chip Burrus, the FBI's acting assistant director of the criminal investigative division. … 'For them their normal day is servicing johns, and after a while, this just becomes [her] life, and [she] kind of accepts it … That's what happened to a lot of these girls.' … If they don't adjust or try to escape, Mr. Burrus said, 'the pimps say, "Okay you want to break away? I'll kill your mom," or "I know you have a sister who's 8, and I'll go to her school, and I'll rip her head off."'"

The AP (3/20) reports on The Blade story, noting "The FBI assigned 16 new agents to the investigation, and the agency is hiring six more this year. The FBI says the interstate ring is organized crime, equating it to drug trafficking. Many of the girls came from backgrounds of abuse or incest, and the pimps conditioned them through abuse and threats against family members to accept their fate, said Chip Burrus."

Corruption Probe Shuts Down Texas Town's Police Force. The Los Angeles Times (3/20, Hart) reports, "It happened without warning. The FBI swooped in, shut down Troup (TX)'s five-man police force and jailed the chief and a sergeant — the 2005 Chamber of Commerce officer of the year, no less — on charges of corruption. " The Times continues, "Startled residents watched in silence as authorities secured the tiny station with yellow crime-scene tape and swarmed the building for evidence. … Sgt. Mark Turner, 47, was charged with delivering marijuana and tampering with or fabricating evidence. According to a search warrant, Turner gave marijuana to an undercover agent, assuring him later that there was more where that came from: the police evidence box. " The Times adds, "Police Chief Chester Kennedy, who led the force for 14 years, also was charged with evidence tampering. He admitted to investigators that he gave Turner 24 cans of light beer from a 30-pack seized in a bootlegging case, but said he planned to buy more if the case went to court. 'Beer is beer,' he said, according to a Sheriff's Department affidavit. … Events unfolded so quickly here that, weeks after the March 3 raid, stunned residents are still talking about it when they meet on the street. Some, however, are less surprised; rumors of police misconduct had circulated for years. … Here in rural East Texas, methamphetamine labs can operate unnoticed. Misdemeanor drug charges in Smith County, about 100 miles southeast of Dallas, are as common as drunk driving arrests, Dist. Atty. Matt Bingham said. But in the last six years, the Troup police force sent just 11 drug cases to the district attorney's office. … Maj. Mike Lusk, head of criminal investigations for the Smith County Sheriff's Department, said Troup police had sent a total of two drug evidence samples to the Texas Department of Public Safety crime lab since 2000."

DOJ_NMG_0018420

Child Services Workers Facing More Danger. The New York Times/AP (3/20) reports that "threats are a daily part of the job for caseworkers who investigate accusations of child abuse and neglect and often remove children from their homes. But the killing of a social worker in South Texas last week has prompted" some caseworkers "to re-evaluate the steps they take to keep safe and has raised questions about what the state can do to better protect them." The family of the social worker "who was killed last week, Sally Blackwell," said she "had received threats in her position as program director, overseeing several offices of caseworkers. The authorities have ruled the case a homicide but have not said whether her death was related to her job."

Friends, Family Of Slain Man Question Sheriff's Account Of Shooting. The Washington Post (3/20, B1, Davenport) reports the "22-year-old Oxon Hill man fatally shot by a Charles County sheriff's deputy Saturday morning had drawn a handgun and fired it while three deputies were trying to arrest him on a drunken driving charge, the sheriff's office said yesterday." But the "friends and relatives of the suspect, Jonathon Lyles, offered a starkly different view. They questioned whether Lyles had a gun and said officers targeted him because he was a young African American man who had had previous run-ins with police."

Victim Of Priest Abuse Returns To Face Past. The Washington Post (3/20, B1, Murphy) profiles Michael Donovan, a "63-year-old Vietnam veteran and retired businessman from California" who visited Washington "on a mission into his past, a mission to banish his own anger and regain control." Almost "50 years ago, during Donovan's eighth-grade spring break, he was sexually abused" at Holy Name School "by Thomas S. Schaefer, then a 30-year-old, newly minted Roman Catholic priest. Schaefer went on to molest at least 20 more boys in the Washington Archdiocese, according to church officials, before pleading guilty in 1995 in five of those cases." In 2003, "determined to be counted in a national survey of the church's abuse problem, he informed the archdiocese of Schaefer's 1956 misconduct. He learned then that he was Schaefer's earliest known victim."

Supreme Court To Hear Cases Crucial To Domestic Violence Prosecutions. In a New York Times op-ed (3/20), attorneys Michael Rips and Amy Lester say the Supreme Court is hearing two cases, Davis v. Washington and Hammon v. Indiana, "that may make domestic violence cases all but impossible to prosecute." The question is "whether statements made to 911 operators can be admitted in prosecutions if those who made the calls refuse to appear in court. Such evidence has become crucial in bringing domestic abusers to justice." In the 1980's and 1990's, "the refusal of victims to cooperate in the prosecution of their batterers may have resulted in the dismissal of as many as 70 percent of all domestic violence cases." Now, authorities "have developed techniques, together known as 'evidence-based prosecution,' that focus on the use of reliable evidence, like 911 tapes, to build cases that do not depend on the cooperation of the victim." But a "significant number of courts have interpreted" another case, Crawford vs. Washington, "to bar the use of 911 tapes and answers to questions posed by police officers unless the witness is available for cross-examination. In so doing, they've overturned convictions in cases of domestic battery."

CIVIL LAW:

Google Gets Win On Government's Subpoena For Web Search Data. The Wall Street Journal (3/20) reports Federal judge James Ware "ruled Google Inc. doesn't have to turn over data about consumer Web-search queries to the Justice Department." Judge Ware "on Friday ordered Google to work with the government to provide 50,000 randomly selected addresses for Web sites from its databases. He denied a request by government lawyers for a sampling of 5,000 search queries entered by Google users, concluding that they essentially duplicated information the government could glean from the Web addresses." In a statement, Google said, "This is a clear victory for our users."

Chicago Alderman Seeks To Close Smoking Ban Loophole. The Washington Post (3/20, A3, Lydersen) reports Marshall McGearty Tobacco Artisans is "a 'tobacco lounge' that has opened in Chicago's trendy Wicker Park neighborhood. It appears every bit the bar or coffeehouse. But appearances can be deceiving: Marshall McGearty is technically a tobacco retail shop with at least 65 percent of its sales in tobacco. And that means it is exempt from Chicago's new ban on smoking in bars, restaurants and other public places." Critics "say the parent company of the lounge, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., is taking advantage of a loophole in the city's anti-smoking ordinance." Last month, "city Alderman Edward M. Burke introduced an ordinance to close the loophole in the smoking ban, stating that venues that serve food and drink cannot be classified as tobacco retail stores."

DOJ_NMG_0018421

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Oakland Nearly Finished Paying Out Over War Protestors' Injuries. The New York Times (3/20, Marshall) reports, "A clash between the police and antiwar protesters (in Oakland, CA) nearly three years ago will cost the City of Oakland more than $2 million, including dozens of payouts to people injured when officers fired wooden dowels, bean bags and rubber pellets." The Times continues, "The Oakland City Council is scheduled Tuesday to approve the final payments related to the incident, which was the most violent of many protests nationwide in the early weeks of the Iraq war. At least 58 people were injured, including nine longshoremen who were caught in the crossfire on their way to work." The Times adds, "The Oakland Police Department said officers had fired the 'less than lethal' rounds to disperse several hundred demonstrators, some of whom the police said had thrown rocks at them. … The protesters said they had been behaving peacefully and accused the police of using excessive force. A lawsuit against the city, the Police Department and several officers, which led to the settlement payments, accused the authorities of civil rights violations. … Many here say the officers were on edge during the protest because state officials had warned that terrorists or self-described anarchists might try to disrupt the event, which was held at the Port of Oakland on April 7, 2003."

Studies Warn Of Difficult Plight For Black Men In US. Several new studies from Columbia, Harvard, Princeton and other institutions warn that black men in the US face a more difficult situation than is portrayed by employment and education statistics. The New York Times (3/20, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports, "Focusing more closely than ever on the life patterns of young black men, the new studies…show that the huge pool of poorly educated black men are becoming ever more disconnected from the mainstream society, and to a far greater degree than comparable white or Hispanic men. … Although the problems afflicting poor black men have been known for decades, the new data paint a more extensive and sobering picture of the challenges they face."

Schools Called Front Line In Culture War Over Homosexuality. Charles C. Haynes, a senior scholar at the First Amendment Center in Arlington, Va., writes in USA Today (3/20, 2.31M) that schools "have become front lines in the culture war over homosexuality -- and the biggest losers are the kids caught in the crossfire of incendiary rhetoric and bitter lawsuits." Conflicts involving sexual orientation "are undermining the educational mission of our schools." Haynes adds, "When they begin to listen to one another, most educators, parents and students discover that they want the same thing: public schools that are safe and free for all students. … Once these shared goals are identified, people are ready to tackle other contentious issues such as gay student clubs and the treatment of sexual orientation in the curriculum." If "people on all sides uphold the rights and responsibilities of the First Amendment, they can agree on policies and practices that serve the common good."

ANTITRUST:

Zurich American To Pay $171.7 Million In Bid Rigging Case. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, Pleven) reports Zurich American Insurance Co. "agreed to pay $171.7 million in a settlement with nine states that have been investigating allegations of bid rigging in the commercial-insurance business." The firm, "a unit of Zurich Financial Services of Switzerland, will pay more than $150 million to reimburse policyholders and another $20 million will go to the states to cover investigative and other costs and as payments in lieu of penalties, according to the states."

UK Insurer Prudential PLC Rejects Aviva Takeover Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, A3, Fleming, Wang) reports, "In what is likely to prove the first round in a long-running takeover battle that could affect insurance markets world-wide, United Kingdom life insurer Prudential PLC Saturday rejected an unsolicited £17 billion ($29.87 billion) takeover proposal from larger rival Aviva PLC. Prudential, which isn't related to Newark, N.J., insurer Prudential Financial Inc. but is active in the U.S. through its subsidiary Jackson National Life Insurance Co. of Lansing, Mich., said Saturday it had received a proposal from Aviva about a possible combination of the two London companies. In a statement, Prudential said it had rejected the proposal as not in the best interests of its shareholders." The Journal notes, "People with knowledge of Aviva's overture said the initial proposal was an all-share offer that valued Prudential at about £17 billion, a 6.25% premium to the group's market value. … Although Aviva might improve the proposed terms," Richard Harvey, the company's chief executive, "is seen as unlikely to launch an overtly hostile bid."

Study Of Corporate Takeovers Finds Widespread UK Market Improprieties. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, C4, Patrick) reports, "The U.K. market regulator said it has found widespread signs of improper share-price moves before corporate takeovers are announced. In an effort to assess the deterrent effects of its regulations, the Financial Services Authority studied 1,500 market announcements on takeover bids and company results in various time periods over the past eight years. The researchers found that price movements from nonpublic information may have taken place before 29% of the takeover announcements and before 22% of the trading updates." The Times adds, "The implementation of the Financial Services & Markets Act in 2001, which toughened sanctions for individuals caught insider trading as well as the disclosure requirements for companies, had no apparent change in market cleanliness. … 'The analysis shows that there was no improvement in market cleanliness in the period after the introduction of the FSA's new powers, and before any high-profile enforcement cases were concluded,' said Hector Sants, the FSA's managing director. 'This suggests that visible enforcement action may be the key tool in our work to reduce market abuse,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0018422

Roche, Amgen Engaged In Fierce Lobbying Battle Over Patents. The Roll Call (3/20, Ackley) reports a "furious lobbying effort between F. Hoffmann-La Roche and Amgen Inc. has fueled big spending on K Street and led to both drugmakers hiring heavy-hitting firms and high-profile former government officials." Roche is "pushing for a patent-law change that lobbyists close to the debate say could make it possible for the Swiss-based company to get approval and eventually market in the United States a competing product to Amgen's renal disease treatment, Epogen." Lobbyists "familiar with both sides' strategies now agree that the battle will have much wider implications on patent policy." Sources say Roche has "tapped a bipartisan team that includes Mickey Kantor, the former U.S. trade representative and Commerce secretary under former President Bill Clinton, and Ted Olson, the former U.S. solicitor general in the current Bush administration." Amgen "upped its lobbying spending during the last six months of 2005, after the biotech firm became aware of Roche's quiet lobbying push. Between the first and second halves of 2005, Amgen spending rose by $1 million, from $2.4 million to $3.3 million, according to public filings."

Supreme Court Patent Case Could Have Far-Reaching Implications. The New York Times (3/20, Pollack) reports for the "first time in a quarter-century, the Supreme Court will hear on Tuesday a case involving the basic question of what type of discoveries and inventions can be patented." Both sides "say the case, which involves a blood test for a vitamin deficiency, could have a wide-ranging impact on the development of diagnostics, perhaps threatening many of the underlying patents for genetic and other medical tests." But the "array of companies filing supporting briefs — including American Express, Bear Stearns and I.B.M. — indicates that intellectual property in other fields might also be affected." Some patent specialists "say they think the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case, against the advice of the United States solicitor general, to rein in patenting."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Kempthorne Known To Work With Those Who Disagree With Him. The Christian Science Monitor (3/20, Knickerbocker, 61K) profiles Interior Secretary nominee Dirk Kempthorne, saying he "has both the experience and the record of collaboration that could help smooth the way in the often-contentious position." Kempthorne "is known to work in concert with those who don't agree with him. He believes that the level of government closest to a problem is the best place to find a solution. And though his environmental record - according to those who score such things - is a pale shade of green, he is not a fire-breathing ideologue likely to dismiss endangered species in the name of corporate ranching or a new highway." The Monitor adds that "the Bush administration and Kempthorne face battles over many issues: development in roadless forest areas; salvage logging of burned timber; the proposed sale of some federal land to lessen the federal budget deficit; changes to the Endangered Species Act; a huge backlog in national parks maintenance; oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and the Outer Continental Shelf; and protections for grizzly bears, wolves, and other recovering species."

Firm Offers DOE Space To Store Spent Fuel. The New York Times (3/20, Wald, 1.19M) reports that Private Fuel Storage "is planning to build a private nuclear waste dump on an Indian reservation in Utah has offered to sell space there to the federal government. The move could help the government avoid billions of dollars in potential legal damages over its failure to build its own repository." The Times adds that while PFS recently "won a license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to open a repository at Skull Valley," the consortium does "not have the permits it needs to transport waste to the site, however, and the State of Utah is trying to block those."

Offshore Drilling Advocates Push Revenue Sharing Plan. USA Today (3/20, Dorell, 2.31M) reports that creators of a new campaign to push drilling for oil along the US coasts "say the time is right to get it done. And they say they've come up with a way of doing it that has statehouses, U.S. industry and even some notable environmental groups on board. … The proposal is simple: States that open their territory to drilling will get a cut of the royalties that currently go 100% to the federal government. A specified chunk of royalties must be spent restoring coastlines." Former Louisiana senator John Breaux, a lobbyist for Patton Boggs, "is hoping to build interest." Breaux "is working on a volunteer basis for the state of Louisiana to give it a share of the royalties from oil and gas off its shores. He's working with a coalition of manufacturers, municipalities and energy companies to bring attention to the plan."

DOJ_NMG_0018423

Court Rules Older Sites Must Meet Same Emission Requirements As New Facilities. A US appeals court ruling that aging power plants and industrial sites must meet the same federal pollution standards as new plants may force the EPA to insist that industrial sites upgrade the facilities. The Christian Science Monitor (3/20, Clayton, 61K) calls the ruling "a repudiation of EPA policy under the Bush administration, which sought to exempt plants that predated the 1970 Clean Air Act from compliance with the tougher air-emission standards. It was cheered by environmentalists - especially those who live and work near such power plants. … The ruling could prompt some big utility companies to upgrade pollution controls at the oldest, most polluting power plants, or shut them down." The EPA "could appeal the decision to the US Supreme Court."

Interior Department Urged To Endorse Settlement On North Carolina Road Project. An editorial in the New York Times (3/20, 1.19M) urges the Interior Department to "resist Representative Charles Taylor of North Carolina" who is proposing $600 million on a road "that few people want and nobody needs." Taylor "runs the subcommittee that controls the Interior Department's budget. For that reason, neither the park service nor Interior's outgoing secretary, Gale Norton, has publicly criticized the idea. But there is more at stake here than pleasing one's paymaster. The road would not only blow a hole in the department's budget; it would also leave a scar on one of the most popular national parks." The road "was promised to the residents of Swain County in 1943 when the Tennessee Valley Authority built a major hydroelectric dam, creating the lake and flooding out an existing road. … A cash settlement of $52 million has been proposed." The Journal says the settlement is "fair, and it won't do lasting damage. Interior should endorse the settlement."

Law Firms Rolling Dice On Indian Law. The New Jersey Law Journal (3/20, Toutant) reports, "Native American law, long a well-established practice area west of the Mississippi, is gaining ground at eastern law firms as tribes displaced in the 19th century seek to reclaim ancestral lands -- and make them instantly profitable." The Journal continues, "After the successful land-claim settlement by the Mashantucket Pequot Tribe in Connecticut, which led to the opening of Foxwoods Resort Casino in 1992, and the Mohegan Tribe's acquisition of land in nearby Uncasville, Conn., for the Mohegan Sun Casino, other tribes have started bringing land-claim suits, and law firms are lining up to help them." The Journal adds, "While tribes' finances are short and the odds of prevailing long, there are still legal fees to be generated. That's because there are casino developers willing to underwrite the tribes' legal costs on the chance that they'll obtain a new site for gaming, say Indian law experts. … 'Part of what's going on these days in Indian country is there are certain forces that are trying to unearth potential claims that might be made to re-establish a tribal homeland and ultimately establish a casino,' says Robert Odawi Porter, director of the Syracuse University Center for Indigenous Law, Governance and Citizenship. … In cases where land-claim suits are funded by outsiders, the tribe is usually a passive participant in the litigation, says Porter. Such arrangements are permitted under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act of 1988, which gives states authority to negotiate revenue-sharing agreements with tribal casinos. … But the process is arduous. Last June, the Shinnecock Indian Nation of Long Island filed a claim for 3,600 acres in the exclusive Hamptons resort area that it says belonged to its ancestors. The casino plan is opposed by New York's governor and senators, as well as by residents of the Hamptons. The tribe's costs are being underwritten by Michigan casino developers Marian Ilitch and Michael Malik. Ilitch, founder of the Little Caesars pizza chain, owns the Motor City casino in Detroit. She and Malik are also building an Indian casino in Barstow, Calif."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Funding Constraints Leave New York FBI Agents Without Email, BlackBerrys. The New York Daily News (3/20, Connor, 729K) reports that "many of New York's FBI agents are fighting crime and terrorists without an Internet-ready phone or even an e-mail account, the New York Daily News has learned," and only about 100 have BlackBerrys under a pilot program, the funding for which also is threatened. Assistant Director Mark Mershon "blamed the technology gap on Washington budget constraints. … 'And as ridiculous as this might sound, we have real money issues right now, and the government is reluctant to give all agents and analysts dot-gov accounts,' he said when asked about the gap at a News editorial board meeting. … FBI officials in Washington…insisted that agents are not at a disadvantage because of cost-cutting. Spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan said about half the FBI employees don't have official accounts because e-mail addresses are still being assigned," but "by the end of the year, the entire bureau should have dot-gov mailboxes, she said." The AP (3/20) reports on the Daily News story.

DOJ_NMG_0018424

NYDaily News Criticizes Lack Of Email Addresses, Blackberrys. Under the headline "FBI Terror Fighters Need Modern Tools," The New York Daily News (3/20, 729K) editorializes, "To say there's not enough money in a $2.5 trillion federal budget to give FBI agents e-mail addresses is patently absurd. Which is why headquarters now says everyone will have official e-mail by the end of the year. That must happen." The Daily News adds, "Every business executive in the country has a BlackBerry. Every assistant to every business executive and every law enforcement agency with which the FBI communicates has BlackBerrys. People who want to blow up the Brooklyn Bridge probably have BlackBerrys. Think this is outrageous? E-mail your congressional representative. Which you can, because Congress has e-mail. And BlackBerrys."

12 Face Charges In California For Making Marijuana-Laced Candy, Soda. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Romney) reports, "A dozen Bay Area residents appeared in federal court Friday on marijuana cultivation and distribution charges in connection with a large-scale operation to make pot-laced candy bars and sodas. … Though the packaging evokes the irreverent Wacky Pack stickers of years past by mocking trademarked products, federal officials say the psychoactive goods are no joke. 'The packaging is so similar to that of the name brand, it has the potential to fall in the hands of children, with potentially tragic consequences,' DEA spokeswoman Casey McEnry said."

The San Francisco Chronicle (3/18, Lee) reports the sweets "had colorful labels and names such as Trippy, Stoney Rancher, Toka-Cola, Pot Tart and Budtella. To federal drug agents, they were dangerous marijuana-laced concoctions that could fall into the hands of children. But to sick patients who rely on cannabis to ease their symptoms, they were just tasty ways to get their medicine -- and legal under California law."

The Contra Costa Times (3/18, Simerman) writes, "A day after federal agents seized thousands of marijuana plants and a booty of pot-laced candy and soda pop in raids on warehouses in Emeryville and Oakland, local medical cannabis advocates reacted coolly -- bitter at another federal plunder on a substance the state deems legal for the sick, but leery of an operation that packaged its products to mimic popular brands of sweets."

Eight New Jersey Residents Accused Of Running "Major" Heroin Ring. The Hoboken (NJ) Reporter (3/19) writes, "Hudson County Prosecutor Edward DeFazio and the Hoboken Police Department have arrested eight Hudson County residents for running a major heroin ring. According to Prosecutor Edward DeFazio, the arrests were the result of a six-month investigation by the Hudson County Prosecutor's Office Municipal Task Force, Hoboken Police Department, and the Drug Enforcement Administration. … The searches resulted in the recovery of 22,000 bags of heroin from 'a sophisticated hidden compartment' in a Ford Explorer."

Attorney Accuses DEA Of "Lukewarm" Response To Death Threat. The New York Times (3/20, Mead) reports in its "New York/Region" section that attorney Thomas Liotti "has been branded a big mouth for his self-promotion and propensity to tongue-lash prosecutors, police officers and even judges. … In a press release on Wednesday…he also criticized the federal Drug Enforcement Agency for what he called its lukewarm response to a death threat against lawyers who defend Colombian drug traffickers. 'I want the U.S. government to realize that they have a responsibility to protect everyone, even criminal defense lawyers,' he said."

Detroit Drug Dealers Said To Be Infiltrating West Virginia Town. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/19, Simonich) writes, "Connections between Detroit and rural America remain strong, but nobody romanticizes about them anymore. Detroit doesn't export cars the way it used to. Instead, say police across the region, it turns out drug dealers who travel hundreds of miles to enrich themselves in smaller towns." The Post-Gazette says in Huntington, West Virginia, detectives have a list with more than 250 names of crack dealers.

Washington Post Profiles "Prince Of Pot". The Washington Post (3/18, C1, Struck) profiles March Emery known as the "Prince of Pot," who the Post says Canadians find harmless, but the DEA does not. According to the Post, Emery said, "'I sold millions of [marijuana] seeds proudly to people all over the world," and perhaps 70 percent of them were mailed to the United States, he concedes. "Everything the DEA said is correct -- except I don't buy the charge that I'm poisoning children of America.'"

Poppy Crops Said To Threaten Afghan Democracy. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (3/18, Dine) reports that "poppies are invaluable cash crops to farmers seeking to sustain their families, but dangerous to a young Afghan democracy. An unholy alliance is emerging among farmers, drug lords, Taliban remnants and al-Qaida fighters," and "drugs are already the nation's sole export of any magnitude." They "threaten to turn it into a 'narco-state,'" and

DOJ_NMG_0018425

"Afghan sources say" al-Qaida "has acknowledged in private sessions its satisfaction that expanding heroin use is poisoning 'infidels' in other countries."

Taliban Rebels Said To Be Teaming Up With Drug Lords. The Washington Times (3/18, Duparcq) has included an AFP story on its "World" section that is similar to a story included in a previous briefing. The AFP writes, "Taliban rebels determined to keep southern Afghanistan in chaos have teamed up with drug barons against the government and its opium eradication campaign."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney Downplays Calls For Staff Changes At White House. Asked on CBS' Face the Nation (3/19) by anchor Bob Schieffer about commentators who have said "you need a staff shake-up over at the White House," Vice President Cheney said, "Bob, you know what this reminds me of? It reminds me of 30 years ago when I was Gerry Ford's chief of staff and you were the CBS correspondent covering the White House. … We had the same kind of stories then, the same kinds of controversy. Administrations go through peaks and valleys. It's a tough business that we're involved in, and when you're down in the polls you're going to take shots that you don't deserve, and when you're up in the polls you're probably going to get praise you don't deserve. So I don't think we can pay any attention to that kind of thing. … [President Bush has] got great people around him, and I simply don't give credence to those kinds of comments." Cheney added the "notion that somehow the staff is exhausted -- these are tough jobs, no question about it. But we've got some very good, very able, very talented folks, who are devoted to the president, devoted to trying to do what's right for the country."

In what the AP (3/19, ,Daniel) calls a "rare Sunday morning television interview," Cheney also said again that he will not seek the presidency in 2008 and he "chuckled when asked if he himself had ever considered resigning amid low poll numbers and suggestions by commentators that he was a liability for the administration."

Cheney Has No Plans To Resign. Asked on CBS' Face the Nation (3/19, Schieffer) if he has considered resigning to shield the Administration from unpopular polices or events, Vice President Cheney said, "Well, I made sure both in 2000 and 2004 that the President had other options. I mean, I didn't ask for this job. I didn't campaign for it. I got drafted. And delighted to serve. And it's been the highlight of my career, to be part of this Administration. I've now been elected to a second term; I'll serve out my term."

Murtha Says Rumsfeld, Cheney Should Resign. On NBC's Meet the Press (3/19, Russert), Democratic Rep. John Murtha said President Bush should fire some of the aides responsible for the Administration's mistakes in Iraq, saying Defense Secretary Rumsfeld "should offer his resignation" and "I would accept it." Asked if Vice President Cheney should resign, Murtha said, "Yeah. Well, certainly the Vice President has been the primary force in running, running this war, and many of the mischaracterizations have come about."

Cheney Says He Can Give Bush "Untainted" Advice. The Washington Times (3/20, Hudson, 90K) reports that Cheney's "lack of political ambition to succeed his boss gives him unusual freedom to be a lightning rod for contentious issues and serve as an 'untainted' adviser to the president," he said yesterday. Speaking on CBS' Face the Nation, Cheney said, "This has been a different kind of arrangement than most administrations have between the president and the vice president, primarily because I'm here to serve him; I'm not here to run for higher office," adding, "My advice to him is untainted by any concern I might have about how the folks in Iowa look at me with connection with the 2008 Iowa caucuses."

Barnes Suggests Personnel Changes For Bush Administration. Fred Barnes writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M) that President Bush "can start the equivalent of his third term now, by filling his presidential staff and cabinet with new faces -- or old faces in new positions -- and by concentrating on new or forgotten initiatives. The goal: rejuvenation of his presidency by shocking the media and political community with a sweeping overhaul of his administration." Barnes adds that Vice President Dick Cheney should resign so Bush can appoint Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice as his "presidential successor." Rice, writes Barnes, should be replaced as Secretary of state by Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut. Barnes also writes that Cheney should "move to the Pentagon to replace Donald Rumsfeld as defense secretary." In addition, Barnes recommends Glen Hubbard to replace Treasury Secretary John Snow. Barnes adds that white House Deputy chief of staff Karl Rove should be sent "to the Republican National Committee as chairman," and current chairman Ken Mehlman should be brought "back to the president's staff as communications chief."

Bush Has Been Taking More Questions From Audiences. The New York Times (3/20, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports in its "White House Letter" column that at the "Riderwood Village retirement community last week in the Washington suburb of Silver Spring, Md.," President Bush "got hit with hardballs by the crowd of 80-somethings. Not only did the retirees, many of them Democrats and former government officials, ask sharp questions about the day's topic, the Medicare prescription drug program, they took on Mr. Bush on global warming and nuclear war." The Times notes that "in the last three months, Mr. Bush has started taking questions, some of them tough, from audiences not stacked with supporters."

DOJ_NMG_0018426

Cheney Discusses Hunting Accident. On CBS' Face the Nation (3/19, Schieffer), Vice President Cheney discussed the hunting accident where he shot prominent Texas Republican lawyer Harry Whittington. Cheney said, "Well, I think it's one of those situation or circumstances that is obviously difficult and generates controversy. It's probably the first time the Secret Service ever had to worry about a protectee shooting somebody else instead of being shot at. As the President said the other night, he's at 38 percent in the polls and as a result of this incident I shot the only trial lawyer in Texas who supported him. So people can laugh about it now, but at the time it was deadly serious."

House Expected To Be In Session Only 97 Days This Year. USA Today (3/20, Kiely, 2.31M) reports the House "is on track this year to be in session for fewer days than the Congress Harry Truman labeled as 'do-nothing' during his 1948 re-election campaign." Congress is "taking an entire week off for St. Patrick's Day. It's the latest scheduling innovation to give members more time to meet with constituents." The House "was in session for 19 days, compared with 33 for the Senate. If they stick to their current schedule — including two weeks off in April, a week in May and July, plus all of August — House members will spend 97 days in Washington this year." The House "was in session 108 days in 1948, according to the chamber's archives, compared with 141 days last year."

Republicans Unable To Craft Unified Political, Policy Agenda. The Washington Post (3/20, A1, Balz, Weisman, 744K) reports in a front page story, "Republican efforts to craft a policy and political agenda to carry the party into the midterm elections have stumbled repeatedly as GOP leaders face widespread disaffection and disagreement within the ranks." Lawmakers "involved in the effort" said "anxiety over President Bush's Iraq policy, internal clashes over such divisive issues as immigration, and rising complaints that the party has abandoned conservative principles on spending restraint have all hobbled" the project. While it is "a Republican refrain that Democrats criticize Bush but have no positive vision, for now the governing party also has no national platform around which lawmakers are prepared to rally. Every effort so far to produce such a platform has stumbled." The struggles "reflect philosophical differences among competing factions within the party, but they also underscore the political consequences of holding power. Republicans insist they remain united around core principles of smaller government, lower taxes and a strong national defense, but can no longer agree on how to implement that philosophy and are squabbling over their delivery on those commitments."

Novak Says GOP Lawmakers Attempting "Trial Separation" From Bush. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (3/20) writes, "'Presidents come and go,' Rep. Jerry Lewis told the House Rules Committee last Wednesday. That was a reason Lewis gave, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, for opposing President Bush's proposed line-item veto." Lewis' opposition, along with "similar acts of opposition to" Bush "by Republicans in Congress," is not a "rebellion and is not even a divorce. Rather, it is a trial separation of congressional Republicans from their president." Novak adds, "One of the president's top political operatives is telling the party's members of Congress that they should support Bush, not out of loyalty but for self-preservation. In 1952, Democrats in Congress, accustomed to more than 20 years in power, thought they could survive by separating themselves from" President Harry Truman, whose approval rating was suffering in large part to the "military stalemate in Korea." But "Republicans swept the November elections, which might be an object lesson about abandonment of their president."

Senate Voted Against Social Security Accounts Last Week. Roll Call (3/20, Pierce) reports that in a "little-noticed vote last Thursday, the Senate went on record, apparently for the first time, against President Bush's proposal to set up personal investment accounts under Social Security, with some unexpected Republicans helping a unified Democratic Caucus defeat the nonbinding proposal." Eight Republicans "joined all 45 Democrats in opposing" an amendment by Sen. Jim DeMint, "which would have directed the creation of a reserve fund for Social Security, but only after the Senate produced legislation allowing younger workers to divert a portion of their Social Security taxes into personal investment accounts or permitting some other type of 'legally binding ownership' of a worker's Social Security money." The Republican centrist votes "in opposition — including Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.), Susan Collins (Maine), Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Olympia Snowe (Maine) — were hardly a surprise. But the amendment also forced the hands of some less likely Republican opponents, including Sens. Conrad Burns (Mont.), Pete Domenici (N.M.), Dick Lugar (Ind.) and Jim Talent (Mo.) — who have typically been more loyal to the GOP leadership."

The Washington Times (3/20, Fagan, 90K) reports Republicans "raised the issue of Social Security reform, and Democrats -- surprised that the issue won't go away -- pledged to make it a major campaign issue this year." Sen. Charles Schumer said, "It's going to be one of the big issues in 2006. They just gave us more fuel." The Times adds Schumer "pledged to tell voters that electing a Democratic Senate is the only way to 'make sure Social Security isn't privatized.'" But Democrats "aren't the only ones who see a campaign issue." Sen. DeMint said, "Those who voted against this amendment voted to raid Social Security. Now, every senator will be on record whether they oppose or support the raid."

DOJ_NMG_0018427

MZM Founder Used Several Tools To Win Lucrative Federal Contracts. The Washington Post (3/20, D1, Babcock, Merle, 744K) reports the "recent corruption conviction of former congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham – and" MZM company owner Mitchell Wade's "recent guilty plea for bribing him -- focused attention on Congress's practice of 'earmarking,' or setting aside, federal money for favored interests." But a "review of the rise and fall of Wade and his company, based on interviews and MZM and government documents, shows that bribing Cunningham was only one part of Wade's formula for success. His firm, which had no prime federal contracts in fiscal 2002, collected more than $170 million over the next three years, thanks not just to Cunningham, but also to Wade's ability to take practices common among government contractors and push them to the limit." In a "tight labor market, he paid well above the going rate for workers with security clearances -- wages that left others in the government contracting industry puzzled." He "freely distributed title and rank," and he "aggressively used the 'revolving door' between the government's defense and intelligence bureaucracy and the private industry, attracting top talent and often sending' new hires back to work on contracts at their former agencies and to try to cultivate new business."

E-Mail Uses TSP's Name In Credit Card Scam. The Washington Post (3/20, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Last week's scare at the Thrift Savings Plan is an opportunity to offer this reminder: Do not click on Web links in unsolicited e-mails. Someone, or some group, operating from somewhere, took advantage of the TSP's trusted name in a scam to rip off credit card and bank accounts. The scheme was built around a fictional TSP e-mail and a bogus TSP Web site. … TSP officials have no tally of how many people got the phony e-mail or how many responded and turned over personal financial information. Although it appears that many of the e-mails went to government employees and retirees, TSP officials said they have been contacted by persons who are not TSP enrollees. Some people did fall for the scheme, the officials said."

Krugman Dismisses Notion That Bush Is Big Spender. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (3/20, 1.19M) that "most of the conservatives now rushing to distance themselves from Mr. Bush still can't bring themselves to criticize his actual policies. Instead, they accuse him of policy sins — in particular, of being a big spender on domestic programs — that he has not, in fact, committed. … So where does the notion of Bush the big spender come from? In a direct sense it comes largely from Brian Riedl of the Heritage Foundation, who issued a report last fall alleging that government spending was out of control." Conservatives "fall for the Heritage spin" because it "suits their purposes. They need to repudiate George W. Bush, but they can't admit that when Mr. Bush made his key mistakes — starting an unnecessary war, and using dishonest numbers to justify tax cuts — they were cheering him on."

Hebert Criticizes Proposed Cuts In Cancer Detection Program. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (3/20, 1.19M), "The federal government has a national breast and cervical cancer early detection program, run by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. It provides screening and other important services to low-income women who do not have health insurance, or are underinsured. … At the moment there is only enough funding to screen one in five eligible women. A sensible policy position for the Bush administration would be to expand funding for the program so that it reached everyone who was eligible. It terms of overall federal spending, the result would be a net decrease. … So what did this president do? He proposed a cut in the program of $1.4 million (a minuscule amount when you're talking about the national budget), which would mean that 4,000 fewer women would have access to early detection. This makes no sense. In human terms, it is cruel. From a budget standpoint, it's self-defeating."

WPost Criticizes FCC Ruling On Scorsese Documentary. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/20, A14, 744K) criticizes the FCC's decision that the Martin Scorsese-produced documentary, "The Blues: Godfathers and Sons," which includes scenes in which "musicians and a producer used numerous profanities," did not satisfy the standard that it set in its decision on that "profanity in 'Saving Private Ryan,' that "'in rare contexts, language that is presumptively profane' will still be allowed 'where it is demonstrably essential to the nature of an artistic or educational work or essential to informing viewers on a matter of public importance.'" The Post continues, "How do they know better than, say, Mr. Scorsese? … This is a dangerous kind of line-drawing -- one better left to filmmakers, or even television executives, than government bureaucrats."

GOP Unity Said To Have "Fallen Apart." Newsweek (3/27, Wolffe, Bailey) reports that the Republican Party's unity has "fallen apart." Lawmakers "have lost faith in the president's political touch." GOP candidates "are uncertain how to pull themselves together in the eight months left before the elections. The toughest question: whether to run, as they have in the past, as W Republicans, or to airbrush the president out of their campaigns." Newsweek adds, "Bush's aides say that it would be suicidal for members to run away from the president. In strategy memos circulated on the Hill, Republican National Committee pollsters argue that disunity will only discourage the base from turning out to vote. But even the party's analysts concede that standing shoulder to shoulder with Bush may not always be the best way to win."

DOJ_NMG_0018428

Newsweek Poll Finds Bush Approval Rating At 36%. Newsweek (3/27, Wolffe, Bailey) reports that President Bush "recorded his lowest approval rating in the NEWSWEEK Poll, with 36 percent; congressional Republicans trailed Democrats by 11 points (39 to 50 percent)."

OTHER NEWS:

Snow Says Americans Broadly Sharing In Economic Expansion. In an interview last week, Treasury Secretary John Snow told the Wall Street Journal (3/20, Ip, 2.11M) that "the widening gap between high-paid and low-paid Americans reflects a labor market efficiently rewarding more-productive people. But he insisted Americans are still broadly sharing in the economic expansion." Snow "said the administration intends to publicly challenge perceptions that typical workers and families haven't benefited much from the economic expansion. The extent to which the expansion has been broadly shared is 'the new sort of battle line in the political arena,' he said." The Journal adds, "Mr. Snow distributed a fact sheet that showed after-tax income per person, adjusted for inflation, rose 8.2% from January 2001, when George W. Bush took office as president, through January 2006. The sheet also showed that per-person net worth -- total assets minus debt -- rose 24%, unadjusted for inflation, from early 2001 to the end of 2005."

Slowing Housing Market Could Ripple Through Economy. USA Today (3/20, Hagenbaugh, Knox, 2.31M) reports that during the boom years, thousands of Americans sought work in the real estate industry. Now, as the housing market slows, "there will likely be a lot of stories of people who are bailing out of their real estate jobs and other professions related to housing -- appraisers, mortgage brokers and home construction workers -- and many not by choice. This could send shock waves through the job market and the economy." USA notes, "Almost four out of every 10 jobs created in the past four years were in housing-related fields. At the end of last year, a record 9.8% of U.S. workers were employed in the real estate industry, up from 8.2% a decade ago, according to Moody's Economy.com. Only the health care industry added more jobs. … Existing home sales fell in January for the fifth month in a row, and home builders Toll Bros. and KB Home say more buyers are canceling their orders. In all, home sales are expected to fall 8% from last year's record, according to a group of economists surveyed by USA TODAY in January."

Medicare Drug Plan Is Growing Issue In Congressional Races. Roll Call (3/20) reports that over the St. Patrick's Day recess, Republicans "are aggressively touting" the Medicare prescription drug program "while responding to criticism from Democrats — and, apparently, from many senior citizens — that the plan is too complex and offers too few benefits." And "building on Democratic efforts to stoke the issue back home, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has unveiled an effort to boost challengers in key 2006 House contests by focusing on the drug benefit. The targeted districts so far include seats held by Republican Reps. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Heather Wilson (N.M.), Steve Chabot (Ohio) and Rob Simmons (Conn.)." Democrats are "optimistic that they have a winning issue." Roll Call notes the Medicare program has become an issue in the FL22 race between Rep. Clay Shaw and Democrat Ron Klein, and the Pennsylvania and Rhode Island Senate races. In addition, "seven of the 10 Congressional districts with the highest percentage of Social Security beneficiaries are held by Republicans, as are two-thirds of the top 25 districts. Of those top seven, five are in Florida, making the Sunshine State ground zero in the fight over Social Security and the Medicare drug benefit." But "so far, Susan MacManus, a political scientist at the University of South Florida, hasn't yet seen frustration with the drug benefit translate directly into anger at Members of Congress."

McClellan's Role As Medicare Administrator Examined. In its "Power Player of the Week" segment, Fox News Sunday (3/19, Wallace) profiled Dr. Mark McClellan, Administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services and brother of the White House press secretary, Scott McClellan. As the Federal Government "prepares for the explosion of baby boomer retirees, McClellan is trying to get ahead of the explosion in costs." McClellan: "We're turning Medicare from a program that people have counted on to pay the bills when they get sick to a program that puts just as much emphasis on helping them stay well." Wallace: "Criticism has been intense that the drug benefit is too complicated, that there are gaps in coverage." McClellan: "Well, I'm very pleased that we're filling millions of prescriptions every day for people who, in many cases, had no coverage before or were paying a lot more for their drugs." Asked he feels "when you see your brother being savaged by the White House press corps," McClellan said, "When you're growing up in a family with politics in the blood, you know you can't take any of this personally."

DOJ_NMG_0018429

Boehlert To Retire. Roll Call (3/20, Kurtz, Pershing) reports Republican Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, "the senior Republican in New York's Congressional delegation and a leading House moderate, announced Friday that he would not seek a 13th term." Boehlert's retirement in New York's 24th CD "creates the 18th Republican House vacancy heading into November; his district isn't in the top tier of competitive open GOP seats, but it isn't far down the list."

Sabo To Retires From Safe Democratic Seat In Minnesota. Roll Call (3/20, Duran) reports Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo "announced Saturday that he will retire at the end the 109th Congress instead of seeking a 15th term, as he previously said he would." Sabo's "announcement quickly set off a barrage of interest among potential candidates to succeed him in his heavily Democratic seat and on the Appropriations Committee." But "many Minnesota political observers believe that Sabo's chief of staff, Mike Erlandson, who surrendered the chairmanship of the state Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party last year, is the early frontrunner." Other "potential contenders, according to Minnesota Democratic sources, include: Peter McLauglin, who recently lost the Minneapolis mayoral contest; Sharon Sayles Belton, a former two-term Minneapolis mayor who lost to Mayor P.T. Rybak; state Sens. Scott Dibble and Satveer Chaudhury; state Rep. Keith Ellison; Minnesota House Minority Leader Margaret Anderson Kelliher; Julie Sabo, the Congressman's daughter and a former state Senator; Minneapolis City Council Majority Leader Scott Benson; and City Councilmembers Lisa Goodman and Gary Schiff." Republicans "are not expected to seriously contest the 5th district, which gave Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) 71 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential election."

Rice Wins Luntz's California Presidential Straw Poll. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice won a 2008 presidential straw poll conducted by pollster Frank Luntz at the recent California GOP convention. Rice received 29%, "followed by Virginia Sen. George Allen at 26 percent and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani at 16 percent. What's it mean? With Rice on the 2008 ticket, even as veep, California could go Republican."

Giuliani Said To Be Ready For Presidential Bid. U.S. News and World Report (3/27, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that while former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani has not talked about running for president in 2008, "there are hints he's ready. A key Republican senator tells us that Rudy's peeps are already at work in Florida. And we hear that he's making a trip to Iowa…to help raise money for Republican gubernatorial candidate Rep. Jim Nussle."

New York Races Seen As Indicators Of Potential Democratic Wave. In his Roll Call column (3/20), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says New York could be "a sign of whether a big Democratic wave is developing." Democrats are "making a major effort to flip a handful of Congressional districts in the state, and they hope that strong Democratic showings at the top of the ticket, combined with a favorable national environment, could net them a seat or two in Congress." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) "will coast to an easy re-election victory, and state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer is expected to win the Democratic nomination for governor and crush his eventual GOP opponent in November. Democrats also hope to make gains in the state Senate." New York political observers say Republicans "have a chance to swipe only a single statewide office — attorney general — and even there, Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro, once thought of as a rising star, is off to another unimpressive start." Rothenberg says the Democrats "best opportunity" is Rep. John Sweeney's 20th CD, where he faces Democratic attorney Kirsten Gillibrand. Democrats "should have their best shot at GOP Rep. Jim Walsh" in the 25th CD. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert's "retirement creates an open seat in the 24th district (Utica/Rome), while first-term Rep. Randy Kuhl drew an unimpressive 51 percent in the 29th district against a weak opponent last time, making him an obvious target this time." Democrats "think they have a shot against GOP Reps. Sue Kelly in the 19th district, Tom Reynolds in the 26th district and Vito Fossella in the 13th district." Yet while "this crop of Democratic opportunities is better than in the past, Democrats remain distinct underdogs in all of these seats."

WSJournal Says Republicans Behaving "Like Democrats." An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M) says that "last week, while voting to raise the federal-debt ceiling to $8.96 trillion, Senators had a chance to terminate" the "annual Congressional pending raid." The Journal notes, "Every Democrat in the Senate joined with eight Republicans to kill an amendment by GOP Senators Jim DeMint and Mike Crapo that would have stopped the Bonnie and Clyde budgeting. The vote was 53-46, and on the list of those voting to continue the Social Security raid is every potential 2008 Democratic Presidential aspirant in the Senate, including Hillary Clinton, John Kerry and Joe Biden. Worse, the list also includes Republicans Conrad Burns (Montana), Jim Talent (Missouri) and Gordon Smith (Oregon), who are running for re-election this year. Apparently, these Senators want the money stored in a lock box, but only on the condition that they know how to pick the lock." Republicans "aren't learning from their low approval ratings. They think the way out of trouble is simply to spend more money -- that is, to behave like Democrats."

DOJ_NMG_0018430

Former GOP White House Aide Raises Funds For Clinton. The Washington Post (3/20, A13, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column on Jeffrey Volk, who once worked in the Nixon White House for speechwriter Patrick J. Buchanan and who helped draft Ronald Reagan 's economic platform in 1980. Volk was in New Orleans with his wife and daughter, a freshman at Tulane University, when Hurricane Katrina struck. Volk "called the White House for help," and he says, "there was no one to talk to." Volk then called the office of his US senator, Hillary Clinton, whose case worker could not send a plane to rescue any New Yorkers in the state, but did call "two or three times a day to make sure we were okay." Volk held a December fundraiser for Clinton and raised nearly $100,000 for her Senate campaign.

Massachusetts' Share Of Faith Based Grants Has Fallen. The Boston Globe (3/20, Helman) reports that Massachusetts' share of faith based grant funding from Washington has fallen by more than a third over the past three years, according to federal figures. Religious groups in the state "took in $19.6 million in federal grants under the program last year, down from $29.9 million in 2003, according to figures released this month by the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. … The 34 percent reduction for Massachusetts from 2003 to 2005, which came as funding to faith-based groups nationwide increased, occurred largely during the tenure of Governor Mitt Romney, a Republican who has touted his ties in Washington, D.C., as a boon for Massachusetts." The Globe adds, "The decline in funding to Massachusetts has come as federal funding nationally to domestic faith-based programs has risen from $1.2 billion in 2003 to $1.6 billion in 2005, according to the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives."

Construction Set To Begin On Islamic School Near Annapolis. Near Annapolis, construction has begun on a campus that project directors say will house and Islamic high school, television station, athletic facilities and a college. The Washington Post (3/20, B2, De Vise, 744K) reports, "Mohammad Arafa, executive director of the Islamic Society of Annapolis, said the Mekkah Learning Center will be the first Islamic high school in the region. Work will progress on the $8 million project only as fast as donations permit; religious law forbids the society to take out a loan with interest."

Hamas Holds Key Ministries In Proposed Cabinet. The AP (3/20, Barzak) reports, "Hamas presented a proposed government Sunday, giving itself key ministries after failing to persuade more moderate parties to join in a coalition that could have softened its hard-line image and prevented likely economic sanctions." PM Ismail Haniyeh's list includes one woman and one Christian. Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar would be the new foreign minister. USA Today (3/20, Gutman, 2.31M) says the new cabinet "is dominated by veteran members of the militant Islamic group." The Financial Times (3/20, Morris) runs a similar report under the headline "Hamas Likely To Take Key Cabinet Posts," while the Christian Science Monitor (3/20, Prusher, 61K) titled its story "Key Hamas Cabinet Posts Go To Hard-liners." The New York Times (3/20, Myre, 1.19M), Washington Times (3/20, Mitnick, 90K) and Washington Post (3/20, A8, Wilson, 744K) run similar reports.

In a related analysis piece, the New York Times (3/20, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "As Hamas completes its cabinet, there is a sense that the landscape has changed for some time to come. The Hamas victory is not just a little local difficulty. Hamas is the Palestinian part of the Muslim Brotherhood and the first to win an election; its victory has enormous resonance for radical Islam. It is a defeat for secular nationalism, Nasserite corporatism and for Fatah, the chosen partner of Washington and Israel."

US Helps Cement Gaza-Crossing Compromise. The AP (3/20, Barzak) reports, "With Palestinians facing severe shortages of bread, milk and other foods in Gaza, US officials called an emergency meeting Sunday and brokered a compromise with Israeli and Palestinian negotiators in a two-month-old border standoff. Ambassador Richard Jones said cargo traffic might start flowing as soon as Monday at the [Karni] crossing, and a Palestinian official said a second crossing would be discussed at meetings Monday." After meeting with negotiators from both sides on Sunday, Jones "said later there was an agreement to open another crossing, Kerem Shalom at the convergence of Gaza, Israel and Egypt."

UAE Gave Money To Families Of Palestinian Militants. The New York Times (3/20, Preston, 1.19M) reports, "In the last four years the United Arab Emirates has provided substantial financial support, through its Red Crescent Society, to families of Palestinians, militants as well as civilians, who have been wounded or killed by Israeli forces, according to Red Crescent documents." In 2002 and 2003, the United Arab Emirates Red Crescent Society, "a quasi-governmental organization, made donations to Palestinian charities that included social groups associated with Hamas, the radical Islamic organization that won Palestinian parliamentary elections and has long been designated a terrorist organization by the United States." The secretary general of the Emirates Red Crescent, Sanaa Darwish al-Kitbe, "said the goal of its Palestinian programs was to 'influence the negative atmosphere' to build peace."

DOJ_NMG_0018431

Egyptian Pop Culture Increasingly Anti-American. The Washington Post (3/20, C1, Williams, 744K) reports from Cairo, "When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited this city last month, Egyptians had an unusual choice: watch her on TV as she expounded on issues of war and peace in the Middle East, or go to a neighborhood movie theater and see her portrayed by a look-alike actress belly-dancing and placed in 'adult' situations." The film "is 'The Night Baghdad Fell,' which depicts Egyptian obsessions with war, sex and the United States. Wildly anti-American, it has done a brisk business for two months, a long screen life for Egyptian-made films. In 'Night,' Egyptians fret about an American invasion of Egypt and the potential destruction of their capital. Americans are bullies, rapists and mindless killers. By the way, 'The Night Baghdad Fell' is a comedy." The film, adds the Post, "is only the latest bit of Egyptian pop culture to display deep unease about Americans."

Senators Urge Mexico To Crack Down On Border Tunnels. The Washington Times (3/20, Seper, 90K) reports, "A bipartisan group of US senators" has sent "letters to Mexican President Vicente Fox and members of the Mexican Congress" urging the enactment of "legislation to crack down" on those that finance or construct US-Mexico border tunnels. The letter was signed by Dianne Feinstein, "Republican Sens. Pete V. Domenici of New Mexico, Conrad Burns of Montana, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Jim Talent of Missouri, and Democratic Sens. Barbara Boxer of California and Maria Cantwell of Washington. The Department of Homeland Security has said tunnels typically have been built to smuggle drugs, but have quickly transitioned into passages for smuggling illegal aliens. The senators said they were concerned they could also be used to smuggle weapons and terrorists into the United States."

Opposition Charges Belarus Election Was Fraudulent. The Financial Times (3/20, Wagstyl, Buckley) reports, "Up to 5,000 opposition supporters braved blizzards and threats of violence from the Belarus authorities to protest on Sunday in central Minsk against what they called a fraudulent election victory by President Alexander Lukashenko." Initial returns "showed Mr Lukashenko, denounced by the US as Europe's last dictator, winning more than 90 per cent of the vote." The Los Angeles Times (3/20, Murphy, 958K), Washington Post (3/20, A8, Finn, 744K), Wall Street Journal/AP (3/20) and New York Times (3/20, Myers, Chivers, 1.19M) also report the story. A second New York Times story (3/20, Myers), titled "Incumbent Remains Popular In Heartland's Rural Villages," in which it says "villages…offer a window into Mr. Lukashenko's popular support."

Matthew Kaminski, editorial page editor of The Wall Street Journal Europe, writes in Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M), "In the club of democracy's enemies, Mr. Lukashenko is an elder statesman, a Hugo Chavez of the steppes. He is a clever populist who cultivates other pariahs and holds an old Bolshevik's contempt for opposition and political compromise." He "is widely known, thanks to Condi Rice, as 'Europe's last dictator,' though that nickname sells Vladimir Putin and other recent arrivals short." Lukashenko, "like a Milosevic or Saddam, wants nothing more than for the world to resign itself to a few more decades of him. A tyrant's best ally is fatalism."

Serbs Searching For War Criminals Mladic, Karadzic. NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 5, 2:25, Maceda, 9.87M) reported, "The death of Slobodan Milosevic, the so-called 'Butcher of the Balkans,' has only increased pressure on Serbia to hand over his two most infamous protégés." UN Chief Prosecutor Carla Del Ponte: "Now, more than ever, I expect Serbia to finally arrest and transfer Radko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic to The Hague as soon as possible." Maceda: "But where are Karadzic, the former Bosnian Serb leader, and his military commander, Mladic, who orchestrated the siege of Sarajevo in which 12,000 civilians died, and later, the massacre of some 8,000 men and boys in Srebrenica, both indicted on war crimes, including genocide, and both with $5 million bounties on their heads? Karadzic is thought to be hiding in the mountains of Montenegro, but Mladic has been seen in or near Belgrade, protected by just a handful of loyal bodyguards." The Serbian government "says it's hunting for Mladic and will arrest him, if only to keep talks alive that could lead to Serbia's joining Europe, a key goal."

Calm Returns To Paris After Massive Labor Riot. NBC Nightly News (3/19, story 4, 0:30, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "In Paris now today, relative calm after a night of chaos: Police arrested more than 160 people Saturday as demonstrators clashed with police to protest a law that would make it easier for employers to fire younger workers without cause. Today, the nation's powerful labor unions threatened to stage a potentially crippling general strike if the government doesn't withdraw the legislation by tomorrow evening." USA Today (3/20, Sanchez, Stinson, 2.31M) says "crowds estimated by the French Interior Ministry at more than 500,000 turned out in about 150 cities Saturday in the largest of six weeks of anti-government protests." The New York Times (3/20, Kanter, 1.19M) and the Wall Street Journal (3/20, Higgins, 2.11M), among other sources, also report on the unrest. USA Today (3/20, Stinson, 2.31M) also runs an analysis piece titled "Jobs Law Means Little In Riot-torn Suburb."

DOJ_NMG_0018432

Energy To Top Agenda As Putin Visits China. Energy will be high on the agenda as Russian President Vladimir Putin visits Beijing tomorrow. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, White, Oster, 2.11M) reports that Putin's hosts "are likely to convey growing frustration that Russia hasn't provided as much energy assistance as China has wanted. Beijing is expected to push the Russian leader to commit to specific plans for building oil and gas pipelines to China." The Journal adds, "This week's discussions are expected to center on reviving talks to build a spur that would carry oil directly to China from a $7 billion pipeline Russia plans to build across east Siberia to the Pacific, as well as a stalled gas pipeline."

Beijing Won't Intervene In Talks Over Iron Ore. China's top economic planner said the government won't intervene in continuing negotiations between Chinese steelmakers and foreign mining companies that supply them with iron ore. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, Blumenstein, 2.11M) reports that Ma Kai, head of the National Development and Reform Commission, told a group of US newspaper editors, "The government will not interfere," adding, "This price will be decided on the basis of market and enterprise negotiations."

Latin American, Caribbean Economies Expected To Grow In 2006. The economies of Latin America and the Caribbean are likely to expand 4.3% in 2006, according to the head of a UN regional research group. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M) reports that Jose Luis Machinea, head of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean "said the forecast is based on expectations that Brazil and Mexico, the region's two largest economies, may expand slightly faster than expected. Furthermore, Chile also may perform better than the 5.5% forecast of Eclac, Mr. Machinea said. For now, however, the group isn't changing its estimate."

Consumers In EU, Japan Showing Willingness To Spend Again. The Wall Street Journal (3/20, Whitehouse, Sapsford, 2.11M) reports that "companies and consumers in the euro zone and Japan, the world's second- and third-largest economies after the U.S., have started spending again -- or appear poised to do so -- for the first time in years. The new climate has prompted moves by central bankers in both places to push up interest rates to curb inflation, a policy that could weigh on stock and bond prices everywhere by slowing the flow of cash around the globe." The shift means "the world might be less dependent on the American consumer, whose willingness to borrow and spend has been a primary driver of world growth for the past five years. If U.S. economic growth starts to taper off later this year, as some economists predict, Japanese and Europeans might help pick up the slack, a global rebalancing act that many had hoped for but few had thought probable."

EU Criticizes Pace Of Turkish Reforms. The European Union is criticizing the Turkish government over the pace of its reforms. The Washington Times (3/20, Borowiec, 90K) reports, "Signals from Ankara indicate the problem is likely to surface again as the EU presses Turkey for changes in the treatment of the Kurdish minority and the role of the military." The Times adds, "Tension remained high yesterday in southeastern Turkey, where security forces were reinforced as Kurds prepared to celebrate the Newroz spring holiday tomorrow. Authorities in Diyarbakir, one of the centers of Kurdish unrest, banned civil servants from taking part in the festivities, warning violators of disciplinary action. Newroz is not an official holiday in Turkey. … The EU wants Turkey, a membership candidate, to eliminate all such restrictions."

East African Drought Forces Changes In Cultural Traditions. East Africa's drought is pushing more and more Africans into cities, according to a front page story in the Washington Post (3/20, A1, Wax, 744K). The movement is "putting pressure on already strained resources and changing cultural practices from diet to marriage traditions. The Post adds, "The men of marrying age in East Africa are calling the current dry season 'the drought that killed the dowry.'"

Private Water Management Efforts Losing Support. The New York Times (3/20, Malkin, 1.19M) reports that support is eroding for private water management to bring water to the world's poor. Instead, many "want to return to relying on the local public utilities that still supply 90 percent of the water to those households that have it. There is a 'big-time shift' in tone, said David Boys, a water policy expert with the Public Services International labor federation. Mr. Boys is a member of an advisory panel appointed by United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, that presented its recommendations at the forum, beginning with a call to strengthen local public utilities."

Annan Makes Case For New UN Human Rights Council. In the Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M), UN Secretary General Kofi Annan argues in favor of the new UN Human Rights Council which will be elected on May 9. Annan writes that there is "every reason to hope that the new Council will combine the best features of the old system with some much-needed changes. All those who want it to fulfill this promise now have seven weeks to make it happen. Let no one who cares about human rights remain on the sidelines of this struggle."

DOJ_NMG_0018433

Liberian President Says She Can Offer Bush A Success Story. Fred Hiatt writes in the Washington Post (3/20, A15, 744K) that when Liberia's new President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf was asked during "how she will plead her case for aid to Bush, given draining U.S. commitments to Iraq and Afghanistan, she replies, 'For the reason you said -- he needs a success. Billions are being spent on Iraq, billions are being spent on Afghanistan -- and it will take a fraction of those billions to make Liberia a success story. I think he needs one, and we're going to give him an opportunity to have one.'" Hiatt adds, "When her hour at The Post is over, she waves off the usual pleasantries and asks: What will emerge from this interview? What will Liberia get out of it? … Well, Madam President, I'm afraid this column is the best I can do. I hope you get more out of President Bush tomorrow."

NYTimes Urges US To Aid UN Efforts In Darfur. An editorial in the New York Times (3/20, 1.19M) says that "the Arab militias financed by the government of Sudan to 'cleanse' Darfur of blacks are moving across the border into neighboring Chad." The UN "has described the carnage in Darfur as the world's biggest humanitarian crisis but continues to prove itself completely useless at doing anything to stop it. … That leaves the United States, where the Bush administration has made a few strides. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick appears to be close to getting the United Nations to supplement, if not replace, the woefully ineffective African Union peacekeeping force in the region with United Nations peacekeepers. The United States should also commit to providing specialized reconnaissance and air support for the United Nations force."

WSJournal Criticizes Chinese Officials' Anti-Democracy Tirade. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/20, 2.11M) says, "At the Asia Society's annual corporate conference in Mumbai yesterday, we asked [China's Commerce Secretary Bo Xilai] what the Middle Kingdom might learn from India's experience, particularly as the Chinese economy becomes more integrated with the rest of the world. To our surprise, and to the shock of the audience -- save the mainland rent-a-clap crowd who were along to lend a literal hand -- Mr. Bo embarked on a tirade against democratic freedoms." The Journal adds that "despite prolonged contact with open societies, Mr. Bo still doesn't seem to understand the secret of their success. Near the end of his huff, Mr. Bo backtracked and claimed that Beijing is 'listening' to the voices of its people, and that its citizens are gradually gaining more democratic freedoms. If only it were so."

Abdullah Praised As "Distinguished Statesman." S. Rob Sobhani, president of Caspian Energy Consulting, writes in the Washington Times (3/20, 90K) that Saudi Arabia remained "surprisingly silent" as the rest of the Muslim world erupted in violence over the publication of cartoons of the prophet Mohammad. Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah "is a pious and popular leader of the most significant Muslim country in the world, and he has reset the tone and tenure of political life in Saudi Arabia by emphasizing restraint and tolerance." Sobhani adds, "Under the leadership of King Abdullah, Saudi Arabia is undergoing a political and social reformation. It is incumbent upon the United States to work with this distinguished statesman to ensure that his vision becomes a permanent feature of this strategic, yet combustible, region."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Iraq's Factions Agree To Form Security Council."
"Justices May Further Restrict Domestic Violence testimony."
"Playing Out Of Pocket."
"Chicago Schools Offer L.A.A Cautionary Tale."
"Separation Of Mosque, State Wanes In Indonesia."
"Why May The Chickens Hit The Road?"

USA Today:
"Deaths Fall For U.S., Rise For Iraqis."
"To Head Off Allergies, Expose Your Kids To Pets And Dirt Early. Really."
"Lawmakers Get Out Of The House."

New York Times:
"On Anniversary, Bush And Cheney See Iraq Success."
"Plight Deepens For Black Men, Studies Warn."
"Rumor, Fear And Fatigue Hinder Final Push To End Polio."
"Behind Louisiana Aid Package, A Change Of Heart By One Man."
"Ayatollahs Aside, Iranians Jump For Joy At Spring."
"Cinderella Now Lingers Longer At The N.C.A.A.'s March Dance."

Washington Post:
"Bush Still Upbeat On Outcome Of Iraq."
"George Mason Knocks Out The Champion."
"Dowries Running Dry In Drought-Stricken East Africa."
"GOP Struggles To Define Its Message For 2006 Elections."
"Multiple Layers Of Contractors Drive Up Cost Of Katrina Cleanup."
"Vision For Transit-Friendly Tysons May Slam The Door On Dealer Row."

DOJ_NMG_0018434

Washington Times:
"Bush Vows Strategy Will Win In Iraq."
"George Mason Looks Sweet."
"New Orleans Slowly Back To Business."
"Virginia Mulls Bad-Driver Fees To Save Budget."
"Afghan Man Faces Death For Christian Conversion."
"Hamas Party Dominates Palestinian Cabinet Picks."

Detroit Free Press:
"Granholm Agrees To Abortion Regulation."
"Big Features, Small Cars."
"2 Empty Sites Bedevil County."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"America's Disease Sentinels Overtaxed."
"7 Days, But It's Weeks Of Work."
"Your Space On MySpace Isn't So Private."
"Bright Idea Can Be Bad Sign, 2 Cities Say."

Dallas Morning News:
"Too Much, Too Fast."
"Across Texas, Neighborhoods Feeling Torn Up Over Teardowns."

Houston Chronicle:
"Yates Case Rekindles Emotions."
"Deadly Way Stations."
"Bush, Cheney Cite Gains, Deny Claims Of Civil War."
"Investigation Has DeLay Stuck in Legal Limbo."
"Injured Firefighter Recalls Raging Blaze, A Promise Kept."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush-Iraq Progress; Iraq War Casualties; Marines-Civilian Deaths; Shiite Pilgrimage; Iraq Anniversary; College War Reporters; IL6 Race-Iraq Veteran; ABC Iraqi Reporter.
CBS: Preempted By College Basketball.
NBC: Iraq-Allawi Interview; Marines-Civilian Deaths; Bush-Iraq Progress; France-Employment Law Protests; Serbian War Criminals; Australia-Cyclone; Colleges-529 Plans; Texas-Flooding; Gulf Coast Churches; FEMA-Payment Errors; Cuba-World Baseball Classic; Pet Hospital.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Iraq War Anniversary; Midwest Snowstorm.
CBS: Iraq War Anniversary; Australia-Cyclone; Midwest Snow Storm; Miami-Pirate Radio Station; Yates-New Trial; NCAA Tournament;
NPR: Allawi-Iraq Civil War; Iraq War Anniversary; Belarus-Election; France-Employment Reform Protests; Texas-Floods; Midwest Snowstorm.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with NATO Secretary General Jaap De Hoop Scheffer, Oval Office, the White House; makes remarks on the Global War on Terror, Renaissance Cleveland Hotel, Cleveland, Ohio.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY —Delivers remarks at a luncheon for congressional Candidate Chuck Blasdel, Spread Eagle Tavern & Inn, 10150 Historic Plymouth St., Hanoverton, Ohio; delivers remarks at a reception for senatorial candidate Tom Kean. The Washington Square Conference Center, 520 Broad St., Newark, N.J.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: CITY SCHOOLS _ The Council of the Great City Schools holds its Annual Legislative and Policy Conference. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings discusses how urban schools are making progress under No Child Left Behind and she believes that progress to the next level by advancing the American Competitiveness Initiative. Location: Washington Marriott, 1221 22nd St. NW.

FIREFIGHTERS CONFERENCE _ The International Association of Firefighters holds a legislative conference. Topics to include homeland security, first responder issues, mid-tern elections and challenges facing firefighters. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Remarks by Harold Schaitberger, general president, IAFF. 9:15 a.m. Remarks by Senator Joe Biden, D-Del. 10 a.m. Remarks by Senator Chuck Hagel, R-NE. 10:45 a.m. Remarks by Ken Mehlman, chairman, Republican National Committee. 11:20 a.m. Remarks by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. 2:35 p.m. Remarks by Howard Dean, chairman, Democratic National Committee. 3:45 p.m. Remarks by Andrew Card, Chief of Staff to President Bush. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

SECURITY ISSUES _ American University's Washington College of Law hosts EMININT 2006 (Emerging Issues in National and International Security) to discuss emerging issues in national and international security. Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Session on ``Petro-Security in the Post-9/11 World," with former CIA Director James Woolsey, others. Location: Room 603, American University's Washington College of Law, 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAQ WAR-MARCH _ The National Campaign for Nonviolent Resistance and Military Families Speak Out holds a march from near the Vietnam War Memorial to the Pentagon to mark the three year anniversary of the war in Iraq and call for an end to the war. Highlights: 9 a.m. Rally. Location: Daniel French Drive, near the Lincoln Memorial. Followed by a march across the Arlington Memorial Bridge to the Pentagon. With Stephen Cleghorn, member of Military Families Speak Out from Reynoldsville, PA, whose stepson received a Bronze Star; and Laura Costas of Silver Spring, MD, whose brother served 14 months in the Army Reserves in Iraq in 2003 - 2004 under stop-loss orders. At the Pentagon, organizers plan a ceremony to honor the fallen, and a ``die-in.'' A delegation will attempt to deliver a coffin, representing the dead killed in Iraq, to Secretary of War Donald Rumsfeld. Pentagon, Arlington, VA.

DOJ_NMG_0018435

HAWLEY-AIRPORTS _ 9 a.m. Transportation Security Administration Assistant Secretary Kip Hawley delivers remarks at the Airport Legislative Alliance Spring Washington Conference. Location: L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, 480 L'Enfant Plaza SW.

MOUSSAOUI TRIAL _ 9:30 a.m. Trial of al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui is scheduled to resume at the federal courthouse in Alexandria, Virginia. Location: U.S. Courthouse, 401 Courthouse Square, Alexandria, VA.

IMMIGRANTS-POPULATION _ 10 a.m. The Immigration group FAIR holds a news conference to release a new study, ``U.S. Population Projections to 2050,'' on the impact of current and proposed immigration policies on U.S. population growth. FAIR says that without significant reductions in overall levels of immigration, U.S. population will climb to more than 450 million by mid-century, while increases in immigration currently under consideration in the Senate will add 200 million people to the U.S. population by 2050. Location: FAIR's national headquarters, 1666 Connecticut Avenue, N.W., Suite 400.

DEMOCRATS-IRAQ WAR _ 11 a.m. Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., joins John Podesta, president and CEO of the Center for American Progress, to mark the third anniversary of the War in Iraq. The Center for American Progress will release a report on ``Progress in Iraq: 2006 1st Quarter Report Card'' detailing what it describdes as ``the dangerously incompetent Administration policies that are failing to make 2006 the year of transition to Iraqi sovereignty that Congress called for last year.'' Location: Room S-211, Capitol.

CHERTOFF-MARITIME SECURITY _ 11:45 p.m. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff Michael Chertoff speaks on ``Charting a Path Forward'' following a Heritage Foundation media roundtable, ``Maritime Security: Real Issues, Real Answers.'' Location: Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

BIRD FLU-CABINET _ 1 p.m. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, Secretary of Health & Human Services, Mike Leavitt, and Secretary of the Interior, Gale Norton, hold a news conference to discuss preparations for avian influenza in the U.S. Location: Jefferson Auditorium, South Building, Wing 5 Entrance, U.S. Department of Agriculture, 1400 Independence Ave., SW.

GUANTANAMO DETAINEES _ 1:30 p.m. - 5:30 p.m. George Washington University Law Center and the Center for Consitutional Rights host a legal forum featuring testimony from former Guantanamo detainees about their detention and treatment. The forum will also include remarks from attorneys who represented detainees, military personnel, and policymakers. Location: GWU Law School, Jacob Burns Moot Court Room, 2000 G St. NW.

LIBERIA _ 2:15 p.m. - 3:45 p.m. The President of the Republic of Liberia, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, will discuss ``Liberia's Progress, Potential, and Challenges for the Future'' in a conversation moderated by Center for Global Development senior fellow Steve Radelet. Location: Peter G. Peterson Conference Center, Institute of International Economics, 1750 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SCIENCE-ECONOMY _ 2:30 p.m. - 4:30 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute sponsors a discussion, ``Scientific Talent and U.S. Economic Leadership.'' Participants are Richard B. Freeman, Harvard University; Steven J. Davis, AEI; David E. Weinstein, Columbia University; and Kevin A. Hassett, AEI. Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

NATO-RIGA SUMMIT _ 3 p.m. NATO Secretary General Jaap De Hoop Scheffer addresses a National Press Club afternoon newsmaker. Topic: ``NATO's Operations, Transformation and the Riga Summit.'' Location: National Press Club.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, March 20, 2006 9:10 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Monday, March 20, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060320.pdf; dojclips060320.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, MARCH 20, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

The Letter Of The Law (USNEWS) 3
Democrat: Punish Bush If Law Broken (USAT) 5
Durbin: It's Too Early To Censure Bush (AP-Y2) 6
Feingold's Censure Call A Distraction For His Party (WT) 6
Democrats Should Declare Censure Move 'Irresponsible' (RC) 7
Revising The Old Plan (USNEWS) 9
Sri Lankan Ordered Freed From Border Jail (AP) 10
Rules For An Unruly New War (USNEWS) 11
The President And The Courts (NYT) 12
Gitmo Goat Or Hero? (TIME) 13
A Legal Loose Cannon (TIME) 13
Another Blown Case? (WP) 14
Terror Case: 'Bizarre' Testimony (NSWK) 15

Homeland Response:

SSA Raises Hurdle In Proposal For DP World To Sell U.S. Holdings (WSJ) 15
Nation's Security Is At Stake (USAT) 16
Scuffle Over Ports Deal Stirs Up Protectionist Fears (USAT) 16
Increase In Contracting Intelligence Jobs Raises Concerns (WP) 17
WTC Talks To Resume Next Week (WSJ) 19
Multiple Layers Of Contractors Drive Up Cost Of Katrina Cleanup (WP) 19
Behind Louisiana Aid Package, A Change Of Heart By One Man (NYT) 21
FEMA Asking Some To Return Money Received For Hurricane Relief (AP) 23
Citizens Panel To Share Its Post-Katrina Vision (LAT) 23

War News:

President Bush To Stop In Cleveland On Monday (ABJ) 24
Bush Trying To Rally War Support (CLPD) 25
Bush Marks Anniversary, Never Says 'War' (AP) 26
Assessments At Odds On War's Anniversary (USAT) 27
Some Say Civil War Already Started (LAT) 28
On Anniversary, Bush And Cheney See Iraq Success (NYT) 30
Bush Still Upbeat On Outcome In Iraq (WP) 32
In Iraq, US Influence Wanes As Full-scale Civil War Looms (CSM) 33
Bush Vows Strategy Will Win In Iraq (WT) 35
Quiet Disapproval In US Marks War's Anniversary (FT) 36
Allawi Says Iraq Is In Civil War; U.S. Forces Clash With Gunmen (WSJ/AP) 37
Deaths Fall For U.S., Rise For Iraqis (USAT) 38
Clashes, Accusations Mark Anniversary Of Iraq Conflict (WP) 39
Top Iraqi Leaders Agree To Form A Policy Council (NYT) 40
Iraq's Factions Agree To Form Security Council (LAT) 42
My Vision For Iraq (WP) 43
Justice: Talking Trash (NSWK) 44
Next Chapter As Iraq War Rages, Army Re-Examines Lessons Of Vietnam (WSJ) 45
Realism Pushes US And Iran A Bit Closer (CSM) 48
Iranians See Talks With U.S. As Historic (WP) 49
U.S. General Doubts Talks With Iran Will Promote Mideast Peace (AP) 50
Top U.N. Members To Try To Break Stalemate On Iran (WP) 51
Tehran Courts Support Of Arabs (WP) 52
Ayatollahs Aside, Iranians Jump For Joy At Spring (NYT) 53
Where Comedy Isn't King (NYT) 55
Afghan Man Prosecuted For Converting (USAT/AP) 56
Democracy And Security (WSJ) 56

DOJ:

Federal Prosecutor Joins Arent Fox's D.C. Office (WP) 58

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Prosecutors Have Another Key Witness, From Jail (NYT) 58

Executive Pay Rises Show Big Slowdown In US (FT) 60
CEOs Report Stricter Rules (USAT) 61

Criminal Law:

Defendant In Plame Case Switches Focus To WMD (USAT/AP) 62
Why Clearing A Cop's Name Matters In Abramoff Scandal (WP) 63
An Unassuming Witness, Steeped In The Underworld (NYT) 64
Pellicano Wiretap Witness Admits Scheme (LAT) 65
Men Accused In Child Prostitution Ring Describe Teens As Partners (ABJ) 67
Corruption Case Swallows The Police Force Of A Texas Town (LAT) 68
Killing In Texas Spotlights Attacks On Social Workers (NYT/AP) 70
Victim's Kin Denounce Shooting By Md. Deputy (WP) 70
Quest To Heal Leads Abuse Victim To Face Old Demons (WP) 71
When Words Bear Witness (NYT) 73

Civil Law:

Judge Grants Google A Reprieve (WSJ) 74
Tobacco Lounge Blows Smoke In The Face Of Chicago's New Ban (WP) 74

Civil Rights:

Oakland Nears Final Payouts For Protesters Hurt By Police (NYT) 75
Plight Deepens For Black Men, Studies Warn (NYT) 76
A Moral Battleground, A Civil Discourse (USAT) 79

Antitrust:

Zurich Financial Unit To Settle Bid-Rigging Case With 9 States (WSJ) 80
Prudential PLC Rejects Aviva Bid As Big Insurance Battles Mount (WSJ) 81
U.K. Tallies Market Abuse (WSJ) 82
Roche, Amgen Engaged In 'Arms Race' On Patent Law (RC) 82
Justices Reach Out To Consider Patent Case (NYT) 84

Environment/Indian Affairs:

For Interior, A Collaborative Conservative (CSM) 85
Utilities Offer Energy Dept. Site For Waste (New York Times) 86
State-U.S. Revenue Sharing At Core Of Offshore Plans (USAT) 87
Court Deals Blow To EPA's Relaxed Rule On Air Emissions (CSM) 89
The Road To Nowhere (NYT) 89
Eastern Law Firms Roll The Dice On Indian Law (LAW) 90

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Many N.Y. FBI Agents Have Neither E-mail, Internet-ready Phones (NYDN) 92
Official: Some New York FBI Agents Don't Have E-mail Accounts (NSDY/AP) 93
Internet Untouchable For FBI Agents In City (NYDN) 93
12 Accused Of Making Marijuana-Laced Candy, Soda (LAT) 94
Bitter Fight Over Sweet Pot Treats Drug Agents Fear Candies Appeal To Kids -- Medical Marijuana Users Insist They're Legal (SFC) 95
Raided Pot 'Edibles' Trouble Advocates (CCT) 96
27,800 Bags Of Heroin; Eight Arrests (HRE) 97
Lawyer Criticizes D.E.A. On Death Threat Response (NYT) .. 98
Detroit Dealers Invade West Virginia Town (PPG) 99
High Crimes, Or A Tokin' Figure? (WP) 101
(SLPD) 103
Taliban Rebels Team Up With Drug Barons (WT) 106

Congress-Administration:

Cheney Dismisses Suggestions Of Shake-Up (AP-Y2) 107
Cheney Comfortable In His Role (WT) 107
A 'Third Term' For Bush (WSJ) 108
Hardballs Replace Softballs, And Bush Takes A Few Swings (NYT) 110
Lawmakers Get Out Of The House (USAT) 111
GOP Struggles To Define Its Message For 2006 Elections (WP) 112
Bush Ignores GOP Rebuffs In Congress (CHIST) 114
Private Account Language Fails (RC) 115
Social Security Reform Rejected (WT) 116
A Contractor's Purchase On Power (WP) 117
'Phishing' Scheme Targets Thrift Savings Plan Holders (WP) 119
Bogus Bush Bashing (NYT) 120
Illogical Cutbacks On Cancer (NYT) 121
Fining The Blues (WP) 122
Is Anyone Listening? (NSWK) 123

Other News:

Snow Defends President's Handling Of Economy (WSJ) 124
Slowing Home Market To Ripple Through Many Layers Of Jobs (USAT) 125
Parties Test Messages On Social Security And Medicare Drug Plan (RC) 127
Boehlert Hangs Up His Spikes (RC) 129
Rep. Sabo Calls It A Career (RC) 131
Washington Whispers (USNEWS) 132

DOJ_NMG_0018439

An Empire State Headache For Republicans? (RC) 133
Bonnie And Clyde Budgeteers (WSJ) 135
Katrina Lost & Found: Loyalty (WP) 136
Mass. Loses Ground In Faith-based Funding (BOS) 137
Work Starts On Islamic High School (WP) 139
Hamas Presents Proposed Cabinet (AP) 140
Hamas Presents Cabinet To Palestinian President (USAT) 141
Hamas Likely To Take Key Cabinet Posts (FT) 142
Key Hamas Cabinet Posts Go To Hard-liners (CSM) 142
Hamas, Failing To Find Partners, Proposes Cabinet (NYT) 144
Hamas Party Dominates Palestinian Cabinet Picks (WT) 145
Hamas Is Alone In Cabinet Plan (WP) 146
A New Landscape: Hamas Digs In (NYT) 147
U.S. Brokers Compromise On Gaza Crossing (AP) 148
Emirates Aided Kin Of Palestinian Militants (NYT) 150
In Egyptian Movies, Curses! We're The Heavies (WP) 151
Mexico Urged To Act On Border Tunnels (WT) 153
Thousands In Belarus Protest Against Poll 'fraud' (FT) 153
Belarus President Expected To Win Reelection Amid Protests (LAT) 154
President Wins Big In Belarus Vote; Thousands Protest Results (WP) 156
Lukashenko Wins Election; Opposition Calls For New Election (WSJ/AP) 157
Protesters Charge Fraud In Belarus Presidential Election (NYT) 158
Incumbent Remains Popular In Heartland's Rural Villages (NYT) 160
Europe's Last Dictator (WSJ) 160
Furor Over French Employment Law Rages On (USAT) 162
French Unions Threaten To Strike (NYT) 163
French Unions Threaten To Strike (WSJ) 164
Jobs Law Means Little In Riot-torn Suburb (USAT) 165
China Puts Energy At Top Of Agenda For Putin's Visit (WSJ) 165
Beijing Passes On Intervening Over Iron Ore (WSJ) 167
Americas Brazil, Mexico, Chile Are Expected To Fuel Strong Area Growth (WSJ) 167
Consumers In Japan And Europe May Help To Drive Global Growth (WSJ) 168
EU Raps Ankara For Pace Of Reforms (WT) 170
Dowries Running Dry In Drought-Stricken East Africa (WP) . 170
At World Forum, Support Erodes For Private Management Of Water (NYT) 172
Wise Council (WSJ) 173
The Case For Caring Now (WP) 174
Spreading Genocide To Chad (NYT) 176
A Chinese Huff (WSJ) 176
King Abdullah: Protector (WT) 177

TERRORISM NEWS:

The Letter Of The Law (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, March 20, 2006

In the dark days after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, a small group of lawyers from the White House and the Justice Department began meeting to debate a number of novel legal strategies to help prevent another attack. Soon after, President Bush authorized the National Security Agency to begin conducting electronic eavesdropping on terrorism suspects in the United States, including American citizens, without court approval. Meeting in the FBI's state-of-the-art command center in the J. Edgar Hoover Building, the lawyers talked with senior FBI officials about using the same legal authority to conduct physical searches of homes and businesses of terrorism suspects--also without court approval, one current and one former government official tell U.S. News. "There was a fair amount of discussion at Justice on the warrantless physical search issue," says a former senior FBI official. "Discussions about--if [the searches] happened--where would the information go, and would it taint cases."

FBI Director Robert Mueller was alarmed by the proposal, the two officials said, and pushed back hard against it. "Mueller was personally very concerned," one official says, "not only because of the blowback issue but also because of the legal and constitutional questions raised by warrantless physical searches." FBI spokesman John Miller said none of the FBI's senior staff are aware of any such discussions and added that the bureau has not conducted "physical searches of any location without consent or a judicial order."

DOJ_NMG_0018440

In December, the New York Times disclosed the NSA's warrantless electronic surveillance program, resulting in an angry reaction from President Bush. It has not previously been disclosed, however, that administration lawyers had cited the same legal authority to justify warrantless physical searches. But in a little-noticed white paper submitted by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to Congress on January 19 justifying the legality of the NSA eavesdropping, Justice Department lawyers made a tacit case that President Bush also has the inherent authority to order such physical searches. In order to fulfill his duties as commander in chief, the 42-page white paper says, "a consistent understanding has developed that the president has inherent constitutional authority to conduct warrantless searches and surveillance within the United States for foreign intelligence purposes." The memo cites congressional testimony of Jamie Gorelick, a former deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration, in 1994 stating that the Justice Department "believes, and the case law supports, that the president has inherent authority to conduct warrantless physical searches for foreign intelligence purposes."

"Black-bag jobs." Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse says the white paper cited the Gorelick testimony simply to bolster its legal defense of the NSA's electronic surveillance program. Roehrkasse points out that Justice Department lawyers have told Congress that the NSA program "described by the president does not involve physical searches." But John Martin, a former Justice Department attorney who prosecuted the two most important cases involving warrantless searches and surveillance, says the department is sending an unambiguous message to Congress. "They couldn't make it clearer," says Martin, "that they are also making the case for inherent presidential power to conduct warrantless physical searches."

It could not be learned whether the Bush administration has cited the legal authority to carry out such searches. A former marine, Mueller has waged a quiet, behind-the-scenes battle since 9/11 to protect his special agents from legal jeopardy as a result of aggressive new investigative tactics backed by the White House and the Justice Department, government officials say. During Senate testimony about the NSA surveillance program, however, Gonzales was at pains to avoid answering questions about any warrantless physical surveillance activity that may have been authorized by the Justice Department. On February 6, Patrick Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, asked Gonzales whether the NSA spying program includes authority to tap E-mail or postal mail without warrants. "Can you do black-bag jobs?" Leahy asked. Gonzales replied that he was trying to outline for the committee "what the president has authorized, and that is all that he has authorized"--electronic surveillance. Three weeks later, Gonzales amended his answer to Leahy's question, stating that he was addressing only the legal underpinnings for the NSA surveillance program but adding: "I did not and could not address operational aspects of the program, or any other classified intelligence activities." In the past, when Congress has taken up explosive issues that affect the bureau, Mueller has made it a point, officials have said, to leave Washington--and sometimes the country--so as not to get pulled into the political crossfire. When Gonzales testified February 6, Mueller was on his way to Morocco.

Government officials told the magazine that Mueller and then Deputy Attorney General James Comey, who also questioned the NSA spying program, both believed that while it was a close call legally, the president did have authority to conduct electronic surveillance of terrorism suspects in the United States without court approval; both men, however, raised grave concerns about the possible use of any information obtained from any warrantless surveillance in a court of law.

At least one defense attorney representing a subject of a terrorism investigation believes he was the target of warrantless clandestine searches. On Sept. 23, 2005--nearly three months before the Times broke the NSA story--Thomas Nelson wrote to U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut in Oregon that in the previous nine months, "I and others have seen strong indications that my office and my home have been the target of clandestine searches." In an interview, Nelson said he believes that the searches resulted from the fact that FBI agents accidentally gave his client classified documents and were trying to retrieve them. Nelson's client is Soliman al-Buthe, codirector of a now defunct charity named al-Haramain, who was indicted in 2004 for illegally taking charitable donations out of the country. The feds also froze the charity's assets, alleging ties to Osama bin Laden. The documents that were given to him, Nelson says, may prove that al-Buthe was the target of the NSA surveillance program.

The searches, if they occurred, were anything but deft. Late at night on two occasions, Nelson's colleague Jonathan Norling noticed a heavyset, middle-aged, non-Hispanic white man claiming to be a member of an otherwise all-Hispanic cleaning crew, wearing an apron and a badge and toting a vacuum. But, says Norling, "it was clear the vacuum was not moving." Three months later, the same man, waving a brillo pad, spent some time trying to open Nelson's locked office door, Norling says.

DOJ_NMG_0018441

Nelson's wife and son, meanwhile, repeatedly called their home security company asking why their alarm system seemed to keep malfunctioning. The company could find no fault with the system.

In October, Immergut wrote to Nelson reassuring him that the FBI would not target terrorism suspects' lawyers without warrants and, even then, only "under the most exceptional circumstances," because the government takes attorney-client relationships "extremely seriously." Nelson nevertheless filed requests, under the Freedom of Information Act, with the NSA. The agency's director of policy, Louis Giles, wrote back, saying, "The fact of the existence or nonexistence of responsive records is a currently and properly classified matter."

"Maximum speed." For the FBI, the very mention of the term "black-bag jobs" prompts a bad case of the heebie-jeebies. In 1975 and 1976, an investigative committee led by then Sen. Frank Church documented how the FBI engaged in broad surveillance of private citizens and members of antiwar and civil rights groups, as well as Martin Luther King Jr. The committee's hearings and the executive-branch abuses that were documented in the Watergate investigation led to numerous reforms, including passage of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act in 1978. The law created a special secret court tasked with approving electronic wiretaps in espionage and other national security investigations. After the Aldrich Ames spy case, Congress amended FISA to include approval of physical searches. After 9/11, the law was further amended to allow investigators to place wiretaps or conduct physical searches without notifying the court for 72 hours and to obtain "roving" wiretaps to allow investigators to tap multiple cellphones.

In justifying the NSA's warrantless surveillance program, Gonzales has argued that the review process required for a FISA warrant is too cumbersome for a program that is of "a military nature" and that requires "maximum speed and agility to achieve early warning."

White House lawyers, in particular, Vice President Cheney's counsel David Addington (who is now Cheney's chief of staff), pressed Mueller to use information from the NSA program in court cases, without disclosing the origin of the information, and told Mueller to be prepared to drop prosecutions if judges demanded to know the sourcing, according to several government officials. Mueller, backed by Comey, resisted the administration's efforts. "The White House was putting pressure on Mueller to broadly make cases with the intelligence," says one official. "But he did not want to use it as a basis for any affidavit in any court." Comey declined numerous requests for comment. Sources say Mueller and his general counsel, Valerie Caproni, continue to remain troubled by the domestic spying program. Martin, who has handled more intelligence-oriented criminal cases than anyone else at the Justice Department, puts the issue in stark terms: "The failure to allow it [information obtained from warrantless surveillance] to be used in court is a concession that it is an illegal surveillance."

Mueller has been criticized by some agents for being too close to the White House. His predecessor, Louis Freeh, made his break publicly from President Clinton, even returning his White House security access badge. Until recently, Mueller reported to the White House daily to brief Bush and Cheney. But Mueller has not shied away from making tough decisions. He refused to allow FBI agents to participate in CIA and Defense Department interviews of high-value prisoners because of the administration's use of aggressive interrogation techniques. In Iraq and at the Pentagon-run camp for terrorism suspects at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, it has been FBI agents who have called attention to what they viewed as abuse of detainees.

It is unclear how much resistance from the FBI the White House and the Justice Department will be willing to brook. What is clear, however, is the extraordinary extent to which officials in both places inject themselves in the bureau's operations. In late 2004, President Bush asked then FBI Deputy Director Bruce Gebhardt, filling in for Mueller during the daily White House briefings, minute details about a suspected terrorism threat in Kansas. "Don't worry, Mr. President," responded Gebhardt, straight-faced. "We have Kansas surrounded."

Democrat: Punish Bush If Law Broken (USAT)

USA Today, March 20, 2006

A top Senate Democrat said Sunday that President Bush should be held responsible if he violated the law in authorizing a domestic spying program. But Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois said it is too early to tell whether censure or impeachment of Bush would be appropriate. “I don't want to prejudge it,” Durbin, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, said on Fox News Sunday. “But if this president or any president violates the law, he has to be held accountable.” Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., introduced censure legislation last week, saying Bush violated the law in not informing Congress or getting approval from a secretive court to conduct the eavesdropping program.

Accidents involving commercial airlines and private aircraft rose last year, but fatalities declined, the National Transportation Safety Board says. NTSB Chairman Mark Rosenker called the increase in accidents to 1,779 last year from 1,717 in 2004 "disappointing," but said the decrease in fatalities is a "hopeful sign." Fatalities fell to 600 last year — most involving small plane crashes — from 636 in 2004. Twenty-two deaths occurred in three commercial incidents. In December, a Southwest jet skidded off a snowy runway at Chicago's Midway Airport and hit a car, killing a boy in the vehicle. Also in December, a Chalk Ocean Airways plane broke up shortly after takeoff from Miami, killing 20 people. Last June at Washington's Reagan National Airport, a ground worker operating a mobile baggage loader was killed after striking a plane.

Vice President Cheney dismissed suggestions that the White House needs a shake-up in the wake of President Bush's record-low job-approval ratings. "I don't think we can pay any attention to that kind of thing," Cheney said on CBS' Face the Nation. "The president … ignores the background noise." Bush's approval sank to 36% in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken March 10-12. Cheney said he heard grumbling 30 years ago as chief of staff for President Ford. "Administrations go through peaks and valleys," he said. "When you're down in the polls you're going to take shots that you don't deserve, and when you're up in the polls you're probably going to get praise you don't deserve."

President Bush's Cabinet simulated a smallpox attack Saturday as the government tested plans to counter the potential use of bioweapons. White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said there is no indication that a smallpox attack is imminent. The government has stockpiled vaccine for everyone in the USA, she said. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Director Julie Gerberding joined the secretaries of Homeland Security, Health and Human Services, Agriculture, Transportation and Veterans Affairs in the four-hour exercise to identify gaps in local, state and federal preparedness plans.

Durbin: It's Too Early To Censure Bush (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 19, 2006

A top Senate Democrat said Sunday that President Bush should be held responsible if he violated the law in authorizing the domestic spy program.

But Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois said it is too early to tell if either censure or impeachment of Bush would be appropriate.

"I can't rule anything out until the investigation is complete. I don't want to prejudge it," said Durbin, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat. "But if this president or any president violates the law, he has to be held accountable."

Durbin's colleague, Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., last week introduced censure legislation, saying Bush violated the law in not fully informing Congress or getting approval from a secretive court to conduct the eavesdropping program. A censure resolution, if adopted, would amount to Congress scolding the president.

Since then, few Democrats have embraced the proposal, while some Republicans have sought to the cast the move as a shameless political ploy over a vital national security issue. Feingold is considered a presidential contender for 2008.

Appearing on "Fox News Sunday," Durbin said he so far has not heard a valid legal justification for the spy program that was put in place after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. But he said considering the stronger sanction of impeachment was not a "valuable discussion at this point."

"It's valuable that Senator Feingold is moving us forward to finally be a catalyst to have the kind of hearings and the kind of deliberations as to what lies behind this warrantless wiretap situation," said Durbin, calling the overall inquiries so far by the Republican-controlled Senate inadequate.

"We have a responsibility to ask the hard questions, to find out what the nature of the program is and whether the president violated the law," Durbin said.

Feingold's Censure Call A Distraction For His Party (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

Congressional Democrats say Sen. Russell D. Feingold's move to censure President Bush for authorizing warrantless surveillance is a distraction from their quest to take back Congress in the fall.

"Every time we get in a great strategic position, we manage to energize the Republican base," Rep. James P. Moran, Virginia Democrat, told The Washington Times.

"Everything is going well for the Democrats and President Bush is tanking in the polls, and then Russ Feingold comes up with the idea of censure, which is going to go nowhere and is not just quixotic but is somewhat self-serving," he said.

Mr. Moran's comments echoed a theme used by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi last week during a briefing with reporters.

The California Democrat said that Republicans want censure to become an election issue to make the minority party look bad and that she would not support censuring the president.

"I have no idea why anybody would censure someone before they have an investigation," she said. "Why doesn't everybody just channel their energy into winning the election?"

The Senate's No. 2 Democrat, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, said it is too soon to make a decision about censuring Mr. Bush for his approval of domestic warrantless surveillance to investigate terror suspects.

"It's valuable that Senator Feingold is moving us forward to finally be a catalyst to have the kind of hearings and the kind of deliberations as to what lies behind this warrantless wiretap situation," said Mr. Durbin on "Fox News Sunday." "We have a responsibility to ask the hard questions, to find out what the nature of the program is and whether the president violated the law."

Already, the Republican National Committee seized on the censure effort put forth by Mr. Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat, last week.

"Sen. Feingold has become a hero again amongst the out-of-the mainstream liberal Democrat base," reads a release on GOP.com.

Mr. Feingold defended his efforts and accused his party members of "cowering," saying Mr. Bush has broken the law and has lied to Congress for ordering the eavesdropping within the United States.

"All Americans want to fight terrorism and protect our country from those who wish to do us harm, but they don't want to sacrifice the rights and principles our country was founded upon," Mr. Feingold said. "One of those fundamental American principles is that the president doesn't get to pick and choose which laws he follows."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, defended the wiretapping as a vital national security tactic.

Other Republicans dismissed Mr. Feingold's censure resolution as a "political stunt." Mr. Frist tried to force a floor vote on the measure, bypassing the Senate Judiciary Committee, but, Senate Democrats have refused to allow that.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said the censure effort should go through the proper committee channels before it comes to the Senate floor. He praised Mr. Feingold as a "man of principle."

"The Judiciary Committee should hold hearings on this, so that the American people and Congress can find out what's going on with the program," he told reporters last week. "I'm going to wait until the committee does its work."

"People should cool their jets and let the process take its course."

Mr. Moran said the censure measure put forth by Mr. Feingold has no chance of being considered by the Republican-controlled House or Senate, "So why do it?"

"You can find lots of reasons to censure President Bush, but we have no power to do so," Mr. Moran said. However, two Democratic senators -- Barbara Boxer of California and Tom Harkin of Iowa -- added their names to Mr. Feingold's censure resolution.

"We have an out-of-control president whose arrogant and, now, illegal behavior is running our country into the ditch," Mr. Harkin says on his Web site. "It's time to rein him in."

Democrats Should Declare Censure Move 'Irresponsible' (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

The best thing that can be said about the call by Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) to censure President Bush is that practically none of his colleagues is backing him up.

DOJ_NMG_0018444

Democrats are not, as he charges, "cowering" in the face of possible Republican allegations that they are pro-terrorist. Rather, they don't want to distract attention from the main Democratic assaults on Bush and the GOP — that he's "incompetent" and that Republicans are in "disarray."

Moreover, as The New York Times reported Thursday, Feingold's move is being used by Republicans, right-wing talk show hosts and conservatives in general to motivate the base.

It's suddenly occurring to Republicans that if Democrats capture control of either chamber of Congress, they'll use their subpoena power to make life pure hell for Bush and the GOP over the next two years.

And, if it's the House that Democrats carry, it's not out of the question that impeachment proceedings could be launched against him in a Judiciary Committee chaired by firebrand lefty Rep. John Conyers (Mich.).

However demoralized Republicans are about Bush and the state of the country, the prospect of seeing him pilloried should help bring out GOP voters.

Moreover, the idea that Democrats might impeach Bush could turn off ordinary voters, much as the impeachment of President Bill Clinton did in 1998. That cost Republicans four House seats, a loss that led to the ousting of then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.).

Feingold himself has said he thinks Bush has committed an impeachable offense by ordering "secret" and "illegal" National Security Agency wiretaps of "domestic" terrorist targets. He claims he's being "moderate" by moving to only censure Bush.

In fact, the whole enterprise is irresponsible — and I'd like to believe that's another reason why Democrats are ducking endorsement of Feingold's action, even though no party leader has actually used that word in public.

While Democratic leaders don't want to endorse Feingold's move, they also are evidently cowering at the prospect of being further savaged by left-wing Web loggers who already are denouncing them for being "soft" on Bush.

Feingold himself admits that he favors wiretapping terrorists and would not stop the program Bush has undertaken, which he says "can easily be done" under existing law.

If that's the case, then the responsible thing for a Senator to do — especially someone who wants to be president — would be to find a way to adjust the law to enable the government to find out what terrorists are up to, rather than punishing a president who believed he had to skirt the law to do it.

In any event, Bush did report what he was doing to Congressional leaders, including Democrats, so it was not entirely "secret." It's not clear — because details of the program are secret — why Bush believed he could not comply with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and obtain warrants for the taps. If FISA procedures are too onerous, the responsible thing would be to make them less so.

Moreover, there's no evidence whatsoever that any innocent Americans have been harmed as a result of the NSA wiretaps or that Bush has ordered them for some nefarious or political purpose.

Feingold wants to censure Bush — and personally believes it's impeachable — for, at worst, an excess of diligence in protecting the country from terrorists who have vowed to kill millions of us if they can. This is scarcely a "high crime" or even a "crime."

Feingold has the reputation of being a sincere and principled civil libertarian, liberal and foreign policy dove. So, it seems he's being honest in his irresponsibility.

On the other hand, what he's doing is also politically advantageous, short-term, for his presidential prospects, even as it's politically disastrous for the Democratic Party as a whole. I'd say it's also politically polarizing and dangerous for the country.

Feingold hopes to distinguish himself among all the other male candidates chasing front-running Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) — and steal some of the ardent lefties who might otherwise support her and who now see him as more courageous than she.

Feingold wants to become the leading 2008 candidate of the anti-war left of the Democratic Party — the wing that nominated another sincere, principled anti-war liberal, Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), in 1972. He lost 49 states to President Richard Nixon that fall.

DOJ_NMG_0018445

Feingold's move reinforces the party's image as "McGovernite" — weak on national security — at a time when Bush's inept Hurricane Katrina response and the Dubai ports disaster has given Democrats an opening to knock Bush on homeland security.

Democrats seem to understand the danger of repeating the McGovern mistake. That's why they rejected now-Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean as their 2004 nominee and picked Vietnam War veteran Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) as an "electable" alternative. Right now, most Democrats are similarly shying away from Feingold's censure initiative, deeming it too far out.

On the other hand, Bush-hatred and partisanship is so intense among Democrats that their leaders often go far out themselves, as when House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) embraced the proposal for a rapid withdrawal from Iraq by Rep. John Murtha (Pa.), and when Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) labeled various GOP Senators as corrupt and had to apologize.

Such conduct is a gift to Republicans. As Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) told me, "every time us Republicans get into trouble, along come the Democrats to help us out."

Still, if Feingold's move is another gift to the GOP, it's not a gift to the country. The more left-wing activists pressure Democrats and right-wing activists pressure Republicans, the less chance there is that the two parties can come together to win the country's wars and solve its problems.

The latest bipartisan George Washington University Battleground survey shows that the public hates this back-and-forth. Asked whether they preferred that Members of Congress possess "strength of values and convictions" or "willingness to find practical, workable solutions," respondents favored "workable solutions" by 58 percent to 38 percent.

This suggests that the country hungers for a real "uniter" not "divider" as president in 2008. And that would not be Russ Feingold.

Revising The Old Plan (USNEWS)

By Linda Robinson

U.S. News and World Report, March 20, 2006

The Bush administration released a key document last week, following on the signing of a classified directive that gives new orders to government agencies about their roles in the war on terrorism. As a result, the National Counterterrorism Center must now produce a National Implementation Plan in the next 90 days. The NCTC, created by Congress after the 9/11 attacks, has already compiled a database of some 200,000 suspected terrorists or terrorist facilitators. Last week, the deputy director of the center, Kevin Brock, said that law enforcement in the United States is turning up about 60 "hits" a day from that list.

The new version of the administration's national security strategy was unveiled by senior White House adviser Stephen Hadley. In a change from the September 2002 version, which said that neither religion nor ideology was the enemy, the new document describes the terrorist threat as a "murderous ideology" that will require both military forces and a "battle of ideas" to defeat. New emphasis is also placed on relying on other countries to help fight the war on terrorism and spread democracy. Iran, believed to be developing a nuclear weapons capability, came in for a veiled warning. Diplomacy to dissuade the regime in Tehran "must succeed," the 49-page document states, "if confrontation is to be avoided." The White House wants to keep Tehran guessing about President Bush's intentions, but there was little confusion about his policy of pre-emption--striking at America's adversaries before they strike first. Bush is still all for it.

Interagency conflicts. The National Security Presidential Directive gives new marching orders to each agency for its role in the war on terrorism. That classified document is colabeled National Security Presidential Directive 46 and Homeland Security Presidential Directive 15, since it also directs domestic agencies on their responsibilities. A major goal of the new NSPD is to resolve discrepancies among previous presidential directives and chronic conflicts among agencies with overlapping responsibilities: The State and Defense departments have wrangled over jurisdiction for the war on terrorism in countries where the United States is not at war, and the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security have had similar turf disputes at home. The Central Intelligence Agency and the Pentagon have both claimed roles in intelligence collection abroad.

Now it falls to the National Counterterrorism Center to make sure each entity does what it has been ordered to do. Congress created the NCTC and gave it two mandates: to fuse the intelligence from all the disparate U.S. intelligence and law enforcement entities and conduct "strategic operational planning" across all those agencies to ensure there is a common plan implemented at home and abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0018446

Among other things, the NCTC maintains a database of "people we want to know about because we believe they are linked to terrorism," Brock, the NCTC's deputy director, explained. The database has 325,000 names on it, including aliases; Brock estimates the names represent as many as 200,000 individuals. The database is being provided to local police, and Brock says they are responding: "We are getting about 120 hits a day, and about half of them are real."

Sri Lankan Ordered Freed From Border Jail (AP)

By Peter Prengaman

AP, March 20, 2006

SAN DIEGO - After more than four years in a U.S. detention center, Ahilan Nadarajah will soon gain the freedom he sought when he fled Sri Lanka and the government forces there that he says repeatedly jailed and tortured him.

He had reached the United States in October 2001 only to be detained on the same accusations that almost got him killed in his home country: He was suspected of being a member of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a separatist group listed as a terrorist organization by the U.S. State Department.

Nadarajah denies the claims, and immigration judges have twice granted him asylum. But the federal government refused to release him.

The latest order came Friday from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, telling the U.S. government it was violating federal law by continuing to hold him even though he wasn't criminally charged and couldn't be deported in the foreseeable future. His lawyers said they now expect him to be freed in a few days.

"I lost my time and my life, and I almost lost my mind, too," Nadarajah said in a phone interview from the Otay Mesa detention center, at the U.S.-Mexico border south of San Diego. "It's not fair. They put me in jail without reason."

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said the decision was being reviewed but would not elaborate. It wasn't immediately clear if the government would appeal the court's decision.

Nadarajah, an ethnic Tamil who turns 26 on Wednesday, came from a family of farmers in northern Sri Lanka, the island nation of 20 million off the coast of India.

In 1995, the Sri Lankan army bombed the area, killing Nadarajah's older brother and forcing the family to relocate. When they later returned, Nadarajah was accused of being a member of the Tamil Tigers, a group that was fighting for an independent state for the ethnic minority on Sri Lanka.

Nadarajah says he was repeatedly jailed and tortured by government forces there that pistol-whipped him, forced his head into a plastic bag with gasoline and left him hanging upside down for hours. Finally, he got a passport and exit visa from a smuggler and traveled through Thailand, South Africa, Brazil and Mexico before he was arrested at the U.S. border on Oct. 27, 2001.

He applied for asylum, arguing that if he were sent back to Sri Lanka he would be tortured and possibly killed.

The U.S. government opposed his application, saying he was affiliated with the Tamil Tigers.

In the 9th Circuit's ruling Friday, Judge Sidney R. Thomas said Nadarajah's detention was "unreasonable, unjustified and in violation of federal law," and called a government argument "patently absurd." The ruling followed a 2001 Supreme Court ruling that immigrants must be freed if their deportation is "no longer reasonably foreseeable," a period interpreted by many legal experts as being about six months.

Nadarajah's attorney described the case as one of the Bush administration's repeated violations of immigration law in the name of national security.

"The government got it completely wrong about whether he was a terrorist, and overreached for detention powers Congress never granted," said Ahilan Arulanantham of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Nadarajah is anxious to be free. He wants to improve his English - which he learned in jail after arriving without speaking a word of the language - go to college and get some "good food."

"I'm tired of this place," said Nadarajah. "I want to be outside, you know? But this was worth it because it saved my life."

DOJ_NMG_0018447

ON THE NET

9th Circuit: http://www.ca9.uscourts.gov/

Rules For An Unruly New War (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, March 20, 2006

It was November 2001, barely two months after the 9/11 terrorist attacks, when Osama bin Laden's personal driver was captured in Afghanistan and later shipped to the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Half a world away, President Bush was ordering up a new military tribunal system to try foreigners designated as enemy combatants and accused of war crimes in the ongoing "war on terror."

Next week those events will collide at the U.S. Supreme Court. In what is destined to be a landmark case, justices are scheduled to hear an appeal by that driver, Yemen native Salim Ahmed Hamdan, challenging the legality of Bush's tribunals--the first since World War II. The high court will finally have to weigh in on some of the most contentious and polarizing issues in the post-9/11 world: How should the United States treat non-American prisoners whose allegiances lie not with a country but an ideology? Does the president have the power to unilaterally decide not only which prisoners qualify as enemy combatants but what rights they have and under what justice system they should be tried? And, at the heart of it all, should past rules of war apply, or does the war on terrorism--so different from previous wars--require its own special standards?

Recruits. Hamdan, now in his mid-30s, was a poor, part-time taxi driver in Yemen just 10 years ago when he was recruited to fight with Islamic insurgents in Tajikistan, according to journalist Jonathan Mahler, who is working on a book about Hamdan. But when those recruits were rebuffed at the Tajik border, they decided to look for bin Laden, who had recently moved his militant organization to Afghanistan.

Hamdan's lawyers acknowledge that their client went to work for bin Laden, but they argue that he was just a functionary, serving as the al Qaeda leader's driver--not involved in plotting or training for attacks on America. But the U.S. government alleges that Hamdan was much more. After his capture, he was designated an "enemy combatant," charged with conspiracy to commit terrorism and murder, and tapped as one of the first Guantanamo detainees to be tried under the new military tribunal system.

His challenge to that system will test the administration's ongoing effort to broadly expand presidential wartime authority--from conducting warrantless domestic surveillance to establishing the military tribunals, which allow unsworn statements in lieu of testimony and can impose the death penalty. And unlike a traditional court-martial, the tribunal system does not allow a review outside the military. The last line of appeal under the tribunals, except in limited circumstances, is Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld. The eight justices who will hear the Hamdan case (Chief Justice John G. Roberts has recused himself because he participated in an appeals court ruling on the case) will also examine whether legal protections afforded prisoners of war under the international Geneva Conventions should extend to detainees like Hamdan, who do not operate under the flag of a country.

Dismissed? But there is a wild card: Government lawyers want the high court to simply dismiss Hamdan's appeal. They argue that a law enacted by Congress last December blocking detainee access to U.S. courts also applies to cases pending at the time. The high court is expected to consider this issue first, and if justices agree with the government, Hamdan's appeal will be moot--as will cases filed by hundreds of Guantanamo's 500 detainees--and his case will revert to the military tribunal.

The administration argues that the president has inherent constitutional power during wartime to establish the tribunals and also draws authority from legislation authorizing the use of military force that Congress passed in the wake of the 2001 attacks. There is historical precedent for the controversial tribunals, and lawyers like Richard Samp of the conservative Washington Legal Foundation argue that if detainees had access to open civilian courts, it would flood the courts and officials could be forced to reveal sensitive U.S. intelligence information.

Whatever the outcome, the justices will be drawn into a profound and emotional debate over the treatment and rights of the Guantanamo detainees--a debate that civil libertarians say has damaged America's reputation. "Military [tribunals] have been used throughout our history--there seems to me plenty of legal authority for that," says Richard D.Rosen, who spent 26 years as an Army judge advocate and now directs Texas Tech University's Center for Military Law and Policy. "But I think the courts should be allowed to get to the merits of this case. The military [tribunal] is not a court, and it's not equipped to decide these constitutional issues." The place for that, argues Rosen, is the Supreme Court. And in taking the case, the justices seem to agree that at the very least they need to establish some rules in a war that often seems not to have any.

DOJ_NMG_0018448

The President And The Courts (NYT)

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

Since the Republican majority has decided to allow President Bush to usurp Congress's role in matters of national security, the battle to save the constitutional balance of powers moves to the judiciary. A critical test of judicial independence will come this month, when the Supreme Court hears arguments in a case that has become a focus of Mr. Bush's imperial vision of the presidency.

Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Yemeni national accused of having been a bodyguard and driver for Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan, has been detained since 2002 in Guantánamo Bay. He filed suit to challenge the legitimacy of the military commission that upheld his designation as an "unlawful enemy combatant" — a term Mr. Bush invented after 9/11 to deny the protections of the Geneva Conventions, international statutes or United States law to certain prisoners.

Mr. Hamdan argued, rightly, that the commissions are not legitimate because prisoners are routinely barred from seeing evidence, much less confronting their accusers or having access to real legal representation. But his case has now become a much larger battle over the principle of habeas corpus, which is embedded in the Constitution and says that a prisoner cannot be denied the right to challenge his detention. Mr. Bush's decision after 9/11 that he had the power to put prisoners beyond the reach of the law at his choosing was the first attempt to suspend habeas corpus on American territory since the Civil War.

The Supreme Court two years ago emphatically rejected the president's claim that its jurisdiction did not extend to Guantánamo. Seeking to reverse that ruling, the White House in December helped push through a special amendment as part of the deal that also saw Mr. Bush sign a watered-down ban on torture of military detainees. The amendment, sponsored by Senator Lindsey Graham, a Republican, and Senator Carl Levin, a Democrat, stripped Guantánamo detainees of the normal rights of judicial review. It also designated a single appellate court to conduct a limited review of decisions by the military commissions, and left "enemy combatants" held without a trial in a seemingly inescapable legal black hole.

As soon as Mr. Bush signed this law, he declared that the administration was going to apply it to all pending cases, about 160 or so, and the solicitor general told the Supreme Court it no longer had a right to hear Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. This is court-stripping — the attempt by another branch of government to prevent the court from deciding a particular issue. The White House tried to justify this outrageous tampering with the judiciary by ignoring the new law's actual language and legislative history to argue that the new legislation took away the power of the courts to hear not just future cases but also cases already filed and accepted for review. The Supreme Court responded by adding the jurisdictional objection to the list of issues it will consider when the case is heard on March 28.

At a minimum, we hope the court will rule that Congress and the president may not deny the justices the power to review pending cases. But it should also reject the defective military commissions, as well as the idea of denying access to the courts for future valid claims brought by Guantánamo detainees, including claims of torture.

If Congress wants to take the extreme step of suspending the Supreme Court's jurisdiction over habeas corpus, especially pending appeals, it must say so in unmistakable terms, which it has not done. Both the text and the legislative history of the Graham-Levin amendment demonstrate an intention to avoid touching pending cases. Moreover, the Constitution itself requires an "invasion" or a "rebellion" as a prerequisite for suspension of habeas corpus. It's hardly likely that the founding fathers intended to give Congress the right to eliminate judicial review during an ongoing international struggle against terrorism that may well go on for generations.

The retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor observed in a recent speech that the framers created three separate and equal branches of government because they knew that preserving liberty requires that no single branch or person can amass unchecked power. According to NPR's Nina Totenberg, who heard the speech, Justice O'Connor cited Republican court-stripping efforts as an example of dangerous overreaching. "It takes a lot of degeneration before a country falls into dictatorship," Justice O'Connor said, "but we should avoid these ends by avoiding these beginnings."

DOJ_NMG_0018449

The president seems to forget that and Congress clearly will not remind him. The nation cannot afford for the Supreme Court to forget as well.

Gitmo Goat Or Hero? (TIME)

By Adam Zagorin And Sally B. Donnelly

Time, March 19, 2006

Did Major General Geoffrey Miller--commandant at GuantÃ¡namo Bay and a top adviser on interrogations at Abu Ghraib--do wrong? No, says a new report by Lieut. General Stanley Green, the Army Inspector General (IG), that TIME obtained last week. A Pentagon panel recommended last summer that Miller be reprimanded for poor oversight of a high-value prisoner at Gitmo. But Green told TIME that the evidence is not there to back charges against Miller of dereliction and lying to Congress about his role in the scandal. The report concludes that at Gitmo Miller was unaware a canine had been used to intimidate alleged "20th hijacker" Mohammed al-Qahtani, or that al-Qahtani was forced to don women's underwear and perform dog tricks--even though Miller was intimately involved in planning al-Qahtani's interrogation. The report even lavishes praise on Miller, noting the "strength, energy and effectiveness of [his] leadership." Miller's military lawyer told TIME: "The IG is entirely correct in fact and law."

Miller's exoneration may only inflame his critics. At a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing last week, chairman John Warner pointedly suggested to one of Miller's superiors that he "go back over this entire matter," warning that Miller will be recalled before the panel to explain himself. Sources close to the powerful committee say that anger at Miller has escalated sharply since he invoked his right to avoid self-incrimination and refused to testify in the detainee-abuse trial of an Abu Ghraib dog handler. In that case, defense lawyers argued that their client was following guidelines from Abu Ghraib military-intelligence chief Colonel Thomas Pappas, who in turn has said under oath that Miller advocated using dogs to "get information" from prisoners.

Green, the Army IG, says that people need in the abuse-scandal investigations to find a "donkey to pin the tail on." But he insists "Miller is not the one." Which leaves the question: Who is?

A Legal Loose Cannon (TIME)

By Douglas Waller

Time, March 19, 2006

The roots of the bungle seem to come down to this: Carla Martin, a government lawyer with a small role in the sentencing trial of confessed 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, thought the chief of the prosecution team was overplaying his hand. In his opening statement, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Spencer argued that if Moussaoui had told the FBI what he knew about the 9/11 plot in advance, authorities "would have prevented" the hijackings and thousands of lives could have been saved. Martin, 51, a veteran in the aviation field, thought defense attorneys could "drive a truck" through that assertion, as she later e-mailed a scheduled witness in the case. Thus she took it upon herself to coach that witness and six other current or former government aviation experts scheduled to testify in ways to fend off the opposing lawyers.

While experienced litigators know how to prep witnesses without crafting their testimony, Martin crossed a line, informing her experts what she would tell the jury and feeding them transcripts from the trial in violation of an explicit order from U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema. It was no small mistake. When Brinkema found out, she angrily barred all aviation-security witnesses from testifying--experts prosecutors were counting on to make their case that had Moussaoui shared what he knew, officials could have prevented 9/11, and since he didn't, he should be executed.

How could such a high-profile case have been handled so sloppily? Certainly Martin, a lawyer for the Transportation Security Administration (TSA), was never meant to be a player. In court documents filed after the blowup, prosecutors painted her as a misguided "miscreant" with only a bit part in the government's case preparation--arranging witness interviews and retrieving aviation documents for prosecutors. A former flight attendant who followed her father into law, Martin developed a reputation for tenaciousness both at the TSA and, before that, at the Federal Aviation Administration, where she started working even before she graduated from law school. But she did hardly any litigating in court. Her work was focused more on administrative matters. For instance, when sensitive aviation-security issues came up in the civil suit brought against Pan Am by families of those who died in the Flight 103 bombing, she advised the presiding judge on whether to clear the courtroom. When she started delving into criminal trial tactics, say colleagues, she was simply out of her element.

DOJ_NMG_0018450

Martin's coaching of the Moussaoui witnesses was discovered when one of them became so put off by her persistent e-mails that she showed them to prosecutors, who then informed the judge of Martin's misconduct. "In all my years on the bench, I've never seen a more egregious violation of the rule about witnesses," Brinkema said. She warned Martin that she may face criminal charges. Martin, who has been placed on paid administrative leave by the TSA, wouldn't comment. Her mother, Jean Martin Lay, told TIME that her daughter is "really devastated" by the accusations. Martin's lawyer, Roscoe Howard, claims that prosecutors have unfairly "vilified" her and that her side of the story, which he says she is preparing, "will show a very different, full picture of her intentions."

Moussaoui, 37, a French Moroccan who was detained about a month before the 9/11 attacks, has pleaded guilty to conspiring with al-Qaeda to hijack planes, but denies direct involvement in the 9/11 plot, claiming that he was preparing for a future attack instead. If he is not executed, he faces life imprisonment. Prosecutors were counting on the witnesses barred by Brinkema to explain to jurors how airport security could have been increased had Moussaoui come clean with FBI agents who interrogated him before 9/11.

In the end, prosecutors managed to persuade the judge to let them present to the jury a new set of aviation experts who have had no contact with Martin. But the case for executing Moussaoui remains tenuous. Legal experts, and even Brinkema, have questioned whether prosecutors are overreaching in arguing that he should be put to death for what he did not do. Martin, in one of her e-mails, said she doubted that airport screeners could have detected all the short-blade knives the hijackers took aboard, even if Moussaoui had told agents before 9/11 what he knew. Of course, that is an opinion that prosecutors wish she had kept to herself.

Another Blown Case? (WP)

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

THE DEATH penalty case against accused Sept. 11 conspirator Zacharias Moussaoui has barely survived the government's latest bout of incompetence. In a blatant violation of a court order, a Federal Aviation Administration lawyer working on the case sent key aviation witnesses a transcript of the government's opening statement, along with her comments on it. This led U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema to exclude those witnesses -- potentially crippling the prosecutors' case for execution of the only person to face trial for the attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center. On Friday, Judge Brinkema revised her order, allowing the testimony of aviation witnesses untainted by the misconduct. So the case will now limp forward.

Americans opposed to capital punishment, as we are, have little reason to regret this development. Mr. Moussaoui already has pleaded guilty and faces life in prison, which is the sentence he should get. While he is by his own admission an al-Qaeda operative sent here to do America harm, his links to the attacks -- which took place after he was in custody -- are weak.

This case nevertheless joins a line of big terrorism prosecutions marred by government misconduct, overzealousness, hyping of charges or just plain ineffectiveness. A conviction in Detroit had to be set aside because of prosecutorial misconduct. The government brought spectacular charges against accused Islamic Jihad activist Sami al-Arian, only to see a jury reject many of them -- and convict on none -- after a lengthy trial. Then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft announced the arrest of Jose Padilla with great fanfare as the foiling of a plot to detonate a radiological "dirty" bomb; after holding him for years as an enemy combatant, the government indicted him for far lesser matters. Mohamed Qahtani, the Guantanamo Bay inmate the government has labeled the 20th hijacker -- when it wasn't busy making the same claim about Mr. Moussaoui -- was subjected to such abusive interrogation that he probably cannot face trial at all.

More generally, the military still hasn't managed to try a single person at Guantanamo before its much-vaunted commissions, whose main selling point was their efficiency. More than four years after the Sept. 11 attacks, the United States lacks a stable, predictable system for trying accused terrorists.

Prosecuting terrorists isn't easy, as Mr. Moussaoui's trial has repeatedly illustrated, but much of this is the Bush administration's fault. The administration failed to work with Congress to create viable legal structures to handle these cases, proceeding in whatever way seemed most convenient in any given situation. The results are abysmal. And, ironically, they undermine the case for the more secretive military trial procedures the government is trying to create. If authorities fail so often to play by the rules in the relatively open federal court system, it's hard to believe their behavior will be better when the spotlight is turned off.

Terror Case: 'Bizarre' Testimony (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff and Karen Breslau

Newsweek, March 20, 2006

The justice department's case against accused 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui is in trouble. The Feds also have a problem in another case. The credibility of the FBI's star witness against a Pakistani-American accused of Qaeda ties is under fire after he testified he saw Ayman al-Zawahiri at a mosque attended by the de-fendant in Lodi, Calif., in 1999. The testimony by informant Naseem Khan, who has been paid $250,000 by the bureau, startled counterterrorism experts: Zawahiri, Osama bin Laden's chief deputy, was in Afghanistan at the time, under indictment for the bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa. Jack Cloonan, a former FBI agent who had tracked Zawahiri for years, told news-week the testimony was "bizarre" and "seriously wrong." While conceding "there may have been some puffery" by the informant, a Justice official who asked not to be ID'd because of legal sensitivities said prosecutors are still confident about the case against Hamid Hayat, 23, accused of attending a Qaeda camp in Pakistan, and his father, Umer Hayat, 48, who allegedly lied to the FBI about his son's travels. Defense lawyers say the testimony raises new questions about Khan, a fast-food worker with a burglary conviction who was recruited by the FBI after 9/11 and paid up to $4,500 a month to ID terror suspects. An internal FBI doc obtained by NEWSWEEK shows Khan claimed to have seen Zawahiri—and two other most-wanted terrorists—at the Lodi mosque in late 1999, describing them as Pashto-speaking Pakistanis. (They are Arabs.) The FBI first used Khan to target two radical imams in Lodi. They were deported. Meanwhile, Khan befriended the younger Hayat, a fruit packer, and secretly taped conversations while encouraging Hayat to visit a Pakistani camp in 2003. Hayat later confessed going to the camp; there is no evidence he plotted any terror acts.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

SSA Raises Hurdle In Proposal For DP World To Sell U.S. Holdings (WSJ)

By Daniel Machalaba

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

SSA Marine Inc.'s decision to explore a sale of the company could complicate Dubai Ports World's plans to sell its U.S. holdings to an American buyer.

SSA Marine, the largest U.S. container terminal operator, has been considered one of the possible bidders for DP World's terminal operations in the U.S. With SSA Marine disclosing that it is a potential acquisition target itself, the number of viable U.S. purchasers for DP World's U.S. holdings could be reduced.

In a statement Friday, closely held SSA said it has received inquiries from "many companies looking to partner with, or invest in SSA Marine" and is exploring its strategic alternatives. The Seattle company noted "opportunities to acquire additional operations," suggesting it still could be a bidder for DP World's U.S. holdings. SSA said it is working with its financial advisor, Citigroup Inc., to evaluate its options.

DP World declined to comment on the SSA Marine announcement.

The SSA statement adds to the frenzy of interest in marine container terminals, which have seen their value soar amid rising trade, limited expansion room in some ports and global consolidation of a handful of large non-U.S. container terminal operators. SSA has operations in 150 ports throughout the world, including 11 marine container terminals on the U.S. West Coast and in Latin America. Some maritime executives have said SSA could be valued at as much as $2 billion.

At the same time, the political firestorm in the U.S. over DP World has put some U.S. terminal operations back on the market. DP World's purchase of Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. of London for $6.8 billion included container terminal operations in five U.S. ports. Many in Congress objected to the deal, citing national security concerns because DP World is controlled by the Dubai government. DP World agreed to defuse the controversy by committing to sell the U.S. terminal operations to a U.S. buyer.

DOJ_NMG_0018452

The Dubai deal could make it more difficult for some companies to bid for SSA. SSA Marine spokesman Bob Watters said in a statement that "none of the alternatives we are exploring would involve selling control of our U.S. operations to a company owned by a foreign government."

That would appear to bar Singapore's PSA International Pte. Ltd. and some Chinese operators from bidding for SSA. It would leave the door open to A.P. Moller-Maersk of Denmark and Hutchison Whampoa Ltd., the world's largest terminal operator, which is based in Hong Kong.

Nation's Security Is At Stake (USAT)

By Duncan Hunter

USA Today, March 20, 2006

In the post-9/11 world, America's No. 1 priority must be national security. But the process that OK'd government-owned Dubai Ports World's takeover of terminal operations at major U.S. ports was geared less toward national security and more toward economic opportunity. Otherwise, how did it overlook red flags like these: (Related: Opposing view)

As recently as 2003, customs officials in the United Arab Emirates (UAE), of which the government of Dubai is a member, allowed 66 high-speed electrical switches, which can be used for detonating nuclear weapons, to go to a Pakistani businessman with ties to that country's military — despite U.S. protests. Further evidence shows Dubai spurned U.S. requests to inspect containers holding the switches. Among other troubling examples, Pakistani physicist and nuclear proliferator A.Q. Khan shipped black-market materials through Dubai, prompting one Middle East expert to call it an "atomic bazaar."

The UAE has been our ally. But we cannot disregard its role as a point of transshipment for dangerous materials — either with governmental acquiescence or great governmental negligence. Right now, we're optimistic that DP World will keep its commitment to sell its interests in U.S. port operations.

But the need to secure critical domestic infrastructure extends beyond our maritime interests and the DP World deal.

That is why I introduced legislation that not only reforms the foreign-investment review process but goes even further to protect all of America's critical infrastructure — stipulating that any asset or system so vital that its incapacity or destruction would debilitate national security, economic security or public health and safety must remain in the hands of reliable, American-owned companies. It also mandates that appropriate authorities inspect all in-bound cargo.

Much of this isn't novel. In fact, the legislation's so-called protectionist elements are already required from Department of Defense contractors. In a post-9/11 world, we must ensure that our critical infrastructure is every bit as secure as critical parts of our defense industrial base.

Today, we can take nothing for granted. We must continue to enhance our security instead of creating even greater vulnerabilities.

To those who say this smacks of protectionism, I say this: America is worth protecting.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., is chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

Scuffle Over Ports Deal Stirs Up Protectionist Fears (USAT)

USA Today, March 20, 2006

Each day, some $3 billion of foreign money pours into the United States, buying stocks, bonds, whole companies, real estate, home mortgages and more. Without that money, interest rates would skyrocket for lack of investors to finance the government's staggering debt. Job growth also would wilt as foreign investment declined. (Related: Opposing view)

You'd think those facts — and they are not in dispute — might prompt lawmakers to tour the globe drumming up more investment, or at least to recognize that we now live in a world economy. Instead, some seem intent on doing just the opposite.

Eager to tap the deep vein of anti-foreign sentiment exposed by the Dubai ports deal, they are pushing a ban on foreign purchases of any assets considered part of the nation's "critical infrastructure."

DOJ_NMG_0018453

The plan may never get off the ground. It certainly won't if even a sliver of reason enters the debate. But at a time when the nation is concerned about immigration, foreign outsourcing of jobs and terrorism, it is a useful measure of just how foolish protectionism can be.

The proposal comes from Rep. Duncan Hunter, a California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. He would like to set a series of draconian standards for any company wishing to buy a part of the nation's "critical infrastructure." Its chairman and CEO would have to be American, as would at least half of its board. The secretary of Defense would have to approve half of the board members and the company would have to keep tabs on the citizenship of its shareholders to make sure that no more than half were non-U.S. citizens.

The idea that the government would be allowed to choose who controls private companies is bizarre by itself. More so coming from a Republican. But that's only the beginning of the problems the bill would create.

• Much of the economy could be shut off to foreign investment since the concept of critical infrastructure is inherently vague. This would dramatically slow economic growth and eliminate jobs. Hunter defines critical assets not just as those affecting national security, but those critical to economic security and public health as well. Virtually any large company could be considered economically vital.

• If "critical" industries were shut off to foreign buyers, then virtually any domestic company would claim its goods and services were critical to avoid having to compete with foreign companies. Competition would decline, driving prices up.

• Other countries would surely retaliate against U.S. firms. The protectionist tit-for-tat would quickly escalate, derailing economic growth that has been critical to raising living standards here and abroad since World War II. Similar events preceded the Great Depression.

There are, to be sure, many security issues surrounding critical infrastructure sites. The Department of Homeland Security's efforts to beef up port security have a long way to go. And the chemical industry has beaten back legislation mandating new safety measures at plants near major cities.

But these have nothing to do with corporate ownership. Shutting off foreign investment amounts to using 9/11 as a pretext for economic nationalism and protectionism. That's bad policy. And, given the USA's need for foreign capital, a bad case of biting the hand that feeds us.

Increase In Contracting Intelligence Jobs Raises Concerns (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

AllWorld Language Consultants Inc., a Rockville firm, is seeking experienced military interrogators to work in Iraq for $153,500 a year plus bonuses, with proficiency in Arabic "preferred but not required," according to Yahoo's Hot Jobs listings.

The U.S. Army element of the Multi-National Force-Iraq is looking for a private contractor to provide airborne surveillance over that country that will "provide situational awareness of the entire area of operations," according to another Web announcement.

Lockheed Martin Corp. is seeking a counterintelligence analyst to work for the Pentagon's newest intelligence agency, the Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), in its Colorado Springs facility to "create and deliver briefings, write reports, and represent Counterintelligence Field Activity," according to a Web classified ad.

These positions and thousands like them are part of a growing trend at the Pentagon to contract out intelligence jobs that were formerly done primarily by service personnel and civil service employees.

But, by using contract employees, government agencies lose control over those doing this sensitive work and an element of profit is inserted into what is being done. Also, as investigations have revealed, politics and corruption may be introduced into the process.

The office of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte has quietly begun to study the contracting issue because "it already is a problem," a senior intelligence official said in a recent interview.

A related concern for intelligence agencies inside and outside the Pentagon is that the government is training people and getting them security clearances, but they then leave for better pay offered by contractors, sometimes to do the same work.

DOJ_NMG_0018454

"Once cleared, they can get a higher salary outside and they are gone," the official said. "We're leasing back our former employees."

The phenomenon is partly the result of Congress's approving large funding increases for intelligence activities but not increasing the limit on the number of full-time persons that agencies can hire. "We don't have the billets," the official said, so the surge is taken care of by contracting out the jobs.

Retired Maj. Gen. Paul D. Eaton, who ran Iraqi military training from 2003 to 2004, describes the hiring of civilians to do jobs previously done by the military as a "shell game" created by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to keep the "force strength static on paper." In an op-ed piece in yesterday's New York Times, Eaton wrote, "This tactic may help for a bit, but it will likely fall apart in the next budget cycle with those positions swiftly eliminated."

"The Pentagon ramped up so fast, it had to turn to contract personnel to have continuity," said another former senior intelligence official who now does contract work. He pointed out that some jobs are so complex, military personnel on three-year rotations are facing reassignment just as they master their jobs.

The trend toward contracting for intelligence analysts will hurt the ability of the CIA and the Defense Intelligence Agency to retain and keep high-quality people, said a former senior intelligence official who helped supervise the rebuilding of the CIA's case officer and analyst corps. "It takes time to get the young up to snuff, and you need 10 to 20 years to get the value for that investment," this former official said, asking for anonymity because of his past role in government.

John O. Brennan, the longtime CIA official who started up and headed the National Counterterrorism Center before his retirement, said contract personnel "bring on recognized expertise that exists outside government" and "often are needed as new [intelligence] systems are being built."

Now a contractor himself, Brennan said it should come as no surprise that many younger military and government-trained intelligence personnel, who have top security clearances, are resigning to take jobs in the private sector.

The CIA's contracting has generally been limited to technical support, but almost two years ago a "spy drain" was described in a column by intelligence expert James Bamford, who warned, "Private contractors are taking over jobs once reserved for highly trained agency employees." Because of the rush to expand activities, Bamford said some newly hired former CIA officers said that "their talents are being wasted on unsophisticated tasks."

Attention has also been focused on the rapid growth of Pentagon intelligence contracting because of recent guilty pleas by former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and contractor Mitchell J. Wade, who used contributions and job offers to get his former company, MZM Inc., more than $100 million in mostly intelligence contracts between 2002 and 2004. In one case, according to court papers, Wade drafted and gave Cunningham an outline of the work that CIFA then contracted with MZM to perform.

Federal investigators are reviewing CIFA's contracts, according to a government prosecutor involved in the inquiry. CIFA Director David A. Burtt II said in a recent interview that 70 percent of his agency's work is handled by contractors.

Brennan said that contract employees frequently cost less for government agencies when they are needed for short durations while new agencies get fully staffed. Thereafter, higher pay given to contract employees over government employees can be justified only in part because contractors offer less job security than the government does.

Brennan said he introduced a rule at the National Counterterrorism Center that personnel cannot resign and return to do the same job with a contractor until a certain amount of time had elapsed.

The contracting for intelligence personnel is "neither black nor white," according to Brennan, but it "needs to be watched."

The Arabic-speaking interrogators that AllWorld Languages is seeking must be U.S. citizens, have security clearances, and be willing to start immediately and deploy to any city in Iraq. AllWorld is a subcontractor of L-3 Communications Holdings Inc., a multibillion-dollar defense contractor that recently got a six-month, $420 million extension to its no-bid Army contract for translators. About 80 percent of the 5,000 translators L-3 employs for the Army are working in Iraq.

William Golden, who runs IntelligenceCareers Inc., maintains a Web site listing thousands of jobs, including senior posts within the intelligence community. In a slide presentation on his site, Golden points out that as the number of contract positions in the intelligence field increases, the number of candidates for such jobs decreases -- in part because the number of people leaving military and government service in the intelligence field is less than the number of jobs being opened up to contract employees.

DOJ_NMG_0018455

In a recent presentation, Golden said 65 to 70 percent of new contract employees who took contract jobs after they left government with security clearances came from the military. Less than 15 percent earned their clearances while working for contractors. One reason for the difference is that it takes a year or more to get a top-secret clearance; meanwhile, an employee is waiting to be hired or is hired and doing a non-cleared job. Those who had clearances just need to have them updated, which takes far less time.

As a result, someone with a top secret and special compartmented information clearance, meaning access to electronic intercepted data, can get as much as 35 percent more pay than others with lesser clearances or no clearances, according to Golden. Brennan, who now runs his own intelligence consulting concern, the Analysis Corp., agreed that "a security clearance in the Washington area means money."

WTC Talks To Resume Next Week (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

NEW YORK -- Talks to resolve how to rebuild the World Trade Center will restart next week after private developer Larry Silverstein offered a revised proposal Friday for his role in the long-troubled project.

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, said it would respond to Mr. Silverstein's proposal.

While calling aspects of Mr. Silverstein's latest proposal "unacceptable," Port Authority spokesman Steve Coleman said the agency "will develop a counter-proposal that we believe will work for both parties to get this deal done."

Negotiations between Mr. Silverstein and the Port Authority broke down Wednesday after failing to meet a deadline imposed by New York Gov. George E. Pataki. The Port Authority walked out on the talks saying the 74-year-old real estate tycoon was bargaining in "bad faith," a charge he denied.

Mr. Silverstein's revised proposal closes the gap between the two sides and contains some new ideas, according to a person close to the talks. In a statement, Mr. Silverstein said "the sooner we get this done the better."

Before talks failed, the two sides had the broad outlines of a deal in place that would have Mr. Silverstein give up the rights to build two of the five planned towers, including the signature Freedom Tower. The sticking points revolved around how much each side would bear of the $7 billion cost.

Little has been rebuilt 4 1/2 years after the attacks that destroyed the Twin Towers. Gov. Pataki, the Port Authority, which Gov. Pataki controls with New Jersey's governor, and Mr. Silverstein have come under heavy criticism for the lack of progress.

Multiple Layers Of Contractors Drive Up Cost Of Katrina Cleanup (WP)

By Joby Warrick

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- How many contractors does it take to haul a pile of tree branches? If it's government work, at least four: a contractor, his subcontractor, the subcontractor's subcontractor, and finally, the local man with a truck and chainsaw.

If the job is patching a leaking roof, the answer may be five contractors, or even six. At the bottom tier is a Spanish-speaking crew earning less than 10 cents for every square foot of blue tarp installed. At the top, the prime contractor bills the government 15 times as much for the same job.

For the thousands of contractors in the Katrina recovery business, this is the way the system works -- a system that federal officials say is the same after every major disaster but that local government officials, watchdog groups and the contractors themselves say is one reason that costs for the hurricane cleanup continue to swell.

"If this is 'normal,' we have a serious problem in this country," said Benny Rousselle, president of Plaquemines Parish, a hurricane-ravaged district downriver from New Orleans. "The federal government ought to be embarrassed about what is happening. If local governments tried to run things this way, we'd be run out of town."

Federal agencies in charge of Katrina cleanup have been repeatedly criticized for lapses in managing the legions of contractors who perform tasks ranging from delivering ice to rebuilding schools. Last Thursday, Congress's independent auditor, the Government Accountability Office, said inadequate oversight had cost taxpayers tens of millions of dollars, by allowing contractors to build shelters in the wrong places or to purchase supplies that were not needed.

DOJ_NMG_0018456

But each week, many more millions are paid to contractors who get a cut of the profits from a job performed by someone else. In instances reviewed by The Washington Post, the difference between the job's actual price and the fee charged to taxpayers ranged from 40 percent to as high as 1,700 percent.

Consider the task of cleaning up storm debris. Just after the hurricane, the Army Corps of Engineers awarded contracts for removing 62 million cubic yards of debris to four companies: Ashbritt Inc., Ceres Environmental Services Inc., Environmental Chemical Corp. and Phillips and Jordan Inc.

Each of the four contracts was authorized for a maximum of $500 million. Corps officials have declined to reveal specific payment rates, citing a court decision barring such disclosures. But local officials and businesspeople knowledgeable about the contracts say the companies are paid $28 to $30 a cubic yard.

Below the first tier, the arrangements vary. But in a typical case in Louisiana's Jefferson Parish, top contractor Ceres occupied the first rung, followed by three layers of smaller companies: Loupe Construction Co., then a company based in Reserve, La., which hired another subcontractor called McGee, which hired Troy Hebert, a hauler from New Iberia, La. Hebert, who is also a member of the state legislature, says his pay ranged from $10 to $6 for each cubic yard of debris.

"Every time it passes through another layer, $4 or $5 is taken off the top," Hebert said. "These others are taking out money, and some of them aren't doing anything."

Defenders of the multi-tiered system say it is a normal and even necessary part of doing business in the aftermath of a major disaster. The prime contracts are usually awarded by FEMA or other government agencies well in advance, so relief services can be brought in quickly after the crisis eases. These companies often must expand rapidly to meet the need, and they do so by subcontracting work to other firms.

The two federal agencies that administer most disaster-related contracts, FEMA and the Army Corps of Engineers, say the system benefits small and local companies that do not have the resources to bid for large federal contracts. At the top end, prime contractors must be large enough to carry the heavy insurance burdens and administrative requirements of overseeing thousands of workers dispersed across a wide area, agency officials say. They also note that contractors have a legal right to hire subcontractors as they need them.

"Our purview of a contract goes to the prime contractor only," said Jean Todd, a Corps contracting officer.

But watchdog groups that monitor federal contracting say Katrina has taken the contract tiering system to a new extreme, wasting tax dollars while often cheating companies at the low end of the contracting ladder. In some cases, the groups say, companies in the top and middle rungs contribute little more than shuffling paperwork from one tier to the next.

"It's trickle-down contracting: You're paying a cut at every level, and it makes the final cost exponentially more expensive than it needs to be," said Keith Ashdown of the watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense. "And in almost every case, the local people who really need to be making the money are at the bottom of these upside-down pyramid schemes."

The gap is particularly large for roof repairs. Four large companies won Army Corps contracts to cover damaged roofs with blue plastic tarp, under a program known as "Operation Blue Roof." The rate paid to the prime contractors ranged from $1.50 to $1.75 per square foot of tarp installed, documents show.

The prime contractors' rate is nearly as much as local roofers charge to install a roof of asphalt shingles, according to two roofing executives who requested anonymity because they feared losing their contracts. Meanwhile, at the bottom of the contractor heap, four to five rungs lower, some crews are being paid less than 10 cents per square foot, the officials said.

At least the prime contractors for roofing and debris removal owned equipment that could be immediately applied to the job at hand. In the world of Katrina contracting, this has not always been the case.

For example, one company hired as an ice vendor owns no ice-making equipment. Landstar Systems Inc., a $2 billion Florida company placed in charge of the bus evacuation of New Orleans, is a transportation broker that specializes in trucking and has no buses of its own. In 2002, the company was awarded a $100 million contract to provide emergency transportation services for the federal government during major disasters. The contract, which is administered by the Federal Aviation Administration, was expanded in the fall to a maximum $400 million. Landstar declined a request for an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0018457

Thousands of New Orleanians had been stranded in the Superdome for more than 48 hours by the time FEMA issued the first order for a bus evacuation early on the morning of Aug. 31. The order was passed to Landstar, which then turned to other companies to locate buses, according to an official chronology prepared by the Department of Transportation. Landstar hired Carey International Inc., of Washington, which then hired the BusBank, of Chicago, and Transportation Management Systems of Columbia, Md. Bus Bank and TMS called private charter-bus companies -- some from as far away as California and Washington state -- asking them to send buses and drivers to New Orleans.

More than 1,100 buses eventually responded, some arriving four days later, after traveling hundreds of miles. Daily earnings averaged about $700 per bus, according to bus company owners. Landstar's daily earnings were nearly $1,200 per bus, government records show.

"A lot of that money is going to brokers who didn't have to do anything," said Jeff Polzien, owner of Red Carpet Charters, an Oklahoma bus company that sent coaches to New Orleans as a fourth-tier subcontractor.

Lower pay is hardly the worst problem subcontractors face. With many tiers to navigate, money trickles down slowly, delaying payment by weeks and months, and frequently imposing hardships on the smallest firms.

Several bus company owners said they were still owed tens of thousands of dollars for work they did in the fall. For some, the delays have been ruinous.

Thomas Paige, owner of Coast to Coast Bus Line of Dillon, S.C., laid off staff, and two of his four buses were repossessed by creditors after payment for his New Orleans work fell behind by three months.

"I went to New Orleans to help people -- and hopefully to help myself -- but now I feel like I've dug a ditch and fallen into it," Paige said. "If I would have known what I know now, I never would have gotten involved. It's just not worth it."

Behind Louisiana Aid Package, A Change Of Heart By One Man (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

Louisiana was in a foul mood on the February day that President Bush's Gulf Coast rebuilding coordinator, Donald E. Powell, stood before an audience of fellow bankers in Baton Rouge.

Two weeks before, the administration had rejected Louisiana's housing recovery plan. Mr. Powell's own idea of housing aid excluded thousands of homeowners, many of them poor, who lived in the flood plain but did not have flood insurance when Hurricane Katrina hit.

Asked about those who had counted on federally built levees to protect them, Mr. Powell, a wealthy man from the dry Texas Panhandle, noted that he had been responsible enough to buy flood insurance for his home in Amarillo.

The members of the Louisiana Bankers Association were not won over. Nor was The Advocate, Baton Rouge's newspaper, which demanded Mr. Powell's dismissal, calling him a "flint-souled" bean counter whose only concern was "guarding the money."

Those with a more charitable view, Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, among them, complained that he lacked the authority to be effective, and some critics wondered if he was simply another presidential crony.

But barely a week would pass before Mr. Powell did an about-face that turned many of his critics into fans, showing that not only had he listened to the locals, but also that his conclusions had carried weight with Mr. Bush.

With Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and Mayor C. Ray Nagin at his side, Mr. Powell announced that the president would seek $4.2 billion more for Louisiana to compensate homeowners — even those in the flood plain.

Mr. Powell's epiphany came after hours of listening to Louisianians: the decision makers; the woman who cleaned his room at the Sheraton; Victoria Reggie Kennedy, the wife of Senator Edward M. Kennedy (whom he called after hearing she was a Louisiana native); the inspectors examining high-water marks in homes. As he drove through New Orleans with Mr. Bush on March 8, he pointed to a small restaurant in the Ninth Ward and rattled off the owner's real estate woes.

"He had a learning experience," said Walter Isaacson, vice chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority. "It's the most amazing thing for somebody of his stature. It's because by himself, he walked around. He walked around and talked to people."

DOJ_NMG_0018458

Mr. Powell says walking about in the region incognito, in blue jeans and boots, is becoming a bit harder now that people are starting to recognize him. "I went with no preconceived thoughts," he said. "And I realized that while Mississippi was an act of God, Louisiana was an act of God and man. There were some flaws. The levees breached."

Last week, Mr. Powell spent much of his time lobbying House members, successfully, to preserve the appropriation. For several days, other states mounted an effort to siphon off some of the money, and conservatives said the entire amount was too large, but on Thursday the House overwhelmingly approved it.

Mr. Powell's work on the housing plan made many Louisianians think that in appointing him, the administration had finally done something right. Garland Robinette, a talk-radio host in New Orleans who has interviewed Mr. Powell several times, recalled telling him, "I was totally prepared to not like you at all, and it aggravates me that you're doing something to make me think you might be a good guy after all."

For Mr. Powell, former chief executive of the First National Bank of Amarillo, the listening tour was part of any banker's due diligence. Texas bankers are a particular breed — conservative, unpretentious and keenly competitive. One newspaper columnist recalled that years ago, after being offered a job in Amarillo, he received a solicitation call two hours later from Mr. Powell's bank. Asked about the incident, Mr. Powell said, "I probably was mad at our people because it was two hours."

Given his prominence in the Texas Panhandle, Mr. Powell's political connections go almost without saying. To the first President Bush, he is an old friend; to the second, he was a top fund-raiser. He had been to Washington only three times, he said, before he was appointed chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation in 2001, a position he left several months early to take his current post in November.

Mr. Powell, 64, is from a working-class family in Amarillo, where he helped his father peddle tobacco and snacks to shopkeepers. A football scholarship made him the first in his family to go to college. He began his career by walking into a bank and asking for a job. During the Texas banking crisis of the 1980's, Mr. Powell hauled the Amarillo bank from the brink of failure.

The $4.2 billion was not his first accomplishment as recovery czar. Until he intervened, state officials had spent hours trying to ensure that the federal government would continue to pick up all recovery expenses, a routine matter that, nevertheless, was authorized for a month at a time.

He also persuaded the president to ask Congress for an additional $1.5 billion for the state's levee system, doubling the previous request. And he became a go-to guy for local officials who hit snags in issues like debris removal and trailer placement.

But his rejection of the housing buyout plan, called the Baker bill after Representative Richard H. Baker, the Louisiana Republican who created it, infuriated many state officials. State leaders had taken great pains to build support for the plan, which called for the creation of a federal agency to buy and sell damaged property. Mr. Powell caused further outrage by skewering the Baker bill — gratuitously, many thought — in an opinion article in The Washington Post.

But he continued to push for an alternative. The first step was to agree on how many houses were damaged, and how badly. Mr. Powell forced Louisiana to justify its figures house by house, using aerial photographs and numbers collected from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Red Cross and insurance companies.

He was involved in details including how to reward those who had carried insurance and how to provide incentives for people to rebuild more safely. But he made no promises.

"He's a good poker player," said Andy Kopplin, a former chief of staff for Governor Blanco who is now the executive director of the Louisiana Recovery Authority. "I'd been getting calls and making calls to those guys at 10 o'clock on a Saturday night and sending data sets up. There was an extraordinary effort going on that gave us hope; at the same time, it was never clear to us that we were going to get a breakthrough."

Some Louisiana Democrats suggested the $4.2 billion was nothing more than damage control by the administration, noting that the president had been hammered for his lack of attention to Hurricane Katrina in his State of the Union address and quickly responded by announcing $18 billion in new money for the Gulf Coast. Further reviled after rejecting the Baker bill, they say, Mr. Bush opted to devote the $4.2 billion to Louisiana, which had been shortchanged in an earlier appropriation.

But Mr. Powell said that the entire effort was influenced not by politics, but by hard data. "I'm on a mission, and I can't — while I'm sensitive to it — that can't guide me," he said of public opinion. "I can't be either pushed or held back. I know if we're attempting to do the right thing. I have a conscience. If you're moving, someone's going to be critical."

DOJ_NMG_0018459

In the meantime, the flint-souled banker seems to be winning the battle for hearts and minds. Louisianians who might have been his adversaries have taken to inviting him over for brunch with the family and praising his frugality.

But Mr. Robinette, the talk-show host, reserves the right to change his mind if Mr. Powell starts to deliver bad news despite Mr. Bush's promises to the region.

"It could still be good cop, bad cop," Mr. Robinette said, "and we just haven't seen the bad cop yet."

FEMA Asking Some To Return Money Received For Hurricane Relief (AP)

The AP, March 19, 2006

BEAUMONT — Thousands of people who received money from the federal government after Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma might be asked to give it back.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency started sending letters last week asking people to return money they received in error.

Some 1.7 million households received FEMA assistance after Hurricanes Rita, Katrina or Wilma. About 2 to 3 percent or 34,000 to 51,000 families will reimburse the agency, Donna Dannels, acting deputy director of FEMA's recovery division.

"The truth is after Rita, FEMA was stretched awfully thin. Information they were giving out to people was extremely inconsistent," said U.S. Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands. "Someone could have easily received it in error."

Similar to an audit, the agency goes through a process after disasters to determine if payments were properly made, Dannels said.

"It goes back to if we have made the appropriate award to the appropriate person for the damages that they incurred," she said.

Those who receive a letter requesting repayment can appeal if they believe they were entitled to the funds.

But FEMA officials encourage them to make payments while the matter is resolved or to at least set up a payment plan. If the amount isn't paid in full within 30 days, a 2 percent interest will be added.

Citizens Panel To Share Its Post-Katrina Vision (LAT)

By Sam Quinones

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — A commission that has been a magnet for criticism as well as a channel for emerging citizen activism will wind up its work today, bringing to a close the first planning stage for a post-Katrina New Orleans.

The Bring New Orleans Back Commission formally issues its final report to Mayor C. Ray Nagin tonight, though the reports of its seven committees have been public for several weeks.

Nagin formed the commission in the fall to recommend how the city might respond to the destruction of Hurricane Katrina. Since then, it has become a symbol of a new volunteerism and activism among Orleanians. It was also lambasted by many residents for one committee's proposal that large swaths of the city be returned to wetlands and open space.

As a post-hurricane entity, the commission went far beyond just storm and flood protection.

The committees also have recommended ways to overhaul land-use planning, rebuild neighborhoods, consolidate duplicative elected offices, revive the city's cultural life, reorder its health and public education systems, and modernize the criminal justice system.

Michael Cowan, a theology professor at Loyola University who worked on the commission's education and government effectiveness committees, said such a broad approach was necessary because so many problems needed addressing. "A lot of the status quo was a disaster," Cowan said.

Before the Aug. 29 storm, the city's schools were failing, poverty and crime were high, and opportunities for economic advancement and homeownership were low. City government was widely viewed as inefficient, inept and corrupt. The population was declining as young and talented people moved elsewhere.

Meanwhile, Cowan said, "the power structure was so locked in that reform efforts just bounced off it. Good people … gave up."

DOJ_NMG_0018460

But Katrina's destruction, as well as the news coverage that followed the flood, embarrassed and reenergized people. Amid the destruction, many New Orleanians saw a chance to organize the city differently.

"It shook a lot of us up," said Gary Solomon, a banker and chairman of the commission's government effectiveness committee. "There's a lot of good people down here who want to see change."

The Bring New Orleans Back Commission itself was a sign of how different things were after Katrina. Before the storm, residents acknowledged an apathetic civic culture. The panel, however, was made up of dozens of volunteers from many professions and classes, some of whom put in weeks of work.

"This was a citizen-led process," Cowan said. "Our public officials did not lead this process and get this work done."

In January, many residents were alarmed when they learned that the urban planning committee recommended a moratorium on building permits in the hardest-hit neighborhoods, and a return of many of the neighborhoods to wetlands and open space.

The committee has also proposed forming a Crescent City Recovery Assn. to direct neighborhood rebuilding, with the power to issue bonds and buy and sell property for redevelopment, including through eminent domain.

But the commission's proposals are merely advice, and whether any of them will be followed is an open question. Moreover, it's unclear where the funding for the proposals would come from, though one place Louisianians are looking to is just off their coast.

Louisiana's offshore wells have provided oil and natural gas for the nation since the 1940s. Though other states receive half the money generated off their shores, Louisiana receives very little. Most of it goes to the federal government.

Rep. Bobby Jindal (R-La.) has introduced a bill that would increase the state's share of the royalties from offshore oil and gas drilling for use in hurricane preparedness and economic development.

"This is going to be a land of opportunity. [But] we can't build it from scratch," said Bruce Thompson, owner of a measurement-equipment company and a member of the committee studying levees and flood protection. "There needs to be a state revenue source. We've got to be treated fairly."

Few commission members believe anything will happen before April 22, when New Orleanians elect a mayor and City Council.

Still, some hope their ideas will become part of the campaign debate.

Preparing for that, Cowan has formed Common Good — an umbrella organization of homeowner associations, nonprofits, universities and religious groups.

Common Good will bring the candidates together in public forums and ask them to commit to changes they will support, he said. After the election, the group will hold bimonthly meetings with the elected officials to see what progress has been made.

"Sometimes people in elected office need to have a broad, diverse group of citizens helping them do the right thing, because they're just subject to a lot of different pressures," Cowan said.

Among many recommendations, the commission report will propose:

• The consolidation of the sheriffs' offices. New Orleans has a criminal sheriff and a civil sheriff, performing the duties that a single sheriff handles in most U.S. counties.

• Establishing regional forensic and DNA labs, as well as one regional police academy and training facility.

• Preventing the City Council from overriding the Planning Commission's land-use decisions.

• Forming an ethics review board for city government.

WAR NEWS:

President Bush To Stop In Cleveland On Monday (ABJ)

By Lisa A. Abraham

Akron Beacon Journal, March 19, 2006

Just days after reaffirming his national security policy of pre-emptive military strikes, President Bush will be in Cleveland to sell his agenda.

DOJ_NMG_0018461

Bush is expected to discuss the global war on terror in a speech Monday at the City Club of Cleveland. More than 1,000 are expected to attend.

On Thursday, the Bush administration issued its updated national security strategy -- a key component of which includes the first-strike military action that led to the U.S. invasion of Iraq three years ago.

As polls show support for the war is waning, the president is making speeches to bolster his strategy.

Ohio Democrats are balking at the president's initiative.

U.S. Rep. Sherrod Brown of Avon has scheduled a telephone conference for the media Monday to talk about how Bush's policies have alienated ``everyday Ohioans."

U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Cleveland sent Bush a letter encouraging him to spend some time in the city to get to know Cleveland residents who are dealing with a different sort of terrorism.

``With all due respect, Mr. President, the people of Cleveland are familiar with the `war on terror.' They are familiar with the terror of joblessness, the terror of cutbacks in pensions and health care, the terror of foreclosure, the terror of trade policies that have gutted our manufacturing base and the terror of economic policies that have left many of them behind," his letter states.

Bush is expected to arrive in Cleveland shortly before noon, and will present the President's Volunteer Service Award to Lois Hagood of Garfield Heights, who volunteers as a reading tutor for first-graders in Cleveland.

Bush's speech is expected to begin about 12:30 p.m. and last about an hour, said Karen Reaves of the office of presidential advance.

City Club spokeswoman Missy Toms said sticking to the club's traditional format, the president will be expected to spend about a half-hour answering unrehearsed questions from the audience after his address.

The club moved the Bush speech from its Euclid Avenue headquarters to the ballroom of the Renaissance Hotel on Public Square to increase seating capacity to about 1,000, she said.

Ordinarily, tickets to a City Club event would be open to the public, but for Bush all of the seats were taken by club members and their guests, Toms said.

The speech is Bush's 41st visit to Ohio since taking office, and his third visit this year. In February, he was in suburban Columbus for a speech on health care and he also attended a fundraiser for Republican U.S. Sen. Mike DeWine in suburban Cincinnati.

The speech will be broadcast live on the Internet with the help of the University of Akron.

The webcast can be viewed by going to the City Club's site at www.cityclub.org and clicking on ``view the webcast." Audio and video from WVIZ Adelphia Cable will be routed to a server at UA for a live webcast.

``To see a president in person is a unique opportunity, but unfortunately, the capacity of the auditorium is limited. With this live webcast, anyone across the country and around the world can join the City Club for the president's address," City Club Executive Director James Foster said.

Bush's appearance marks only the third time a sitting president has spoken to the City Club, a nonpartisan free-speech forum. President Clinton spoke in 1994 and Ronald Reagan in 1988.

Bush Trying To Rally War Support (CLPD)

By Sabrina Eaton

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, March 20, 2006

Three years after U.S. troops thundered into Iraq with promises of swift victory, President Bush is visiting Cleveland to shore up enthusiasm for both the lingering war and his leadership.

His luncheon speech before the City Club at the Renaissance Cleveland Hotel today comes as the president's approval ratings hit record lows and polls show increased displeasure with a war that has claimed the lives of more than 2,300 U.S. troops.

Bush will discuss how the United States is "working with all aspects of Iraqi society" to defeat terrorists, restore order and rebuild Iraq, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said. It is part of a monthlong effort by Bush to update Americans on the war's progress and "how we're fixing what was not working."

DOJ_NMG_0018462

"Oftentimes, the progress that is being made doesn't get as much attention as the dramatic and horrific images of violence that people see on their TV screens," McClellan said Friday. "It's important to continue to put things in the broader context."

Republican supporters of Bush's strategy, like Ohio Sens. George Voinovich and Mike DeWine, say Cleveland is a good place for him to explain his policies. Democratic critics, like Reps. Sherrod Brown and Dennis Kucinich, insist he has handled the war ineptly.

John Alterman of Washington's bipartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies credited Bush with disrupting terrorist networks enough to prevent another attack on U.S. soil, but said U.S. allies believe Bush has "destabilized" the world.

"The question is how to keep control of post-conflict environments when you don't have a clear enemy and a clear physical objective," Alterman said. "That is not going to be solved with a presidential speech."

Bush Marks Anniversary, Never Says 'War' (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

The Associated Press, March 19, 2006

President Bush marked the anniversary of the Iraq war Sunday by touting the efforts to build democracy there and avoiding any mention of the daily violence that rages three years after he ordered an invasion.

The president didn't utter the word "war."

"We are implementing a strategy that will lead to victory in Iraq," the president assured a public that is increasingly skeptical that he has a plan to end the fighting after the deaths of more than 2,300 U.S. troops.

Administration officials repeated the mantra that progress continues toward building a unified Iraqi government and nation.

"Now is the time for resolve, not retreat," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld wrote in a column for The Washington Post. "Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis."

Yet there were acknowledgments from the top commander of U.S. forces in Iraq that the situation is fragile and that he did not predict the strength of the insurgency.

"I did not think it would be as robust as it has been," Gen. George W. Casey said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "And it's something that, obviously, with my time here on the ground, my thinking on that has gained much greater clarity and insight."

Bush did not mention the insurgent attacks, the car bombs or the mounting Iraqi deaths in a two-minute statement to reporters outside the White House after returning from a weekend at Camp David. Avoiding the word "war," he called the day "the third anniversary of the beginning of the liberation of Iraq."

The president only indirectly referred to the violence when he said he spent the morning reflecting on the sacrifices made by U.S. troops. Bush said he spoke by phone earlier in the day with the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, and had received a positive report.

The White House is trying to remind the disapproving public of Bush's vision for Iraq with a public relations blitz. The president plans to give a series of speeches on Iraq, beginning Monday in Cleveland.

More than three-fourths of the public thinks it's likely that Iraq is headed toward civil war, according to an AP-Ipsos poll taken in early March.

And two-thirds of Americans say the U.S. is losing ground in preventing civil war in Iraq, according to a Pew Research Center poll taken in the same period. That's up from 48 percent in January.

On Sunday, Vice President Dick Cheney did not express any regret for predicting in the days before the invasion that U.S. troops would be greeted as liberators or his assessment 10 months ago that the insurgency was in its "last throes." On the contrary, he said the optimistic statements "were basically accurate, reflect reality."

Like Bush, Cheney touted the political progress in Iraq, pointing out that the Iraqis have met the political deadlines set for them and predicting they will form a unified government "shortly."

In an interview on CBS' "Face the Nation," Cheney flatly rejected a statement made earlier Sunday by Iraq's former interim prime minister that the increasing attacks killing dozens each day across his country can only be described as a civil war. "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is," Ayad Allawi told the British Broadcasting Corp.

Instead, Cheney described the violence as the actions of terrorists who have "reached a stage of desperation."

DOJ_NMG_0018463

"What we've seen is a serious effort by them to foment a civil war," Cheney said. "But I don't think they've been successful."

Cheney blamed the negative perception on news coverage of the daily violence instead of the progress being made toward democracy.

"There is a constant sort of perception, if you will, that's created because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad," the vice president said. "It's not all the work that went on that day in 15 other provinces."

White House critics bemoaned the fact that the third anniversary of fighting ever came to pass and accused the Bush administration of incompetence.

"By any measure, in my view, we're worse off in Iraq today than we were a year ago," Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., said on CNN's "Late Edition." He cited increased deaths and violence, incomplete government services and a long path to building a consensus government.

Rumsfeld urged Americans to continue supporting the fight and said he believes history will show that the terrorists were defeated. Meanwhile, his detractors issued another round of criticism and calls for his resignation.

In a New York Times column, retired Gen. Paul D. Eaton, who was in charge of training the Iraqi military from 2003-2004, called the defense secretary "incompetent strategically, operationally and tactically, and is far more responsible for what has happened to our important mission in Iraq. Mr. Rumsfeld must step down."

Nearly three years ago Bush announced the end to major combat in Iraq.

Last week, U.S. forces launched Operation Swarmer, described by the Pentagon as the biggest air assault since April 2003. However, Casey said Sunday that he wouldn't categorize Swarmer as a major combat operation, noting that other operations had used far more troops.

"It was an operation to go out into an almost uninhabited area," Casey said. "I think, frankly, it got a little bit more hype than it really deserved because of the use of the helicopters to get the Iraqi and the coalition forces there."

Assessments At Odds On War's Anniversary (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — On the third anniversary of the start of the U.S.-led war in Iraq, the Bush administration insisted the effort is making progress and said Iraq is doing more to fight insurgents.

Critics in Washington and protesters around the world called for a new approach.

President Bush called Sunday a "time to reflect" about the sacrifices of U.S. troops in Iraq over the past three years. He said he was pleased by Iraqi efforts toward democracy. The top U.S. general in Iraq, meanwhile, predicted "a couple of more years" of violent insurgency, but with U.S. troop presence going down.

However, Iraq's former prime minister, Ayad Allawi, said the country is in a state of civil war. Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., a critic of the administration's handling of the war, said it was time for "new thinking." And Anthony Cordesman, a leading Iraq expert and war supporter, said, "We may well fail in all our efforts because they came far too slowly."

Protests around the world focused criticism on the Bush administration. Police in London estimated 15,000 people marched from Parliament to Trafalgar Square; last year's protest drew 45,000. About 800 people rallied in Tokyo compared with about 2,000 last year. In the United States, the biggest rally was in Chicago, where about 7,000 people marched. Smaller protests were held in other cities, including Boston, San Francisco, Pittsburgh and New York.

Avoiding the word "war," Bush said Sunday marked "the third anniversary of the beginning of the liberation of Iraq." Speaking to reporters upon his return from Camp David, Bush said he talked by phone Sunday morning with the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, and came away "encouraged by the progress" the Iraqi government is making to establish a balance across Sunni Arab, Shiite Muslim and Kurdish factions.

Top Bush administration officials sought Sunday to convey a message combining a realistic assessment of continuing violence in Iraq with optimism about the future.

DOJ_NMG_0018464

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld issued a message to the 132,000 U.S. troops in Iraq acknowledging their sacrifice. "The progress on all fronts has been murderously contested at every turn by terrorists aligned with al-Qaeda. But they are not succeeding," he said in the statement posted on the Pentagon's website.

Vice President Cheney, appearing on CBS' Face the Nation, rejected Allawi's assessment and said insurgents have "reached a stage of desperation." Cheney also said he did not regret previous statements — that U.S. forces would be greeted as liberators and that the insurgency was in its last throes — and said they "were basically accurate, reflect reality."

Cheney blamed the media for focusing on violence instead of Iraq's progress toward rebuilding. Violence is intensifying, he said, because the enemy knows that if democracy succeeds in Iraq, its extremist agenda throughout the Middle East will be imperiled.

"There's a lot more at stake here," Cheney said.

Appearing on three networks, Army Gen. George Casey, commander of coalition forces in Iraq, described the violence there as centered in and around Baghdad.

Fifteen of 18 provinces have six incidents of violence or fewer per day, Casey said. In 12 Iraqi provinces, he said, the number of violent incidents is two or fewer per day. He predicted that current troop levels would continue over the next few months but that U.S. forces could be reduced later in 2006 and next year.

Cordesman, of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, predicted Iraq will not stabilize until 2007-08. He said there is "a real risk that Iraq will degenerate into full-scale civil war or a level of divisiveness that will paralyze or limit" the country. As to the idea that Iraq is a model for spreading democracy across the region, Cordesman was dismissive: "Iraq is not a model of anything."

Hagel, a possible Republican presidential contender in 2008, said on ABC's This Week that the war is "helping bankrupt this country" and that U.S. policy options must include withdrawal. The United States so far has spent about $400 billion on the Iraq war.

Among Democrats, Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, said on NBC's Meet the Press, that "Republicans in Congress will get a rude awakening" on Iraq in the November elections if the administration does not change course.

Some Say Civil War Already Started (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and his senior advisors Sunday sought to mark the third anniversary of the Iraq war with declarations of progress, but found themselves embroiled in renewed debate about whether the nation had fallen into civil war.

In statements to reporters, appearances on Sunday morning TV news shows and an op-ed article, Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Army Gen. George W. Casey, the senior U.S. military commander in Iraq, declared that the United States was making progress toward stabilizing Iraq and defusing sectarian tensions.

But those upbeat assessments faced sharp skepticism from U.S. legislators from both parties and from a senior Iraqi political leader, former interim Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, who has been a staunch American ally. They contended that Iraq was now in the midst of a civil war between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

The issue of whether Iraq's sectarian fighting constitutes a civil war has taken on political significance. Polls have shown American support for the Iraq war dropping since the bombing last month of a Shiite shrine in Samarra led to widespread communal violence. Strategists in both parties have said that Bush will have a more difficult time sustaining support for the U.S. military presence in Iraq if the public believes that troops are caught in the middle of a civil war.

On a day of sweeping arguments from both sides, the most dramatic comments came from Allawi.

"It is unfortunate that we are in civil war," the former prime minister told the British Broadcasting Corp. "We are losing each day, as an average, 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more. If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

Allawi added: "Maybe we have not reached the point of no return yet. But we are moving toward this point. We are in a terrible civil conflict now."

In separate television interviews, both Cheney and Casey rejected Allawi's characterization.

DOJ_NMG_0018465

The vice president, speaking on CBS' "Face the Nation," said that "terrorists" in Iraq wanted to provoke civil war, but added, "I don't think they've been successful."

"That's been their strategy all along," Cheney said, "but my view would be they've reached a stage of desperation from their standpoint."

Appearing on CNN's "Late Edition," Casey contended that Iraq was still "a long way from civil war."

But he portrayed overall conditions much more cautiously than the vice president had, saying on NBC's "Meet the Press" that the situation in Iraq was "fragile."

"Is the situation here fragile because of the increased … sectarian tensions and increased levels of violence?" Casey said. "That's absolutely right, and I don't want … to sugarcoat it. The situation here is fragile, and I suspect it will remain fragile until we get a new government, a government of national unity formed."

In Baghdad, political leaders made their first measurable progress toward forming such a government, agreeing to create a council that would give each of the country's major political factions a voice in making security and economic policies.

Bush, speaking briefly to reporters after returning from a weekend at Camp David, said he had spoken Sunday morning with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in Iraq about the government negotiations.

"I'm encouraged by the progress," Bush said. "The ambassador was encouraged by it."

But Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the United States needed to move more aggressively to resolve the long-running negotiations over a new government, perhaps by threatening to begin removing U.S. forces if the Iraqis could not agree on a consensus government.

"The only leverage we have is our troop presence," Reed said on ABC's "This Week."

"And I think we have to make it clear to the Iraqi political leaders that if they're not able or willing to come together … that our presence can't be indefinite there."

The political effect of the continued fighting in Iraq can be seen clearly in recent polls. Since the Feb. 22 bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, support among Americans for both the war and Bush's performance as president have fallen to some of the lowest levels of his tenure.

In a CNN/USA Today/Gallup national survey released last week, for instance, 55% of Americans said that chaos and civil war were the most likely outcomes in Iraq; 40% said they expected that a stable government would be formed.

Only 37% of those polled said they believed the war in Iraq had been worth the cost, down from 46% in January. Fully 60% of those surveyed said the war had not been worth the cost; that equaled the highest percentage Gallup has recorded on that question.

As administration officials sought to rebut the idea of a civil war, lawmakers, also speaking on the Sunday interview programs, supported Allawi's conclusion.

"I think … the former prime minister is correct," Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said on "This Week."

"I think we have had a low-grade civil war going on in Iraq, certainly the last six months, maybe the last year. Our own generals have told me that privately."

Rep. John P. Murtha, a traditionally hawkish Democrat from Pennsylvania who has urged Bush to remove American forces from Iraq, echoed Hagel. "Our troops are caught in a civil war," Murtha said on "Meet the Press."

Hagel, who has become a frequent critic of the war, said that the invasion had weakened America's security position. "Are we better off than we were three years ago?" he asked. "Is the Middle East more stable than it was three years ago? Absolutely not. It's more unstable."

Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, also expressed concern about the direction of events in Iraq.

"Materially things have worsened … for ordinary Iraqis," he told "Late Edition." "Certainly more Iraqi civilians are being killed, substantially more, and the government is not yet in operation."

DOJ_NMG_0018466

Both Bush and Cheney, in their comments, said trends in Iraq were much more positive than such assessments suggested. Cheney rejected charges that he had been too optimistic in earlier assessments of the war, such as his assertion in May 2005 that the insurgency was in its "last throes."

Cheney said good news from Iraq had not been reported. Public disillusionment "has less to do with the statements we've made, which I think were basically accurate and reflect reality, than it does with the fact that there's a constant sort of perception, if you will, that's created because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad," Cheney said. "It's not all the work that went on that day in 15 other provinces in terms of making progress toward rebuilding Iraq."

In an op-ed article in the Washington Post, Rumsfeld declared that the "terrorists seem to recognize that they are losing in Iraq" and that the U.S. must remain in the country long enough to ensure stability.

"Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis," Rumsfeld wrote.

On Anniversary, Bush And Cheney See Iraq Success (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 19 — On the third anniversary of a war that they once expected to be over by now, President Bush and senior officials argued Sunday that their strategy was working despite escalating violence in Iraq, even as a former Iraqi prime minister once favored by the White House declared that a civil war had already started.

Displaying a carefully calibrated mix of optimism about eventual victory and caution about how long American troops would be involved, the officials who marked the day — including Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld — sounded much as they had on the first anniversary of the invasion. At that time, the rebuilding effort had just begun, the insurgency was far less fierce, and the American occupation had suppressed, temporarily, the sectarian violence scarring Iraq today.

The picture painted by the administration clashed with that of the former interim prime minister, Ayad Allawi, once hailed by Mr. Bush as the kind of fair-minded leader Iraq needed. He declared in an interview with the BBC that the country was nearing a "point of no return."

"It is unfortunate that we are in civil war," said Mr. Allawi, who served as prime minister after the American invasion and now leads a 25-seat secular alliance of representatives in Iraq's 275-seat National Assembly. "We are losing each day, as an average, 50 to 60 people through the country, if not more."

"If this is not civil war," he said, "then God knows what civil war is."

Mr. Allawi's assessment was contradicted by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander in Iraq, who said on CNN's "Late Edition" that "We're a long way from civil war."

As politicians in Baghdad moved incrementally forward on Sunday on forming a unified government, at least 15 more bodies were discovered around the capital, bringing to more than 200 the number of people believed killed in sectarian violence in the past few weeks. [Page A10.]

On CBS News' "Face the Nation," Mr. Cheney sought to place the war in a broader context. "It's not just about Iraq, it's not about just today's situation in Iraq," he said. "It's about where we're going to be 10 years from now in the Middle East and whether or not there's going to be hope and the development of the governments that are responsive to the will of the people, that are not a threat to anyone, that are not safe havens for terror or manufacturers of weapons of mass destruction."

The war has taken more than 2,300 American lives, and those of 33,000 to 37,000 Iraqis, according to the estimates of the Iraq Body Count Project, an independent group that monitors the news media.

Mr. Rumsfeld dismissed calls for withdrawal by comparing the current battle to the two great struggles of his generation: World War II and the cold war. "Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis," he wrote in an op-ed article published in The Washington Post. "It would be as great a disgrace as if we had asked the liberated nations of Eastern Europe to return to Soviet domination."

DOJ_NMG_0018467

Mr. Bush is entering the fourth year of the war able to declare success in the dismantling of Saddam Hussein's tyrannical government and in providing a framework for democratic elections, though the country has so far failed to put together the institutions to make a democracy work. Mr. Bush's approval rating, which soared in the early days of the invasion as Americans rushed to Baghdad, has sunk to the low-to-mid 30 percent range as the chaos and number of Iraqis meeting violent deaths has escalated.

Mr. Cheney was challenged on "Face the Nation" about his statement three years ago that "we will be greeted as liberators" and his assertion 10 months ago that the insurgency was in its "last throes."

He insisted that in both cases his facts were right, but that the news media had created a different perception with vivid imagery of killing.

"I think it has less to do with the statements we've made, which I think were basically accurate and reflect reality, than it does with the fact that there's a constant sort of perception, if you will, that's created because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad," he said.

The administration could take heart this weekend from the relatively small antiwar protests around the country, compared with protests held on the previous anniversaries of the invasion. An estimated 7,000 people demonstrated in Chicago on Saturday and smaller protests were held over the weekend in Boston, San Francisco and other cities. In Times Square, the figure was about 1,000.

Television was the forum where the administration's representatives and opponents marshaled the statistics that they believe made their cases. Mr. Bush argued last week that by year's end, Iraqi forces would control more than half the country; Representative John P. Murtha, the hawkish Pennsylvania Democrat who late last year called for American withdrawal, said Sunday on NBC News' "Meet the Press" that the statistic was meaningless.

"I flew for an hour and 15 minutes over desert," he said of a recent trip. "Wasn't a soul. And that's the territory I guess they're talking about." Meanwhile, he noted, unemployment has soared in areas hardest hit by sectarian violence. Oil production, which the administration once said would pay for Iraq's rebuilding, was markedly below last year's levels.

As midterm elections approach, the White House is concerned that support for the war is ebbing fastest among Republicans who supported the war, including some influential conservatives who argue that the job of liberation is done, and American troops should not be left in the crossfire of civil strife.

Mr. Bush talked about the war in a two-minute statement to reporters on Sunday when he returned to the White House from Camp David, urging Iraq to form a unity government, and saying, "I'm encouraged by the progress." Then he entered the White House with his wife, Laura.

He offered no answers to questions about the gap between his expectations three years ago and the realities of Iraq today, seemingly underscoring the problem the White House has faced in explaining the war. Suspicions that Mr. Hussein had unconventional weapons, an original justification for the invasion, have proved unfounded.

Mr. Bush halted eroding support for his Iraq strategy last December, explaining his military, political and economic strategy and admitting some early errors. But that was before images of Shiites fighting Sunnis began a new erosion of support.

On the critical political question — how long American forces will stay — General Casey has said a significant presence will be required for "a couple more years," and "over 2006, we will continue to see a gradual reduction in coalition forces."

When the war was launched, the Pentagon expected a short conflict. Its classified plans called for the withdrawal of the majority of American troops by the fall of 2003. Today there are roughly 133,000 still there.

As of Friday, 2,313 American military personnel and Defense Department civilians had died during the Iraq effort; of those, 1,811 were killed in action and 502 in non-hostile events, like accidents, a Pentagon spokesman said Sunday. The spokesman also cited statistics that 7,912 American military personnel had been wounded so severely in action they could not return to duty, and 9,212 had been wounded in action but could return to duty.

Mr. Rumsfeld, whose refusal to send larger numbers of troops into Iraq after the invasion has made him a lightning rod for critics, said in his published remarks on Sunday that terrorists, not the American-led coalition, are losing in Iraq, a message repeated by Mr. Cheney.

DOJ_NMG_0018468

And like Mr. Cheney, Mr. Rumsfeld insisted the problem was the imagery from a 24-hour news cycle. "Fortunately, history is not made up of daily headlines, blogs on Web sites or the latest sensational attack," Mr. Rumsfeld wrote. "History is a bigger picture, and it takes some time and perspective to measure accurately."

Bush Still Upbeat On Outcome In Iraq (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

President Bush and Vice President Cheney hailed the progress being made by Iraqi leaders to form a unity government yesterday, as the administration tried to dispel a growing perception that a continuing wave of sectarian violence has pushed Iraq into a full-fledged civil war.

Bush, speaking on the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion that toppled Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, assured Americans that his administration is pursuing a strategy "that will lead to victory in Iraq," an outcome about which polls show the public is increasingly skeptical.

Cheney, meanwhile, dismissed assertions made by former Iraqi prime minister Ayad Allawi that the nation is in the throes of civil war. He said Iraq is holding together as a new constitutional democracy even as terrorists are desperately trying to cause its dissolution.

"What we've seen is a serious effort by them to foment civil war, but I don't think they've been successful," Cheney said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

The upbeat appraisals by Bush and Cheney came as other voices struck a more ominous note. Allawi contradicted Bush's progress report, saying the country is edging toward "the point of no return."

"We are losing a day as an average 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more," Allawi said on BBC's "Sunday AM" program. "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

Three years after U.S.-led forces quickly swept through Iraq, the country remains in the grips of a bloody insurgency. The war and its aftermath have left more than 2,300 U.S. troops and at least 30,000 Iraqis dead. Negotiations to form a unity government to lead Iraq have been deadlocked since parliamentary elections in December.

The anniversary was marked by protests around the country and around the world, as thousands of antiwar demonstrators gathered in cities from London to Tokyo. In New York, a crowd of about 200 people marched down Fifth Avenue to protest the war. Demonstrators also marched through storm-ravaged New Orleans, saying the slow pace of recovery there illustrates the cost of the war in Iraq.

Meanwhile, a growing majority of Americans believe the effort is not worth the cost both financially and in lives lost. A Washington Post-ABC News poll earlier this month found that two-thirds of Americans questioned whether the United States has a clear plan for handling the situation in Iraq.

As the administration offered optimistic appraisals of the war's progress, Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), a frequent administration critic who is weighing a run for president in 2008, echoed Allawi's assessment, saying that Iraq is already in the midst of a "low-grade civil war."

"I think it's important that we stop this talk about we're not going to leave until we achieve victory," Hagel said on ABC's "This Week." "Well, what is victory? We achieved victory, Saddam's gone, the Iraqis have a constitution, they had an election, it's now up to them."

Hagel said a precipitous U.S. withdrawal from Iraq would be a mistake, but he added that the Bush administration should work harder to achieve a political settlement in Iraq by engaging other Middle Eastern countries in a negotiated solution.

Despite Americans' growing pessimism, the Bush administration is continuing to press ahead with its strategy, saying that it is steadily moving toward success. Bush is scheduled to deliver a speech in Cleveland today, which is part of a continuing administration effort to rebuild the eroding public support for the war by having the president speak regularly to specific elements of the war strategy.

Bush, who spoke on the White House South Lawn after returning from a weekend at Camp David, said that he is encouraged by Iraq's continuing steps toward democracy, and that he is urging Iraqi leaders "to work hard to get this government up and running." Bush said he spoke by phone yesterday to U.S. ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, who he said remains encouraged by the political progress being made in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0018469

Sectarian violence intensified after last month's bombing of the Golden Mosque, a revered Shiite religious site in Samarra. Hundreds of Iraqis have been killed in brutal attacks, counterattacks and kidnappings since the mosque bombing.

Although a growing majority of Americans have come to believe that the U.S. invasion was an error and that the nation is headed toward civil war, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the U.S. military commander in Iraq, brushed aside the idea on "Fox News Sunday." "I personally don't believe one, that we're there now; two, that civil war is imminent; and three, that it is inevitable and it will happen," he said.

Meanwhile, Cheney said that Iraq is progressing toward establishing a functioning democracy. He pointed out that Iraq has gone from the brutal rule of Hussein to negotiations to form a government in three years. In addition, he said, the United States is making substantial progress in training Iraqi security forces, who he said are leading about half the missions in Iraq.

Cheney also dismissed a statement by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who said the war in Iraq should never have been fought: "I would not look to Ted Kennedy for guidance and leadership on how we ought to manage national security. . . . I think what Senator Kennedy reflects is sort of the pre-9/11 mentality about how we ought to deal with the world and that part of the world."

But CBS anchor Bob Schieffer bluntly challenged Cheney on his own string of prognostications, such as his pre-invasion assertion that U.S. troops would be welcomed in Iraq as liberators and, 10 months ago, that the insurgency was in its "last throes."

Cheney replied that those statements were "basically accurate and reflect reality," but that public perceptions of Iraq's progress are being skewed "because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad."

Again linking the war in Iraq to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Cheney called the conflict part of "an aggressive, forward-leaning" strategy that has prevented terrorist incidents in the United States since then.

Kennedy, meanwhile, put out his own statement chastising Cheney: "He was wrong about the link between al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein. He was wrong about Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. He was wrong about America being greeted as liberators. He was wrong about the insurgency being in the last throes. Now he rejects the idea of civil war."

In Iraq, US Influence Wanes As Full-scale Civil War Looms (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD - Every day, more violence. And more uncertainty for Iraqis than they have ever known, as they mark three years since American troops invaded.

The wave of optimism that once buoyed Iraqis after the fall of Saddam Hussein is now being marked as yet another casualty of the bombs and murders that are part of daily life here.

But even as Iraq slides toward full-scale civil war, Iraqi analysts are trying to envision a way out of a vicious insurgency, political deadlock, and sectarian bloodshed.

One factor they are considering is the changing American role. Despite the continued presence of 130,000 American troops, and arm-twisting efforts by US diplomats to forge a unity government, Iraq's democratic political process is, by definition, giving the US even less leverage to shape this broken nation's future.

"The majority of Iraqis are now against this occupation, whether they are Sunni, Shiite or Kurd," says Wamidh Omar Nadhmi, a political scientist who heads a Sunni-led group called the Foundation Conference. "But those in government positions are trying to unleash a campaign of suppression, to take advantage [of the violence], to dominate.

"Now we are told: '[The Americans] are not going to take sides,' " says Mr. Nadhmi, referring to remarks by US officials last week that Iraqi forces must handle sectarian strife on their own. "But if it comes to civil war, and the US does not try to keep order, as the controlling power, then why do they stay in Iraq?"

Tens of thousands of Iraqis have died in a maelstrom of insurgent violence. Many hundreds more are dying in sectarian killings that flared a month ago, after the destruction of the gold-domed Shiite shrine at Samarra.

DOJ_NMG_0018470

The grim reality today - and the perception among so many Iraqis that the US is responsible - could not be in sharper contrast from the faith Iraqis once held, that the all-powerful Americans would solve their problems.

"It is unfortunate that we are in civil war," Iyad Allawi, Iraq's former prime minister, told BBC news Sunday. "We are losing each day an average of 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more. If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

That view is hotly disputed by US officials and commanders, but is on the lips of many Iraqis here. "Maybe we have not reached a point of no return yet, but we are moving towards this point," said Mr. Allawi.

But escaping that vortex will not be easy, analysts say.

"The new government is incapable of ruling the street without the American presence," says Ahmad al-Rikabi, head of the popular Radio Dijla in Baghdad. "If [US forces] left Iraq, the future of the country would be in the hands of the militias. This is the case already, but we still have some hope [the US] will keep some balance."

The stakes could not be higher, for Iraq or for the region, President Bush said last week. "The battle lines in Iraq are clearly drawn for the world to see, and there is no middle ground," he said. "The enemy will emerge from Iraq one of two ways: Emboldened or defeated."

US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad has been pushing Iraqi leaders to form a unity government, that would mend rifts inside the main Shiite bloc, and ensure a significant role for the minority Sunni Arabs. At the formal opening of parliament last Thursday, he had a place in the handshaking line alongside Iraqi political leaders.

But diplomats close to the talks say not all Iraqi leaders welcome the forceful US intervention. Both Washington and Tehran have signaled that they could commence talks to solve the crisis, in what would be the first publicly acknowledged contact since Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution.

"Saddam Hussein is still ruling Iraq - he may be behind bars, but he created the mentality we have today," says Mr. Rikabi. "Saddam has to be executed. It's not revenge, and won't be satisfying for his victims. But it will be good for Shiite and Kurds, and even Sunnis, to help them focus on their leaders."

"The symbols of the past are still in front of our eyes; we're still living in the past, and must get rid of the past," says Rikabi. Sectarian violence grows

But getting rid of the past means getting rid of business as usual, and that means coming to terms with the increasingly pervasive Shiite militia influence in Iraq's security forces, which are accused of abuse, torture, and operating death squads that target Sunni Arabs. They also reportedly let other Shiite militias, like the Mahdi Army of anti-US cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, operate with impunity.

"The first thing is to change the minister," says a Shiite police colonel who asked not to be named, referring to Bayan Jabr, the minister of interior and a former Badr militia leader. "We need an independent one."

Ambassador Khalilzad has pushed for such a change. Shiites are targeted almost exclusively by the Sunni Arab extremist insurgents. But Sunni Arabs say they see little change on the ground.

"Nobody obliged the minister of interior to resign - he should be arrested," says Mr. Wamidh. "There have been no actual steps in favor of the Sunnis, but accumulated attacks against them."

The daily toll was again evident Sunday, as hundreds of thousands of Shiite pilgrims made their way by foot to the sacred city of Karbala, south of Baghdad, to mark Monday the death of Hussein, the grandson of the prophet Muhammad.

Pilgrims have been subject to drive-by shootings and bombings by Sunni Arab extremists that have killed four. A mortar landed near the shrine of Imam Hussein but caused no harm. An extra 700 American troops were deployed from Kuwait, to boost security during the religious event.

In Baghdad four bodies killed execution-style were found Sunday; 22 were found, by one count, the day before.

Whatever the result of the political wrangling, many Iraqis say it will not be enough to correct three years of US mistakes - from disbanding Saddam Hussein's 400,000-strong army with the stroke of a pen, to a vigorous de-Baathification plan that swept capable bureaucrats from government - that helped fuel insurgency. Out of touch politicians

DOJ_NMG_0018471

But there is a further problem, analysts say, that no amount of US influence can help: The fact that insecurity is so pervasive, that Iraqi leaders and the government meet inside the bubble of the Green Zone, among a labyrinth of 12-foot-high concrete blast walls woven together with coils of concertina wire that keep them safe, as well as isolated.

"The politicians are out of touch with the street, so it is like a group of blind people negotiating," says Rikabi. "They have nothing to do with the Republic of Iraq ... they do not feel a power cut for a second, while outside, [electricity] is off for 22 hours a day. You can't make the right decision, when the prime minister still has his family in London."

Relying on such politicians also risks the endgame for the US, which wants a unity government to take control - and control Iraqi security forces - so American forces can begin withdrawing.

"I can see their dilemma," says Nadhmi. "[President George] Bush is triumphant about democracy in Iraq, but if he tries to intervene and put in a prime minister of his own, it would be a contradiction." Seventy-five daily insurgent attacks

Still, options are limited for the US - both military and political - which last week accused Iran of "meddling" in Iraqi affairs, and claimed that Iran had helped insurgents improve their explosive techniques.

The US military's "kinetic or muscular approach has failed to produce sustained success," says a report last month from the International Institute of Strategic Studies (IISS), noting that insurgent attacks at a tempo of 75 per day against coalition forces show "no signs of diminishing."

It notes that several key non-Al Qaeda insurgent groups secretly agreed to a 21-point "principles for dialogue" with US forces last December. Such talks have not taken place in part, the IISS says, because "the very logic of elections, bringing to power an indigenous government with a mandate, has directly reduced US influence over Iraqi politics."

This has been clear for months to many in Iraq, who look back with nostalgia on Saddam Hussein, in the way that older Russians often crave the order once instilled upon the Soviet Union by Josef Stalin.

"People were executed in Saddam's days, but it is the same today," says Rikabi, of Radio Dijla. "Then it was behind high walls, now it is by this or that militia.

"Before, people respected the traffic police, there was an organization, a state; today we have the smell, the shadow of a government," says Rikabi. "Before, people would go to restaurants until 2 a.m.; today their lives are full of fear.

"Then, we had one Saddam Hussein," concludes Rikabi. "Today, we have many Saddam Husseins."

Bush Vows Strategy Will Win In Iraq (WT)

By From combined dispatches

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

President Bush yesterday marked the third anniversary of the beginning of the Iraq war, saying the U.S. strategy will "lead to victory."

"A victory in Iraq will make this country more secure and will help lay the foundation of peace for generations to come," Mr. Bush said in a brief statement on the South Lawn of the White House after returning from Camp David.

Other administration officials echoed the president's call for resolve in the face of enemy attacks that have killed more than 2,300 U.S. troops in Iraq.

"Now is the time for resolve, not retreat," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld wrote in a column for The Washington Post. "Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis."

While protesters around the world also observed the anniversary of Operation Iraqi Freedom -- with anti-American rallies that drew smaller crowds than similar demonstrations in the past -- the president paid tribute to the nation's armed forces.

"Today ... marks the third anniversary of the beginning of the liberation of Iraq, and it's a time to reflect," Mr. Bush told reporters. "And this morning, our reflections were upon the sacrifices of the men and women who wear our uniform.

"Ours is an amazing nation where thousands have volunteered to serve our country. ... Many volunteered after 9/11, knowing full well that their time in the military could put them in harm's way. So, on this third anniversary [of] the beginning of the liberation of Iraq, I think all Americans should offer thanks to the men and women who wear the uniform, and their families who support them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0018472

The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, said Iraq has made "huge progress" toward democracy, holding three nationwide elections and adopting a constitution.

"If you think about it, three years ago Saddam Hussein was still in charge of the country. Now he's on trial, and will be held accountable by the Iraqi people," Gen. Casey said on "Fox News Sunday."

The Army general said progress has also "been made with the Iraqi security forces, barely from almost nothing to the point now where two of the Iraqi divisions, 13 of the Iraq brigades and almost 60 of the Iraqi military and special police battalions are actually in the lead conducting counterinsurgency operations across Iraq."

Gen. Casey acknowledged the continuing efforts of foreign terrorists to foment civil war in Iraq.

"So, is there violence in Iraq? Sure. Is there terrorism in Iraq? Sure," he said. "And the terrorists and insurgents are doing everything in their power to convince both the Iraqis and our public that this endeavor can't succeed. But I think the Iraqis are right now ... on the threshold of a very significant step toward their future."

Turnout for anti-war rallies was lower than on the first and second anniversaries of the war. Only about 200 demonstrators showed up yesterday for a march down New York's Fifth Avenue, with signs including, "We the People Need to do More to End the War."

Attendance was also down at anti-war events in other countries, including Japan, where about 800 showed up in Tokyo for a march to the U.S. Embassy.

"The Iraq war was President Bush's big mistake and the whole world is against him," Tokyo organizer Ayako Nishimura told the crowd.

Similar sentiments were expressed yesterday by Democrats.

"The American people can see the truth for themselves every day," said Democratic National Committee communications director Karen Finney. "We don't need more of the same permanent commitment to a failed strategy from this administration. The American people know that we need to change course in Iraq, so 2006 can be a year of transition in which the Iraqis truly take control of their country."

On NBC's "Meet the Press," Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and war critic, dismissed the administration's reports of progress in Iraq and compared the situation to the war in Vietnam 40 years ago.

"When the whole world is against you, when our international reputation has been diminished so substantially, when all the countries in the region say, 'We'd be better off without us being in Iraq,' when the people themselves in Iraq say -- and American people say it, I mean who is right?" Mr. Murtha said.

Quiet Disapproval In US Marks War's Anniversary (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, March 20, 2006

On the third anniversary of the US-led invasion of Iraq, the US capital's historic protest venues were surprisingly serene on Sunday. Outside the White House tourists had their pictures taken next to a cardboard cut-out of the president, families enjoyed the sun on the Mall and several bored-looking policemen stood guard outside the vice-president's DC home. Not a placard in sight or a chant to be heard.

Americans may have turned decisively against the war in Iraq in recent months, but their change of heart has been largely expressed quietly to pollsters rather than in loud public protests. The micro-protests that have taken place around the third anniversary – including a few hundred who gathered to hear anti-war speeches in the affluent DC neighbourhood of Dupont Circle – pale by comparison with the monster demonstrations against the Vietnam war.

A clue to this curiously low-key response may be found in the bustling shopping centres. Despite the mounting cost of the war in Iraq, the economic consequences have remained relatively contained. There have been no signs of a decline in consumer confidence and no uptick in inflation.

Americans have not even been asked to stump up the cash for the war effort – at least not yet – with the administration and Congress opting for higher borrowing rather than higher taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0018473

As of Friday military casualties had mounted to 2,313 killed and 17,000 wounded. This is enough to make many Americans question the conflict, but the toll still falls far short of the 58,000 Americans who died in Vietnam.

But the simmering concerns over the conflict have been taking a heavy toll on support for George W. Bush, dragging the president's approval ratings close to the levels of support for President Richard Nixon in the wake of Watergate.

A poll for Newsweek magazine at the end of last week showed that just 29 per cent of Americans approve of the president's handling of the war, down from 69 per cent in the months after the conflict began in March 2003. Almost 60 per cent of Americans now feel less confident that the war will come to a successful conclusion, with fears mounting that the country will slide into civil war.

The administration has launched a new campaign to rebuild support for the war. In a television interview on Sunday, Dick Cheney, the vice-president, said there was "overwhelming evidence" that the US was making progress in Iraq. Set-piece speeches are planned this week by both the president and vice-president.

Yet despite the reassurances, recent pronouncements of the president have had an uncharacteristically dour tone. In a speech over the weekend, Mr Bush acknowledged that there had been "horrific images from Iraq" and that a "tense situation" prevailed in parts of the country. He urged Americans to brace for "more fighting and sacrifice." That is not what was being predicted three years ago.

Allawi Says Iraq Is In Civil War; U.S. Forces Clash With Gunmen (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Iraq is in the middle of a civil war, Iraq's former prime minister, Ayad Allawi, said in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp. aired on Sunday.

Mr. Allawi, who heads the Iraqi National List, a secular alliance of Shiite and Sunni politicians, said there was no other way to describe the increasing violence across the country.

"It is unfortunate that we are in civil war. We are losing each day as an average 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more," Mr. Allawi told the BBC. "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

Mr. Allawi said playing down the current problems in Iraq would be a mistake, telling the BBC he had warned against a power vacuum and the prevalence of militias. Mr. Allawi said the formation of a national unity government was what Iraq needed to achieve peace.

Iraq's newly elected parliament was seated Thursday, and representatives of its Shiite Arab, Sunni Arab and Kurdish blocs have been meeting in an effort to overcome deep divisions and agree on the makeup of a new government. The minority factions want to block broad Shiite control of powerful ministries.

British Defense Secretary John Reid, who is visiting Iraq, expressed concern about "a greater degree of sectarian violence," but said he didn't believe civil war was imminent. "The most urgent need at the moment is the speedy formation of a government of national unity," he said.

Meanwhile, on the eve of the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion, American troops clashed with gunmen north and west of Baghdad Sunday and insurgents lobbed a mortar round into Karbala, the holy city south of Baghdad where a million Shiite pilgrims assembled for a major religious commemoration.

U.S. Troops to Remain in Iraq for Years

Separately, the top commander of U.S. forces in Iraq said Sunday that U.S. troops likely will remain there for the next few years though the numbers will be scaled back as Iraqi forces gain strength. "I see a couple of more years of this with a gradually reducing coalition presence here in Iraq .. as the Iraqi security forces step forward," Gen. George W. Casey said.

Mr. Casey said he did not think at the time the war began that the insurgency in Iraq would have been as robust as it has been. Appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," he said didn't believe Iraq was in danger of falling into civil war, although he said it remained a possibility because of increased sectarian tensions and violence. "The situation here is fragile," he said. "I suspect it will remain fragile here until we get a new government, a government of national unity, formed."

Continuing Violence

DOJ_NMG_0018474

Iraqi police said eight civilians, including a child, were killed in clashes between U.S. troops and gunmen in Duluiyah, 45 miles (75 kilometers) north of Baghdad. The town is located in Iraq's Sunni heartland where the Iraqi army and U.S. forces opened an airborne campaign last week to hunt down insurgents.

The Americans said it was the largest "air assault" operation since the 2003 invasion.

During operations in Duluiyah, police said, U.S. troops arrested Col. Farouq Khalil, an Iraqi interior ministry official, after raiding his house. The American military didn't immediately respond to a request for comment. Earlier it said scores of suspected insurgents had been detained.

Elsewhere, two civilians were killed and 10 wounded when gunmen attacked U.S. troops stationed at the governor's office in Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad.

In the capital, police found the bullet-riddled bodies of three men bound hand and foot and dumped in a sewage treatment plant in the southeast neighborhood of Rustamiyah. The victims appeared to be the latest in the wave of revenge killings after the bombing Feb. 22 of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

The mortar round fired at the holy city of Karbala landed in a parking lot a half mile from the shrine that is the destination of the pilgrims marking the 40th and final day of mourning for Imam Hussein, the Prophet Muhammad's grandson. No one was hurt.

In violence against police, gunmen killed four guards at archaeological sites in the northern city of Mosul. A fifth policeman and a bystander were wounded. A roadside bomb exploded on a police patrol in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, killing one officer and injuring 10 others, the Iraqi military said.

A Baghdad policeman driving on a rural road in Latifiyah, about 20 miles south of the Iraqi capital, was also killed by gunmen, police said. Four men riding in the car were wounded in the attack.

Near the southern city of Basra, two officials of the Iraqi Islamic Party were gunned down by four assassins. On Saturday, a dozen bodies were found in Baghdad in the shadowy war of Shiite-Sunni reprisals.

In a U.S. radio address, President Bush said the violence in Iraq "has created a new sense of urgency" among Iraqi leaders to form such a government.

Those leaders -- representatives of the squabbling Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish blocs in Iraq's new parliament -- were taking a break from negotiations to observe Monday's Shiite holiday and Tuesday's Kurdish New Year. They are deadlocked over how to apportion the most powerful jobs in the new government, as minority factions seek to limit domination by Iraq's Shiite majority.

The U.S. military reported that two 101st Airborne soldiers were killed Thursday by indirect fire, usually meaning mortars, at the Speicher operating base, north of where the joint Iraqi-U.S. operation was in progress.

At least 2,314 American military personnel have died since the Iraq war began in the early hours of March 20, 2003.

Deaths Fall For U.S., Rise For Iraqis (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. military deaths during the past month have dropped to an average of about one a day, approaching the lowest level since the insurgency began two years ago, according to a USA TODAY analysis of U.S. military data.

The decline in U.S. deaths comes as Iraqi casualties are the highest since the U.S. military began tracking them in 2004.

In the past month, nearly five times as many Iraqi forces and civilians were killed as troops in the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, U.S. military data show.

The shift from spring 2004, when U.S. and Iraqi casualty rates were comparable, reflects an insurgency that increasingly targets Iraqis and the growing presence of Iraqi forces on the front lines.

“The Iraqi army is far bigger in number, far higher in training capability and far more willing to go where the fight is and take casualties,” British Defense Secretary John Reid said in an interview.

On the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion, however, a wave of violence against Iraqis is prompting talk of civil war. In an interview Sunday with the British Broadcasting Corp., former interim prime minister Ayad Allawi said, “We are losing each day as an average 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more. If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is.”

DOJ_NMG_0018475

Vice President Cheney disagreed. Speaking on CBS' Face the Nation, Cheney said, "What we've seen is a serious effort by (insurgents) to foment a civil war. But I don't think they've been successful."

According to U.S. military data, about 15 Americans and 73 Iraqis are killed or injured each day. A USA TODAY analysis of U.S. military data shows the number of U.S. forces killed during the war has declined steadily since November.

RAND Corp. military analyst Nora Bensahel says the increasing level of Iraqi casualties "means Iraqi security forces are in positions of responsibility." The United States, which has 132,000 troops in Iraq, is "doing fewer patrols on its own and more in support of Iraqi operations," reducing U.S. casualties.

The U.S. military also has cut the number of American deaths by thwarting the homemade bombs that are the insurgency's prime weapon. Soldiers and Marines now find and neutralize more than 40% of the bombs, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said in an interview. That compares with 30% in September. Lynch said that 41 insurgent bombmakers have been killed or captured. Insurgents "are losing skilled bombmakers," he said.

Meanwhile, Iraq's 240,600 security forces increasingly are fighting insurgents directly, the Pentagon says. Sixty-three Iraqi units are operating independently or in a lead role with coalition support, up from 37 in September. Iraqi Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari says military recruiting remains strong, despite the rising casualties.

Clashes, Accusations Mark Anniversary Of Iraq Conflict (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 19 -- Clashes between U.S. forces and suspected insurgents, and allegations of American troops killing noncombatants, marked the third anniversary Sunday of the start of the American-led invasion of Iraq.

In Duluiyah, a stretch of farms along the Tigris River about 45 miles north of Baghdad, soldiers of the 4th Infantry Division's 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team battled insurgents, the U.S. military said in a statement.

The statement said American troops were responding to insurgents who opened fire with small arms and rocket-propelled grenades in the area, predominated by Sunnis. Seven of the attackers were killed, and two U.S. soldiers were wounded.

A top police official, as well as a resident who claimed he saw the fighting, said U.S. troops also shot and killed a family of three during house-to-house searches after the firefight.

"I saw corpses on the ground that I believe were of armed men who had clashed with the American forces" and with the Iraqi army, said Ahmad Hashem, the resident. "Then the American soldiers appeared and started searching homes. They raided a house which was close to my home and killed a man named Ahmad Khalaf Hussein, his wife and his 10-year-old son."

Western news agencies also reported civilian deaths in the fighting. The U.S. military, in the statement from spokesmen in Baghdad, said it knew of no civilian deaths in the engagement.

U.S. military officials said the fight was not connected to another ongoing offensive, Operation Swarmer, in which U.S. and Iraqi forces have been searching for Sunni insurgents and weapons caches in arid countryside between the Tigris River and Samarra, about 65 miles north of Baghdad.

American officials announced last week that they had ordered a further investigation into a deadly incident four months ago in the town of Haditha in far western Iraq.

At least 15 civilians were killed in the incident on Nov. 19. The military's original statement on Nov. 20 said that the civilians and a U.S. Marine were killed by a roadside bomb. Time magazine reported Sunday that U.S. officials are now investigating whether Marines killed the 15 civilians, including seven women and three children, after the insurgent bombing that killed their fellow Marine.

The newsweekly said it had given military officials accounts from a doctor and survivors that said the 15 unarmed townspeople were killed as they hid in their houses, or tried to run to safety, as Marines searched the area after the bombing. Time said it had also given the military a videotape showing some of the bodies. It quoted unidentified military officials as saying that Marines had believed U.S. troops were coming under fire from the houses, and that the initial investigation indicated that Marines, rather than a bomb, had killed the 15.

DOJ_NMG_0018476

"We take these allegations very seriously, and I believe the fact that two additional investigations are ongoing concerning this incident clearly demonstrate that," a U.S. military spokeswoman in Baghdad, Lt. Col. Michelle Martin-Hing, said in an e-mail on Sunday. Martin-Hing said the shootings were "the first in a series of engagements that day that began when the Marine patrol was ambushed in a residential neighborhood with an IED followed immediately by small arms fire from multiple directions. Over the course of five hours, the Marines actively tracked insurgents moving through the town among civilian homes, other structures and palm groves, on foot and by vehicle. The investigation will examine whether any rules of engagement were violated."

A roadside bomb exploded near a police patrol Sunday morning in Baqubah, killing a policeman and injuring 10 other people, according to Lt. Col. Fakhri Tamimi Hassman, an official with the Diyala provincial police. Baqubah is about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad.

In Baghdad, the bodies of three men who had been bound hand and foot and shot were found dumped in the west of the city, and another man was shot dead Sunday as he left a Shiite mosque, news agencies reported. The number of execution-style killings in Baghdad -- with the victims shot, often after being tortured or bound -- has climbed to an average of about 30 a day since mid-2005, according to Baghdad morgue figures. Many of the killings have allegedly been carried out by militias or police forces allied with Iraq's governing Shiite parties.

Iraq's former prime minister, Ayad Allawi, told the BBC that the increasing attacks across his country can only be described as a civil war.

Sunni, Shiite, Kurdish and secular political leaders said Sunday that they had agreed on the creation of a National Security Council that would represent all of Iraq's major political factions. The move appeared designed to counter Shiite dominance of Interior and Defense ministry forces.

"The agreements that we have declared today prove that civil war is not a possibility, and the Iraqi people could not allow for a civil war to take place," President Jalal Talabani told reporters.

The war in Iraq began on March 19, 2003, Washington time -- early morning March 20 in Baghdad -- when President Bush authorized an early strike by U.S. fighter-bombers and offshore Tomahawk cruise missiles on a Baghdad bunker where Saddam Hussein was reported to be sleeping. The Defense Department confirmed 2,313 U.S. military deaths as of Friday, with unofficial totals indicating 207 other coalition military deaths.

Tens of thousands of Iraqi civilians have died in the war, from U.S. and Iraqi military actions, insurgent attacks and, increasingly, raids attributed to government-allied Shiite Muslim squads that allegedly operate both inside and outside Iraq's new, Shiite-dominated security forces.

Top Iraqi Leaders Agree To Form A Policy Council (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 19 — Iraqi officials announced Sunday that they had agreed to form a council of the country's top politicians to make policy on security and economic issues in the new government. The council, which will include the prime minister and president, is an attempt to include all the country's major factions in decision making at a time of rising sectarian tensions.

The Iraqi Constitution approved by voters last fall does not have language supporting the creation of such a council. The 19-member body will essentially concentrate power in the hands of the country's political party leaders, and supersede the cabinet and Parliament in making broad decisions.

The move is a step forward in the snail-paced negotiations over the formation of a full, four-year government. Debate over creating the so-called national security council, and what powers it would wield, had contributed to the deadlock in the talks.

The main Shiite political bloc, which is expected to hold the most executive power in the new government, had opposed formation of the council, while the Kurds, Sunni Arabs, secular politicians and the Americans had pushed for it.

Many Shiite leaders viewed the idea of the council, first proposed by Massoud Barzani, the president of Iraqi Kurdistan, as an attempt to hamstring the prime minister, expected to be a Shiite, and check the power of the main Shiite bloc, known as the United Iraqi Alliance.

DOJ_NMG_0018477

But on Sunday, after five hours of negotiations at President Jalal Talabani's guest villa here, the Shiites agreed to the council's formation. Because of the way the council will be set up, the Shiites, who constitute the largest political bloc in Parliament, will have an effective veto over council decisions.

Furthermore, the prime minister or president will be able to override any decisions they disagree with if the decisions conflict with the executives' constitutional authority, Iraqi officials said.

Otherwise, the council's actions will be considered binding.

"It's a good thing," said Adnan Pachachi, the temporary speaker of Parliament and a secular politician. "It's a safety valve in a way. Decisions will be taken in which all major political parties will be part of. No one will accuse the prime minister of making decisions on his own."

The council is expected to make policy on security issues, like how to build up and deploy the Iraqi Army and the police, how to disarm the country's many militias and what to do about insurgent territories like Anbar Province in western Iraq, Iraqi officials said. The council will also address economic matters, including oil revenue and the budget.

Any decisions that require legislation will be put before Parliament, Mr. Pachachi said. But the Parliament will probably support any decisions made by the council because all the leaders of the major parliamentary blocs will sit on the council, he added.

The council's decisions require a two-thirds vote of its 19 members. The president, prime minister, speaker of Parliament and the leader of any autonomous region (only Iraqi Kurdistan, for now) get seats on the council. The rest will be given to other party leaders. Over all, the seats will be distributed in proportion to the percentage of Parliament controlled by each major bloc.

According to that system, the main Shiite religious bloc will get nine seats, the Kurds four, the main Sunni Arab religious bloc three, the secular bloc two and a smaller Sunni Arab bloc one, Mr. Pachachi said. The two-thirds vote requirement effectively gives the Shiite members final say over any decision, as long as they remain united.

The council will operate parallel to the cabinet but will have greater responsibility for broad policy decisions. The cabinet will run the day-to-day affairs of the government ministries. Part of the motivation for creating the council is a desire to check the power of the ministers, especially those in charge of security.

Control of the Interior and Defense Ministries has been one of the most hotly debated issues in the talks to form a government. Each political bloc suspects the others of sectarian motives in trying to control the armed forces. With heightened sectarian tensions and talk of impending civil war on the rise, whoever controls the army and the police would have a guaranteed arms supply. Besides the prime minister and president, who have yet to be chosen, the politicians expected to sit on the national security council include Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Shiite bloc; Tarik al-Hashimi, leader of the main Sunni Arab bloc; Saleh al-Mutlak, leader of the smaller Sunni Arab bloc; Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister and a secularist; and Mr. Barzani, the president of Iraqi Kurdistan.

"It's true that there's no explicit mention of it in the Constitution," Mr. Hashimi said at a news conference at Mr. Talabani's villa. "We think that the salvation of Iraq for the time being lies in showing a lot of flexibility in establishing new political bodies that include all the components of the Iraqi people."

The political leaders must now tackle other deeply contentious issues in the talks to form a government. At the top of the list is the Shiite nomination of Ibrahim al-Jaafari, the current prime minister, to retain that post. The other blocs oppose Mr. Jaafari's nomination, and have demanded that the Shiites present a new candidate. Mr. Jaafari has come under sharp criticism for failing to quell the violence and for the huge shortcomings in postwar reconstruction.

The political jockeying took place as Mr. Allawi, the former prime minister, told the BBC News on Sunday that the country was already mired in civil war. "It is unfortunate that we are in civil war," he said. "We are losing each day, as an average, 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more. If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

At least 15 bodies, all of them shot, were found across Baghdad on Sunday, police and hospital officials said. More than 200 bodies have been discovered in nearly two weeks, virtually all believed to be victims of sectarian violence.

A homemade bomb killed a police commando in Baghdad on Sunday. In Kirkuk, a cluster bomb left from the American invasion of 2003 exploded, killing a shepherd and a 6-year-old boy, said Lt. Col. Yadgar Abdullah of the Kirkuk police department.

DOJ_NMG_0018478

The police found two Iraqi soldiers shot dead in Hawija, west of Kirkuk. Officials in Basra said two employees of the South Oil Company were shot to death on Saturday night. Both were members of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a conservative Sunni Arab group, and had been handcuffed.

Iraq's Factions Agree To Form Security Council (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraqi officials agreed Sunday to set up a council that would give each of the country's main political factions a voice in making security and economic policies for a new government.

The accord, announced after nearly a week of negotiations, was aimed at deflating rising sectarian tensions and represented the first breakthrough in the U.S.-guided effort to form a unity government after parliamentary elections Dec. 15.

President Bush applauded the deal, which came as the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion focused public attention on the troubled effort to stabilize Iraq and start bringing home 133,000 troops after toppling President Saddam Hussein.

"I encourage the Iraqi leaders to continue to work hard to get this government up and running," Bush told reporters in Washington.

The 19-member national security council would include the Iraqi president and prime minister and hold more power than the Cabinet, which is yet to be formed. It is expected to set policies governing the army and police, the counter-insurgency campaign in Sunni Muslim Arab areas and the disarmament of Shiite Muslim militias accused of sectarian killings.

The council also will oversee economic matters such as the budget and the allocation of oil revenues.

As outlined by participants in the talks, the council would represent political parties in rough proportion to their electoral strength — with nine members from the Shiite alliance that fell just short of a majority in the 275-member parliament, four each from the Kurdish and Sunni blocs, and two from secular parties.

Leaders of those factions took the unusual step of agreeing to form the council before what was expected to be a more contentious discussion of who would hold the positions of president and prime minister and head the Cabinet ministries controlling the army and police.

A council with powers beyond those of the Cabinet is not mentioned in the constitution ratified by voters in October. It was proposed in January by Kurdish leaders to check the power of the Shiite alliance, which is entitled to nominate the prime minister and is expected to dominate the Cabinet.

Shiite negotiators had resisted the idea of a broad policymaking council as unconstitutional. But other political blocs contended that it would help stem Iraq's sectarian bloodshed and avert all-out civil war; they won quiet backing for the proposal from U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who has been deeply involved in the talks from the start.

"We think that the salvation of Iraq at this time lies in showing a lot of flexibility in establishing new political bodies that include all the components of the Iraqi people," Tariq Hashemi, leader of the main Sunni party, said Sunday at a news conference.

At least 34 Iraqis were killed or found dead Sunday in the continuing violence, which has soared since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in the predominantly Sunni city of Samarra. Worried that the power vacuum was fostering the violence, interim President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, summoned political leaders last week to try to speed up efforts to form a government. Iraq has been run for nearly 11 months by an interim leadership formed from the transitional assembly elected in January 2005.

After the December election left no party with a parliamentary majority, all factions agreed, under U.S. pressure, to work toward a broadly representative government — one that might undermine the insurgency by including Sunnis in the Cabinet.

But the effort got bogged down a month ago after the Shiite bloc nominated interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, a religious conservative with close ties to Iran's theocratic leadership, to continue in his post for a full four-year term.

The other political groups, supported by the more secular Talabani, pledged to block Jafari's ratification, which requires a two-thirds vote in the parliament. The rival blocs have demanded that the Shiites offer a less divisive candidate, but the Shiites have balked.

In an effort to break the deadlock, Talabani last week shifted the focus of the talks to the proposed council.

DOJ_NMG_0018479

Shiite negotiators succeeded in limiting some of the council's proposed authority. Its policies will require approval by 13 members, allowing the nine Shiite members a chance to thwart any decision if they stick together.

Hussein Shahristani, a Shiite negotiator, said leaders agreed that the council's decisions on the Cabinet would be binding "as long as they do not contradict the constitutional prerogatives of the president or prime minister." That formula, other politicians countered, might lead to conflicts.

"In reality, the authority of the council is uncertain," said Dhafir Ani, a spokesman for the main Sunni bloc. "It hasn't been settled."

Iraqi politicians said the formation of the council in effect added ground rules to replace the ad hoc manner in which decisions had been made in the last year, when party leaders brokered deals behind closed doors and presented them to the parliament. This time, Sunni parties would be better represented.

As political leaders wrangled in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, violence continued outside. Iraqi sources and Western news agencies reported the discovery Sunday of 17 bodies of men tortured or shot to death in Baghdad alone, 11 of them flushed by city sewers into the tanks of water-purification plants.

Police said three civilians were killed in crossfire when insurgents attacked U.S. and Iraqi forces guarding the provincial governor's office in Ramadi, a Sunni city 60 miles west of Baghdad.

Other deaths included civilians and Iraqi policemen killed in Mosul, Baqubah, Basra and Baghdad.

In Duluiya, a Sunni town about 55 miles north of the capital, Iraqi officials said American troops killed a teacher, his wife, their 13-year-old son and four other people during clashes set off before dawn by a rocket-propelled grenade ambush on their armored patrol.

Maj. Tim Keefe, a U.S. military spokesman, contested the account from police officials and the deputy governor, saying the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team of the 4th Infantry Division had killed seven "attacking terrorists."

Keefe said two U.S. soldiers were wounded in the clash, which occurred south of Samarra. More than 1,500 airborne U.S. and Iraqi troops staged a fourth day of raids in suspected insurgent bases north of Samarra, but the patrol in Duluiya was not part of that operation, Keefe said.

Police officials said the teacher and his family were shot when American soldiers raided their home after the ambush. An 18-year-old boy from another family was killed after he left home "to see what was going on," according to a Reuters reporter in the town.

Deputy Gov. Abdullah Hussein said in a telephone interview from Tikrit that two of the seven killed were insurgents.

After the clash, Reuters reported, American troops handed out leaflets saying they did not regard Sunnis as their enemy and wanted to withdraw from Iraq as soon as the country's newly formed government and army were able to stand on their own.

My Vision For Iraq (WP)

By Ibrahim Al-jafari

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The elections last December in Iraq were a monumental stage in my country's history and a testament to the courage of its people, who refuse to bow to any dictator or terrorist. As the wheels of democracy have begun to turn in Iraq, the people's wishes are becoming clearer and their representatives identified. To this end I am humbled and honored to be chosen by my coalition to lead Iraq's first democratically elected full-term government.

My government's first challenge will be to stifle the terrorism that has plagued our country and defiled the name of Islam. While we are making good progress in expanding and developing Iraq's security services, the war against the terrorists cannot be won by military means alone. It is paramount that all Iraqis work together to build a democratic, free Iraq.

Since I took office, I have sought to bring every community into the political process. I refused to marginalize the Sunni Arabs after the January 2005 election boycott, ensuring they made up over a fifth of the cabinet.

Sidelining Moqtada al-Sadr's group from the Governing Council was a mistake. Had it been integrated into the political process back then, long before the formation of the Mahdi Army, events would have turned out differently in the south. I corrected this policy and brought Sadr's group into the democratic process. This inclusive approach resulted in the huge nationwide turnout for the December elections and a parliament that truly reflects Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0018480

During my term as elected prime minister, Sadr's group has not attacked any coalition troops. Furthermore, Sadr and several Sunni leaders are now catalysts for maintaining the peace in Iraq, calling on their followers not to retaliate against terrorist provocations, which aim to ignite civil war.

Unfortunately, we have suffered setbacks during the past year. The most troubling was the discovery of prisoner torture in an Interior Ministry jail in November. As soon as I learned of these despicable acts I formed an investigative committee made up solely of Sunni leaders, and I await its findings.

The long-term solution to this problem will be multifaceted. We must ensure that all security forces receive proper training and that there is a chain of command that holds commanders and officers responsible for such abuses. In addition, the various militias that fought Saddam Hussein's regime honorably must be fully integrated into Iraq's security forces without concentrating any particular group into any one division. Finally, we need to strengthen the country's nascent judiciary, which suffered years of coercion and corruption under the former regime, to guarantee its independence and impartiality.

The other major challenge my government will face is reviving Iraq's economy. Iraq has been drowned by decades of Baathist socialist policies that have made millions reliant on government handouts. We must encourage entrepreneurship and enterprise, while establishing adequate safety nets for the less privileged.

Economic rehabilitation also requires some tough and unpopular changes, such as the reduction in government subsidies for gasoline that my administration began a few months ago. Such steps can be made only by a popular government that has the trust of the people. My administration has the political capital to be able to bring about these necessary changes.

Ultimately, I will work to secure the reality of a democratic, liberal, peaceful Iraq -- a beacon for freedom in the Middle East. This is not merely a wish but an article of faith. Having lived in London for the majority of my years in exile, I appreciate the importance of liberty for both guaranteeing democracy and ensuring human development.

I am hopeful that with Iraqi determination, and the support of the multinational force, we can defeat the terrorists and make Iraq the first democratic Arab country. I believe in working toward a peaceful, stable and nuclear-free Middle East, where Iraq is not the rogue state that it was under the previous regime.

The road ahead will be tough, but the Iraqi people have demonstrated their bravery, determination and resolve. The world should not falter at such a crucial stage in history.

The writer is prime minister of Iraq.

Justice: Talking Trash (NSWK)

By Rod Nordland

Newsweek, March 20, 2006

Saddam Hussein had a point when he described his trial as a "farce." In five months of proceedings, the Iraqi High Tribunal has managed only 17 actual court days amid tight security, hunger strikes and boycotts by lawyers. Assassins have killed a judge, a court employee and two defense attorneys. At one point Saddam's codefendant, Barzan al-Tikriti, the once feared head of the Mukhabarat intelligence service, came to court in his underwear. The ex-dictator himself complained of having guards watch him take his pants down to use the toilet during recesses. Saddam's appearance last week brought a new low, with the prosecutor and defense lawyers screaming at one another, and the chief judge repeatedly hitting a red button that cut off the mike as Saddam declared himself not only president, but "commander in chief of the mujahed [holy warrior] armed forces." Finally the judge closed the hearing, threw out the press and shut down TV transmissions—all as Saddam ranted on.

Saddam's diatribes were better informed than they had been in previous court appearances. Held in solitary confinement since his capture in December 2003, Saddam has had little contact with the world beyond his cell. His American jailers strictly purged his reading material of any news about events in Iraq. But since the trial began, Saddam has been allowed to see attorneys, and on Wednesday he made the most of the information he was getting, praising the resistance while calling on Iraqis to avoid civil war. "Let the people unite and resist the invaders and their backers," he said at one point. "Don't fight among yourselves." The chief judge hit the red button and silenced the audio feed, but Saddam's speech was still audible in the courtroom. "The invaders and their supporters know they're on their certain way to being swept out, like the trash they are."

DOJ_NMG_0018481

Lost in the chaos was the case itself. Saddam and his seven codefendants are on trial for the executions of 148 Shiites in the village of Dujail, in reprisal for a failed 1982 assassination attempt on Saddam as his motorcade passed by the village. Of all the accusations against Saddam, it's a relatively small one—but one where the alleged chain of responsibility is well documented. By his own statements, Saddam has tied himself to the reprisals, saying in court on March 1 that he had personally ordered the Dujail villagers tried—and their orchards razed—for an ambush that involved only 20 attackers. "Where is the crime?" Saddam declared. "[Since when] is trying a suspect accused of shooting at a head of state a crime?"

The Saddam-era trial, before the Revolutionary Court in 1984, is the heart of the prosecution's case, which maintains it was a sham. Forty-six of the defendants were "liquidated under torture" —before they were recorded as appearing at the trial. Eleven of the accused were minors, one as young as 12. A few years after the trial, Saddam's officials discovered that the kids had never been executed because of their ages. "We recommend executing them in a secret manner," reads one document. There's an arrow from that sentence to the margin, where Saddam allegedly wrote "Yes. It is preferable that they are buried by the Mukhabarat."

Saddam could well be executed soon after the Dujail case ends, without waiting for other cases against him to proceed. The defense still has a chance to make its arguments, which could extend well into the summer. But once a verdict is rendered by the five-judge panel, "if any defendant were sentenced to any penalty, no matter whether it were the death penalty or imprisonment, that penalty should be executed within 30 days of the court's verdict," chief prosecutor Jafar al Musawi told NEWSWEEK. Although there would be an automatic appeal of a death sentence to the court of cassation, that court has no backlog of cases, Musawi says, and an appeal "would only take days."

Many more cases involving Saddam could follow—if he's still alive. Already, charges are being prepared in the poison-gas attacks against Kurds in Halabja, the wider Anfal massacres and the slaughter of Shiites after an abortive uprising in 1991. But if Saddam doesn't hang for Dujail, the other 12 cases being prepared against him could, at the present rate, take more than a decade to try. Even many Iraqis unhappy with the American occupation wouldn't like that. "I think most Iraqis share the opinion that I have," said Ahmed Taha, 42, a Sunni primary-school teacher from Babylon. "Let's get done with it and execute him."

At one point in last week's trial, after Saddam quieted down and apparently agreed to address the Dujail charges, the judge pressed the green button to switch on his audio. But the defendant soon rounded on him: "If it were not for the Americans, neither you nor your fathers would have been able to bring me here." It was then that the judge declared the trial closed to the public. Shia politician Ali al Dabbagh was in the visitors' gallery. "Saddam was trying to pass messages to the insurgents and encourage them to attack," he said. "The judge had to stop this." With months more to go, Saddam's only defense is to make a mockery of the entire proceeding. So far, he's succeeding.

Next Chapter As Iraq War Rages, Army Re-Examines Lessons Of Vietnam (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

The last time Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld visited Baghdad, back in December, the top U.S. military commander there gave him an unusual gift.

Gen. George Casey passed him a copy of "Learning to Eat Soup with a Knife: Counterinsurgency Lessons from Malaya and Vietnam," written by Lt. Col. John Nagl. Initially published in 2002, the book is brutal in its criticism of the Vietnam-era Army as an organization that failed to learn from its mistakes and tried vainly to fight guerrilla insurgents the same way it fought World War II.

In the book, Col. Nagl, who served a year in Iraq, contrasts the U.S. Army's failure with the British experience in Malaya in the 1950s. The difference: The British, who eventually prevailed, quickly saw the folly of using massive force to annihilate a shadowy communist enemy.

"The British Army was a learning institution, and the U.S. Army was not," Col. Nagl writes.

DOJ_NMG_0018482

Col. Nagl's book is one of a half dozen Vietnam histories -- most of them highly critical of the U.S. military in Vietnam -- that are changing the military's views on how to fight guerrilla wars. Two other books that have also become must-reading among senior Army officers are retired Col. Lewis Sorley's "A Better War," which chronicles the last years of the Vietnam War, and Col. H.R. McMaster's "Dereliction of Duty," which focuses on the early years.

The embrace of these Vietnam histories reflects an emerging consensus in the Army that in order to move forward in Iraq, it must better understand the mistakes of Vietnam.

In the past, it was commonly held in military circles that the Army failed in Vietnam because civilian leaders forced it to fight a limited war instead of the all-out assault it longed to wage. That belief helped shape the doctrine espoused in the 1980s by Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Colin Powell. They argued that the military should fight only wars in which it could apply quick, overwhelming force to destroy the enemy.

The newer analyses of Vietnam are now supplanting that theory -- and changing the way the Army fights. The argument that the military must exercise restraint is a central point of the Army's new counterinsurgency doctrine. The doctrine, which runs about 120 pages and is still in draft form, is a handbook on how to wage guerrilla wars.

It offers Army and Marine Corps officers advice on everything from strategy development to intelligence gathering. Col. Nagl is among the four primary authors of the doctrine. Conrad Crane, a historian at the U.S. Army War College, is overseeing the effort.

One of the doctrine's primary goals is to shatter the conventional wisdom that defined the post-Vietnam Army. "We are at a turning point in the Army's institutional history," Col. Nagl and his co-authors write in a forthcoming essay in "Military Review," an Army journal.

The doctrine's biggest emphasis is on the need to curb the military's use of firepower, which created thousands of refugees and horrific collateral damage in Vietnam. "The more force you use when battling insurgents, the less effective you are," the draft states.

The Army is also using its Vietnam experience to highlight the importance and difficulty of building local security forces that can carry on independently after U.S. forces go home. For most of the Vietnam War, the U.S. gave spotty attention to South Vietnamese forces. Without U.S. air support and artillery they quickly crumbled.

Drawing on its frustrating struggle to prop up a corrupt government in Saigon, the Army in its new blueprint counsels soldiers that anti-guerrilla operations must be focused on building a government that is seen as legitimate in the eyes of the locals. "Military actions conducted without analysis of their political effectiveness will be at best ineffective and at worst help the enemy," the draft doctrine states.

Within the Bush administration, there's broad support for the Army's new direction. It matches President Bush's own shift away from a pre-9/11 aversion to nation-building and guerrilla wars. The current national-security strategy seeks to spread freedom and democracy -- even if it means committing troops to guerrilla fights in places like Iraq and Afghanistan.

For most of the 1980s and 1990s the Army's understanding of what went wrong in Vietnam was dominated by retired Col. Harry Summers's history "On Strategy: A Critical Analysis of the Vietnam War." That account argued Viet Cong guerrillas were used by the communist regime to distract the U.S. from the real threat -- the conventional North Vietnamese Army. The U.S. didn't lose because it fought a guerrilla war badly, Col. Summers asserted, but rather because it was prohibited by the civilian leadership from launching a conventional attack on North Vietnam.

His book, commissioned by the Army and published in 1981, gave Army officers reason to ignore guerrilla warfare for the two decades that followed. It quickly became part of the curriculum at the Army's war colleges and remained on reading lists until a few years ago. "The timing was perfect," says George Herring, a Vietnam scholar at the University of Kentucky who also taught at the United States Military Academy at West Point. "Summers was selling a message a lot of top people in the army wanted to hear."

Army histories that challenged Col. Summers's narrative were rebuked. In 1986, Andrew Krepinevich, then an Army major, published "The Army and Vietnam," an alternative account of the Army's failings in the war. Instead of fighting a classic guerrilla war, the Army fought a large-scale conventional war and alienated potential allies in Vietnam, Mr. Krepinevich wrote. One four-star general blasted the book in a review as "a long rambling, one-sided discourse." It wasn't widely read.

DOJ_NMG_0018483

By the 1990s Army officers interested in successful careers didn't study counterinsurgency. A few, however, were drawn to it. One of those officers was Col. Nagl, who graduated from West Point and went on to study international relations at Oxford University as a Rhodes Scholar. After the first Gulf War, where he served as a platoon leader, Col. Nagl went back to Oxford to get his doctorate.

The first Gulf War seemed to vindicate the Army's big-war approach. The Army had finally been allowed to fight the conventional, firepower-intensive war it wanted to mount in Vietnam. It prevailed quickly and with few casualties. "By God, we've kicked the Vietnam syndrome once and for all," the President George H.W. Bush gushed in 1991.

To Col. Nagl, the Army's quick, low-casualty win wasn't necessarily a good news story. "The lesson of the Gulf War was: Don't fight the U.S. conventionally," Col. Nagl says. "The way to defeat the U.S. Army is to use guerrilla warfare and exhaust the will of the U.S. At least you have a chance to win."

Col. Nagl reread Mr. Krepinevich's account of the Army in Vietnam, which he says had a big influence on his doctoral thesis. "I stole from it shamelessly," he says today, although he fully credited the work in his own. He also immersed himself in the papers of Sir Gerald Templer, who led British counterinsurgency efforts in Malaya in the 1950s. "I wanted to figure out why the British Army was able to learn how to defeat an insurgency after starting out badly and why the American Army was not able to learn as well in Vietnam," Col. Nagl says.

He concluded that the Army did learn in Vietnam, but far too slowly. By 1969 the military had shifted away from large-scale search-and-destroy missions and was putting a far greater emphasis on building indigenous security forces, safeguarding villagers and developing the local economy. However, "at that point the American people had already lost their faith," he says.

Col. Nagl's book was released in October of 2002 by Praeger Publishers, on the eve of the Iraq invasion. (It was later published in paperback by the University of Chicago Press.) He took the "Learning to Eat Soup with a Knife" title from a famous aphorism of T.E. Lawrence, also known as Lawrence of Arabia: "To make war upon rebellion is messy and slow, like eating soup with a knife."

A few months later, Col. Nagl was dispatched to Iraq to serve as the third-highest-ranking officer in a 700-soldier battalion based outside Fallujah. "I thought I knew something about counterinsurgency until I tried to do it," he says today. He quickly discovered the challenge to be even more difficult than he'd expected. His unit took heavy casualties and his battalion's efforts to build an Iraqi police and Army force sputtered in the face of insurgent attacks, poor equipment and a lack of funds.

While Col. Nagl was in Iraq, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's top officer, picked up his book and was taken by its argument that the Army's big-war culture in Vietnam often overpowered innovative ideas from inside the service and out.

The general ordered his fellow four-star generals to read it. Before he went to Iraq to take over as the top commander, Gen. Casey read Col. Nagl's book as well. "The thesis that the U.S. military was too prone to [big offensive strikes] to be good at counterinsurgency was something I noted to watch for when I got here," says Gen. Casey in an email from Baghdad.

The tome has already had an influence on the ground in Iraq. Last winter, Gen. Casey opened a school for U.S. commanders in Iraq to help officers adjust to the demands of a guerrilla-style conflict in which the enemy hides among the people and tries to provoke an overreaction. The idea for the training center, says Gen. Casey, came in part from Col. Nagl's book, which chronicles how the British in Malaya used a similar school to educate British officers coming into the country.

"Pretty much everyone on Gen. Casey's staff had read Nagl's book," says Lt. Col. Nathan Freier, who spent a year in Iraq as a strategist. A British brigadier general says that "Gen. Casey carried the book with him everywhere." Both Col. Nagl's and Mr. Krepinevich's books are included on a recommended counterinsurgency reading list included in the draft doctrine.

Other Vietnam histories have also drawn the interest of senior Army officers. Lt. Gen. John Vines, who was until recently the No. 2 commander in Iraq, recommended his staff read Col. McMaster's "Dereliction of Duty." The book portrays the military's senior Vietnam-era generals as a feckless lot, unwilling to confront President Lyndon Johnson over what they believed to be a bankrupt strategy. Its message: Military commanders must always speak the truth to their civilian bosses.

Similarly, Mr. Sorley's "A Better War" in recent months has become popular among senior Iraq and Afghanistan strategists. Mr. Sorley's book argues that the military, in the latter years of the war under the leadership of Gen. Creighton Abrams, radically shifted its approach. Instead of just hunting North Vietnamese soldiers and Viet Cong guerrillas in the jungle, commanders in 1969 began focusing far more on providing security to Vietnamese villagers, a strategy dubbed "clear and hold."

DOJ_NMG_0018484

Mr. Sorley posits that in the early 1970s, Gen. Abrams's "clear and hold" approach was winning the war. Congress's precipitous withdrawal of support for the South Vietnam government and a fickle American public turned that victory into defeat, he writes. Most historians consider Mr. Sorley's account to be far too sanguine on the war's latter years. (Of late, the Bush administration has adopted Gen. Abrams's language. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has described the American strategy in Iraq as "clear, hold and build.")

Going forward, the big question is whether the Army's newly popular Vietnam views survive after the war in Iraq. If things go badly, there is likely to be intense pressure from within the Army to blame the political leadership for not sending enough troops, the news media for negative coverage, or the American public for its unwillingness to stick it out. None of those analyses, however, recognize the Army's own failings -- particularly in the first years of the war, say experts.

"The problem with blaming a fickle American public or the political leadership is that it gives you no tools to do better the next time," says Sarah Sewall, a former Clinton administration defense official who now oversees Harvard's Carr Center for Human Rights. "That is what happened after Vietnam."

Realism Pushes US And Iran A Bit Closer (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - A mutual interest in a stable Iraq is driving Washington and Tehran - two otherwise increasingly antagonistic capitals - to sit down and talk.

Even as the Bush administration says America "may face no greater challenge from a single country than from Iran," and as US-backed efforts proceed in the United Nations Security Council to address Iran's nuclear ambitions, the two governments have agreed to meet in Baghdad.

The way forward for this conversation traverses a minefield of potential explosions, but the fact it is happening at all reflects a shift to pragmatic foreign-policy outlooks in both Washington and Tehran.

"No one knows how far this will go before it all blows up, or forces on one side or the other sabotage it, but it's another mark of the reemergence of realists in the Bush administration that we can even consider talking to the Iranians," says Daniel Brumberg, a professor of comparative government at Georgetown University in Washington.

In Iran, "efforts to talk to the US may well be the work of foreign ministry pragmatists [in Tehran] reasserting their influence" over the extremist stance of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, adds Mr. Brumberg. For these pragmatists, landing in the Security Council is the direct result of Mr. Ahmadinejad's confrontational antics, and they may see in Iraq a way to start undoing the damage.

The White House says the talks - the first acknowledged direct contacts between the two countries since discussions in 2003 on Afghanistan - will be limited in focus to Iraq. The US accuses Iran of providing support and materials to groups that have targeted American forces and interests in Iraq.

But the talks are also an acknowledgment of Iran's pivotal role in Iraqi affairs - political, social, and religious - at a particularly difficult moment for the US engagement there.

The US sought help from Iran after the US-led toppling of the Taliban government in Afghanistan. That experience ended up souring, but not before the Iranians took some constructive steps that aided the US goal of establishing a stable government, observers say.

One aim of Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador in Iraq and the man authorized by President Bush to meet with the Iranians, will be to confront his interlocutors on the supplying of Shiite militias, a relationship the US says is exacerbating sectarian violence.

But Mr. Khalilzad - who was previously the US ambassador to Afghanistan - may venture into more political discussions, analysts say, encouraging the Iranians to use their extensive influence with some political leaders of Iraq's ruling Shiites to help in ending the damaging deadlock over forming a new government.

DOJ_NMG_0018485

"The US says these talks will 'just be about Iraq,' but what does that mean?" asks Ray Takeyh, an expert in US-Iran relations at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington. "Is it just rebuking them for their actions there, or is it, 'We don't want a civil war, and you don't, so how can we both work to avoid it?' "

The problem he sees is that the Bush administration rhetoric seems diametrically opposed to such an approach. "It might seem to make sense to talk to the Iranians about the mutual interests in a stable Iraq," he says. "But it would be inconsistent with everything else that the administration has been saying about the Iranians over the past two weeks: that they are our biggest single threat, and so on."

Mr. Takeyh says the Iranian regime is also motivated by a desire to undermine the deliberations about its nuclear program in the Security Council. "They may be betting they can lessen some of the pressure to act against them if they are seen to be engaging in something helpful like talks in Iraq," he says.

Some Iranian policymakers may be moved to demonstrate a willingness to cooperate with the Americans - who, after all, rid them of two of their archenemy neighbors, the Taliban and Saddam Hussein - both by the worrisome violence next-door and by a domestic population that wants desperately to avoid international isolation.

Iranian interests may not be identical to America's in Iraq, but growing prospects of a slide to full-blown civil war have rattled the Iranians, experts say. "The Iranians know that if the civil war accelerates they may be drawn into the swamp, and they don't want that," says Georgetown's Brumberg.

Still, actors on both sides could intervene to nip the talks before they even bud. "Will Ahmadinejad try to blow them up?" wonders Brumberg, who cites efforts already made to purge the foreign ministry.

And in the US, skeptics of such talks are surely watching for any missteps, he adds. "The Afghanistan experience" of talking with Iran "is actually a cautionary tale," Brumberg says. "It left a bitter taste, and some people are going to remember that."

Iranians See Talks With U.S. As Historic (WP)

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

TEHRAN, March 19 -- Iran's acceptance of direct talks with the United States over Iraq is being regarded among Iranians as a major foreign policy development, a historic if still tentative departure from 27 years of official enmity that held the government of the "Great Satan" as one to be spoken against, but never with.

"America's objective in inviting Iran for talks is to send a message to Islamic movements throughout the world that Iran gave in to Washington after 27 years of resistance," Kayhan, a hard-line daily newspaper, warned Saturday in an editorial that analysts said underscored the significance of Iran's shift.

"Announce as soon as possible that you won't have any dialogue with the U.S. and avoid entering a destructive trap that has been prepared for Islamic Iran," the editorial continued.

Vehement opposition to the United States has been a pillar of Iran's theocratic system since 1979, the year an angry population overthrew the monarch Washington had helped install 26 years earlier in a coup engineered with the help of the CIA. From the U.S. side, a similar enmity was embedded in policy when student militants overran the red-brick U.S. Embassy in Tehran, taking 52 Americans hostage and holding them for more than a year.

The United States severed diplomatic relations with Iran, and over the next quarter-century both countries consistently found a reliable villain in the other.

Inside Iran, however, an appetite for rapprochement grew along with a population whose youthful majority had no memory of the revolution.

In 2002, a poll found that three-quarters of Iranians surveyed favored talks with the United States. The pollster was thrown in jail, but the reality drove a quiet competition between Iran's two rival political forces.

"Whoever could take the prize" of U.S. rapprochement would, it was widely believed, dominate Iranian politics for the foreseeable future, said Mehdi Karrubi, a moderate cleric who was speaker of the last parliament dominated by reformers.

The competition, however, had paralyzed the effort: Neither side would allow the other to reach out to the United States without risking accusations of betraying the Islamic revolution.

DOJ_NMG_0018486

That changed last year, when conservative clerics edged reformists out of government, unifying Iran's elaborate ruling structure for the first time in nearly a decade. It also cleared the way for the opening to Washington, and even reformists urged the conservatives to act.

"This might be a historic irony, but it's true the state is in 'harmony,' " said Mostafa Tajzadeh, a prominent reformist theoretician, speaking before the announcement of the direct talks. "No time has been more convenient for talks between the two countries. We are less sensitive than at any time since the revolution."

A few conservatives quietly urged the same. Behind the scenes of Iran's conservative establishment, insiders whispered about the prospect of negotiations.

When the announcement came Thursday, it was pointedly public. Ali Larijani, who heads the Supreme National Security Council, announced the decision to parliament, then summoned American correspondents to interviews. With a level gaze, he said Iran would accept the invitation of the U.S. ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, to talk about Iraq.

Analysts and politicians said the decision showed every sign of carrying the weight of Iran's ultimate authority, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. And some conservatives fell in line.

"It is obvious that when the Iranian officials present an idea, it is a calculated act," said Habibollah Asgaroladi, a leader of the Islamic Coalition Society, according to the ISNA news agency. "Considering the problems in the region, there is this necessity to solve problems through negotiations."

No dates have been set for the talks, and Iran has yet to name its delegation, which Larijani said would be of a rank "appropriate" to the task. Both Iran and the United States publicly emphasize that the subject will be limited to the teetering situation in Iraq, where both have deep interests and influence.

U.S. officials underscore this adamantly, openly arguing that Iran is opening a channel to the United States in hopes of siphoning off pressure it faces from the U.N. Security Council about the intentions of its nuclear program.

Some Iranian politicians acknowledge as much. "Although the talks will be over Iraq, these talks would have certain impacts on other regional developments and also on nuclear diplomacy," said Reza Talainik, head of parliament's national security and foreign affairs committee, ISNA reported.

Others describe the opening as a first step toward reducing Iran's estrangement from the West. The United States long has labeled Iran the world's largest state sponsor of terrorism. But Tajzadeh said he feared the escalating rhetoric over Iran's nuclear program, which many suspect is a front for acquiring atomic weapons, was building toward military action.

"The public image the U.S. has made of Iran is a monster. They have to do something, at least break a horn," he said. "There is only a small chance. This is negotiation.

"Of course, in the short term," he said, "it would not be in my party's favor. But in the long term, it would be in the favor of the Iranian nation and our party."

Naser Hadian-Jazy, a political scientist at Tehran University, said Iranian commentators of all stripes see the new opening as the most significant public approach to Washington since 1979, despite mid-level diplomatic contacts through third parties in advance of the invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq.

"Both the supporters and those who are critical have made this point clear," he said.

The public also appeared to welcome news of talks. "I think both sides should take advantage of this opportunity. They should be friends," said Kobra Mehdipour, 68, clutching her chador against the March wind.

Asked who in Iran might feel otherwise, she said, "There might be some illiterate people in the provinces who want to be friends with other countries but might be under the influence of some kind of propaganda."

Karrubi, the moderate cleric, moved from supporting the 1979 embassy takeover to urging rapprochement with Washington. He said that was the challenge for the governments as well.

"Both sides should forget the rhetoric used in the media and politics. They should put it aside," he said. "They should create something new."

U.S. General Doubts Talks With Iran Will Promote Mideast Peace (AP)

The Associated Press, March 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018487

WASHINGTON — The top commander of U.S. forces in Iraq expressed doubt today that negotiations between the United States and Iran over Iraq would help bring peace and stability in the Middle East.

"I don't have a lot of confidence that these will turn out to be productive, but I could be wrong," said Gen. George W. Casey, the top commander in Iraq.

"They're playing, I think, a very delicate balancing act," he said of Iran. "On the one hand, they want a stable neighbor. On the other hand, I don't believe they want to see us succeed here."

The Bush administration agreed last week to talk to Iranian officials about Iraq after a nearly three-decade break in diplomatic ties between the two countries. U.S. intelligence strongly suspects Iran has been arming Iraqi Shiite militia and some insurgent groups.

Casey said he didn't have much faith in the talks but that it was a "political call." Any negotiations should involve the Iraqis' use against coalition forces of "improvised explosive device technology" that he says are coming from Iran.

"That needs to stop," Casey said on "Fox News Sunday."

For the talks, U.S. officials have ruled out discussion of any attempt by Iran to gain a political foothold in Iraq, as well as international concern that Iran is seeking to build a nuclear bomb, an allegation that Tehran denies.

Last week, Bush's top foreign policy adviser, Stephen Hadley, expressed concern that Iran's willingness to talk might be a ploy designed to divert attention from the nuclear dispute. The U.N. Security Council is expected to discuss the nuclear issue this month, with Washington pressing for penalties.

Still, lawmakers from both parties said today they welcomed the discussions, saying it was critical for the Bush administration to engage the Middle East region — even countries it might disagree with — as the U.S. contemplates an exit strategy in Iraq.

"I think we have to understand that we are talking frequently to people with whom we have severe disagreement, whom we dislike, whom we may feel really are terrorists, but those are the folks that are in the world that we're going to have to influence," said Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind.

"Now, that doesn't mean that we're necessarily going to be successful in any of these respects, but clearly we're not only sharing the burden, but probably bringing some sense of urgency to the world in a way in which we are not perceived as doing in Iraq," Lugar said.

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., agreed, saying that Iran and the U.S. have a mutual interest in not seeing a civil war break out in Iraq. The U.S. can refuse to negotiate on other issues, such as terrorism or a suspected nuclear arms program, he said.

"Seventy-five percent of the Iranians or more hate their leadership, and the last thing they need is 50 million Shia on the other side learning from their Shia brethren how to wage a war," said Biden, who appeared with Lugar on CNN's "Late Edition."

Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., said that talking with Iran would give the U.S. more options in eventually pulling out of Iraq. He called that a better approach than to engage in a "mindless kind of banter" about "well, if we leave, the whole place falls apart."

"We've got to think in a big-picture way here that we haven't thought before. I think we need to talk to the Iranians," he said on ABC's "This Week." "There will be no peace in Iraq or in the Middle East without the Iranians being part of that."

Top U.N. Members To Try To Break Stalemate On Iran (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, March 19 -- The Security Council's five permanent members and Germany will hold a high-level meeting Monday in New York to try to break an impasse over the international response to the Iranian nuclear crisis.

The meeting comes as U.S. and European diplomats have failed during two weeks of negotiations to overcome Chinese and Russian objections to a Security Council statement demanding that Iran stop its nuclear-enrichment activities and cooperate with the International Atomic Energy Agency. R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, and top foreign affairs officials from the five other governments are expected to attend.

U.S. and European officials say they will try to assuage Russian and Chinese fears that the adoption of the statement will inevitably lead to harsh punitive measures against Iran. "We're not hellbent on going to war; we're not hellbent on imposing sanctions," said a senior State Department official familiar with the discussions, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the talks are supposed to be confidential. "We're hellbent on having the Iranians return to the negotiations, like the Russians and the Chinese want."

DOJ_NMG_0018488

Moscow's opposition to a Security Council declaration has hardened in recent weeks as senior U.S. officials, including Burns, have publicly threatened to press for targeted sanctions against Iran's rulers if they ignore the 15-nation council's call for a freeze on Iran's uranium-enrichment activities.

Russian diplomats say they are concerned that a U.S.-backed European draft, which sets a two-week deadline for Tehran to stop enrichment activities and agree to more intrusive U.N. inspections, provides too little time to test Iran's cooperation. Russia's U.N. ambassador, Andrei Denisov, mockingly told the Associated Press on Friday: "Let's just imagine that we adopt it and today we issued that statement -- then what happens after two weeks? In such a pace, we'll start bombing in June."

Monday's meeting, which will be held at the British mission, was scheduled in response to a request by Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov to hold talks outside the Security Council to map out the United Nations' long-term strategy for persuading Iran to scale back its nuclear activities.

An evening meeting, which will include the U.N. ambassadors for the six governments, will focus on reaching a deal on the presidential statement.

A second senior Bush administration official, who also spoke on the condition of anonymity, denied an AP report Saturday suggesting that Britain was considering proposing Monday to resolve the standoff through talks among the council's five veto-wielding members, Germany and Iran. "The report is absolutely false," the U.S. official said. "We checked with the Brits, and they were stupefied by that report, and they never heard of it. No one has made that proposal, and we wouldn't accept it."

The standoff hinges on whether the Iran crisis should be handled by the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency or the Security Council, which can impose sanctions or use force. Russia and China have insisted that the IAEA take the lead, while the United States, France and Britain say that Iran will stop its activities only if faced with the threat of sanctions.

Some council members say the European proposal for a two-week deadline for IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei to report to the council on Iran's cooperation is too short. China prefers four to six weeks. Russia opposes any report until the IAEA meets in June.

China said Friday that it would accept a continuing role for the U.N. council in managing the nuclear crisis. U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said he had offered a compromise to bridge the gap between Russia and the council's three major Western powers. Under the plan, ElBaradei would report on Iran to the 35-member IAEA board and the Security Council.

U.S., French and British diplomats say they have rallied a majority of the council's 15 members in support of a draft statement that would call on Iran to stop uranium-enrichment activities and cooperate with the IAEA. They will resume talks on Tuesday.

Tehran Courts Support Of Arabs (WP)

By Daniel Williams

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

CAIRO -- Iran has embarked on a charm offensive in the Arab world aimed at expanding economic and political ties and circumventing efforts by the United States and its allies to isolate Iran over its nuclear program.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad traveled this month to Kuwait, the first visit there by a high-ranking Iranian official in more than 25 years. Other Iranian officials toured Persian Gulf states trying to persuade them to endorse Iran's desire to develop nuclear technology, which U.S. officials have called a cover for building weapons. In mid-February, Iran's deputy foreign minister for Arab and African affairs, Mohammad-Reza Baqeri, met in Mecca with Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal in a bid to persuade the Saudis to coordinate stands on regional issues, according to reports from Tehran.

Iran also moved to shore up its longtime alliance with Syria, itself a target of U.S.-led isolation efforts. Iran and Syria signed preferential trade agreements and announced plans to lay an oil pipeline between the two countries, although a key section would have to pass through Iraq. During a recent meeting with Iranian officials in Damascus, Syrian Prime Minister Naji al-Otri publicly endorsed Iran's assertion of the right to develop nuclear technology, albeit for "peaceful purposes."

DOJ_NMG_0018489

Across the Mediterranean, in Tunisia, officials pledged to increase trade, flights and tourism ties with Tehran.

The activity coincides with Iran's stated support for Hamas, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement, which won a majority of seats in the Palestinian parliament in January. Ahmadinejad has offered to fill gaps in the Palestinian Authority budget created by a withdrawal of international aid as Hamas takes over. The United States and many European governments consider Hamas a terrorist organization and have said it ought to be isolated until it recognizes Israel and forswears violence.

Arab observers say Iran's diplomatic offensive represents a newly vigorous approach to improving relations with its neighbors. "Iran is trying to become a player in the region. At least toward the Arabs, Iran is trying to moderate its tone," said Maha Altorki, an Iran analyst in the Asia section of the Arab League, based in Cairo, the Egyptian capital.

Altorki said Iran faces numerous obstacles in its campaign. Persian Gulf states closely allied with the United States are leery. Iran has laid claims to islands and undersea territory in the oil-rich gulf. During a meeting of Persian Gulf foreign ministers this month, Abdullah bin Zayed al-Nahyan, foreign minister of the United Arab Emirates, pointed out that Iran continues to occupy islands claimed by the UAE and called for their peaceful return.

Iran also faces suspicions about its long-term intentions. It is a majority Shiite Muslim country ruled under Islamic law as Iranian clerics define it, and that makes leaders of the predominantly Sunni Muslim Arab world wary that the Iranians will try to subvert their rule. Last year, Jordan's King Abdullah warned of an emerging "Shiite crescent" stretching from Iran through Iraq and Syria into Lebanon, where Iran has long been a patron of the Hezbollah movement that fought the Israeli army.

Abdullah and Middle East observers have noted that the Bush administration boosted Iran's regional profile by toppling Saddam Hussein and effectively shifting power to Iraqi Shiite parties and militias that Tehran had hosted while they were in exile.

"I have a real problem with certain Iranian factions' political influence inside Iraq," Abdullah said in a published interview last year. "My concern is political, not religious -- revolving around Iran, Iran's political involvement inside Iraq, its relation with Syria and Hezbollah and the strengthening of this political-strategic alliance. This would create a scenario where you have these four -- Iran, Iran-influenced Iraq, Syria and Hezbollah -- [with] a strategic objective that could create a major conflict."

Not all Arab countries share such alarm, cautioned Wael al-Assad, director of the Arab League's Department of Multilateral Relations. "There is no single position in the Arab world toward Iran. In general, the closer a country is to Iran, the more worried it is," he said. "Of course, the collapse of Iraq and the rise of the Shiites make the situation more frightening to some."

The Arabs' position on Iran's nuclear program is complicated by their demand that the region should be free of nuclear weapons -- including Israel, which has long possessed a nuclear arsenal but never acknowledged it.

"We don't want Iran to have nuclear weapons. The difference with the U.S. approach is that we see it as a regional issue," Assad said. "We want a nuclear-free zone. We declare it is wrong for any country in the area to possess nuclear weapons. Otherwise there will be an arms race. The Americans handle it on a state-by-state basis."

Ayatollahs Aside, Iranians Jump For Joy At Spring (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

ISFAHAN, Iran, March 19 — All day and all night, the main street of this city was packed over the weekend with shoppers jockeying to buy last-minute gifts and sweets as they hurried to get ready for the celebration of the Iranian New Year, called Nowruz. Behind his cluttered desk inside an antique shop, Sayed Ali Zargabashi watched with great satisfaction as the crowds spilled off the sidewalks.

"People are not listening to the regime," said Mr. Zargabashi, 63. "They are emphasizing and embracing the traditional celebrations. People want the best they can get. Their eyes are open now."

After the Islamic Revolution in 1979, the ruling ayatollahs sought to stamp out many traditions, like Nowruz, a celebration with some Zoroastrian links that stretches back thousands of years to the pre-Islamic era, to mark the arrival of spring. The celebration is considered by many here the most Iranian of holidays.

The ayatollahs tried, and failed.

Now, nearly three decades later, some people say the increasingly enthusiastic embrace of Nowruz and other ancient traditions represents a resistance against the country's more conservative religious rulers.

DOJ_NMG_0018490

A few days before Nowruz, for example, Iranians poured out of their homes to celebrate Chahar Shanbeh Suri, igniting fireworks and jumping over small fires set in the streets, a traditional practice intended to bring good health in the new year. Several years ago, the government decided it could not stop the practice, and set up special parks where the fires could be set.

This year's celebration — a time for family gatherings — has proved especially vexing for the religious leadership as it occurs on Monday, the same day the faithful are expected to mourn the death of Imam Hussein, a figure whose defeat in battle centuries ago became a defining moment in Shiism, the dominant Islamic sect in Iran.

Some clerics said in interviews that it was acceptable to observe the new year, but because the celebration was occurring on the 40th day after the anniversary of Imam Hussein's death, people should not show joy — which in itself prompted giggles from some as they hurried to get ready.

"I think these days, there is a silent resistance in Iran, especially among the middle class," said Hamidreza Jalaipour, a sociologist. "They are resisting not politically, but socially and culturally."

Like most conflicts in a society as complex and layered as this one, the contemporary story of Nowruz is not one-sided or exclusively about resistance. It is also about accommodation. While Iran's religious leaders have followed a policy of confrontation with the West over their nation's nuclear program, they have, however grudgingly, ceded to the public's insistence on retaining, even bolstering, traditions not founded in Shiism.

While it was the reformist government of former President Mohammad Khatami that decided to establish parks to hold the fire-jumping festivities, for example, the practice was continued this year after the election of the ideologically conservative President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

That Iran's religious leaders have accepted Nowruz, and other prerevolution traditions like Chahar Shanbeh Suri, also demonstrates a growing degree of stability, as the country's leadership has tried to reconcile the bookends of Iranian national identity — faith and culture, experts here said.

At last week's Friday Prayer service, held in the sprawling open-air arena at Tehran University and broadcast nationwide, Ayatollah Ahmad Jannati, among Iran's chief enforcers of strict Islamic doctrine as head of the Guardian Council, did not mention Chahar Shanbeh Suri. He also did not mention Nowruz, though he acknowledged that recreation was good, as long as people continued to observe the laws of the Islamic republic.

"In this new year," Ayatollah Jannati said from a podium high above the crowd, "God's kindness and affection should be on you. We should always observe piety and all laws decided by God. You can neither commit sin in happiness or sadness."

There still exists a battlefield between those on the extremes of the debate, the ultrareligious who would like to erase elements of Iranian identity not explicitly Islamic, and others, including many in the expatriate community, who try to undermine the credibility of the Islamic government by appealing to Iranian nationalism through such traditions as Char Shanbeh Suri.

"What is interesting is that it is not clear why the opposition is trying to benefit from setting fire to little thorn bushes and firecrackers, which has mistakenly turned into a tradition, and interpret it as opposition to the Islamic republic," Hussein Shariatmadari, editor in chief of the conservative daily newspaper Kayhan, wrote on Thursday.

The exact beginning of Nowruz — the name means "New Day" — is unclear, although its origin has been traced back thousands of years. In Iran, it is closely associated with the Zoroastrian faith, a monotheistic religion in which worshipers perform prayers and rituals in the presence of fire — a symbol of order, truth and righteousness. Zoroastrians are said to have made the Nowruz tradition formal.

Tooran Shahriari, a senior member of the Zoroastrian community in Tehran, said that the ancient calendar was divided in 12 months of 30 days each. At the end of the year, she said, the five days left over became "special days" and the basis for the celebration.

In practical terms, the holiday signifies the end of winter and the start of the new growing season, and resembles a blend of New Year's Eve and Thanksgiving. In advance of the holiday, Iranians conduct an intense spring cleaning.

The holiday begins at the exact moment of spring, and so on Monday Iranian families will gather in their homes at about 10 p.m. around tables set with seven symbolic dishes, each beginning with the letter S in Persian, including items like vinegar, dried fruit, garlic and sprouting seeds, which represent renewal. The holiday ends on the 13th day with an event called Sizdah Bedar, when everyone is supposed to go out into nature, hold picnics and enjoy the early spring.

DOJ_NMG_0018491

In Isfahan, there was a rush to get ready for the holiday. One tradition is to buy new clothing, and tailors were busy trying to meet holiday orders. In one shop, a tailor named Akbar said that nearly half his annual business was conducted in the month before the holiday. He said he was certain Nowruz was so popular because people were rebelling against the government and its strict social codes of behavior.

"They really tried to take away Nowruz from people," Akbar said as he fitted a customer with a new suit. "People are turning away from religion altogether. They are not listening to what the government is saying." He is not being completely identified to protect him from possible reprisal over his comments about religion, which is often considered a red line in this country.

Not everyone shared the tailor's view. Instead, some people who identified themselves as religious said they saw no conflict with Iran's culture.

"Iranians have both tradition and religion, and they both get respected in return," said Jaafar Hemmassian, 40, a baker in the center of the city as he sold piles of cream puffs and cases of confections. "All of the traditions of Nowruz are accepted by Islam."

A few days earlier, as people gathered in a small park in Tehran to set fires and celebrate Chahar Shanbeh Suri, held on the last Wednesday of the year, many people said they were pleased that the government had finally relented — and even helped to organize the occasion.

"This is an important night for us, especially because this regime has finally realized that it should respect peoples' demand and let them celebrate it," said Manijeh Emadi, 54, a high-school teacher. "They wanted to take away Nowruz and its traditions for 27 years. Finally they learned that this tradition has survived for hundreds of years, and it will survive them as well."

Where Comedy Isn't King (NYT)

By Jake Tapper

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

Washington — I was only a few hours into my recent two-week stay in Baghdad when I first noticed the discordant images on Iraqi television: Between the grisly shots of war dead, pools of blood and burnt-out shells of cars came bits of wacky slapstick.

Grown men and women joked around in silly makeup and goofy costumes, emoting exaggeratedly, acting like buffoons. It was difficult to compute at first: amid the horror, some Iraqis were actually trying to make the country laugh.

With the newfound freedom of speech here, more than 100 television and radio stations have been licensed; the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, marveled at the transformation a few days ago, noting that until the invasion Uday Hussein's "pen ruled supreme." This has resulted not only in more news and public affairs programming, but many new entertainment shows.

Every Tuesday night, for instance, the Kurdish TV station KurdSat runs "Program," which offers music and skits about corruption and society. Every Friday afternoon "Caricatures," on the satellite station Al Sharqiya, lampoons sectarian strife and the annoyances of day-to-day life like cellphones. The American Idol-esque "Iraq Star," which recently completed a season's run on Al Sumariya, came with its own version of Simon Cowell named Mo Hadi.

On radio, every day the Rashid station offers a four-hour show called "DJ Rashid," which brings listeners music, comedy and various contests. Callers share jokes and poems on the Mahaba radio station's "Mahtata" show every evening.

Struck by this phenomenon, my producers and I called Iraqi TV and spoke to Amjad Hamid, the manager of the entertainment division. He seemed very proud of a new sitcom set to debut next month. In 15 half-hour episodes, "Me and Layla" — starring Odei Abdel-Sattar, an Iraqi Danny DeVito — will show the misadventures of a hapless Romeo. Mr. Hamid invited us to visit the set to interview the producer, director and actors. He was convinced that what they were trying to do was important.

When we went a few days later to where they were filming in north Baghdad, we could have been on a back lot in Burbank. A one-camera crew shot a scene where the diminutive Mr. Abdel-Sattar and another actor — the straight man, it seemed — had an animated discussion. The director, Jamal Abed-Jasim — bald, wearing a red shirt and tan vest — barked out his vision; a woman in a business suit clutching a clipboard never left his side. The smooth-as-silk producer, Mazin Mohammed Mustafa, paced and smoked. Mr. Abdel-Sattar hammed it up off camera. Gaffers and grips tended to their tasks; extras milled around, waiting to shine.

DOJ_NMG_0018492

For us, it was a chance to cover something besides car bombs, carnage and body counts. That perhaps understandable focus — and concerns for our own security — have clearly hindered the ability of journalists to tell stories about Iraqi society, about the less obvious ways that Iraqis are trying to rebuild their country.

"Iraqis have a real need to smile now to make them forget all the destruction and terrorism surrounding them," Mr. Abdel-Sattar told us, sunglasses perched atop his head. "God willing, things will get better."

Mr. Mustafa, the producer, told us more comedies were in production at Iraqi television stations now than at any time during Saddam Hussein's reign. And many of them were political — something unheard of. He echoed the sentiment of so many Hollywood producers: "Tragedy is easy; comedy is where the challenge is."

"Every director in Iraq wants to make the Iraqi people smile," he told us. "To ease what they are going through, to make the average Iraqi forget about the misery of his daily life."

Yet tragedy still has a way of rearing its head.

We had been on the set for less than an hour when Mr. Mustafa got a phone call that clearly upset him. Grabbing Mr. Abed-Jasim by the arm, Mr. Mustafa took him aside and told him that gunmen had assassinated Mr. Hamid, the entertainment-division chief, outside his Baghdad home just minutes earlier.

The director told the cast and crew. Shock and grief turned to terror. Everyone on the set immediately became restless, anxious. Eyes moist with tears began darting about the street. Iraqi TV is widely perceived as being pro-Shiite and pro-government; the Sunni-leaning Baghdad TV had just had one of its anchors shot and killed a few days before. Not that any of the violence in today's Iraq needs a reason.

Mr. Mustafa told the crew to break down; within minutes everyone had jumped into cars and minivans and fled. My crew and I weren't far behind. Iraqi TV put a black band of mourning on the top left corner of its screen and spent much of the rest of the day covering Mr. Hamid's funeral.

It is American journalists' duty to try to look at the broader picture in Iraq — telling the stories about those brave souls who seek to restore normalcy and laughter into the daily routine here. But there is no denying that the horrific violence will often make that task impossible.

Jake Tapper is a correspondent for ABC News.

Afghan Man Prosecuted For Converting (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, March 20, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — An Afghan man who allegedly converted from Islam to Christianity is being prosecuted in a Kabul court and could be sentenced to death, a judge said Sunday.

The defendant, Abdul Rahman, was arrested last month after his family went to the police and accused him of becoming a Christian, Judge Ansarullah Mawlavezada told Associated Press in an interview. Such a conversion would violate the country's Islamic laws.

Rahman, who is believed to be 41, was charged with rejecting Islam when his trial started last week, the judge said.

During the hearing, the defendant allegedly confessed that he converted from Islam to Christianity 16 years ago when he was 25 and working as a medical aid worker for Afghan refugees in neighboring Pakistan, Mawlavezada said.

Afghanistan's constitution is based on Shariah law, which states that any Muslim who rejects their religion should be sentenced to death.

"We are not against any particular religion in the world. But in Afghanistan, this sort of thing is against the law," the judge said. "It is an attack on Islam. ... The prosecutor is asking for the death penalty."

The prosecutor, Abdul Wasi, said the case was the first of its kind in Afghanistan.

He said that he had offered to drop the charges if Rahman changed his religion back to Islam, but the defendant refused.

Mawlavezada said he would rule on the case within two months.

Afghanistan is a deeply conservative society, and 99% of its 28 million people are Muslim. The rest are mainly Hindus.

Democracy And Security (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0018493

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

The publication last week of the Bush Administration's National Security Strategy has been greeted with a combination of media indifference and contempt. "Bush clings to pre-emptive force," was one news agency's sum-up of the 49-page document. Readers of these columns might prefer to draw their own conclusions by actually reading it: www.whitehouse.gov/nsc/nss/20061. What they'll find is a strategy that's admirably specific and, in the issues that matter most, broadly right.

This is especially important at a time when countries such as Iran, Syria and Egypt are betting that the Administration's domestic political weakness and its troubles in Iraq will see them safely through the 2008 election and what they hope will be a more pliant U.S. foreign policy. The document may now give those regimes second thoughts. Crucially, it reaffirms the Administration's first-term support of pre-emption: "When the consequences of an attack with [weapons of mass destruction] are potentially so devastating, we cannot afford to stand idly by as grave dangers materialize."

We'll take that to mean that the Bush Doctrine remains alive and well, despite persistent reports that it had been quietly shelved in favor of . . . well, no one has yet made clear what. Critics of the doctrine have argued that America's intelligence failure and difficulties in Iraq demonstrate the perils of pre-emption. Yet it is precisely because U.S. policy makers will never have perfect information about the capabilities and intentions of our enemies that pre-emption is sometimes needed, particularly when the threats are potentially catastrophic.

What distinguishes this document, however, is the emphasis it places on "effective democracy": that is, nations in which the institutions of democracy -- regular and honest elections; representative and accountable government -- serve as the armature of basic political, religious and economic freedoms.

Critics have questioned whether promoting democracy really advances U.S. security interests, pointing to the recent victory of Hamas in Palestinian elections. But leaving aside that the former government of Yasser Arafat was no less bloody minded, the objections fail to appreciate the ways in which effective democracies tend to counteract the very factors that gave rise to Hamas in the first place: Political participation takes the place of exclusion; the free flow of information and a marketplace of ideas replace "sub-cultures of conspiracy and misinformation," and so on.

None of this guarantees that elections will inevitably lead to liberal outcomes. And, yes, there are times and places (Pakistan now) where the diplomatic prod to democracy has to be measured against the help a government is providing against a more urgent enemy (al Qaeda). But the evidence of the past century is that elections usually produce more long-run stability, and they merit a try in the Middle East.

Equally useful is the strategy's clear-eyed account of the connection between the nature of a regime and its behavior. "Governments that honor their citizens' dignity and desire for freedom tend to uphold responsible conduct toward other nations," the document notes, "while governments that brutalize their people also threaten the peace and stability of other nations."

This is directly relevant to Iran, whose nuclear ambitions are mainly a function of the ideological obsessions of its rulers -- and not, as is sometimes argued, of Iran's objective national interests. This means the threat Iran poses is unlikely to change as long as the regime remains the same: The "ultimate goal" of U.S. policy, therefore, is rightly an Iran which "[opens] up its political system and [affords] freedom to its people.

How this is done is another matter, and nobody is now arguing for changing the regime in Tehran the way it was changed in Baghdad. But we are heartened that the strategy begins with the declaration that "It is the policy of the United States to seek and support democratic movements and institutions in every nation and culture" (our emphasis). This puts us in mind of U.S. support for Russian refuseniks in the 1970s, Poland's Solidarity movement in the 1980s and Kurdish autonomy in northern Iraq in the 1990s -- all of which have analogs in modern-day Iran.

There is a great deal more in this document that deserves attention, notably the effort to retool the State Department into an engine of "transformational diplomacy," and not, as it usually is, the defender of every given status quo. It is also good to see the Administration belatedly recognize that Russian democracy is increasingly threatened by its own government.

Best of all is the line that "Though tyranny has few advocates, it needs more adversaries." One critique of the President's push for democracy is the idea that the U.S. should not too visibly support the world's democratic dissidents and movements, lest they be tainted by American associations. But we suspect that champions of liberty in places such as Egypt, Iran and China take greater courage from an America that states its purposes boldly than one that fears its own shadow. Since when did the love of liberty become the love that dare not speak its name?

DOJ_NMG_0018494

DOJ:

Federal Prosecutor Joins Arent Fox's D.C. Office (WP)

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

Baruch Weiss, a veteran federal prosecutor who most recently was associate general counsel at the Department of Homeland Security, has joined the District office of Arent Fox in the litigation and white-collar defense groups.

From 1984 through 2002, Weiss was senior trial counsel for the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, where he handled cases including a fraud investigation of a major securities firm, appeals involving the first World Trade Center bombing in 1993 and the unsuccessful prosecution of boxing promoter Don King for insurance fraud.

Meanwhile, Jim Schumann, who was previously in the DHS office of legislative affairs, has joined the government affairs group at Akerman Senterfitt. He will serve on the firm's disaster recovery task force.

In other moves in the Washington offices of major law firms:

· Four lawyers who were with Heller Ehrman LLP -- Colin G. Sandercock, John P. Isacson, Paul M. Booth and David W. Laub -- have joined the life sciences and intellectual property practices of Proskauer Rose LLP as partners.

· Roger Nober, outgoing chairman of the federal Surface Transportation Board, has joined Steptoe & Johnson LLP as a partner.

-- Larry Liebert

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Prosecutors Have Another Key Witness, From Jail (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

The government heads this week into the home stretch of its case against two former Enron chief executives. Prosecutors will be looking to end on a flourish with the testimony of Ben F. Glisan Jr., the only former top executive who has already been sentenced in the Enron debacle.

Mr. Glisan, the former treasurer, is the last major witness for the government before the case shifts to the defense and to what promises to be memorable testimony by the defendants, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay.

Mr. Glisan worked closely with Andrew S. Fastow, the former chief financial officer, on developing special-purpose entities, like the Raptors group, that both men have said in plea deals were used to inflate earnings and hide debt. The government is also expected to use Mr. Glisan to try to connect the dots for jurors hearing a complex case.

For seven weeks and through 14 witnesses, jurors have listened to prosecutors build a case on largely disparate pieces of indirect circumstantial evidence that Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, the top executives of what was once the seventh-largest company in the world by revenue, conspired to mislead and defraud investors.

Legal experts have generally praised the government's case, which has shied away from complex explanations of accounting and focused on the actions and words of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay in the three years before Enron collapsed in December 2001.

But legal experts continue to debate two crucial issues: whether the government has presented enough evidence that Mr. Lay knowingly lied about the true state of Enron's businesses and, more broadly, whether there was an extensive conspiracy within Enron to defraud and mislead employees and investors, as the government contends.

Those issues underscore the importance of decisions that the judge, Simeon T. Lake III of Federal District Court, will make in the coming weeks about how to structure the jury instruction. If the judge grants a "deliberate ignorance" instruction, as expected by many legal specialists because of case precedent, it could ease the way for jurors to find Mr. Lay guilty — even if the government cannot prove he knew that fraud was occurring on his watch.

DOJ_NMG_0018495

"These instructions are making it very difficult if not impossible for defendants to prevail in these types of cases," said Joel Androphy, a lawyer in Houston specializing in white-collar crime.

Mr. Lay's lead lawyer, Michael Ramsey, agreed that prosecutors were more likely than not to seek the "deliberate ignorance" instruction for his client. "There is nothing direct to say about Ken Lay," Mr. Ramsey said. "It has all got to be by insinuation and innuendo."

But legal experts said the cumulative impact of such testimony could be taking a toll on Mr. Lay. Last week provided some of the most emotional testimony against Mr. Lay to date. Johnnie Nelson, a 46-year-old pipeline operator in New Mexico, blamed Mr. Lay for steep losses in his retirement savings account, saying a man he formerly admired had let him down.

At week's end, Sherron S. Watkins, a former Enron vice president and now an author and lecturer, said she had become concerned about potential accounting problems and had taken the concerns directly to Mr. Lay after Mr. Skilling abruptly resigned.

Ms. Watkins criticized Mr. Lay's handling of an inquiry into her accusations and raised the specter that Mr. Lay might have authorized lawyers to look into firing her, which did not happen in the end.

Jurors seemed riveted by her testimony, which was peppered with her negative opinions of Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling. Judge Lake helped prosecutors by not reining in her answers.

Prosecutors have also presented evidence that Mr. Skilling participated in fraudulent acts. David W. Delainey, the former chief executive of the Enron Energy Services retail division, testified about one meeting in March 2001 in which Mr. Skilling assented to a plan to shift some $250 million in troubled retail contracts to the wholesale energy division.

Mr. Delainey contended that the meeting participants knew the move was being done to deceive investors about the retail unit, which he called a "basket case."

Mr. Fastow, while admitting his own criminality, testified that Mr. Skilling approved "bear hug" side deals guaranteeing that one partnership, LJM, would not suffer losses for doing deals with Enron that could help it manipulate its earnings. And Mr. Fastow, in somewhat shaky testimony, nevertheless said the side deals had been memorialized in a document called the Global Galactic agreement, aspects of which, he said, Richard A. Causey, the chief accounting officer, had discussed with Mr. Skilling.

Kevin P. Hannon, the former chief operating officer of Enron's troubled broadband unit, offered surprising testimony that Mr. Skilling uttered "They're on to us" in a May 2001 meeting at which senior executives discussed a research report suggesting Enron's stock was overvalued.

Despite the evidence presented so far, some legal experts said they believed the case could crumble once Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay took the stand.

"There is still no explosive evidence," said Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who is now a defense lawyer at McCarter & English in Newark. "Jurors will be expecting prosecutors to dissect their testimony with a scalpel."

Before the defense takes over, Mr. Glisan's appearance for the prosecution offers one more chance for high drama. Mr. Glisan, 40, has already served more than half of a five-year sentence for conspiring to falsify financial results and make Enron appear more successful than it actually was. He was the chief architect of the Raptor vehicles, whose insolvency in the fall of 2001, prosecutors contend, played a role in the ultimate collapse of Enron.

Mr. Glisan is serving time at a low-security prison in Beaumont, Tex., about 100 miles east of Houston, according to Bureau of Prison records. He is sure to draw stares if he enters the courtroom in prison garb, as he did two years ago when he testified in another Enron case involving the sham sale of interests in Nigerian barges.

Affable and sharp, Mr. Glisan was credited with being a crucial government witness in the barge case, which resulted in five defendants being found guilty. Unlike other government witnesses, Mr. Glisan has less to gain from shading his testimony to fit the government's theory of the case because he is already serving his sentence, legal experts say.

Away from the courtroom, lawyers for both sides began hashing out the all-important jury instruction they will eventually submit to the court.

DOJ_NMG_0018496

"I am not terribly optimistic after yesterday that we can get a charge together by agreement," he said Saturday. "The judge will have to get into it and make some rulings."

The "deliberate ignorance," or "conscious avoidance," charge made it fairly easy for jurors to find Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom, guilty last year of conspiracy and fraud charges.

In a motion seeking a new trial, lawyers for Mr. Ebbers, who was sentenced to 25 years in prison, argue that jurors were told they could find him guilty based on "conscious avoidance" even without evidence that Mr. Ebbers "deliberately avoided learning any fact at issue."

The judge in that case justified the charge on the grounds that the circumstances were "overwhelmingly suspicious" and that Mr. Ebbers had failed to question those suspicious circumstances.

Mr. Ebbers also struggled to win a "missing witness" charge, which defense lawyers in the Enron case are likely to seek as well. In the Ebbers case the judge denied defense motions to grant immunity to some witnesses or to allow use of previous statements to impeach the government's cooperating witnesses.

Absent that, Mr. Ebbers's lawyers sought to instruct jurors that certain witnesses were "missing" because they were under government control, had indicated they would exercise their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and were not given immunity by the court to testify for the defense.

Lawyers for Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay are facing the same challenges in responding to testimony by government cooperators testifying under plea agreements. Most of the government cooperators, including Michael J. Kopper, a close confidant of Mr. Fastow; and David B. Duncan, the former Andersen partner who had approved much of Enron's questionable accounting, have told defense lawyers they would invoke Fifth Amendment rights.

Others important Enron figures who have not been charged, like the former Enron president Greg Whalley, also have indicated they would invoke the Fifth if called.

That would make it tough for the defense to disprove Mr. Delainey's accusations about what was said at the March 2001 meeting in Mr. Skilling's office. All but one participant in the meeting — a former Enron accountant, Wesley H. Colwell — is likely to be unavailable for the defense.

Mr. Colwell testified earlier in the trial for the government but was not asked about his role in the effort to shift losses out of the retail unit.

Another participant in the meeting that day, Mr. Causey, is not likely to be called by the government except as a rebuttal witness, if at all, prosecutors have said.

Executive Pay Rises Show Big Slowdown In US (FT)

By Dan Roberts

Financial Times, March 20, 2006

Growth in US executive pay has slowed sharply in spite of record profit growth, according to preliminary findings from an independent corporate governance watchdog.

The Corporate Library, which usually estimates greater pay inflation than most industry studies, calculates that US chief executives took home 11 per cent more money in 2005, compared with a 30 per cent rise the year previously. Among the 500 largest companies, median total compensation reported to date rose by just 3.7 per cent in 2005 to $5.2m.

“It is early days yet, but it may be possible to find some small encouragement in the fact that, at least for a group of companies, compensation increases for CEOs, while far exceeding those for other employees, have dropped from the heady levels found in last year’s survey,” said Paul Hodgson, senior research associate.

The slowdown coincides with a change in tactics among pay campaigners, who believe they may be reaching the limit of their efforts to shame companies into pay restraint.

More transparent disclosure rules that were recently proposed by the Securities and Exchange Commission should soon make it much harder for companies to disguise the total pay packages that are received by their executives.

DOJ_NMG_0018497

Activists, such as those running union pension funds, are shifting their attention, proposing resolutions that will make it easier for investors to nominate directors to compensation committees or vote on approving remuneration, as is common in the UK and Australia.

"We are at a critical point as boardroom vested interests fight tooth and nail against further reform and there is a danger that the focus on disclosure becomes a distraction from the real question, which is board accountability," said Brandon Rees, a researcher with the AFL-CIO's office of investment.

Some experts are sceptical that giving investors the information and the tools to tackle boardroom excesses will necessarily make much difference to overall levels of pay.

"We may discover that investors are not really that bothered," said Mr Hodgson.

"There will be even fewer excuses with the proposed disclosure regulations coming in, so what will happen then is the blame will shift from compensation committees to shareholders."

Pat McGurn, special counsel at Institutional Shareholder Services, said this coming year would prove the acid test for those who argue that improved corporate governance automatically leads to lower executive pay. "The SEC can bring you to the water, but it is up to investors to fix things," he said.

While the Corporate Library's latest figures show pay inflation slowing, many high-profile cases appear the result of voluntary restraint. For example, General Electric announced its chief executive had chosen to waive the cash portion of his bonus due to poor stock price performance.

CEOs Report Stricter Rules (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, March 20, 2006

Large U.S. companies are making strides in corporate-governance practices, from creating stronger independent boards to linking more executives' pay packages to their companies' performance, according to a survey out today.

The survey of 100 CEOs by the Business Roundtable, a group of CEOs whose companies boast $4 trillion in revenue, suggests that leading corporations are taking their watchdog roles more seriously in the wake of Enron and other corporate scandals.

"This shows dramatic change, and it's all motivated by the desire for good corporate governance," said Steve Odland, CEO of Office Depot and corporate-governance chair of the Business Roundtable.

Among the survey's findings:

•Pay practices. Some 57% of companies have increased pay-for-performance elements in their executives' compensation packages. That's up from 40% in 2004. Also, nearly all companies have stock-ownership requirements or guidelines for executives and directors.

In general, pay and governance experts believe that corporate officials do a better job if their pay is tied to companies' earnings and stock-price performances.

•Board independence and oversight. At least 91% of the companies have an independent chairman or lead director — up from 71% two years ago.

Barely 11%, though, have split the chairman and CEO positions. Shareholder activists and some regulators think boards should be run not by CEOs, but by chairs with no ties to management.

•Compliance costs. Half the CEOs expect their costs to comply with the Sarbanes-Oxley anti-fraud laws to drop this year. Only 6% predict their costs will rise. Larger companies spend several million dollars a year in compliance costs.

Charles Elson, director of the University of Delaware's Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance, said the survey shows that companies "have made progress, but we still have a long way to go."

For instance, he said, all executives already should have pay-for-performance packages. The bigger issue: How is their pay structured? If pay increases are pegged to a 5% short-term investment return, that's far less demanding than higher goals over five or 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0018498

Elson said companies are improving their governance because of pressure from pension funds, labor unions and regulators, plus court rulings that make directors liable for not policing their firms.

Executive pay has soared since the 1980s, provoking criticism from leading investors. "Too often executive compensation in the U.S. is ridiculously out of line with performance," Berkshire Hathaway CEO Warren Buffett said in a letter to his shareholders last month.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Defendant In Plame Case Switches Focus To WMD (USAT/AP)

By Pete Yost, The Associated Press

USA Today, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Ten months ahead of his scheduled trial in the Valerie Plame affair, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby seems intent on zeroing in on three little letters: WMD.

In their latest court filing, Libby's legal team described Plame's CIA identity as "at most a peripheral issue" to "the media conflagration" over the failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

It's the media conflagration, and the resulting fingerpointing among the White House, the CIA and the State Department over who was to blame, that Libby's lawyers want to focus on in a bid to get him off, their court papers suggest.

Libby's lawyers also suggested in a court filing late Friday that it's the State Department — not Libby — who's to blame for leaking Plame's CIA identity to the media.

The court papers underscore the possibility that a criminal trial of Libby could highlight the ongoing debate over whether the White House manipulated intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq.

If the jury learns the background information about "fingerpointing," and also understands Libby's additional focus on urgent national security matters, the jury will more easily appreciate how Libby may have forgotten or misremembered "snippets of conversation" about Plame's CIA status, the defense lawyers stated.

Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff was indicted Oct. 28 on five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about how he learned of Plame's CIA employment and what he told reporters about her.

Libby's lawyers are asking U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton for access to government documents about a 2002 trip that Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, made to the African nation of Niger at the CIA's behest and about "his wife's involvement" with that mission.

The documents relate to what prospective witnesses — including then-deputy secretary of State Richard Armitage and deputy White House chief of staff Karl Rove — might say at Libby's trial.

Noting news reports last week, the court papers say there has been speculation that Armitage told The Washington Post's Bob Woodward that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA, and speculation that Woodward's source and the primary source for conservative columnist Robert Novak are the same person.

Novak disclosed Plame's identity on July 14, 2003, eight days after Wilson contended in a New York Times op-ed column that the administration twisted prewar intelligence to exaggerate the Iraqi threat from a nuclear weapons program.

"If the facts ultimately show that Mr. Armitage or someone else from the State Department was also Mr. Novak's primary source, then the State Department and certainly not Mr. Libby bears responsibility for the 'leak,' " Libby's lawyers said.

The court filing also focused on Marc Grossman, a former undersecretary of state for political affairs who allegedly told Libby a month before Plame's identity was disclosed that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.

"If Mr. Armitage or another State Department official was in fact the primary source for Mr. Novak's article, Mr. Grossman's testimony may be colored by either his personal relationship with Mr. Armitage or his concern for the institutional concerns of the state Department," the lawyers wrote.

Rove — a source for Novak and Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper — is under investigation by special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald.

DOJ_NMG_0018499

Libby's lawyers say that "either the government or the defense may call Mr. Rove as a witness at trial" and note that "the grand jury's investigation may be continuing with respect to Mr. Rove or other witnesses."

The defense says the documents it seeks will help demonstrate that the White House did not launch a concerted effort to punish Wilson by leaking his wife's identity.

Libby also is asking for notes from a September 2003 meeting in the White House Situation Room where Colin Powell, who was secretary of State, is reported to have said that everyone knows Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and that it was Wilson's wife who suggested the CIA sent her husband to Niger.

"The media conflagration ignited by the failure to find WMD in Iraq and in part by Mr. Wilson's criticism of the administration, led officials within the White House, the State Department and the CIA to blame each other, publicly and in private, for faulty prewar intelligence about Iraq's WMD capabilities," the court papers state.

"The government's version of events blows out of proportion the minor role Ms. Wilson actually played and in doing so creates an impression that is highly prejudicial to Mr. Libby," they say.

Wilson's accusations stemmed from President Bush's assertion in his 2003 State of the Union address that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein had recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa.

Based on his 2002 trip, Wilson said he had found it doubtful that Niger had agreed to sell uranium yellowcake to Iraq, as alleged in intelligence provided to the CIA.

Why Clearing A Cop's Name Matters In Abramoff Scandal (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

A former D.C. cop could alter national politics this year.

Here's why: An appeals court decision that involves the police officer could well make it harder for prosecutors to make a case against lawmakers implicated in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Pundits have long predicted that testimony by Abramoff would produce a string of indictments of federal officials this year and that those, in turn, would so tarnish the reputation of his fellow Republicans that the party could lose control of the House, the Senate or both in the November elections.

But that was before the surprising court decision that helped a former Metropolitan Police Department detective named Nelson Valdes.

According to the court's record, Valdes ran license plates through a law enforcement database and provided the vehicle-owner information he collected to a person who paid him cash. He was convicted in 2002 of taking illegal gratuities.

But a three-judge appeals court panel recently reversed that decision. It said, in an opinion dated Feb. 24, that his actions weren't a formal part of his duties and therefore weren't covered by the statute.

Scholars say that as a result of the Valdes case, the process of charging lawmakers and their aides with wrongdoing in the Abramoff scandal (and others like it) will be more difficult.

"Now, virtually every time the government tries to bring an official-acts prosecution, the defense will cite the Valdes case," said George D. Brown, professor at Boston College Law School. "The decision raises a substantial element of doubt,"

Kathleen Clark, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis, agreed. "I'd be very troubled if I were in the Justice Department pursuing these things," she said.

The federal appeals court here in the District decided that officials such as Valdes should not be convicted for taking payoffs unless their behavior involved a "decision or action" that affected a "formal government decision made in fulfillment of government's public responsibilities."

"Casual and informal use of government resources," which in this case included Valdes's database queries, the decision added, would not qualify as the kind of official act that could be prosecuted under the law.

His conviction on three counts of receiving an illegal gratuity was overturned, and other bribery-like cases could be turned upside down, as well.

In short, Clark said, the Valdes case "narrows the scope of what is an official act."

DOJ_NMG_0018500

"It certainly hamstrings the use of the gratuities statute as the basis for a public corruption indictment," Brown agreed.

Not every expert agrees, of course. And lawyers are still poring over the details of the ruling. But many of those who have studied the decision closely believe that it leaves the definition of "official act" vague enough to cast doubt on all sorts of corruption cases.

Put simply: How can prosecutors know for sure what are formal and what are informal duties involved in an official act?

Some instances are clear-cut. If a lawmaker accepts money to vote in favor of a briber's interest, that is obviously a crime.

But if the lawmaker uses his powerful position to pressure a business executive to help a friend who gives him money, is that a formal official act? Maybe not.

Or what about the instance in which a lawmaker calls an executive branch official to praise a business that wants a government contract? Even though the bureaucrat understands the conversation to be a pointed request on the business's behalf, would the communication be a formal official act or an informal one?

Who knows? But that distinction could make all the difference.

All we know is that the Valdes case has raised the bar on proof for the prosecution.

"It opens the door for good defense lawyers to make arguments," Clark said. "This could open the way to a lot of tough motions to dismiss" bribery and gratuity cases.

Here are the facts of the case:

On Feb. 17, 2001, Valdes met William Blake, an FBI informant posing as a judge. They exchanged pleasantries at a popular nightclub called MCCXXIII near DuPont Circle and went on to see each other on several other occasions.

Blake said he might need Valdes to do him a favor. That favor turned out to be obtaining data such as automobile registration information about various people through a police computer system. In implicit exchange for the assistance, Blake gave Valdes money.

Valdes was indicted on three counts of bribery and was convicted on three counts of receipt of an illegal gratuity, a lesser charge. But he appealed and won reversal last month.

The majority ruled that the government "failed to show that the acts for which Valdes received compensation were official acts" within the meaning of the bribery statute. What the government needed, the decision stated, was to show "at least a rudimentary degree of formality" in what that official act was.

In dissent, Judge Karen LeCraft Henderson accused the majority of, in effect, making payoffs legal.

"In Mexico, they call it 'la mordida' (literally, 'the bite'); in Iran, 'bakhshish'; and in France, 'pot-de-vin.' Here in America, we call it a 'payoff' and, today, the majority calls it lawful," Henderson wrote.

She also said that Valdes was clearly acting officially when he used the police's special databases.

But at least for cases that come before the federal court in Washington, the majority will rule. Any future bribery charges against lawmakers or their aides will probably be harder to prove thanks to this obscure onetime detective.

An Unassuming Witness, Steeped In The Underworld (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

To look at him, one might never guess that Burton Kaplan devoted 40 years to a protean life of crime.

Short, bald, meek, myopic, Mr. Kaplan is an unassuming presence, an aging man from Brooklyn with more than a vague resemblance to the low-rent hucksters who gather every week for pastrami sandwiches in Woody Allen's "Broadway Danny Rose."

He is a complex character, who, for decades, led a double life. On one hand, he was that stock-in-trade cliché, "the legitimate businessman," who owned a discount clothing store in Bensonhurst and a factory for Chinese garment makers in Antigua. On the other hand, he is — or was — an inexhaustible fountainhead of crime.

Both sides of Mr. Kaplan's personality were on display this week in Federal District Court in Brooklyn, where he spent three vivid days as the star government witness at the trial of Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, retired New York detectives, who stand accused of taking part in at least eight murders for the mob.

He linked the lawmen to at least a dozen killings and kept the courtroom spellbound with his clipped accounts of how the two defendants had once gunned down a gangster on the grass berm of the Belt Parkway and, earlier, had delivered a kidnapped mobster to his rival, who accepted the bounty in the parking lot of a Flatbush Toys "R" Us.

In 14 hours on the stand, Mr. Kaplan, 72, speaking softly and lubricating his accounts with constant gulps of water, proved himself a linchpin of the prosecution's case and then survived the opening round of cross-examination. By Thursday evening, when court let out, it was clear he had an encyclopedic understanding of the underworld — the Balzac, if you will, of Brooklyn crime.

It was an unlikely expertise for a young man raised in Depression-era Bedford-Stuyvesant to a working-class family that owned an appliance store on Vanderbilt Avenue. A feckless student, Mr. Kaplan attended the prestigious Brooklyn Technical High School, but dropped out after a year and a half. "I wish I'd stood there," he testified this week.

On St. Patrick's Day 1952, he said, he enlisted in the Navy and was sent to Japan, where he spent the early cold war deciphering and analyzing Russian military codes. Discharged four years later, he returned to Brooklyn and the family business, installing washers, dryers and air-conditioners, as his father had done.

But even then, he told the court, he had a secret. He was "a degenerate gambler," betting on the horses and playing in "neighborhood poker games" from the age of 13. "I enjoyed it, I became sick with it," he said.

Gambling led to debts, which led to loan sharks, which led to the Mafia, he said. By the 1960's, Mr. Kaplan said, he was in the orbit of Christopher Furnari, a rising star in the Luchese family, to whom he offered fealty through what he called "small pays."

Mr. Kaplan was never an imposing man (he said he once paid someone $1,000 while in prison to assault another inmate on his behalf), although he did have a taste for "rough-and-tumble characters," as Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler, said. The roughest among them was no doubt the Luchese underboss, Anthony Casso, who once shot a dog outside a gangster bar for barking too loudly.

In 1985, when Mr. Furnari went to prison, Mr. Kaplan — and his "pays"— were handed over, gangland-style, to Mr. Casso, and the two men started dining together at least twice a week. By then, Mr. Kaplan's business ventures had encompassed everything from counterfeit watches to homemade quaaludes. He was also smuggling marijuana, though at first, he said, "I didn't even know what it was."

The next year, mob assassins tried to murder Mr. Casso, and he turned to Mr. Kaplan for assistance with revenge. Mr. Kaplan testified that the gangster knew he had connections to a pair of Brooklyn lawmen who would kill for cash, and he said Mr. Casso hired them to wreak his vengeance on seven rivals, who all eventually turned up dead.

Mr. Kaplan said it was the start of a blood-tie that bound the mobster to the two detectives from 1986 to 1993, when Mr. Casso was arrested. In 1994, he agreed to cooperate with the authorities, and Mr. Kaplan, despite a wife in Brooklyn and a daughter in Manhattan, went, as he put it, "on the lam."

He was already in his 60's, but with help from friends, he said, he got a library card and memberships at AAA and Costco, all in the name of Barry Mayers, and used these fake documents to obtain a state ID. He skulked about from San Diego to Mexico to Oregon and finally to Las Vegas. There, in a triumph of fugitive entrepreneurship, he opened a storefront warehouse selling suits to "female casino executives."

"A good suit for a good value," he said.

Then, without a word to anyone, he returned to New York City in the spring of 1996 and was arrested that September on a federal narcotics charge in which he was accused of selling up to 13,000 pounds of marijuana a year.

After spending nine years in prison, he decided he would testify at trial. His agreement with the government is classic Burton Kaplan.

In exchange for his cooperation, he faces a prison term with an abundance of wiggle room: "zero to life," he said.

Pellicano Wiretap Witness Admits Scheme (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian And Andrew Blankstein, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

A Valencia businessman who said he hired the investigator to get illegal information decides to cooperate with the federal investigation.

A Valencia businessman admitted Friday to conspiring with Anthony Pellicano to illegally dig up information about a teenager who had accused him of sexual assault, becoming the latest witness cooperating in the federal probe of the indicted private eye.

"I hired Mr. Pellicano because he told me he could listen in" to the young woman's phone calls, a shaken George Kalta, 37, told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer, as he entered his guilty plea. "That was the only reason I hired Mr. Pellicano."

The plea makes Kalta the fourth person to acknowledge that they hired — or helped — Pellicano to illegally investigate others using wiretaps, confidential police record searches or other methods.

Once one of Los Angeles' best-known private investigators, Pellicano is at the center of a wide-ranging FBI investigation that has shaken Hollywood and its legal community. To date, 13 people have been charged, including an entertainment attorney, a record company executive, two former police officers accused of selling him confidential data and several telephone company employees.

Without exception, the many attorneys and celebrities who hired Pellicano over the years have said since his indictment that they were unaware that his alleged hardball tactics may have crossed the line into lawlessness.

But criminal defense attorney Leslie Abramson, representing Kalta, said outside court on Friday that Pellicano bragged to her client about listening in on other people's conversations and about having connections within law enforcement. The connections included "a contact" in the Los Angeles County district attorney's office and a police officer who he said could get him a district attorney's memo for $5,000.

"He bragged about how he did this [wiretapping] for other clients," Abramson said. "He said that is why people pay him so much."

Abramson said Pellicano also boasted of his celebrity clients, including Tom Cruise, Michael Jackson and O.J. Simpson.

Kalta, owner of a lighting manufacturing company, was charged by the district attorney's office in early 2002 with sexual battery by restraint and false imprisonment.

County prosecutors said his victim was an 18-year-old woman who was assaulted in October 2001, when she was making a delivery to Kalta's Canoga Park store.

Kalta eventually pleaded guilty to felony assault without a deadly weapon and was granted probation. The charge was later reduced to a misdemeanor and dismissed, Abramson said.

During Friday's federal court hearing, Assistant U.S. Atty. Kevin Lally said authorities could prove that Kalta hired Pellicano on Oct. 17, 2001, to investigate his accuser and to listen to the woman's telephone conversations. Kalta paid Pellicano $50,000 for the information.

Outside court, Abramson said her client went to Pellicano after searching the Internet for a private investigator who could help prove his innocence.

She said Kalta later began to suspect that Pellicano was bugging his telephone because on four separate occasions between March and May of 2002, the investigator called Kalta right after Kalta spoke with Abramson. "Every single time we had a conversation about Pellicano, as soon as we hung up, he would call George and badmouth me," she said.

The events outlined by Abramson parallel those of another criminal defendant who also hired Pellicano and was represented by attorney Danny Davis. Davis represented Kalta before Abramson.

Last year, Abramson said, federal prosecutors played her and her client a recorded conversation in which Pellicano urged Kalta not to fire another attorney in order to hire Abramson. "He said I was not a lawyer he could trust," Abramson said.

Kalta, however, hired Abramson, who brought in another private investigator.

After that, Abramson said, Kalta found the locks in his office glued shut. One of the doors had a knife jammed into a keyhole.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Dan Saunders said he could not discuss evidence in the case that had not yet been made public. Pellicano's attorney, Steven Gruel, could not be reached for comment.

A spokeswoman for the district attorney said she was unaware of claims that Pellicano had a contact within the office and urged anyone with information to come forward.

Davis' attorney, Harland Braun, disputed the notion that Pellicano had any special relationship with Davis. He said Davis became involved in the two cases after Pellicano had been hired.

Without disputing that her client broke the law, Abramson said Kalta was hardly the most important figure in the Pellicano investigation.

"There are much bigger fish to fry," she said. "As far as I'm concerned, George is a minnow."

Men Accused In Child Prostitution Ring Describe Teens As Partners (ABJ)

Akron Beacon Journal, March 20, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio - Troopers and a judge in Pennsylvania found themselves repeatedly processing the same young prostitutes, who paid fines with already-prepared money orders and went back to the truck stops where they worked.

Slowly, through talks with the girls, authorities built up evidence that led to federal charges against men accused forcing teenage girls from northwest Ohio to work in a prostitution ring, a newspaper reported.

The work was painstaking. And the jailed men accused of being pimps are unrepentant, The Blade reported in Sunday's editions.

"Pimps do things like ... lock the girls up in closets. I'm 'finesseful,' you know what I'm saying?" Derek Maes told the newspaper in a telephone interview from a Pennsylvania jail.

He and 12 other men were named in a 102-page federal indictment in December that accused them of taking teenagers, including at least nine from the Toledo area, across state lines for prostitution. The indictment said the girls were beaten if they failed to follow orders or make enough money.

Maes, 41, and another man charged, Robert Scott, 44, deny they are pimps, arguing that they didn't force the girls - including a 12-year-old - to do anything. They say if the girls were selling themselves against their will, they would have asked law enforcement for help when arrested.

Scott said the prostitutes were more like business partners, free to work with different employers.

"She's choosing the best investment for her money," he said. "The prosecutors are trying to make it like a bunch of us running around with candy in our pocket, going to parks and picking up little kids. It wasn't like that at all - period."

The federal case centered on truck stops outside Harrisburg, Pa., where state police had started cracking down on the problem through undercover arrests.

Fines collected for offenses such as prostitution and vandalism in a township with one of the truck stops increased tenfold to $32,400 in 2004 from about $3,300 a year earlier.

"You could sit and watch girls run down the rows, run under the trucks, in all directions. There were some nights out there it looked ridiculous," said trooper David Olweiler, a state police intelligence officer.

As arrests piled up, Olweiler started keeping the girls' booking photos in a three-ring binder, trying to show a pattern of repeat arrests. He also had long conversations, trying to understand them.

"A lot of these girls, you wouldn't know they're victims," he said. "They love to brag. You wouldn't know they were in it against their will."

The prostitutes came to court with money orders already made out for the exact fine and costs of $418.50, West Hanover Township Magistrate Roy Bridges said.

"You should have seen how some of them were dressed," Bridges told the newspaper. "Sometimes troopers would wrap them up in one of those yellow blankets used to cover dead bodies."

Eventually, state police called for federal help.

The FBI assigned 16 new agents to the investigation, and the agency is hiring six more this year. The FBI says the interstate ring is organized crime, equating it to drug trafficking.

Many of the girls came from backgrounds of abuse or incest, and the pimps conditioned them through abuse and threats against family members to accept their fate, said Chip Burrus, the FBI's acting assistant director for criminal investigations.

"They just become accustomed to that lifestyle," Burrus said. "You can't consent to be a prostitute at age 14. That's just an impossibility."

After the indictments, the truck stops near Harrisburg cleared out.

"For a long time, we didn't see anybody," Olweiler said. "But one of our patrols came back the other day and said they're back out there."

Corruption Case Swallows The Police Force Of A Texas Town (LAT)

By Lianne Hart, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

Many Troup residents are shocked by the shutdown amid charges of evidence tampering. But rumors of lapses have circulated for years.

TROUP, Texas — It happened without warning. The FBI swooped in, shut down Troup's five-man police force and jailed the chief and a sergeant — the 2005 Chamber of Commerce officer of the year, no less — on charges of corruption.

Startled residents watched in silence as authorities secured the tiny station with yellow crime-scene tape and swarmed the building for evidence.

Sgt. Mark Turner, 47, was charged with delivering marijuana and tampering with or fabricating evidence. According to a search warrant, Turner gave marijuana to an undercover agent, assuring him later that there was more where that came from: the police evidence box.

Police Chief Chester Kennedy, who led the force for 14 years, also was charged with evidence tampering. He admitted to investigators that he gave Turner 24 cans of light beer from a 30-pack seized in a bootlegging case, but said he planned to buy more if the case went to court. "Beer is beer," he said, according to a Sheriff's Department affidavit.

Events unfolded so quickly here that, weeks after the March 3 raid, stunned residents are still talking about it when they meet on the street. Some, however, are less surprised; rumors of police misconduct had circulated for years.

"Mind you, they're innocent until proven guilty, but I think there was too much temptation," said Addie Herring, 85, who has lived in Troup for half a century. "This used to be such a good place to live, but now we've got all this dope."

Here in rural East Texas, methamphetamine labs can operate unnoticed. Misdemeanor drug charges in Smith County, about 100 miles southeast of Dallas, are as common as drunk driving arrests, Dist. Atty. Matt Bingham said. But in the last six years, the Troup police force sent just 11 drug cases to the district attorney's office.

Maj. Mike Lusk, head of criminal investigations for the Smith County Sheriff's Department, said Troup police had sent a total of two drug evidence samples to the Texas Department of Public Safety crime lab since 2000. "We do that much in an hour," he said.

Bingham said: "It appears from the current investigation that the problem is not with the Troup Police Department prosecuting innocent people, it is that they were not prosecuting guilty people."

Lawyers for Kennedy and Turner could not be reached for comment.

Since the police force was shut down, a notice has been taped to the front door of the darkened station: Dial 911 or call the sheriff in an emergency.

Turner, unable to make $500,000 bond, remains in jail. At an emergency City Council meeting held days after his arrest, he was fired.

Kennedy, 59, posted $400,000 bond and often can be seen at his regular table at the Farmer's Cafe in Troup. The waitresses welcome him with smiles, but fellow diners shoot sidelong glances as he keeps his eyes on his meal. At a special City Council session March 10, Kennedy too was fired.

At that meeting, resident Vicki Risvold stood and said what had festered inside for too long. For years, she said, drugs were sold openly from the house across the street. Risvold said packets of white powder were traded so casually that her young daughter recognized a sale in progress. Twice Risvold reported the drug dealing to police, who promised to look into it but never did, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0018505

"We moved from Austin for a small-town life, but my children weren't exposed to the drug culture until we came here," said Risvold, 43. The city officials sat in a semi-circle in front of her. Risvold looked hard at one who, when she had told him about the drug dealing, had merely asked if she was sure.

"I hope you can sleep at night," Risvold said, her voice quaking with anger.

Mayor John Whitsell, 30, has brushed off suggestions that Troup had turned a blind eye. If there was talk of wrongdoing, it was rumor, and "in any small town, you're going to have rumors," he said.

Whitsell said he had no idea there might be a problem with the police until he got a call from authorities about the arrests. "I was shocked," he said.

It took one of the department's own to call attention to the alleged corruption. In January, patrolman Justin Johnson told a Smith County sheriff's investigator that Kennedy and Turner were accepting money or drugs in exchange for covering up crimes. Before long, Johnson was wearing a recorder and talking to Turner about taking drugs from an evidence box for personal use.

Authorities searching the station after it closed found a department in disarray, Lusk said. Drugs were lying in open bags or had not been tagged; some evidence bags were empty; rape kits were stored in a refrigerator next to rancid, moldy food. As the investigation continues, more charges and arrests will come, Bingham said.

Since the FBI raid, Bingham said, the district attorney's office has fielded dozens of calls from citizens complaining of crimes they said were poorly, or never, investigated by Troup police. "People feel like they can come out and tell us things now," Bingham said.

Troup bills itself as the "good neighbor town." It has 1,949 residents, one medical doctor and 12 churches. Its main street is a study in shuttered stores, but the businesses that seem to sustain small Texas towns hang on: a beauty parlor, a video store, a tanning salon. Outside of town are oil pumps operated by heavy-booted riggers, who stomp into eateries and leave behind trails of red dirt.

Robin Bradford works on the production line at a plastics factory, cleaning just-made buckets as they roll down a conveyor belt. In December, she said, someone stole her furniture and a lifetime of possessions from a rented storage room. The thief took an urn that held her father's ashes but left a large painting of Jesus.

"It seemed that all Mark and Chester did was take fingerprints. The more I thought about it, the more upset I got," Bradford said, stabbing a piece of fried catfish with her fork.

But some in the diner where Bradford was eating defended the officers as caring professionals who often performed acts of kindness.

Kennedy had the city turn on Rodney Colbert's water when he was new to town and waiting for his first paycheck, Colbert said.

Anita Watson said Kennedy sometimes picked up children at school in his patrol car when parents couldn't get off work.

"The children trust him," Watson said. "That says a lot about what kind of person he is. I'm worried about how the children will feel."

Bradford looked up from her plate. "I'm worried about the children too, what kind of example he's setting for them," she said.

If Kennedy is found guilty, waitress Lisa Duley said, she won't hold a grudge. "Even if he did it, he's still Chester. Everybody makes mistakes. You deal with them and move on," she said.

Town leaders are focusing on cleaning up the mess and restoring Troup's reputation. The three remaining police officers have been transferred to the public works department. County constables and sheriff's deputies are temporarily filling the void, patrolling the town with vigilance.

"This is the most Sheriff Department cars I've ever seen, and I've been living in the same spot for 45 years," one woman said.

Though relieved that change is coming, Risvold hates that Troup's problems have been so publicly exposed. She's protective of the place where she raised four children, where her friends and memories reside.

"You want people to see the good in it, not the bad," she said. This is my home…. But I think it'll take a long time to trust the police again."

DOJ_NMG_0018506

Killing In Texas Spotlights Attacks On Social Workers (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

AUSTIN, Tex., March 19 (AP) — In six years as a social worker with the state's Child Protective Services, Holly Jones has been cursed, chased by dogs and run out of houses by angry parents.

Threats are a daily part of the job for caseworkers who investigate accusations of child abuse and neglect and often remove children from their homes. But the killing of a social worker in South Texas last week has prompted Ms. Jones and her colleagues to re-evaluate the steps they take to keep safe and has raised questions about what the state can do to better protect them.

"We don't have weapons, we don't have training in self-defense, we didn't go through a police academy and we're dealing with the same people they are," Ms. Jones said.

The social worker who was killed last week, Sally Blackwell, 53, was found in a field in Victoria on Wednesday. Her family said she had received threats in her position as program director, overseeing several offices of caseworkers. The authorities have ruled the case a homicide but have not said whether her death was related to her job.

The killing comes a year after a woman fired a shotgun at two caseworkers who had come to her home near Alice, about 45 miles west of Corpus Christi, to investigate a child abuse complaint. The caseworkers fled. The woman was convicted in December of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon.

Ms. Jones, 28, who recently became a supervisor for a Child Protective Services unit in suburban Austin, said caseworkers needed to know how to protect themselves.

A study released last week by the National Association of Social Workers found that 55 percent of 5,000 licensed social workers surveyed said they faced safety issues on the job. Sixty-eight percent of them said their employers had not adequately addressed their concerns. A survey in 2002 of 800 workers found 19 percent had been victims of violence and 63 percent had been threatened.

As the investigation into Ms. Blackwell's death continues, state protective services officials are thinking about ways to make the job safer, the Family and Protective Services commissioner, Carey Cockerell, said in an e-mail message to employees on Thursday.

Currently, social workers in Texas receive a half day of safety training, and the issue frequently comes up in a 12-week course, said a spokesman, Chris Van Deusen.

The child services department has no way of tracking how many threats its roughly 3,000 caseworkers receive, said Patrick Crimmins, spokesman for the Department of Family and Protective Services. But even people who have spent their entire careers with the agency can remember only a few instances in which threats escalated to violence, Mr. Crimmins said.

In 2001, Michigan lawmakers toughened the penalties for people who threaten or attack social workers after a child welfare caseworker was beaten, bound, gagged and suffocated while checking on a family. The law also required safety training for workers who make home visits.

The death of a Kansas mental health social worker prompted Representative Dennis Moore, Democrat of Kansas, to introduce a resolution last fall that would encourage state and local agencies to improve the safety of social workers. The resolution is pending.

Victim's Kin Denounce Shooting By Md. Deputy (WP)

By Christian Davenport

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

A 22-year-old Oxon Hill man fatally shot by a Charles County sheriff's deputy Saturday morning had drawn a handgun and fired it while three deputies were trying to arrest him on a drunken driving charge, the sheriff's office said yesterday.

Friends and relatives of the suspect, Jonathon Lyles, offered a starkly different view. They questioned whether Lyles had a gun and said officers targeted him because he was a young African American man who had had previous run-ins with police.

DOJ_NMG_0018507

Sharonda Lyles, 28, of La Plata said her brother would not pull a gun on an officer. "I don't know why the police sought out to kill my brother," she said.

The sheriff's office said Lyles was shot about 7:30 a.m. after Officer James Thompson spotted his car, which had backed over a curb and nearly hit an apartment building in the 600 block of Zekiah Run Road in La Plata.

Authorities said Lyles was slumped over the steering wheel of the vehicle, which was still running, and Thompson called for backup. When two other officers arrived, they interviewed Lyles and gave him field sobriety tests, which Lyles failed, officials said.

As the deputies tried to arrest him and place him in handcuffs, Lyles fought back, drew a semiautomatic handgun and fired a shot that missed the officers, officials said.

They said Officer Clint Walter, a four-year member of the sheriff's office, fired back, hitting Lyles in the chest with a single shot. Lyles was taken to Prince George's Hospital Center, where he was pronounced dead.

Sheriff's officials said they recovered the handgun Lyles had fired, and they denied that race played a part in the shooting.

"The man had a gun. He fired on a police officer, and the police officer returned fire," Capt. Joe Montminy said. Race "has nothing to do with it. . . . [The officers] were struggling for their lives."

The officer who initially spotted Lyles's car, Thompson, is African American, said Kristen Timko, a spokeswoman for the sheriff's office. Walter and Officer Jonathan Rager, who responded to assist in the arrest, are white, she said.

All three have been placed on routine administrative leave pending an investigation.

John Bowlin, 22, of Largo, who is Lyles's half-brother, said the authorities' version of events does not make sense. He wondered why the deputies did not immediately check whether Lyles had a gun, before the sobriety tests.

Timko said suspects may or may not be patted down for weapons, depending on the circumstances.

Lyles's friends and family members gathered yesterday at the scene of the shooting, where a shrine of candles and flowers had been created.

Sharonda Lyles said her brother had served time in prison for drug offenses and violating parole and had been pursuing a career in music since his release in November.

"He was trying to get his life together, and they kill him," said friend Michael Jones, 24, of La Plata.

Lyles worked at a mall music store selling CDs and T-shirts and was working on a rap album, his sister said. She said he was tall and plain-spoken. "He would do anything for you," she said. "He was all that. He was my little brother."

She and several of Lyles's friends, who had gone to the scene Saturday morning after word of the shooting spread, said Lyles was left lying on his back for about an hour without medical care before an ambulance came.

Timko disputed that, saying the officers immediately called for an ambulance, which arrived 3 1/2 minutes later. Once the paramedics assessed the situation, they called for a helicopter, which arrived at a nearby fire station at 7:59 a.m., about 30 minutes after the shooting, Timko said.

Quest To Heal Leads Abuse Victim To Face Old Demons (WP)

By Caryle Murphy

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

On a balmy, hint-of-spring day last week, Michael Donovan drove his rented car slowly past Holy Name School in Northeast Washington, where a billboard read, "He who angers you, controls you."

The 63-year-old Vietnam veteran and retired businessman from California was on a mission into his past, a mission to banish his own anger and regain control. A mission of healing.

Almost 50 years ago, during Donovan's eighth-grade spring break, he was sexually abused at Holy Name by Thomas S. Schaefer, then a 30-year-old, newly minted Roman Catholic priest.

Schaefer went on to molest at least 20 more boys in the Washington Archdiocese, according to church officials, before pleading guilty in 1995 in five of those cases. Only one other priest in the archdiocese, Robert J. Petrella, had more known victims, officials said. About 25 people have reported being molested by Petrella. The two priests were responsible for more than a third of the 123 reports of sexual abuse by clergy in the archdiocese's 59-year history.

For decades, Donovan kept quiet about his traumatic experience, confiding only in his current wife. But in 2003, determined to be counted in a national survey of the church's abuse problem, he informed the archdiocese of Schaefer's 1956 misconduct. He learned then that he was Schaefer's earliest known victim.

"It took me 47 years to raise my hand," Donovan said. "These are things that get buried in people's lives. But they don't forget it."

Donovan, who served with the 101st Airborne in Vietnam, recalled that the priests who took his initial calls apologized immediately, which "was really heartfelt by me. Nobody had ever apologized to me for what happened."

He decided that he needed to do two things to "face the dragon I need to face." One was to meet Schaefer. The other was to visit the room at his old school where the abuse occurred.

Psychologists and victims' advocates say it is common for survivors of child sexual abuse to want to meet their abusers, partly because the once-powerless child becomes the empowered adult controlling the encounter.

Gary Schoener, a Minneapolis psychologist whose clinic has treated more than 4,000 people abused by professionals, including teachers, doctors, psychiatrists and clergy, said that "at least half of child abuse victims want to physically see or visit with the offender. . . . They feel that any kind of clarity about why those things happened can help healing."

Donovan asked the archdiocese to pay for him and his wife to travel to see Schaefer. In June 2004, the archdiocese sent him a check for $3,000. It has also paid for his psychological counseling, Donovan said.

Donovan has retained a lawyer who is negotiating with the archdiocese for a financial settlement.

After his 1995 conviction, Schaefer was sentenced to 16 years in prison by Prince George's County Circuit Court Judge William B. Spellbring Jr. But after Schaefer had served less than five months, the judge suspended the rest of the sentence and released him to a facility for priests with psychological problems.

Now 80, Schaefer lives in Vianney Renewal Center in Dittmer, Mo., about 30 miles from St. Louis. Run by the Servants of the Paraclete, a religious order of men, the center is a community for priests who cannot engage in active ministry "for personal, health-related, psychological, social or canonical reasons," according to its Web site.

He is not allowed to leave the community unsupervised, Washington Archdiocese spokeswoman Susan Gibbs said, adding that "the archdiocese pays to keep him in that facility.

"He's asked several times to return to Washington. . . . He'd like to die here," Gibbs said. "And we have declined because we want to ensure that he never returns to this community where he harmed children." Schaefer is not receiving a church pension, she said.

Schaefer did not respond to a message left with a Vianney official seeking comment.

Donovan and his wife, Sharon, met Schaefer in St. Louis. A psychologist treating Schaefer was also present, Donovan said.

Schaefer, who is tall, thin and balding, was aloof, the couple said in separate interviews. "We were expecting to find a feeble, old man in poor health," said Sharon Donovan. "He seemed to be a vigorous . . . quite a dapper man. Well-dressed, well-groomed, urbane, quite distant, quite cavalier about the whole thing."

Schaefer did not admit doing anything wrong with Donovan, both said. But Sharon Donovan said he told her husband, "I'm sorry for anything I might have done to hurt you."

Donovan recalled that Schaefer "said that he had found his peace with God and that God had forgiven him."

Their meeting also included this: "He had no recollection of me," Donovan said. "Zero."

Initially, Donovan said he felt "elation" that he had "conducted myself as a gentleman. . . . I came away feeling empowered. But a few weeks later, it hit me like a ton of bricks," and he sought professional help for an emotional breakdown.

What Schaefer could not recall, Donovan could not forget.

The pale, redheaded priest at Holy Name favored him, Donovan said, often taking him out of class to spend time together because, as Schaefer told the nuns, he thought Donovan might have a vocation to be a priest.

Schaefer also knew Donovan's love of wrestling, and during spring break in 1956, when no one else was in the school, he suggested that they wrestle. But the priest showed up saying that he had forgotten his wrestling gear and asked whether they could wrestle "Greco-Roman style," or nude, Donovan said. "I gave no thought to the impropriety of it," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0018509

As they wrestled for the next three-quarters of an hour, Schaefer got increasingly excited and aggressive, finally attempting to sodomize him, Donovan recalled. "At the very end, I was fighting someone who was trying to rape me," he said.

He said he struck the priest with an open-handed slap across the face. "I expected a lightning bolt from God because I'd hit a priest, but he immediately stopped and whimpered," Donovan said.

The building where he attended eighth grade is now a day care and parish activity center. On his visit, he quickly found the musty auditorium where he played a munchkin in the "Wizard of Oz" and the old basketball court "where I proved what a terrible basketball player I was."

But the low-ceilinged room, with its dusty wrestling mats, that he had come to see was not there. A layer of concrete covers the brick wall where, as Donovan recalls, there used to be a door to the room where he was molested.

He said he was not disappointed.

"I feel very good about being here. . . . It completes what I had to do. I've got what I needed out of it," he said. "There were many good days here. There was only one bad."

When Words Bear Witness (NYT)

By Michael Rips And Amy Lester

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

THE Supreme Court is scheduled to hear oral arguments today in two cases that may make domestic violence cases all but impossible to prosecute. The cases, Davis v. Washington and Hammon v. Indiana, raise the question of whether statements made to 911 operators can be admitted in prosecutions if those who made the calls refuse to appear in court. Such evidence has become crucial in bringing domestic abusers to justice.

Domestic violence accounts for up to 34 percent of all reported violent crimes, but it is notoriously difficult to prosecute, because victims frequently drop charges or refuse to testify when their abusers threaten them with further violence. In the 1980's and 1990's, the refusal of victims to cooperate in the prosecution of their batterers may have resulted in the dismissal of as many as 70 percent of all domestic violence cases.

In recent years, however, prosecutors, police officers and advocates for domestic violence victims have developed techniques, together known as "evidence-based prosecution," that focus on the use of reliable evidence, like 911 tapes, to build cases that do not depend on the cooperation of the victim. In San Diego, the City Attorney's domestic violence unit uses evidence-based prosecution, and it obtains convictions in about 88 percent of its cases. In a typical six month period in the old days, the unit's conviction rate was just 12 percent.

But evidence-based prosecution suffered a major setback in 2004. That year, in Crawford v. Washington, the Supreme Court held that if witness statements were "testimonial" in nature, they could not be introduced unless the witness was available for cross-examination by the defendant. The court deferred the question of exactly what types of statements should be considered "testimonial." That is the matter at the heart of the two cases now before the court.

A significant number of courts have interpreted Crawford to bar the use of 911 tapes and answers to questions posed by police officers unless the witness is available for cross-examination. In so doing, they've overturned convictions in cases of domestic battery. In a survey of more than 60 prosecutors in California, Oregon and Washington, 63 percent said that Crawford hampered the prosecution of domestic violence; 76 percent reported that they'd grown more likely to drop domestic violence charges when they encountered uncooperative witnesses; and 65 percent said that Crawford had made domestic violence victims less safe than they were before. Reports from other jurisdictions echo these findings.

If the Supreme Court, in deciding Davis and Hammon, adopts a definition of "testimonial" that includes statements made by victims to 911 operators or to officers arriving at the scene of the abuse, prosecutors will face some undesirable options in domestic violence cases. They can refuse to bring cases in which the victim won't testify; or they can try to force the victim to testify. The latter is no solution because it would entail subjecting abuse victims to state-imposed sanctions, including jail time.

This is why, in answering the question left open by Crawford, the court should not define "testimonial" in a way that restricts the use of out-of-court statements made by victims to 911 operators or police officers at the scene of the crime. Without access to such evidence, the criminal justice system may be rendered virtually incapable of protecting victims of domestic violence and of holding their batterers accountable.

DOJ_NMG_0018510

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Grants Google A Reprieve (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

A federal judge ruled Google Inc. doesn't have to turn over data about consumer Web-search queries to the Justice Department.

U.S. District Judge James Ware on Friday ordered Google to work with the government to provide 50,000 randomly selected addresses for Web sites from its databases. He denied a request by government lawyers for a sampling of 5,000 search queries entered by Google users, concluding that they essentially duplicated information the government could glean from the Web addresses.

Judge Ware also said that turning over the queries potentially could cost Google the trust of some users, and he expressed concern about whether releasing "search queries themselves may constitute potentially sensitive information."

The Justice Department requested the information from Google last year to defend the Child Online Protection Act, a federal law intended to shield minors from sexually explicit materials on the Internet. Enforcement of the law has been blocked in the courts.

"This is a clear victory for our users," Google said in a statement Friday. A Justice Department spokesman couldn't be reached.

Some legal experts said future government requests could meet with more success.

"The next time the government comes calling, it will pile so much more on its side of the scale -- a better explanation of its need and a more compelling set of facts -- that the court will have no choice but to compel Google to turn over search queries," said Paul Ohm, a former Justice Department lawyer and associate professor at the University of Colorado School of Law.

Tobacco Lounge Blows Smoke In The Face Of Chicago's New Ban (WP)

By Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

CHICAGO -- Glasses clink, friends chat in plush chairs and a fire crackles in a stone hearth at Marshall McGearty Tobacco Artisans, a "tobacco lounge" that has opened in Chicago's trendy Wicker Park neighborhood.

It appears every bit the bar or coffeehouse. But appearances can be deceiving: Marshall McGearty is technically a tobacco retail shop with at least 65 percent of its sales in tobacco.

And that means it is exempt from Chicago's new ban on smoking in bars, restaurants and other public places.

Many patrons on a recent evening were enjoying the lush atmosphere and freedom, they said, from dirty looks from nonsmokers.

But critics say the parent company of the lounge, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., is taking advantage of a loophole in the city's anti-smoking ordinance.

"It's just another example of tobacco companies skirting the law," said Kevin Tynan, marketing director for the American Lung Association of Metropolitan Chicago.

Last month, city Alderman Edward M. Burke introduced an ordinance to close the loophole in the smoking ban, stating that venues that serve food and drink cannot be classified as tobacco retail stores.

Burke's ordinance charges that "tobacco lounges have attempted to circumvent the power and purpose" of the smoking ban, which currently affects restaurants, music venues and other public places; bars and taverns have until 2008 to comply.

Though Marshall McGearty opened the same week in January that the Chicago City Council passed the anti-smoking ordinance, R.J. Reynolds said the timing is pure coincidence.

DOJ_NMG_0018511

"This has nothing to do with the smoking ban," said RJR Senior Marketing Director Brian Stebbins, noting that the company opposes the smoking ban.

He said the lounge is solely intended to promote the company's new high-market Marshall McGearty brand of hand-rolled, small batch cigarettes with tobacco from Zimbabwe, Brazil and North Carolina. Stebbins noted that upscale cigar stores frequently have a few chairs and a television, and offer beverages such as Scotch or coffee.

The cigarettes at Marshall McGearty, with names such as Aegeans, Muse and the Earl, are displayed in ornate boxes with descriptions that sound more like fine wines. Oriental Rose promises "smoke that is creamy, sweet and delicate, highlighted by floral notes."

Stebbins said the lounge is a first for R.J. Reynolds and the first of its kind in the country. A spokesperson for Philip Morris USA said the company has no such outlets. Both declined to say whether they anticipate more tobacco lounges in the future. But judging from the number of smoking bans around the country, it is possible companies will see the lounges as a way to promote their brands while providing a hangout for smokers otherwise denied by bans.

"We certainly expect them to try to put these in other cities with bans," said Annie Tegen, program manager for the group Americans for Nonsmokers' Rights. "This is just another slimy trick by Big Tobacco to circumvent the system. An $8 pack of cigarettes still exudes the same toxins as a $4 pack. For the people of Chicago, this is an equal opportunity killer."

Sitting in the lounge, Clay Beardshear and Clay Achee said they had traveled along the West Coast for several months recently and had a hard time finding a place to have a cigarette with their beer or coffee, because most of the cities they visited had smoking bans.

When they arrived in Chicago and heard about Marshall McGearty, they made a beeline for it.

"This place will be booming," once the Chicago ordinance goes into full effect, predicted Achee as they played Scrabble and smoked.

A group of young women who meet at the lounge every Tuesday evening said they are tired of getting heat from nonsmokers and are happy to have a place to relax among their own.

"Just last night someone was saying I was blowing smoke in their face all night, though I wasn't aware of it," said Justine Hanchar, 28, a medical receptionist. "Anywhere you go, you get those vibes."

Sarah Nawrocki, 28, predicted the group will be there "every night" once the smoking ban goes into full effect.

Shannon Moore, a 24-year-old musician who said she enjoys the ambience created by smoke in the piano bars where she plays, said smoking has become "like an underground thing" because of bans and anti-smoking sentiment. "This is like a haven for us," she said.

There are about 6,000 municipalities nationwide with some type of smoke-free ordinance, and smoking is banned in all bars in the states of California, Connecticut, Washington, Delaware, Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Rhode Island and Vermont.

Tegen and other anti-smoking advocates said they think tobacco lounges ultimately will be unsuccessful in the face of growing opposition to smoking.

"I'd expect this business model to flop," Tegen said. "People in Chicago are excited about the smoke-free law. And many smokers I know in Chicago don't mind stepping outside for five minutes to smoke. I don't see them as a trend that will continue."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Oakland Nears Final Payouts For Protesters Hurt By Police (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

OAKLAND, Calif., March 19 — A clash between the police and antiwar protesters here nearly three years ago will cost the City of Oakland more than $2 million, including dozens of payouts to people injured when officers fired wooden dowels, bean bags and rubber pellets.

DOJ_NMG_0018512

The Oakland City Council is scheduled Tuesday to approve the final payments related to the incident, which was the most violent of many protests nationwide in the early weeks of the Iraq war. At least 58 people were injured, including nine longshoremen who were caught in the crossfire on their way to work.

The Oakland Police Department said officers had fired the "less than lethal" rounds to disperse several hundred demonstrators, some of whom the police said had thrown rocks at them.

The protesters said they had been behaving peacefully and accused the police of using excessive force. A lawsuit against the city, the Police Department and several officers, which led to the settlement payments, accused the authorities of civil rights violations.

Many here say the officers were on edge during the protest because state officials had warned that terrorists or self-described anarchists might try to disrupt the event, which was held at the Port of Oakland on April 7, 2003.

The demonstration had been organized to draw attention to two shipping companies that were assisting the government's military efforts. American President Lines was under contract to ship weapons to the military in Iraq, and Stevedoring Services of America held the government contract in 2003 to operate the port at Umm Qasr, Iraq.

In settling the lawsuit, the city did not admit fault, and there is still disagreement about whether the police were provoked by the protesters. Even so, the department did agree to change its crowd-control policy to prohibit the "indiscriminate use" of rubber and wooden bullets and similar ammunition and to require a fair warning to protesters to disperse.

"The settlements are a vindication," said Jim Chanin, one of the lawyers representing the protesters and dock workers. "The punishment did not fit the crime. It was not appropriate use of force."

Erica Harrold, a spokeswoman for the Oakland city attorney, John Russo, said the revision of the crowd-control policy was overdue, as were the clearer guidelines on the use of force.

"The most useful outcome of the case has been the revamping of the crowd-control and use-of-force policy," Ms. Harrold said, adding that the changes did not indicate an admission of wrongdoing.

The city has already paid more than $1 million to settle most of the claims. The payouts, from $5,000 to $500,000, cover medical costs associated with the injuries, which included broken bones and grapefruit-size welts and in some cases required operations and skin grafts.

Mr. Chanin estimated that the settlement would ultimately cost the city over $2 million, including $1.5 million in payments to the plaintiffs, plus legal fees and costs associated with the new crowd-control policy. That tally does not include the cost of hiring an outside lawyer to help with the case, which the city said would add well over $500,000.

Thirteen of the 52 plaintiffs had been holding out for a trial, in hopes of drawing attention to their complaints of free speech and civil rights violations, but in the end agreed to the settlement, Mr. Chanin said.

"We got the comprehensive crowd-control policy and every single person got money, with serious compensation for the most serious injured," Mr. Chanin said. "There was no need to put on a show trial for no reason."

The longshoremen's union, a plaintiff in the lawsuit, held a protest in Oakland this month and invoked the memory of the violence in 2003 to raise concerns about the Iraq war, terrorism, port security and the domestic spying program.

"Real port security means inspecting all containers offloaded," one of the injured longshoremen, Jack Heyman, wrote in an opinion article for The San Francisco Chronicle to coincide with the protest, "not stifling the free-speech rights of those who work in the ports."

Plight Deepens For Black Men, Studies Warn (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

BALTIMORE — Black men in the United States face a far more dire situation than is portrayed by common employment and education statistics, a flurry of new scholarly studies warn, and it has worsened in recent years even as an economic boom and a welfare overhaul have brought gains to black women and other groups.

DOJ_NMG_0018513

Focusing more closely than ever on the life patterns of young black men, the new studies, by experts at Columbia, Princeton, Harvard and other institutions, show that the huge pool of poorly educated black men are becoming ever more disconnected from the mainstream society, and to a far greater degree than comparable white or Hispanic men.

Especially in the country's inner cities, the studies show, finishing high school is the exception, legal work is scarcer than ever and prison is almost routine, with incarceration rates climbing for blacks even as urban crime rates have declined.

Although the problems afflicting poor black men have been known for decades, the new data paint a more extensive and sobering picture of the challenges they face.

"There's something very different happening with young black men, and it's something we can no longer ignore," said Ronald B. Mincy, professor of social work at Columbia University and editor of "Black Males Left Behind" (Urban Institute Press, 2006).

"Over the last two decades, the economy did great," Mr. Mincy said, "and low-skilled women, helped by public policy, latched onto it. But young black men were falling farther back."

Many of the new studies go beyond the traditional approaches to looking at the plight of black men, especially when it comes to determining the scope of joblessness. For example, official unemployment rates can be misleading because they do not include those not seeking work or incarcerated.

"If you look at the numbers, the 1990's was a bad decade for young black men, even though it had the best labor market in 30 years," said Harry J. Holzer, an economist at Georgetown University and co-author, with Peter Edelman and Paul Offner, of "Reconnecting Disadvantaged Young Men" (Urban Institute Press, 2006).

In response to the worsening situation for young black men, a growing number of programs are placing as much importance on teaching life skills — like parenting, conflict resolution and character building — as they are on teaching job skills.

These were among the recent findings:

¶The share of young black men without jobs has climbed relentlessly, with only a slight pause during the economic peak of the late 1990's. In 2000, 65 percent of black male high school dropouts in their 20's were jobless — that is, unable to find work, not seeking it or incarcerated. By 2004, the share had grown to 72 percent, compared with 34 percent of white and 19 percent of Hispanic dropouts. Even when high school graduates were included, half of black men in their 20's were jobless in 2004, up from 46 percent in 2000.

¶Incarceration rates climbed in the 1990's and reached historic highs in the past few years. In 1995, 16 percent of black men in their 20's who did not attend college were in jail or prison; by 2004, 21 percent were incarcerated. By their mid-30's, 6 in 10 black men who had dropped out of school had spent time in prison.

¶In the inner cities, more than half of all black men do not finish high school.

None of the litany of problems that young black men face was news to a group of men from the airless neighborhoods of Baltimore who recently described their experiences.

One of them, Curtis E. Brannon, told a story so commonplace it hardly bears notice here. He quit school in 10th grade to sell drugs, fathered four children with three mothers, and spent several stretches in jail for drug possession, parole violations and other crimes.

"I was with the street life, but now I feel like I've got to get myself together," Mr. Brannon said recently in the row-house flat he shares with his girlfriend and four children. "You get tired of incarceration."

Mr. Brannon, 28, said he planned to look for work, perhaps as a mover, and he noted optimistically that he had not been locked up in six months.

A group of men, including Mr. Brannon, gathered at the Center for Fathers, Families and Workforce Development, one of several private agencies trying to help men build character along with workplace skills.

The clients readily admit to their own bad choices but say they also fight a pervasive sense of hopelessness.

"It hurts to get that boot in the face all the time," said Steve Diggs, 34. "I've had a lot of charges but only a few convictions," he said of his criminal record.

Mr. Diggs is now trying to strike out on his own, developing a party space for rentals, but he needs help with business skills.

DOJ_NMG_0018514

"I don't understand," said William Baker, 47. "If a man wants to change, why won't society give him a chance to prove he's a changed person?" Mr. Baker has a lot of record to overcome, he admits, not least his recent 15-year stay in the state penitentiary for armed robbery.

Mr. Baker led a visitor down the Pennsylvania Avenue strip he wants to escape — past idlers, addicts and hustlers, storefront churches and fortresslike liquor stores — and described a life that seemed inevitable.

He sold marijuana for his parents, he said, left school in the sixth grade and later dealt heroin and cocaine. He was for decades addicted to heroin, he said, easily keeping the habit during three terms in prison. But during his last long stay, he also studied hard to get a G.E.D. and an associate's degree.

Now out for 18 months, Mr. Baker is living in a home for recovering drug addicts. He is working a $10-an-hour warehouse job while he ponders how to make a living from his real passion, drawing and graphic arts.

"I don't want to be a criminal at 50," Mr. Baker said.

According to census data, there are about five million black men ages 20 to 39 in the United States.

Terrible schools, absent parents, racism, the decline in blue collar jobs and a subculture that glorifies swagger over work have all been cited as causes of the deepening ruin of black youths. Scholars — and the young men themselves — agree that all of these issues must be addressed.

Joseph T. Jones, director of the fatherhood and work skills center here, puts the breakdown of families at the core.

"Many of these men grew up fatherless, and they never had good role models," said Mr. Jones, who overcame addiction and prison time. "No one around them knows how to navigate the mainstream society."

All the negative trends are associated with poor schooling, studies have shown, and progress has been slight in recent years. Federal data tend to understate dropout rates among the poor, in part because imprisoned youths are not counted.

Closer studies reveal that in inner cities across the country, more than half of all black men still do not finish high school, said Gary Orfield, an education expert at Harvard and editor of "Dropouts in America" (Harvard Education Press, 2004).

"We're pumping out boys with no honest alternative," Mr. Orfield said in an interview, "and of course their neighborhoods offer many other alternatives."

Dropout rates for Hispanic youths are as bad or worse but are not associated with nearly as much unemployment or crime, the data show.

With the shift from factory jobs, unskilled workers of all races have lost ground, but none more so than blacks. By 2004, 50 percent of black men in their 20's who lacked a college education were jobless, as were 72 percent of high school dropouts, according to data compiled by Bruce Western, a sociologist at Princeton and author of the forthcoming book "Punishment and Inequality in America" (Russell Sage Press). These are more than double the rates for white and Hispanic men.

Mr. Holzer of Georgetown and his co-authors cite two factors that have curbed black employment in particular.

First, the high rate of incarceration and attendant flood of former offenders into neighborhoods have become major impediments. Men with criminal records tend to be shunned by employers, and young blacks with clean records suffer by association, studies have found.

Arrests of black men climbed steeply during the crack epidemic of the 1980's, but since then the political shift toward harsher punishments, more than any trends in crime, has accounted for the continued growth in the prison population, Mr. Western said.

By their mid-30's, 30 percent of black men with no more than a high school education have served time in prison, and 60 percent of dropouts have, Mr. Western said.

Among black dropouts in their late 20's, more are in prison on a given day — 34 percent — than are working — 30 percent — according to an analysis of 2000 census data by Steven Raphael of the University of California, Berkeley.

The second special factor is related to an otherwise successful policy: the stricter enforcement of child support. Improved collection of money from absent fathers has been a pillar of welfare overhaul. But the system can leave young men feeling overwhelmed with debt and deter them from seeking legal work, since a large share of any earnings could be seized.

About half of all black men in their late 20's and early 30's who did not go to college are noncustodial fathers, according to Mr. Holzer. From the fathers' viewpoint, support obligations "amount to a tax on earnings," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0018515

Some fathers give up, while others find casual work. "The work is sporadic, not the kind that leads to advancement or provides unemployment insurance," Mr. Holzer said. "It's nothing like having a real job."

The recent studies identified a range of government programs and experiments, especially education and training efforts like the Job Corps, that had shown success and could be scaled up.

Scholars call for intensive new efforts to give children a better start, including support for parents and extra schooling for children.

They call for teaching skills to prisoners and helping them re-enter society more productively, and for less automatic incarceration of minor offenders.

In a society where higher education is vital to economic success, Mr. Mincy of Columbia said, programs to help more men enter and succeed in college may hold promise. But he lamented the dearth of policies and resources to aid single men.

"We spent $50 billion in efforts that produced the turnaround for poor women," Mr. Mincy said. "We are not even beginning to think about the men's problem on similar orders of magnitude."

A Moral Battleground, A Civil Discourse (USAT)

By Charles C. Haynes

USA Today, March 20, 2006

Tragically, public schools have become front lines in the culture war over homosexuality — and the biggest losers are the kids caught in the crossfire of incendiary rhetoric and bitter lawsuits.

In school districts across the nation, escalating conflicts involving sexual orientation in the curriculum, student clubs, speech codes and other areas of school life are undermining the educational mission of our schools. Media stories in the past two months alone have spotlighted bitter fights over these issues in Utah, Pennsylvania, Kansas, California, Idaho and Florida. Any notion of the public interest is often lost in the clash of world views across seemingly unbridgeable distances.

When people are this far apart, every act by one side is seen as a hostile move by the other. A "Day of Silence" to protest treatment of gays and lesbians is now followed by a "Day of Truth" to promote conservative religious views of homosexuality. A T-shirt proclaiming "Straight Pride" is worn to counter one professing "Gay Pride." These differences are deep and difficult to negotiate.

Can we do better? If we care about education — and the future of the nation — we must. That's why the First Amendment Center asked Wayne Jacobsen of BridgeBuilders, an organization that helps communities find common ground on religious issues, to help me create a road map for winning the peace in the fight over sexual orientation in schools. The drafting committee also included representatives from the Christian Educators Association International and the Gay, Lesbian and Straight Education Network, two groups with widely divergent views on homosexuality, but with a shared commitment to civil discourse.

It took eight months to hammer out a statement of principles we could all support. But finally, on March 9, we released "Public Schools and Sexual Orientation: A First Amendment framework for finding common ground." Two major educational organizations, the American Association of School Administrators and the Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development, have endorsed the document. The guide does not prescribe a particular outcome, but rather proposes a process for reaching an agreement that all sides can support. All of the sponsoring groups have agreed to disseminate the guidelines widely and encourage schools to address these issues proactively.

Fairness is a two-way street

For the process to work, school officials must be fair, honest brokers of a dialogue that involves all stakeholders. That means, first and foremost, that school leaders must refrain from choosing sides in the culture-war debate over homosexuality. If schools are going to find agreement on policies and practices that bring the community together, it won't be by taking a side and coercing others to accept it.

Consider the case a few years ago of Thomas McLaughlin, a junior high school student in Pulaski County, Ark. Thomas complained that because he refused to keep quiet about being gay, school officials harassed and punished him — forcing him at one point to read aloud Bible verses and prayers. After a lawsuit was filed, the school district settled by paying damages and apologizing to the student.

DOJ_NMG_0018516

On the other side of the spectrum, Betsy Hansen, a high school student in Ann Arbor, Mich., challenged her district in 2002 for censoring her religious views in opposition to homosexuality. During a "diversity week" program, school officials prevented Betsy from delivering a speech she was asked to give because they claimed her Roman Catholic views on homosexuality were "negative." Betsy also sued — and she won when a judge ruled that her free speech rights had been violated.

As the outcome of these cases makes clear, school officials can't impose one religious view of homosexuality, but neither can they censor the religious convictions of students.

First Amendment ground rules

To avoid divisive fights and lawsuits, educators and parents must agree on civic ground rules to ensure fairness for all sides. After all, public schools belong to everyone. However deeply we disagree about homosexuality, the vast majority of us want schools to uphold the rights of all students in a safe learning environment. It isn't possible for us to reach ideological or religious consensus, but it is possible — and necessary — to reach civic consensus on civil dialogue.

School districts divided about how to handle issues concerning sexual orientation should take a step back from the debate and find agreement on First Amendment principles. Most Americans can agree that freedom of religion and speech are inherent rights for all. Starting with an acknowledgement of inalienable rights immediately levels the playing field, helping to ensure that everyone has a right to speak — and everyone's claim of conscience is taken seriously.

More challenging, but still attainable, is an agreement that we all have a civic responsibility to guard the rights of others, including those with whom we disagree. And, finally, people must agree to debate one another without resorting to personal attacks, ridicule, false characterizations of opposing positions and similar tactics.

In the guide, we call this commitment to the principles of rights, responsibilities and respect "First Amendment ground rules." Using this framework, people with deep differences are able to come to the table ready to engage in constructive dialogue.

Finding common ground

With civic ground rules in place, school districts should consider creating a permanent "common ground task force" that fully represents the range of perspectives in the community. Given time and opportunity, people with opposing views learn to trust and respect one another. And that trust and respect can then translate into shared recommendations on safe schools, balanced curricula, appropriate student expression and other issues.

When they begin to listen to one another, most educators, parents and students discover that they want the same thing: public schools that are safe and free for all students. As we say in the guide: "A safe school is free of bullying and harassment. And a free school is safe for student speech even about issues that divide us." Once these shared goals are identified, people are ready to tackle other contentious issues such as gay student clubs and the treatment of sexual orientation in the curriculum.

Winning the peace isn't easy — it takes commitment and courage. But if people on all sides uphold the rights and responsibilities of the First Amendment, they can agree on policies and practices that serve the common good.

Charles C. Haynes is the co-author of Finding Common Ground: A Guide to Religious Liberty in Public Schoolsand senior scholar at the First Amendment Center in Arlington, Va.

ANTITRUST:

Zurich Financial Unit To Settle Bid-Rigging Case With 9 States (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Zurich American Insurance Co. agreed to pay $171.7 million in a settlement with nine states that have been investigating allegations of bid rigging in the commercial-insurance business.

DOJ_NMG_0018517

The company, a unit of Zurich Financial Services of Switzerland, will pay more than $150 million to reimburse policyholders and another $20 million will go to the states to cover investigative and other costs and as payments in lieu of penalties, according to the states.

"We can confirm that Zurich is finalizing agreements with certain state legal and regulatory authorities to resolve inquiries related to insurance business practices," Zurich said. The company said it will release "further details as soon as possible."

The agreement announced by several of the nine states is the latest development in the probes that authorities around the country have been conducting in recent years into insurance-industry practices.

In 2004, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer charged Marsh & McLennan Cos., a major insurance broker, with cheating corporate clients by rigging bids and collecting fees from insurance companies for directing business to them. Last year, without admitting wrongdoing, Marsh signed an $850 million settlement agreement with Mr. Spitzer's office.

Zurich admitted no wrongdoing as part of the settlement, said Mark Tobey, head of the antitrust and civil Medicaid-fraud division in the Texas attorney general's office.

"Going forward, companies like Zurich will be disclosing a lot more information," Mr. Tobey said. He described the company as "very cooperative."

Mr. Tobey said the policyholders involved included major companies, universities and local governments. The settlement is subject to court approval, and the court will determine which policyholders are reimbursed and how much.

Besides Texas, the states involved are California, Florida, Hawaii, Maryland, Massachusetts, Oregon, Pennsylvania and West Virginia.

Florida last week filed a civil lawsuit against Marsh making charges similar to those made by Mr. Spitzer's office. An attorney for Marsh has questioned that lawsuit's validity and said Florida's Department of Financial Services had signed a general release absolving the New York company.

Prudential PLC Rejects Aviva Bid As Big Insurance Battles Mount (WSJ)

By Charles Fleming And Michael Wang

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

LONDON -- In what is likely to prove the first round in a long-running takeover battle that could affect insurance markets world-wide, United Kingdom life insurer Prudential PLC Saturday rejected an unsolicited £17 billion ($29.87 billion) takeover proposal from larger rival Aviva PLC.

Prudential, which isn't related to Newark, N.J., insurer Prudential Financial Inc. but is active in the U.S. through its subsidiary Jackson National Life Insurance Co. of Lansing, Mich., said Saturday it had received a proposal from Aviva about a possible combination of the two London companies. In a statement, Prudential said it had rejected the proposal as not in the best interests of its shareholders. "The board confirms that it is not in discussions with any party and reaffirms its confidence in Prudential's future as an independent company."

An Aviva spokeswoman declined to comment on the proposal or on Aviva's next possible move. Statements by Aviva's chief executive, Richard Harvey, about his desire to find acquisitions that would allow the company to expand suggest Aviva won't throw in the towel easily.

People with knowledge of Aviva's overture said the initial proposal was an all-share offer that valued Prudential at about £17 billion, a 6.25% premium to the group's market value. They said Aviva's top managers were meeting to discuss how to proceed. Although Aviva might improve the proposed terms, Mr. Harvey is seen as unlikely to launch an overtly hostile bid. He has said a hostile bid is a "low probability" because unsolicited takeovers are seldom successful in the life-insurance industry.

The global insurance industry is expected to continue to see consolidation -- although how quickly remains unclear. The Wall Street Journal, citing people familiar with the matter, reported Friday that St. Paul Travelers Cos., of St. Paul, Minn., is in the preliminary stages of discussing a possible merger with Zurich Financial Services AG of Switzerland, although no deal may ultimately emerge. Yesterday, St. Paul Travelers said "recent media reports of its being in discussions regarding the possibility of a merger with Zurich Financial Services Group are not true." A spokesman for St. Paul declined to elaborate beyond the statement. A spokesman for Zurich Financial declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0018518

A combination of the two U.K. insurance heavyweights companies has been rumored for months. Prudential has consistently poured cold water on market speculation, and the group's chief executive, Mark Tucker, who took over in May last year, has stressed that he thinks Prudential should continue as an independent company under his management. A merger would allow the combined group to leapfrog, by market value, the continental European insurance competitors, such as AXA SA, of France, and Allianz AG Holding, of Germany.

Aviva's interest in Prudential primarily concerns the neat fit between the two group's overseas operations. While Aviva has concentrated on building its European business, Prudential has a strong U.S. presence through Jackson National Life, which sells life-insurance and savings products. Prudential has a strong presence in Asia, where it has been active since the 1920s and where it ranks as the largest European life insurer, with 8,700 workers in 12 countries, including China, India, Japan and South Korea.

Aviva, which sells life- and general-insurance policies, has a market capitalization of £20.2 billion. Prudential, which sells life-insurance and savings products, has a market capitalization of £16 billion. Prudential shares rose 7.1% to close Friday at 672 pence in London, while Aviva was up 2.8% to close at 850.50 pence.

This month, Aviva announced a 29% rise in 2005 operating profit at £2.9 billion. Prudential last week said its 2005 operating profit was up 33% to £1.7 billion.

U.K. Tallies Market Abuse (WSJ)

By Margot Patrick

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

LONDON -- The U.K. market regulator said it has found widespread signs of improper share-price moves before corporate takeovers are announced.

In an effort to assess the deterrent effects of its regulations, the Financial Services Authority studied 1,500 market announcements on takeover bids and company results in various time periods over the past eight years. The researchers found that price movements from nonpublic information may have taken place before 29% of the takeover announcements and before 22% of the trading updates.

The implementation of the Financial Services & Markets Act in 2001, which toughened sanctions for individuals caught insider trading as well as the disclosure requirements for companies, had no apparent change in market cleanliness.

The regulator said there was a small but statistically significant increase in informed price movements immediately following the conclusion of the first enforcement cases under the new rules, in 2004.

"The analysis shows that there was no improvement in market cleanliness in the period after the introduction of the FSA's new powers, and before any high-profile enforcement cases were concluded," said Hector Sants, the FSA's managing director.

"This suggests that visible enforcement action may be the key tool in our work to reduce market abuse," he said.

The FSA said that by developing its methods to assess the cleanliness of U.K. financial markets, it should over time be able to measure whether its regulatory efforts are working.

In its 2006 Financial Risk Outlook, the FSA said some firms are failing to comply with the European Union-wide market-abuse directive, which prohibits the use of nonpublic, price-sensitive information.

"Firms must ensure that they have procedures in place to identify transactions which they reasonably suspect to be abuse, and make suspicious-transaction reports to us as appropriate," the regulator said.

It said it was reviewing trading and market behavior at institutions including investment banks and hedge funds to find potential cases of market abuse.

Roche, Amgen Engaged In 'Arms Race' On Patent Law (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

A furious lobbying effort between F. Hoffmann-La Roche and Amgen Inc. has fueled big spending on K Street and led to both drugmakers hiring heavy-hitting firms and high-profile former government officials.

DOJ_NMG_0018519

Roche is pushing for a patent-law change that lobbyists close to the debate say could make it possible for the Swiss-based company to get approval and eventually market in the United States a competing product to Amgen's renal disease treatment, Epogen.

Initially, Roche pursued a more secretive strategy, as Roll Call first reported in November. At that time, Roche quietly sought a rider on an appropriations bill that would have changed five words and two commas — the seemingly innocuous "for purposes of this title" — in U.S. patent laws.

Since then the level of rancor has only grown between the two companies. And lobbyists familiar with both sides' strategies now agree that the battle will have much wider implications on patent policy.

According to numerous sources, Roche has tapped a bipartisan team that includes Mickey Kantor, the former U.S. trade representative and Commerce secretary under former President Bill Clinton, and Ted Olson, the former U.S. solicitor general in the current Bush administration. Olson, a partner with Gibson Dunn & Crutcher did not return a call seeking comment. Kantor, who is with the firm Mayer Brown Rowe & Maw, confirmed that he and Olson were handling patent matters for Roche. Roche also has retained the Federalist Group, long a Republican powerhouse that recently went bipartisan.

For its part, Amgen upped its lobbying spending during the last six months of 2005, after the biotech firm became aware of Roche's quiet lobbying push. Between the first and second halves of 2005, Amgen spending rose by $1 million, from $2.4 million to $3.3 million, according to public filings.

And recently, Amgen has signed two patent experts from the firm Drinker Biddle & Reath: Michael Remington, an intellectual property specialist, and Chris Katopis, former director of Congressional affairs for the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office and a one-time aide to House Judiciary Chairman Jim Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.).

"I've never seen an arms race like this in terms of the hiring of consultants," said one lobbyist familiar with the issue.

Amgen's side, lobbyists say, wants to maintain current precedent set by the International Trade Commission. The ITC can stop products that infringe on U.S. patent holders from coming into the country. And the lobbyists on Amgen's side say Roche's proposed change could end up undermining the ITC's ability to do that.

"If you cannot infringe a U.S. process patent in Indiana, you should not be able to move manufacturing to India and then bring the infringing product back into the U.S.," said one lobbyist familiar with Amgen's side.

A statement from Daniel Whelan, an Amgen spokesman, said, "We believe that a strong patent system is essential to protect American jobs. We are on record as strongly opposing measures that would jeopardize the interests of patients, threaten innovation, or hurt American jobs."

Roche's side, however, argues that the change would help the ITC interpret the original intent of the patent law at issue and would simply harmonize how federal courts and the ITC treat process patents.

(Amgen is currently suing Roche for patent infringement in U.S. District Court in Boston.)

Shelley Rosenstock, a spokeswoman for Roche, said her company is restricted about what it can say on the issue because of the pending lawsuit.

In an e-mailed comment, she said: "As I understand it, the issues before Congress at this time are broad policy issues that pertain to legal forum shopping, statutory interpretation and patent law standards. Roche believes consumers would benefit if Congress would eliminate forum shopping and duplicative litigation from the patent code."

Lobbyists familiar with Amgen said they expect Roche to try to get the policy change through regular order such as hearings, markups and perhaps as a free-standing bill, or as a part of broader patent reform.

And although no lobbyists involved in the debate said Roche is still looking for an appropriations vehicle to the make the change, Sensenbrenner and Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) sent a recent letter to House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) warning him that such an effort could be afoot.

The letter said, "We respectfully ask that you decline any request to include changes" to the patent laws Roche is seeking "in any appropriations bill." The letter did not mention the company by name.

The letter adds that, "A proposal has been circulated that would limit the authority of the International Trade Commission (ITC) to enforce the rights of U.S. process patent holders against infringing foreign products made abroad."

Lobbyists familiar with both sides said the letter tracked Amgen's point of view almost perfectly.

Jeff Lungren, spokesman for the House Judiciary Committee, said Sensenbrenner routinely sends such letters to colleagues.

"This is more of a jurisdiction process letter, letting the Appropriations Committee know that we'd be opposed to that," Lungren said. "We had heard rumblings about maybe some type of effort to put patent provisions in an appropriations bill, and they just wanted to make sure that didn't happen."

Justices Reach Out To Consider Patent Case (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

For the first time in a quarter-century, the Supreme Court will hear on Tuesday a case involving the basic question of what type of discoveries and inventions can be patented.

Both sides say the case, which involves a blood test for a vitamin deficiency, could have a wide-ranging impact on the development of diagnostics, perhaps threatening many of the underlying patents for genetic and other medical tests.

But the array of companies filing supporting briefs — including American Express, Bear Stearns and I.B.M. — indicates that intellectual property in other fields might also be affected.

Some patent specialists say they think the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case, against the advice of the United States solicitor general, to rein in patenting.

"The Supreme Court reached out and grabbed this case," said Edward R. Reines, a patent attorney at Weil, Gotshal & Manges who is not involved in the case. "These circumstances suggest that some members of the court believe there are too many patents in areas where there should be none."

At issue is whether relationships between a substance in the human body and a disease — for example, the familiar association between high cholesterol and a higher risk of heart attacks — can be the basis of a patent, or whether such relationships are unpatentable natural phenomena.

This case, LabCorp v. Metabolite Laboratories, stems from a 1990 patent awarded to scientists at the University of Colorado and Columbia University. They found that a high level in the blood of homocysteine, an amino acid, indicated a deficiency of either vitamin B12 or another B vitamin called folic acid.

Much of the patent describes a specific way to measure homocysteine, and those claims are not at issue. But the 13th claim of the patent is more general: it covers a way of determining vitamin deficiency by first testing blood or urine for homocysteine by any means and then correlating elevated levels with a vitamin deficiency.

The patent is owned by Competitive Technologies, a publicly traded patent management firm in Fairfield, Conn., and licensed to Metabolite Laboratories, a tiny company based at the University of Colorado. LabCorp, one of the biggest clinical testing companies in the nation, with 2005 revenues of $3.3 billion, sublicensed the test from Metabolite.

At first, LabCorp, whose full name is Laboratory Corporation of America Holdings, tested for homocysteine using the specific method described in the patent and paid royalties to Metabolite and Competitive Technologies. But in 1998 it switched to a newer and faster test developed by Abbott Laboratories.

Metabolite and Competitive sued, charging LabCorp with violating Claim 13 of the patent. In 2001 a federal jury in Denver ruled against LabCorp, and the company was eventually ordered to pay $7.8 million in damages and attorneys' fees. The appeals court that handles patent cases affirmed the lower court decision in 2004.

In asking the Supreme Court to overturn the lower court decisions, LabCorp is arguing that Claim 13, because it does not specify how testing is to be done, patents nothing more than the natural relationship between homocysteine and vitamin B deficiencies, blocking other inventors from developing better tests.

"The present-day implications of such a holding are limitless — and dangerous," LabCorp wrote in its brief. "Anyone who discovers a new medical correlation could stifle medical treatment through a 'test plus correlate' claim."

But Metabolite and its allies argue that such correlations are the basis of diagnostics and that not allowing patents would stifle development of new tests. There are tests, for instance, that look at mutations in particular genes to predict a high risk of breast cancer or to predict which AIDS drugs will not work.

DOJ_NMG_0018521

"Hundreds, if not thousands, of patents would at once be called into question" if the ruling goes against Metabolite, said a brief jointly submitted by Perlegen Sciences, a company developing genetic tests, and Mohr Davidow Ventures, a venture capital firm that backs diagnostics companies.

Another question in the case is whether doctors could infringe the patent merely by looking at a test result for homocysteine and then thinking about vitamin deficiency. Indeed, the lower courts said LabCorp had not directly infringed but rather had induced doctors to infringe by performing the correlation.

Partly with that in mind, the American Medical Association, the American Heart Association and AARP have submitted briefs in support of LabCorp, arguing, in the words of the heart association, that the patent could have "devastating effects on patient health care."

Millions of homocysteine tests are done each year because high levels of the amino acid are associated with an increased risk of heart attack, stroke, birth defects and other diseases; people often take B vitamins to lower homocysteine and reduce the risk. (Clinical trial results announced last week, however, suggested that taking B vitamins did not prevent heart attacks.)

Court precedents have held that laws of nature, natural phenomena and abstract ideas cannot be patented. "Einstein could not patent his celebrated law that E = mc2; nor could Newton have patented the law of gravity," the Supreme Court wrote in a 1980 decision. '

But in a 1981 decision in Diamond v. Diehr — the last time the Supreme Court considered the issue — the court upheld a patent on a method of curing rubber that made use of a well-known equation governing chemical reactions. The court said that the equation was only part of a broader invention.

Glenn K. Beaton, an attorney for Metabolite, said that as in that 1981 case, "it's not the correlation itself that is patented here," but rather "the use of that correlation to determine B12 and folate deficiencies."

In recent years, controversial patents have been granted on software and on business methods, such as ways of managing investment portfolios or of allowing people to order merchandise on Amazon.com with one click of a mouse.

Bear Stearns, Lehman Brothers and the Computer and Communications Industry Association filed briefs urging the court to use the LabCorp case to restrict such business method patents, or at least not expand them. Other companies, including American Express and I.B.M., say the LabCorp case is not relevant to business method patents.

The solicitor general, in urging the court not to hear the case, said there was not enough of a record from the lower courts on the question of patenting natural phenomena. That is because LabCorp did not raise that argument in the lower courts, instead trying to get the claim invalidated on other grounds. If LabCorp wins the case in a way that weakens patents on diagnostic tests, it could be one of the bigger losers. The company, based in Burlington, N.C., is counting on high-priced, patented genetic tests to fuel its growth.

Bradford T. Smith, executive vice president for corporate affairs at LabCorp, disputed that. "We think this case can be decided very narrowly," without undermining other patents, many of which rely on more than just correlations, he said.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

For Interior, A Collaborative Conservative (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, March 20, 2006

ASHLAND, ORE. - Dirk Kempthorne, President Bush's nominee to the head the Interior Department, has both the experience and the record of collaboration that could help smooth the way in the often-contentious position.

As governor of Idaho, a former US senator, and mayor of Boise before that, Mr. Kempthorne is known to work in concert with those who don't agree with him. He believes that the level of government closest to a problem is the best place to find a solution. And though his environmental record - according to those who score such things - is a pale shade of green, he is not a fire-breathing ideologue likely to dismiss endangered species in the name of corporate ranching or a new highway.

"I've been dealing with this guy for years," says Rick Johnson, executive director of the Idaho Conservation League. "He's not overtly anti-environment. He is overtly states' rights."

DOJ_NMG_0018522

The West, for all its wide-open spaces where most of Interior's 500 million acres of responsibility lie, in fact is becoming the most urban region of the country. Cities like Boise, growing rapidly, are more conservation-minded than in the past, says Mr. Johnson. As a result, many newcomers to the West value environmental quality - something reflected in some of Kempthorne's policies.

Most national environmental groups blast the nominee as "an unabashed champion of the resource-extraction and development interests that profit most from public lands," as Philip Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust, put it. But Kempthorne has already won praise from some prominent Democrats. Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D), who chairs the Western Governors' Association, warmly congratulated him. Sen. Maria Cantwell (D) of Washington noted that Kempthorne had "stood up to the administration" over nuclear-waste cleanup at a federal facility in Idaho. He has many friends in the United States Senate, which is expected to confirm his nomination.

Still, the Bush administration and Kempthorne face battles over many issues: development in roadless forest areas; salvage logging of burned timber; the proposed sale of some federal land to lessen the federal budget deficit; changes to the Endangered Species Act; a huge backlog in national parks maintenance; oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and the Outer Continental Shelf; and protections for grizzly bears, wolves, and other recovering species.

As the likely new "landlord" over national parks and wilderness areas, water reclamation projects, and vast rangelands where cattle graze and new gas and oil wells have sprouted under Mr. Bush, Kempthorne will be in the thick of the fray.

National parks could be an especially difficult issue. The mammoth National Park Service, part of Interior, oversees 388 parks, monuments, battlefields, historic sites, lakeshores, scenic rivers, and trails. The number of park units has nearly doubled since 1970, and annual visits now total almost 300 million.

"One thing he did in Idaho was try to get more resources for parks," says Craig Obey, vice president of the National Parks Conservation Association. "Hopefully, he will try to carry that ahead nationally."

It's a big load to carry. The parks' maintenance backlog is between $4.5 billion and $9.7 billion, estimates the Congressional Research Service.

Meanwhile, the administration is trying to open some parks to more commercial activities, such as snowmobiling in Yellowstone. Its parks management plan, critics say, deemphasizes natural-resource protection in favor of commerce and recreation - which could increase traffic, air pollution, and other adverse impacts.

"That could be potentially devastating to the parks, depending on how it turns out," says Mr. Obey. The 500-member Coalition of National Park Service Retirees, too, has expressed concern. Last month, the watchdog group Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility sued the department for refusing to give details of industry lobbying efforts regarding national parks policies.

Utilities Offer Energy Dept. Site For Waste (New York Times)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 19 — A group of nuclear utilities that is planning to build a private nuclear waste dump on an Indian reservation in Utah has offered to sell space there to the federal government. The move could help the government avoid billions of dollars in potential legal damages over its failure to build its own repository.

This month the utilities, eight companies from around the country, won a license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to open a repository at Skull Valley, on land leased on a Goshute Indian reservation, about 60 miles west of Salt Lake City.

The utility consortium, called Private Fuel Storage, does not have the permits it needs to transport waste to the site, however, and the State of Utah is trying to block those.

The Energy Department signed contracts in the 1980's with each of the nuclear operators, promising to accept their spent fuel beginning in January 1998, in exchange for a payment of a tenth of a cent for each kilowatt-hour they generated.

The project now appears to be at least 20 years behind schedule, and the department faces approximately $50 billion in damage claims from the utilities, many of which have resorted to building giant casks adjacent to their reactors to store the old fuel.

DOJ_NMG_0018523

In a letter to the chairmen and the ranking minority members of the House and Senate Energy Committees, Private Fuel Storage said it could begin taking fuel within three years, at a cost of about $61 million a year. In the letter, which was sent in December but released last week, the company estimated the Energy Department's costs to maintain the fuel at the reactor sites at about $500 million a year.

The fuel is currently kept at 72 sites whose storage costs vary widely. At some sites, the reactors have been retired and torn down, and maintenance and security personnel remain in place simply for the fuel. At others, while construction of the casks was expensive, the cost to maintain them is small.

Of the eight utility partners, three have announced that they have no immediate need for off-site waste storage.

The consortium proposed either that the Energy Department take title to the fuel and pay for storage, or let the utilities continue to own the fuel but reimburse them for the storage costs. It suggested legislation to reassure Utah that even if the government's proposed repository, at Yucca Mountain in Nevada, never opened, the Goshute site would not become permanent.

Representative David L. Hobson, the Ohio Republican who is chairman of the energy and water subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, has been pushing for dry-cask storage, possibly as a prelude to chemical processing of the wastes to extract useful material before burial. And last month, the Bush administration endorsed such chemical processing, through a partnership. But the cask idea has not gone far with the Energy Committees.

"The view right now on Capitol Hill is that this is a free-market project, and let's see if the market sends business their way," said Marnie Funk, a spokeswoman for the Senate Energy Committee.

State-U.S. Revenue Sharing At Core Of Offshore Plans (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, March 20, 2006

Oil companies and U.S. industries have been aching for years to get at the billions of barrels of oil and trillions of cubic feet of natural gas sitting off the shores of the USA.

There have always been reasons to look elsewhere: cheaper energy overseas, governors demanding royalty payments, beachgoers opposed to the sight of derricks in the distance, environmental groups predicting ecological disaster.

However, the creators of a new campaign to drill up and down the coasts say the time is right to get it done. And they say they've come up with a way of doing it that has statehouses, U.S. industry and even some notable environmental groups on board.

“Never before has there been such a flurry of legislative activity on the issue,” says Adam Sharp, spokesman for Sen. Mary Landrieu of the Gulf Coast state of Louisiana.

The proposal is simple:

•States that open their territory to drilling will get a cut of the royalties that currently go 100% to the federal government.

•A specified chunk of royalties must be spent restoring coastlines.

Simple, and hard to resist.

Consumers are paying relatively high prices for energy. Polls show concern among the public about U.S. alliances with even friendly Arab countries, which control much of the world's oil. The White House is calling for new energy solutions. A top item on the agenda of environmental groups — restoring coastlines ravaged by human activity — will take big money.

“We hope this will be a front-burner story for the next couple of months,” says Kevin McCoy, vice president for energy resources policy at the National Association of Manufacturers.

Former Louisiana senator John Breaux is hoping to build interest.

Breaux is a lobbyist for the Washington firm Patton Boggs and is working on a volunteer basis for the state of Louisiana to give it a share of the royalties from oil and gas off its shores. He's working with a coalition of manufacturers, municipalities and energy companies to bring attention to the plan.

“We need that oil,” said Breaux, who is working with Shell Oil, among others. “In Louisiana, it would fund coastal restoration.”

DOJ_NMG_0018524

The Interior Department estimates there are 86 billion barrels of oil and 420 trillion cubic feet of gas yet to be discovered off U.S. shores. That's 11 times as much oil as the USA used in 2005 and 19 times as much gas, the U.S. Energy Information Agency says.

Major drilling off the outer continental shelf, which extends 3 miles to 200 miles from shore, is banned in all but a portion of the Gulf of Mexico.

Utilities say they have always coveted the deposits but found the political opposition too daunting. Bills filed in Congress during the 1990s went nowhere, largely because of budgetary issues.

Utilities are more optimistic this year given the drive to give states a cut of the action.

Revenue sharing "would provide, hopefully, economic incentives to the states to support … development of their offshore resources," says Richard Shelby, executive vice president for public affairs at the American Gas Association.

Congressional leaders also see a more hopeful scenario among a handful of competing bills.

"Things are different now," says Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., chairman of the House Resources Committee, who is looking at several new bills on revenue sharing.

"We're paying an all-time high for natural gas, an all-time high for oil," says Pombo, who expects a vote on the issue this spring. "States are beginning to look at this in terms of revenue and their own energy security. Those are things we have to balance. It's completely different than a few years ago. The stakes have changed."

Some coastal states are now on record as supportive of the idea.

Georgia's Department of Natural Resources supports a plan to lease the outer continental shelf for oil and gas. Connecticut's Department of Environmental Protection says it would like a share of any drilling in its region. The Virginia Legislature voted to urge its congressional representatives to support the idea.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco says she wants an end to a double standard for gas and oil drilled on land, the royalties from which are shared with the affected state. Thirty-five states received $1.7 billion in such royalties in 2005. Wyoming received the most: $878 million.

Much more money is at stake in offshore drilling.

Oil and gas leases in the portion of the Gulf where drilling is allowed brought in $5.7 billion for the federal government in 2005. Blanco wants states to get half of the royalties and says Louisiana should get 54% of that cut in the Gulf. Under that formula, Louisiana could receive as much as $1.5 billion a year for a state with an $18.5 billion annual budget.

Members of Congress from some states are not supportive of new drilling, however, and some have filed bills to ban it. Pombo expects differences to be worked out. "I have to compromise between states that want to produce and states that don't want any production near their shores," Pombo said.

Supporters think the stance of some environmental groups could help their cause.

For decades, such groups have lamented the degradation of the Louisiana coastline. Much of the damage was caused by channels cut through marshes for pipelines and for ships that ferry supplies to the derricks offshore.

To restore the coastline, miles of long-gone banks must be rebuilt with massive amounts of soil, then planted with cypress and marsh grass. That would take billions of dollars, and letting offshore drilling continue in order to get it is a choice some groups are willing to make.

"We think it's reasonable," says Susan Kaderka, director of the National Wildlife Federation's Gulf States Natural Resources Center.

The deal has caused a rift among the groups. Kaderka says her group only supports revenue sharing for a significant portion of the Gulf Coast. Other groups warn that it sets a bad precedent to ever support drilling and it could lead to much more of it.

"Once this happens, it's hard not to make other states expect to get a chunk of the change," says Lisa Speer, director of water and ocean policy at the Natural Resources Defense Council.

Marvin Odum, a Shell Oil executive vice president in charge of exploration in the Americas, is among those hoping other states do decide to join in. As for support from any environmental groups, Odum says, "That would be more voices on the idea that are favorable."

DOJ_NMG_0018525

Court Deals Blow To EPA's Relaxed Rule On Air Emissions (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, March 20, 2006

The US Environmental Protection Agency will probably have to go back to the drawing board now that a US appeals court has said aging power plants and other industrial sites must meet the same federal pollution standards as new plants.

Friday's decision represents a repudiation of EPA policy under the Bush administration, which sought to exempt plants that predated the 1970 Clean Air Act from compliance with the tougher air-emission standards. It was cheered by environmentalists - especially those who live and work near such power plants.

One, Lisa Graves Marcucci, a mother and clean-air activist who lives near Pittsburgh, says the ruling gives her hope that EPA investigations of nearby aging power plants, which the agency halted a few years ago, will resume.

"It's a huge victory for people like us because, when we see a ruling like this, it gives us hope that facts and figures and law will dictate a fair outcome rather than pressure from lobbyists," she says.

The ruling, however, is a setback for industries, which may now be required to install expensive new emissions-cutting equipment. It could also initiate endless reviews of their plants, they say.

"Today's decision ... is disappointing," said Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, in a statement. "What benefit comes from today's decision? Certainly none for the environment."

The ruling could prompt some big utility companies to upgrade pollution controls at the oldest, most polluting power plants, or shut them down.

"The language of the court's decision is very, very strong," says Eric Schaeffer of the Environmental Integrity Project, a New York environmental group. "The EPA's excuses, always pretty thin, have gone away. We now know this rule is going to go forward, and that these guys will have to get permits, and clean up their emissions."

Many older power plants had their sulfur-dioxide and nitrous oxide emission levels "grandfathered," or accommodated, under the Clean Air Act of 1970.

Under the EPA's "new source review" (NSR) rules, these plants weren't required to bolt on costly new air-pollution equipment in the 1970s. But NSR, as interpreted until about five years ago, subjected older plants to the more stringent contemporary pollution standards if their facilities were upgraded at any point and emissions increased.

The utility industry and the EPA under the Bush administration have argued that many plant modifications, including those that previously would have trigged NSR, did not bring about a review - even when higher emission levels were the result.

The US Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, in Washington, D.C., disagreed with the EPA. "The EPA's interpretation would produce a 'strange' ... result," the judges wrote. "A law intended to limit increases in air pollution would allow sources ... to increase significantly the pollution they emit without government review."

The EPA could appeal the decision to the US Supreme Court.

Since President Bush took office, the EPA has held a looser interpretation of NSR. In 2003 the agency withdrew from scores of NSR investigations and a number of court cases, and refused to press 20 such cases that had been recommended to the Justice Department for prosecution, Mr. Schaeffer says.

The Road To Nowhere (NYT)

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

It seems insane that the National Park Service would even think of spending $600 million on a road that few people want and nobody needs — especially when the service has barely enough money to keep up appearances. But that could happen unless the Interior Department musters the courage to resist Representative Charles Taylor of North Carolina.

Mr. Taylor, who says a new road would stimulate the local economy, runs the subcommittee that controls the Interior Department's budget. For that reason, neither the park service nor Interior's outgoing secretary, Gale Norton, has publicly criticized the idea. But there is more at stake here than pleasing one's paymaster. The road would not only blow a hole in the department's budget; it would also leave a scar on one of the most popular national parks.

DOJ_NMG_0018526

At issue is a 30-mile road proposed for the north side of Fontana Lake on the eastern edge of the Great Smoky Mountains National Park in North Carolina. The road was promised to the residents of Swain County in 1943 when the Tennessee Valley Authority built a major hydroelectric dam, creating the lake and flooding out an existing road. After a fitful start in the 1960's, the road was abandoned for environmental and budgetary reasons.

Those reasons still apply. The road, including three big bridges, each the length of the Brooklyn Bridge, would breach an unbroken tract of national forest, destroy wildlife habitat and poison hundreds of miles of streams. Its estimated cost of $604 million — up 40 percent from only a year ago — is three times the annual roads budget for the entire national park system, which is already suffering from a big repair backlog.

There is no pressing need for the project. Swain County has other roads. The road's opponents include Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, and Swain County's own commissioners. There is broad agreement that restitution of some sort is due the residents of the region, and that the spirit if not the letter of the original agreement should be honored. A cash settlement of $52 million has been proposed.

As Mr. Taylor has noted, this will not generate the jobs and income that the road project would. But it's fair, and it won't do lasting damage. Interior should endorse the settlement. The department's neutrality serves only to keep alive an idea that makes even less sense now than it did in 1943.

Eastern Law Firms Roll The Dice On Indian Law (LAW)

By Charles Toutant, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, March 20, 2006

Native American law, long a well-established practice area west of the Mississippi, is gaining ground at eastern law firms as tribes displaced in the 19th century seek to reclaim ancestral lands -- and make them instantly profitable.

After the successful land-claim settlement by the Mashantucket Pequot Tribe in Connecticut, which led to the opening of Foxwoods Resort Casino in 1992, and the Mohegan Tribe's acquisition of land in nearby Uncasville, Conn., for the Mohegan Sun Casino, other tribes have started bringing land-claim suits, and law firms are lining up to help them.

While tribes' finances are short and the odds of prevailing long, there are still legal fees to be generated. That's because there are casino developers willing to underwrite the tribes' legal costs on the chance that they'll obtain a new site for gaming, say Indian law experts.

"Part of what's going on these days in Indian country is there are certain forces that are trying to unearth potential claims that might be made to re-establish a tribal homeland and ultimately establish a casino," says Robert Odawi Porter, director of the Syracuse University Center for Indigenous Law, Governance and Citizenship.

In cases where land-claim suits are funded by outsiders, the tribe is usually a passive participant in the litigation, says Porter. Such arrangements are permitted under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act of 1988, which gives states authority to negotiate revenue-sharing agreements with tribal casinos.

"Everything is dictated by the developer -- I call it the 'sit back and take a check approach,'" Porter says.

But the process is arduous. Last June, the Shinnecock Indian Nation of Long Island filed a claim for 3,600 acres in the exclusive Hamptons resort area that it says belonged to its ancestors. The casino plan is opposed by New York's governor and senators, as well as by residents of the Hamptons. The tribe's costs are being underwritten by Michigan casino developers Marian Ilitch and Michael Malik. Ilitch, founder of the Little Caesars pizza chain, owns the Motor City casino in Detroit. She and Malik are also building an Indian casino in Barstow, Calif.

The Shinnecocks' lawyers are from Roseland's Lowenstein Sandler: Kurt Lenz and Nicomedes Herrera, both real estate practitioners, and Richard Ricci, an environmental lawyer. Lenz says he and his colleagues have been instructed not to answer press inquiries. He referred questions to the tribe's public relations consultant, who did not return a call.

NATIONAL FIRMS ON BOARD

Native American law is a well-established practice niche in the West, touching on subjects ranging from mineral and timber rights agreements to treaty enforcement, federal regulation and jurisdictional disputes between tribal security forces and non-Indian police.

DOJ_NMG_0018527

In the East, fewer lawyers have formed Indian-affairs practices because forced emigration of the 1800s has left few tribal groups.

But in 1987, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled, in California v. Cabazon Band of Mission Indians, 480 U.S. 202, that if a state allows any type of gambling for any purpose for any type of organization, a tribe can engage in that type of gambling on its reservations. Since then, with Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun as shining beacons, tribes have come to view casinos as a route to self-sufficiency -- and land claims have proliferated.

That helps explain why national firms such as Dorsey & Whitney of Minneapolis, and Hughes, Hubbard & Reed and Holland & Knight, both of New York, have been building up their Native American practice groups.

Holland & Knight's 23-lawyer group, which includes former U.S. Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell of Colorado, is headed by Jerome Levine, who joined the firm in 2000 after running an Indian law boutique in Los Angeles for 20 years. Levine says he moved his practice because his tribal clients required a Washington, D.C., presence and access to real estate and corporate finance experts that his small firm lacked.

Lawyers focused on Indian law are rare in New Jersey, where casino gambling is constitutionally limited to Atlantic City. But an exception is Michael & Carroll, for whom Native American clients constitute 50 percent of its work, says partner Guy Michael. The Atlantic City firm is counsel to the Chitimacha Tribe, which operates a successful casino in Louisiana, and Michael is general counsel to the tribe's gaming commission that his partner, Robert Carroll, chairs. Both Michael and Carroll worked in casino regulation as New Jersey deputy attorneys general and then helped develop Foxwoods in Connecticut.

Michael sees no end to the growth of Indian gaming places. "Everybody says we're going to reach the saturation point," he says, "and then more [Indian casinos] come on line and everybody goes to them."

HIGH HURDLES

Major impediments make it no easy task to win a land claim. Tribes must first have recognition from the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs as a sovereign nation. About 500 groups have earned such recognition, of which about 200 operate casinos, bingo halls or other gambling facilities, according to the National Indian Gaming Association.

But many more tribes lack official recognition, and the path toward such status can require expert analysis of a group's linguistics, culture and religion, says Hershel Kozlov of Wolf Block in Cherry Hill, N.J., who represents some Native American clients in his gaming practice.

Such proceedings are primarily administrative but can be contentious. Porter says that in the East primarily, intermarriage and assimilation make it more difficult to prove tribal integrity.

For example, the Ramapough Mountain People of New York and New Jersey were on the verge of BIA recognition when the Cabazon Band case came down and Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun went up. Atlantic City casino owners, Donald Trump among them, opposed recognition, aware that the Ramapough land was within an hour's drive from New York City. In 1994, the BIA denied recognition, saying the Ramapoughs' uncertain origins negated identity as a distinct community descended from an historic tribe.

Even tribes that have official recognition still have to prove they are the appropriate heirs of those who occupied the seized property. Land-claim cases usually cite violations of the Non-Intercourse Act of 1790, which required that sales of land by Indians to local or state governments had to be ratified by Congress. Many local officials continued to buy land from Indians in violation of that law, Kozlov says.

One such claim of an unauthorized transaction was filed in federal court in Camden in December. The Unalachtigo Band of the Nanticoke Lenni-Lenape Nation says its 3,000-acre homestead in Shamong Township was improperly purchased by Burlington County in 1801.

But the 108-member tribe has yet to find a lawyer. On Jan. 11, it filed a brief with U.S. Magistrate Judge Ann Marie Donio claiming indigence and seeking assigned counsel. In fact, it goes so far as to request Hughes Hubbard, which has brought such cases before.

The tribe has offered to settle its case in exchange for two 1,500-acre parcels of land -- one in Rancocas State Park in Burlington County and the other the Alpine Boy Scout Camp in Bergen County -- on which to build casinos, though the tribe has not held negotiations with casino developers, says tribal chairman James Thomas.

DOJ_NMG_0018528

Burlington County Solicitor Evan Crook said the county would fight the suit and had appointed Anthony Drollas Jr. of Trenton's Capehart & Scatchard as its outside counsel.

An earlier attempt by a tribe to establish an Indian casino in New Jersey fell flat in 1998. The Delaware Tribe of Western Oklahoma, which claims the New Jersey shore as its ancestral home, sought to buy a two-acre parking lot from Wildwood City for a casino. But the tribe pulled out of the project after Attorney General Peter Verniero filed suit to stop the transaction.

HOLDOUTS

Not all Indians embrace the development of casinos. Donald Daines, a land-use lawyer at Hill Wallack in Princeton, represents tribal dissidents pro bono in civil rights disputes.

In 2004, Daines represented an Oneida woman, Danielle Patterson, who was arrested and had her mobile home seized and demolished by tribal police because she refused to let it be inspected, in violation of a reservation ordinance.

At the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Daines argued that Patterson was persecuted because she opposed a pro-casino tribal administration, but the Northern District of New York dismissed the claim brought under the Indian Civil Rights Act, 25 U.S.C. 1301. The 2nd Circuit affirmed in Shenandoah v. Halbritter, 366 F.3d 89 (2004), and the Supreme Court denied certification.

"There are a lot of casino nations who are disenfranchising and removing those who oppose the casino," Daines says. "What you are seeing when you talk about the area of law related to casinos is the tip of the iceberg in Indian law."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Many N.Y. FBI Agents Have Neither E-mail, Internet-ready Phones (NYDN)

New York Daily News, March 20, 2006

NEW YORK _ It seems as if every Manhattan prep schooler has one, but many of New York's FBI agents are fighting crime and terrorists without an Internet-ready phone or even an e-mail account, the New York Daily News has learned.

Mark Mershon, the assistant director in charge of the FBI's 2,000-employee city office, blamed the technology gap on Washington budget constraints.

He said there's a cost attached to assigning an agent or analyst an e-mail address with the official domain name _ ic.fbi.gov.

"And as ridiculous as this might sound, we have real money issues right now, and the government is reluctant to give all agents and analysts dot-gov accounts," he said when asked about the gap at a News editorial board meeting.

"We just don't have the money, and that is an endless stream of complaints that come from the field."

Mershon also revealed that only about 100 agents in New York have BlackBerry devices, which allow users to send and receive e-mail and access the Internet from their phone.

And just a few weeks ago, the New York office was notified that funding for its BlackBerry pilot program _ designed to help the FBI better communicate with city, state and federal law enforcement _ was being cut.

"I, with the help of others, raised a stink," Mershon said, adding that BlackBerry funding has been restored.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., decried the penny-pinching.

"The FBI should have the tools it needs to fight terrorism and crime in the 21st century, most of all in New York City, and one of the most effective means of communications is e-mail and the Internet," he said. "FBI agents not having e-mail or Internet access is much too much a pre-9/11 mentality."

FBI officials in Washington, however, insisted that agents are not at a disadvantage because of cost-cutting.

Spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan said about half the FBI employees don't have official accounts because e-mail addresses are still being assigned.

By the end of the year, the entire bureau should have dot-gov mailboxes, she said.

As for the BlackBerry devices, she conceded funding for the pilot program was put in jeopardy because a lawsuit over the technology had threatened to make the machines obsolete.

DOJ_NMG_0018529

Now that the issue has been resolved, the FBI intends to keep the 100 wireless gadgets in the budget, though there are no plans to issue them to more agents.

Those who don't have them can use their regular cell phones, pagers and secure radios to communicate internally and with other agencies.

"BlackBerrys do cost money," she said. "It's the newest high-tech gadget, but it's not the only way to communicate."

Official: Some New York FBI Agents Don't Have E-mail Accounts (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, March 20, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) _ Budget constraints are forcing some local FBI agents to operate without e-mail accounts, according to the agency's top official in New York.

"As ridiculous as this might sound, we have real money issues right now, and the government is reluctant to give all agents and analysts dot-gov accounts," Mark Mershon said when asked about the gap at a Daily News editorial board meeting.

"We just don't have the money, and that is an endless stream of complaints that come from the field," he said.

FBI officials in Washington denied that cost-cutting was putting agents at a disadvantage.

Spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan said e-mail addresses are still being assigned, adding that the city bureau's 2,000 employees would all have accounts by the end of the year.

Mershon, the assistant director in charge of the agency's New York City office, also said that 100 city agents have been given Internet-ready phones such as BlackBerry devices.

Sen. Charles Schumer called for better access to technology for agents.

"The FBI should have the tools it needs to fight terrorism and crime in the 21st century, most of all in New York City, and one of the most effective means of communications is e-mail and the Internet," he said. "FBI agents not having e-mail or Internet access is much too much a pre-9/11 mentality."

Internet Untouchable For FBI Agents In City (NYDN)

New York Daily News, March 20, 2006

FBI terror fighters need modern tools

Anyone who watches the TV show "24" might well believe that America's counterterrorism agents are so technologically advanced they can communicate instantly and tap into computers across the world. Well, we're here to tell you that Jack Bauer could never survive in the FBI.

Forget about having the capability to download secret documents and other such fanciful feats; superagent Bauer wouldn't even have a government e-mail account were he assigned to the bureau's New York office, headquarters of the nation's premier anti-terror unit.

You read right. Somewhere up the bean-counting chain of command, someone decided the FBI couldn't afford to give every agent and analyst in the bureau's largest office outside D.C. a <USnew_edit>basic 20th century communication tool like an FBI.gov e-mail address. As for giving them 21st century technology, such as BlackBerrys, fuhgeddaboudit.

This bit of backwardness and misplaced priorities came to light as we chatted with Mark Mershon, the assistant FBI director who runs the New York office, about the bureau's progress in creating information systems after trying and failing twice. Working our way down a technologies checklist, we arrived at what we though was the mundane item of e-mail, only to be stunned.

Establishing state-of-the-art electronic case files will take money and more expertise than we can muster, but you don't have to be a geek to know something is very wrong - and solvable - when field agents are denied modern basics.

To say there's not enough money in a $2.5 trillion federal budget to give FBI agents e-mail addresses is patently absurd. Which is why headquarters now says everyone will have official e-mail by the end of the year. That must happen. Every major employer provides workers with job-related e-mail because it enhances productivity. Agents should be able to distribute business cards that say JohnJones@fbi.gov. Now, they rely on personal accounts, on which no FBI business should take place.

As for BlackBerrys - devices that are both phones and e-mail terminals - only 100 managers and counterterrorism agents have them in the FBI's 2,000-person New York office. And those are part of a field-testing program. Testing? What's to test? Every business executive in the country has a BlackBerry. Every assistant to every business executive and every law enforcement agency with which the FBI communicates has BlackBerrys. People who want to blow up the Brooklyn Bridge probably have BlackBerrys.

Think this is outrageous? E-mail your congressional representative. Which you can, because Congress has e-mail. And BlackBerrys.

<USnew_edit>Avoid the refund ripoff

As the April 15 tax deadline approaches, financial offices have opened in New York City's poorest neighborhoods, the better to fleece the unwary with overpriced tax-preparation services and high-interest loans that promise "instant money," all quite legally.

There's no reason to swim with the loan sharks. You can avoid predators by calling 311 and asking for the name of a nearby tax preparer who won't charge a penny for the service and who should also explain why instant-money loans are an extremely bad deal.

The lure of that type of loan is that a taxpayer gets refund money right away and repays the debt when the IRS check arrives. Two facts are left out of the picture: first, the loans carry annual interest rates as high as 700%, and, second, you don't have to wait very long for the government check to come.

According to a report by the Neighborhood Economic Development Advocacy Project, a consumer rights organization, more than 300,000 city taxpayers coughed up a total of more than $92 million in tax preparation and loan fees in 2004, paying an average of $276 per filer. More than three-quarters were families earning less than $34,678 a year.

What's worse, most of the people who took out instant-money loans were waiting for payments of the Earned Income Tax Credit, the federal program that gives cash to the working poor. As a result, companies that offer instant-refund loans wound up with millions that were intended for the needy.

Instant refunds are all but unnecessary. Thanks to improved processing, taxpayers whose filings get sent in electronically can expect a refund check in 15 days or less. And more than three dozen banks, credit unions, community organizations and government offices offer free tax preparation. Working families ought to take advantage of this painless way to avoid the annual refund ripoff.

12 Accused Of Making Marijuana-Laced Candy, Soda (LAT)

By Lee Romney, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

They face cultivation and distribution charges over 'Pot Tarts,' 'Toka-Cola' and others.

SAN FRANCISCO — A dozen Bay Area residents appeared in federal court Friday on marijuana cultivation and distribution charges in connection with a large-scale operation to make pot-laced candy bars and sodas.

The products, bearing such slightly off-brand names as Keef Kat, Toka-Cola, Stoney Ranchers, Trippy peanut butter and Pot Tarts, are packaged to look like the legitimate brands they mimic.

According to an affidavit filed in U.S. District Court here, some of the products — sold under the company name Beyond Bomb — were seized this month at the Compassionate Caregivers medicinal marijuana dispensary in Los Angeles.

They also were being sold at other dispensaries throughout the state, including the Green Grocery Co-Op in Van Nuys, the warrant said.

Though the packaging evokes the irreverent Wacky Pack stickers of years past by mocking trademarked products, federal officials say the psychoactive goods are no joke.

"The packaging is so similar to that of the name brand, it has the potential to fall in the hands of children, with potentially tragic consequences," DEA spokeswoman Casey McEnry said.

Medicinal marijuana use, purchase and cultivation are permitted with limitations under state — but not federal — law.

Federal drug agents identified Kenneth Affolter, 39, of the upscale East Bay community of Lafayette as head of the manufacturing outfit.

DOJ_NMG_0018531

Search warrants served on three East Bay warehouses and Affolter's home turned up hundreds of the candy bars and sodas, as well as $100,000 in cash and more than 4,000 marijuana plants, McEnry said.

Affolter and 11 others identified by officials as Beyond Bomb employees are being held without bail.

Their attorneys could not be located Friday. Bruce Margolin, director of Los Angeles NORML — National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws — called the arrests aggressive and "uncalled for."

"There are a lot of people depending on [marijuana products] for their health and safety and welfare," he said. "What do they want, for them to be buying off the street?"

Despite the large number of plants seized, Margolin said the suspects could have a defense if they operated as a caregivers' cooperative.

Bitter Fight Over Sweet Pot Treats Drug Agents Fear Candies Appeal To Kids -- Medical Marijuana Users Insist They're Legal (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 18, 2006

They had colorful labels and names such as Trippy, Stoney Rancher, Toka-Cola, Pot Tart and Budtella.

To federal drug agents, they were dangerous marijuana-laced concoctions that could fall into the hands of children. But to sick patients who rely on cannabis to ease their symptoms, they were just tasty ways to get their medicine -- and legal under California law.

Federal agents who converged on several of what they called "marijuana candy factories" in the East Bay on Thursday seized hundreds of sodas and candies laced with marijuana in what they said was the largest bust of its kind on the West Coast.

Authorities say the drug is illegal no matter what form it takes, especially marijuana candy products that mimic mainstream candies and are attractive to youths.

But angry medical-marijuana patients said Friday that investigators are blowing smoke and that the raids in Oakland and Emeryville on Thursday are just the latest proof that federal investigators are running roughshod over local and state laws that allow for medicinal cannabis use.

In 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, which allows the use of marijuana for medical purposes with a doctor's recommendation. Despite the law, authorities -- from the California Highway Patrol to the Drug Enforcement Administration -- have pounced on local marijuana-growing operations in the Bay Area, including locations in San Francisco and Sonoma County in December.

The candy-factory raids are the latest crackdown.

"I think the government is once again trying to create terror through our community," said Angel Raich, 40, of Oakland, who uses the drug to treat pain, nausea and seizures associated with a brain tumor and a wasting syndrome. "I do know for a fact that medical-cannabis candy and those kinds of products are in the dispensaries, and patients do use them."

Rick Steeb, 55, of San Jose, who uses marijuana to treat the pain from glaucoma, said he's "never seen (the candy) outside the dispensaries. It's not like they were being sold in convenience stores."

But Special Agent Casey McEnry, spokeswoman for the DEA, the agency that conducted this week's raids, said Friday that marijuana "is a violation of federal law in this form and in the smoked form. Even though there may be claims that these weren't meant for kids, the packaging may suggest otherwise."

The alleged ringleader, Kenneth Affolter, 39, of Lafayette, six other men and five women appeared Friday before U.S. Magistrate Bernard Zimmerman in San Francisco and were ordered held without bail pending a hearing next week.

Affolter, whose nickname is "Kena," operated Beyond Bomb, a manufacturer of the marijuana treats, from adjoining warehouses at 1055 and 1071 Yerba Buena Ave. and 3960 Adeline St. in Emeryville, DEA Special Agent William Armstrong wrote in an affidavit unsealed Friday.

Investigators learned that a $3,913 PG&E balance for a month's period covered all three locations and was billed to Affolter, Armstrong wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0018532

Affolter is listed as president of Clear Soap, which is under suspension for failing to pay state taxes, DEA Special Agent Jason Chin wrote in an affidavit. Affolter told Oakland police officers who responded to a silent alarm at one of the Yerba Buena warehouses last month that "he made soaps and candles," agents wrote.

Marijuana candies have been around for at least five years, cannabis users say. But raids of these products only began recently.

In May, police seized Beyond Bomb products from Compassionate Caregivers, a medical-marijuana dispensary in Los Angeles. In July, DEA agents seized Beyond Bomb candies from a San Lorenzo home.

Oakland's Compassionate Caregivers Club at 1740 Telegraph Ave., which Affolter used as a marijuana-cultivation site, was also searched as part of this week's raids, which netted up to 5,000 marijuana plants and $150,000 in cash, authorities said.

At the Telegraph Avenue site, agents found more than 100 marijuana plants, authorities said. Growers there wore identical gray, short-sleeve collared shirts and white lab coats, Armstrong wrote.

Employees also meticulously tracked their work hours on time cards, affidavits said.

Affolter's attorney, Robert Byers of Oakland, said Friday that it was unfair for authorities to claim that children could end up eating Beyond Bomb's creations.

"They know it's not marketed for kids," Byers said. "They're only seen in the context of people who use medical marijuana. A sweet, nice-tasting product is certainly going to benefit them."

Raided Pot 'Edibles' Trouble Advocates (CCT)

By John Simerman

The Contra Costa Times, March 18, 2006

A day after federal agents seized thousands of marijuana plants and a booty of pot-laced candy and soda pop in raids on warehouses in Emeryville and Oakland, local medical cannabis advocates reacted coolly -- bitter at another federal plunder on a substance the state deems legal for the sick, but leery of an operation that packaged its products to mimic popular brands of sweets.

The raids on a business called Beyond Bomb netted some 10,000 rooted plants, thousands of tiny plant "clones," as well as boxes of candy and soda with take-off names such as "Pot Tarts," "Toka-Cola," "Stoney Rancher" and "Munchy Way," with labels to match.

Agents also raided the Lafayette home of Kenneth Dean Affolter, 39, who they say ran the business. He and 11 others were taken into custody and charged with of distributing marijuana.

Authorities say they believe the snacks and soda were headed to pot dispensaries and cooperatives across the Bay Area and California, said Special Agent Casey McEnry, a spokeswoman for the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

"We don't have any information that these products did ultimately end up in the hands of minors, but that doesn't mean it didn't happen," she said. "They look so similar to the real products, it would almost suggest ... that's the way it looks."

Medicinal marijuana advocates pointed to state law and said it was doubtful the THC-laden snacks and soda were aimed at children.

"There's actually a lot of product like that, and dispensaries are the places they can be had. They're the only places that marijuana is retailed in California," said Dale Gieringer, California coordinator for the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, or NORML.

"They're usually five bucks, three bucks, about like a joint. They're good. A lot of them are very professionally made."

For patients who have trouble smoking, or for whom doctors are concerned about them smoking, "edibles" are the age-old alternative. Droplets and sprays are other options, advocates say.

Gary Ainsworth, who suffers chronic pain, said he likes the taste and medicinal quality of the company's sodas, with names such as "Puffsi" and "Joint," after Pepsi and Jolt. He bought some at an Oakland dispensary but said he doesn't drink it much because of the cost and the long drive from his home in Clovis.

"It works real well for the medication part. But I think it was like $12 for an 8-ounce bottle," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0018533

Still, "I'm not hip with the idea of using Jolly Ranchers and (candy) names like that," said Ainsworth. "I think it should be packaged as medicine. If a patient were to have that laying out, somebody might think it's something else -- like, 'have a lollipop.' "

Jeff Jones, executive director of the Oakland Cannabis Buyers' Cooperative, said he has the same concerns over confusion, and another one: that one of the raided warehouses was in an area near homes and schools. Jones favors regulating the suppliers like other businesses.

"If there were permits, they would not have been allowed to be in the neighborhood," said Jones. "That's what this calls for, in my mind. Businesses this big need regulations."

The four warehouses -- three in Emeryville, one in Oakland -- each had sophisticated growing equipment and "looked like they had been in operation for quite some time," said McEnry. The workers all wore gray collared work shorts, and white lab coats were found there, according to agents and the criminal complaint released Friday.

Authorities also found more than $150,000 in cash.

It was the second federal raid in a week on a California medical marijuana supplier, after a raid Tuesday of a Desert Hot Springs farmer who supplied a dispensary in Palm Desert. Federal authorities have been emboldened by a U.S. Supreme Court ruling last summer, in a case against an Oakland woman, that they can prosecute patients who keep and grow marijuana in states that allow it for medical use.

The conflict between state and federal law "means that if you are growing large quantities of marijuana for medical use, you're always going to be a target for the federal government, and the piece of the puzzle that's taking the most risk," said Camilla Norman Field, deputy director of the Drug Policy Alliance in San Francisco.

Under pressure from the federal clash, state lawmakers have tried to clarify the guidelines for medical marijuana and Proposition 215, the medical marijuana law passed in 1996 by 56 percent of California voters.

A 2004 law established a voluntary ID system, recognized the right for patient and caregiver collectives to cultivate pot, and set out restrictions for how much pot patients could keep: up to six mature or 12 immature plants and up to a half-pound of dried, processed marijuana.

The law, however, did not authorize "any individual or group to cultivate or distribute marijuana for profit." The extent to which Affolter may have profited from Beyond Bomb was unclear Friday. Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, declined to comment.

One medical marijuana advocate said it appeared the operation was professional, concerned with the quality and cleanliness of the product, and "most likely doing this with the best intentions of it being medical."

Still, Caren Woodson, campaign director of Americans for Safe Access, acknowledged that the packaging is somewhat hard to defend.

"But that is part of waging the debate around medical cannabis, trying to figure out what works with the public and what doesn't work," she said.

"Unfortunately, yes, the names are kid-friendly. But who's to say medical cannabis patients can't have fun, too? It's not just kids who eat Milky Ways."

27,800 Bags Of Heroin; Eight Arrests (HRE)

By Tom Jennemann

Hoboken (NJ) Reporter, March 19, 2006

Hudson County Prosecutor Edward DeFazio and the Hoboken Police Department have arrested eight Hudson County residents for running a major heroin ring.

According to Prosecutor Edward DeFazio, the arrests were the result of a six-month investigation by the Hudson County Prosecutor's Office Municipal Task Force, Hoboken Police Department, and the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The individuals arrested were allegedly part of a major organization that supplied heroin throughout the Hudson County area. Detectives also seized a number of high-end customized luxury vehicles with secret compartments allegedly used by members of this organization to hide and transport the heroin.

DOJ_NMG_0018534

According to DeFazio, detectives executed search warrants at various locations in Hudson County, including 406 3rd St., Union City, and 4525 Kennedy Blvd., North Bergen. Detectives also searched several vehicles.

The searches resulted in the recovery of 22,000 bags of heroin from "a sophisticated hidden compartment" in a Ford Explorer.

DeFazio added that police also recovered four loaded semi-automatic handguns and 5,000 bags of heroin from a hidden compartment in a Lincoln Navigator. The guns recovered were two Highpoint .9mm handguns, one .45 caliber Ruger, and one .40 caliber Glock, which was reported stolen.

Also, 811 bags of heroin were recovered from the Lumina. A bulletproof vest was found in the Range Rover. DeFazio said police seized a total of more than 27,800 bags of heroin with a street value of over $250,000. Detectives believe the organization was trafficking 15,000 to 20,000 bags of heroin per week.

DeFazio said that those arrested "represented high- and mid-level distributors, suppliers and supervisory level participants. As such, they face potential state prison sentences ranging from a minimum of five years to a maximum of life imprisonment in the case of those charged with leader crimes."

DeFazio said that the U.S. Attorney's office of New York will prosecute the case because they believe it might lead to a large source of heroin in New York City. He also said that he expects more arrests in this case and that several of those arrests will be local.

Arrested individuals

The following is a list of individuals who were arrested and their respective charges and bails:

* Jose "Nutty" Gonzalez, 24, of Union City. He was charged as leader of Narcotics Trafficking Network; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin (2 counts); Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property (two counts); Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; Certain Person not to have a Weapon; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million.

* Rory Praylow, 27, of Hoboken. He was charged as leader of a of Narcotics Trafficking Network; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million.

* Manuel "Murder" Suarez, 30, of Jersey City. He was charged as a "Leader of Narcotics Trafficking Network"; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin (two counts); Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property (two counts); Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; Certain Person not to have a Weapon; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million.

* Philip Anthony "Spud" Pasquale, 21, of Hoboken. He was charged with Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 500 feet of a public park; and Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more. His bail was set at $500,000.

* Jason "Jay" Santos, 24, of Jersey City. He was charged with Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million.

* Alexander Gonzalez, 20, of Jersey City, He was charged with Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $100,000. * Mary J. Gama, 26, of Union City was charged with Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more. Her bail was set at $100,000.

* Darryl L. Oliver, 34, of Hoboken was charged with Possession of Marijuana. His bail was set at $5,000.

Lawyer Criticizes D.E.A. On Death Threat Response (NYT)

By Julia C. Mead

DOJ_NMG_0018535

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

Thomas Liotti has been branded a big mouth for his self-promotion and propensity to tongue-lash prosecutors, police officers and even judges. He shrugs off the criticism, calling it a byproduct of being a lawyer who defends some of the most dangerous criminals to pass through any of New York's downstate courtrooms.

Mr. Liotti has defended clients on death row, others who murdered their previous lawyers and major drug traffickers with connections to Colombian drug lords.

"It's all part of a day's work," Mr. Liotti, of Garden City, N.Y., said in his characteristic boom.

But even a self-described tough guy like Mr. Liotti gets scared.

In a press release on Wednesday in which he bragged about the toughness of his clients — one, he said, was involved in a courthouse shootout; another waved a gun at him and boasted he was a contract killer — he also criticized the federal Drug Enforcement Agency for what he called its lukewarm response to a death threat against lawyers who defend Colombian drug traffickers.

"I want the U.S. government to realize that they have a responsibility to protect everyone, even criminal defense lawyers," he said. "There's not much I can do. I can't hide. I'm a person with a family."

Asked whether he took the threat — certainly not his first — seriously enough to be frightened, he said, "Yeah, absolutely."

Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the United States attorney's office, said, "We do take these cases very seriously."

He added, however, that as a matter of policy he could not confirm that any investigation was under way.

The threat was contained in an anonymous letter that came to light in Colombia in November, naming 22 lawyers, 7 in New York and 15 in Colombia. Among other things, it said any American lawyer found in Colombia would be "captured and executed." Soon after, a memo thought to have come from inside a prison in Cómbita, Colombia, began circulating among lawyers. It rated the performance of about 30 in New York, New Jersey and Miami who had represented accused drug dealers.

"I think I won the prize for the most derogatory evaluation," said Mr. Liotti, a former president of the New York State Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. Next to his name, it said, "Incompetente, Desleal, Mentiroso, Traidor, Sin Excrupulos" — incompetent, disloyal, liar, traitor, without scruples.

Tipped off to the threat by a colleague, Mr. Liotti wrote to the enforcement agency in early February to demand an investigation. The Feb. 28 response from Jodi L. Avergun, the agency's chief of staff, said the agency had taken the threat seriously and immediately referred the matter to the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn for investigation.

Lawrence M. Herrmann, a lawyer in Jackson Heights, Queens, who was named in the death threat, said he had clients awaiting extradition from the Cómbita prison but was afraid to visit them. "I spoke with three D.E.A. agents I know in Bogotá; two said it was nothing, the third told me to be careful," he said.

Like others on the list, Mr. Liotti said he had represented some clients who became informers rather than face a long prison term and others who refused to testify for the prosecution.

"Who knows why this threat was made?" Mr. Liotti said. "There are just rumors out there, and you never know what the plots and subplots are. It's like fighting ghosts."

Detroit Dealers Invade West Virginia Town (PPG)

By Milan Simonich, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 19, 2006

The 'Hillbilly Highway' from Motor City now carries crack and crime, not jobs

HUNTINGTON, W.Va. -- They still talk about "the Hillbilly Highway," a route that led from poverty in Appalachia to jobs in the auto plants of Detroit.

Connections between Detroit and rural America remain strong, but nobody romanticizes about them anymore. Detroit doesn't export cars the way it used to. Instead, say police across the region, it turns out drug dealers who travel hundreds of miles to enrich themselves in smaller towns.

In Huntington, detectives keep a running list of the Detroit crack dealers they have arrested. It contains more than 250 names but accounts for only a portion of those who have infiltrated the city of 50,000 in the past three years.

DOJ_NMG_0018536

"Those are just the adults that we've caught. There are more. Lots more," said narcotics Detective Paul Hunter.

Law officers in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky and West Virginia all have stories about the Detroit drug pipeline, but no town has been hit harder than Huntington.

It was here that gunmen killed four teenagers one day last year, leaving their bodies scattered on a sidewalk, a driveway and the front yard of a house. Huntington police have not arrested anybody in the case, but they have a theory.

"We believe, obviously, that there's a Detroit connection. We haven't seen anything to change our minds," Capt. Steve Hall said last week.

These days, just about every drug arrest in Huntington produces suspects from Detroit. The quadruple homicide is a variation of that pattern, Capt. Hall says.

Detectives believe the shooters targeted Donte Ward, 19, because he supposedly stole from a woman connected to Detroit drug dealers. The triggermen, determined not to leave any witnesses, also killed the three people who happened to be with Mr. Ward.

Two of them, Michael Dillon, 17, and Megan Poston, 16, had gone together to their high school prom that night.

"I can still see the corsage falling off Megan's wrist," Capt. Hall said. "That will stick with me forever."

Ten months have passed since the shootings, which also took the life of 18-year-old Eddrick Clark. Capt. Hall said three detectives continue to work the investigation in between other cases.

Huntington Mayor David Felinton said the crime changed Huntington.

"The killings were our 9/11," he said. "We're no longer the same place as a result of what happened. We're not as safe."

The mayor meets occasionally with the victims' families, sharing information about the investigation's two fronts, one at home, the other in Detroit.

But the scourge of crack cocaine makes it impossible to update everyone. Police had Mr. Ward's mother, Tina, in jail last week on drug-possession charges.

The invasion of Detroit drug dealers coincided with the layoff of police in Huntington to balance the budget. Sixteen of 91 officers were let go in 2002.

Given its size, Huntington should have 120 to 130 police officers, Mr. Felinton said. Today, the police force has been built back up to 88, though not everybody is working. Some officers are on military leave.

Narcotics officers say Detroit dealers control most of the 30 or so crack houses in Huntington. But Detective Hunter said they are shrewd enough to keep their names off deeds and leases.

With less competition in smaller cities than in Detroit, the dealers can sell crack at inflated prices. They call Huntington "Moneyton." Nearby Ashland, Ky., is "Cashland."

To fight the drug incursion, Mr. Felinton said, he hopes to add 10 police officers and two code enforcement officers to the city payroll this year.

The code enforcement officers would help police close down crack houses after raids. Sgt. J.T. Combs, who heads the narcotics unit, says he has been frustrated by the city's lack of diligence in boarding up drug dens.

Mr. Felinton says the problem is money. Huntington has only one code officer on staff. He says police will get more help if he is able to add the extra positions in the next budget.

Beefing up the police department has become a more popular idea since the quadruple homicide and a separate drive-by shooting in an affluent neighborhood.

Mr. Felinton said he thinks the quadruple murder will be solved. Capt. Hall is less confident.

"I'm not real hopeful," he said. "But we're not giving up."

For police in smaller towns, fighting the Detroit connection can be daunting, even on seemingly routine cases.

Capt. Hall said his officers have arrested Detroit residents on felony drug warrants, only to have police or prosecutors in Michigan decline to extradite them, possibly for financial reasons. Huntington is 340 miles from Detroit, so a trip to pick up a prisoner may mean lodging and food expenses, plus two days' wages.

DOJ_NMG_0018537

Thomas Sansone, police chief of New Castle, Lawrence County, had the same problem with Detroit drug dealers caught in his town. He said Detroit authorities declined to extradite certain prisoners that New Castle officers arrested on felony drug warrants. Chief Sansone then had no choice but to release them.

This emboldened the suspects, he said. Instead of hiding from New Castle police, the accused drug peddlers suddenly felt comfortable.

Police in Steubenville, Ohio, have a different frustration in dealing with Detroit suspects. They say that because of the large number of cases in overburdened Detroit and Wayne County, Mich., courts, some criminals can avoid serious punishment, then move to smaller towns.

They point to the case of Ramone Barnett. He served six months in jail for a 2003 shooting in Detroit, said Steubenville narcotics Detective Jon Sowers. After Mr. Barnett, 34, went free, he headed for Steubenville and restarted a crack-dealing business, Detective Sowers said.

Steubenville police arrested him last month, alleging that he had a dozen individually wrapped packages of crack cocaine, each weighing 3 grams.

Because of his criminal record, Mr. Barnett also was charged with illegally possessing a firearm. Police say they found him carrying a 9 mm handgun, which had been reported stolen in a Weirton, W.Va., break-in.

Steubenville, an easy drive from parts of Pennsylvania and West Virginia, is the type of smaller border town that Detroit dealers often target.

Two Detroit gangs that took over crack-dealing operations in New Castle eventually expanded to Beaver Falls and Farrell in Mercer County, said Pennsylvania Attorney General Tom Corbett. Local and state law officers eventually pooled their resources to raid the gangs' crack houses and issue arrest warrants for 28 of their members, including both leaders.

In Huntington, police say, there are no Detroit gangs but there are countless Detroit drug dealers.

"You put one in jail and there are two to take their place," Capt. Hall said.

He has about four years until retirement and one last hope -- seeing the quadruple murder case solved.

Mr. Felinton said hiring more officers and stepping up day-to-day drug enforcement may give police the lead they need.

People in the drug world know who committed the killings, the mayor said, but they are not inclined to talk, unless they are arrested and facing charges themselves.

High Crimes, Or A Tokin' Figure? (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Canadians Find the 'Prince of Pot' Harmless. The DEA Begs to Differ.

VANCOUVER

Sweet marijuana smoke tumbles down the steps from "the Vapor Lounge," a corner of Marc Emery's bookstore where customers toke up at will.

"We get high with everybody," Emery says, shrugging. "This is a pilgrimage spot, and people come here from all over the world. We get high."

Illegal? Yes.

So were the seeds he used to keep in a case in the store, with exotic names like Afghan Dream and Chemo Grizzly. So was the booming business he ran, complete with glossy seed catalogues describing the subtle and sublime nuances of his varieties. ("Nebula: Fruity flavor and scent. Transcendental buzz. Harvest outdoor.") So, for that matter, are the other marijuana businesses that have sprouted up in the block around his Vancouver bookstore. The street is nicknamed "Vansterdam," with pot-hazy cafes, headshops filled with pipes and bongs, and neon signs advertising illegal seed sales.

Until recently, nobody much cared, it seemed. The police hadn't bothered to come around for eight years. Before that, they busted Emery for seed sales and raided him four times. But he just got fined -- once with "a nice speech from the judge saying what a nice person I was and how marijuana probably shouldn't be illegal," Emery says -- and the police stopped trying.

DOJ_NMG_0018538

In truth, Emery hated being ignored. He tried to stir up notoriety. Every year, he filled out his income taxes listing his occupation as "Marijuana Seed Vendor," paying heftily and honestly, he says, on his multimillion-dollar business. The Canadian Revenue Service never questioned him.

He told the Canada post office he was getting and sending his seeds through the mail. They never stopped delivery. He started the B.C. Marijuana Party, fielded 79 candidates in 2001, and ran repeatedly for local and federal offices. He never won.

He broadcast "Pot-TV" on the Internet, entertained politicians, and openly funded marches, lawsuits and marijuana-legalization drives from Arizona to Israel to Washington, D.C.

When it was too quiet at home, he would go somewhere to rattle up a pro-pot demonstration. He would light up a fat joint in front of a police station, daring the cops to arrest him.

Twenty-one times they did. Usually he got off, or was released after a night in jail, or fined. His longest stretch was 61 days in jail in 2004, ordered by a Saskatoon judge clearly irked at Emery's in-your-face apologia. No big deal, Emery says. He read the Bible behind bars.

Then came the DEA.

Emery figured something was up when a strange young woman pestered him to buy 10 pounds of pot. He refused. She bought some seeds at his store, asked for tips about how to hide them to go to the States, and left.

Eight days later, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents and Vancouver police tromped into his store, ordered the customers out, taped paper over the windows and began hauling out computers and files. Emery, on the other side of Canada to speak near Halifax at the Atlantic Hemp Festival, was grabbed by six plainclothes policemen as he left a restaurant.

Emery is "one of the attorney general's most wanted international drug trafficking targets," the DEA in Washington crowed on July 29, 2005, announcing an extradition request for Emery and two employees. Emery's bust, the DEA said, was "a significant blow not only to the marijuana trafficking trade but also to the marijuana legalization movement."

And he thought trying to change the law was legal, Emery muses.

So did lots of other Canadians, it turned out. Emery's arrest for extradition on U.S. "drug kingpin" charges, carrying a minimum sentence of 10 years to life in prison, outraged many in Canada. They resented the long reach of America's law and what they saw as the United States' fevered preoccupation with pot.

"They need to leave our country alone," complained a letter to the editor in the London (Ontario) Free Press. "If we wanted to prosecute Emery we would, but it is not worth our time and money."

"Marc's business was known to police and every level of government," intoned a columnist in the Vancouver Province. To arrest him now "is petty and dishonest."

Todd Greenberg, the assistant U.S. attorney handling the case in Seattle, says Canada's apparent tolerance of Emery's seed business does not make the U.S. bid to prosecute him unfair.

"What Canada does or does not do is not particularly relevant to us," he says. "We are prosecuting him for what he did in our country -- distributing millions and millions of marijuana seeds in the United States. When someone does that, the United States has the obligation to enforce our laws whether that person is physically located here or overseas."

Greenberg says the charges brought by a federal grand jury followed an 18-month investigation in which DEA agents repeatedly found Marc Emery's seeds at the root of illegal marijuana "grow ops." He insists Emery's legalization campaigns did not affect the charges.

That sounds hollow to Bruce Mirken, a spokesman for the Washington-based Marijuana Policy Project that Emery says he helped finance (contributors are confidential, the organization says). The DEA's public boast to have dealt a blow to "the legalization movement" showed its hand, Mirken says.

"This is a democracy. We are supposed to be able to talk about whether our laws make any sense.

"Year after year they roll out ad campaigns that attempt to demonize marijuana," Mirken notes. "They consider it the number one drug threat in America. That always struck us as bizarre."

If the DEA tries to demonize marijuana, Emery runs a multimedia juggernaut to sanctify it. In addition to his irreverent Internet site, his Cannabis Culture magazine comes out every other month, a slick magazine chockablock with advertisements by seed vendors and hydroponics suppliers, articles on growing lush and potent plants, and even a "pot puzzler" crossword. He says he distributes 75,000 copies.

DOJ_NMG_0018539

Emery's bookstore is a cheerful dispensary for books and magazines on marijuana, bongs and pipes of every conceivable design, T-shirts, pot cookbooks, grinders, vaporizers, mushroom spores, and hemp clothing.

And then there is Emery himself. At 48, he looks more like a Young Republican than a stoner who calls himself the Prince of Pot. As often as not, he is in a coat and tie, with neatly combed hair, an earnest expression, with a good sound bite for the TV. He has been a soccer coach and a foster parent. Married, divorced and soon to remarry -- to Jodie Giesz-Ramsay, 21, who transcribed his jailhouse musings and now helps edit his magazine.

He talks with a machine-gun style unmellowed by his admitted custom of a daily joint or two. He compares himself to Martin Luther King and Mahatma Gandhi. He had to apologize last year for calling a federal minister a "Nazi," and he won no PR points when he spat on a policeman during a 2000 arrest of one of his employees.

Emery's life is the limelight. For 17 years, he ran a used-book store in Ontario, and publicly challenged a business fee, his town's bid for the 1991 Pan American Games, its Sunday shopping laws and pornography laws. In 1990 he flouted the prohibition against selling High Times magazine, then banned as "illicit drug literature." He helped win that battle, getting the law overturned, and found his calling in the marijuana movement.

He wound up in British Columbia, a tolerant corner of a tolerant country. The official statistics agency of Canada says 45 percent of Canadians over age 15 have used marijuana. Possession and use is legal for medical purposes, and the former Liberal government tried to make possession of pot a matter of a small fine.

The legislation did not pass, but the laws on marijuana and sales of seeds are often overlooked. Until his arrest in July, Emery says only two people had ever been prosecuted for selling seeds, and both had simply been fined.

So Emery sold and sold. He accepted seed orders of the 534 varieties listed in his catalogue or on the Internet only with money orders that could not be easily traced. He got and sent seeds through the Canadian Postal Service, and then destroyed the records, he says.

"I sold millions of seeds proudly to people all over the world," and perhaps 70 percent of them were mailed to the United States, he concedes. "Everything the DEA said is correct -- except I don't buy the charge that I'm poisoning children of America."

Emery says he did it all for the movement, not for profit. He claims to have funneled more than $3 million to marches, candidates, lawsuits and ballot drives over a decade. He says he paid taxes and kept very little. He lives modestly in his fiancee's apartment. He doesn't own a car or a house, investments or fancy jewelry, he says.

Emery will get a judicial hearing in Canada later this year. The Canadian justice minister in the new conservative government could block the extradition, but he is a tough-talking former prosecutor and Emery acknowledges his chances are "slim odds indeed."

"In the U.S, I have every confidence I would get a minimum of 30 years," Emery says in an interview in the basement of his bookstore. "I'll get a longer sentence than I'd get in Canada for multiple murder, for something no one in Canada has ever gone to jail for."

Here is the twist: Emery welcomes it. Almost.

"I'm interested in whatever would legalize pot fastest," he says. "Part of me believes that going to jail will accelerate that process. And part of me believes that if I die in jail it will accelerate it even faster."

That is as much for Emery's devotion to the spotlight as devotion to the cause, he concedes.

"I'm very interested to see what happens to me, because I think I am a person of destiny," he says, with no trace of modesty. "I haven't been fearful since the moment I was arrested. I just felt my time has finally come. . . .

"I've already got this grand-scale epic going in my head. I am out to destroy the DEA and defeat them. And they are out to destroy me."

(SLPD)

By Philip Dine

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018540

For now, the cabbage-green rows of small poppies in the furrowed squares of land resemble any variety of legitimate crops. In a few months, these plants will stand out as a tall sea of crimson.

Viewed from the window of a low-flying helicopter, new poppy fields come into view every few seconds, spread around a desolate landscape virtually unchanged for centuries in this remote part of Afghanistan. The houses are small, isolated and fashioned from mud, some with mud walls around them. There is no sign of mosques or schools, hospitals or stores.

This is the epicenter of poppy cultivation in Afghanistan. The nation's crop provides 87 percent of the world's opium, from which heroin is produced, according to the United Nations. Early indications are that Helmand, a province deep in southern Afghanistan bordering Pakistan, will produce half the world's supply of opium this year.

The poppies are invaluable cash crops to farmers seeking to sustain their families, but dangerous to a young Afghan democracy. An unholy alliance is emerging among farmers, drug lords, Taliban remnants and al-Qaida fighters. Intelligence sources and Afghan officials cite mounting evidence that insurgents are using drugs to wreak havoc on Afghan society - including the corrupting of public officials - while also extracting funds from drug profits for their anti-government violence.

The resulting tension was in evidence on a recent tour of the area by two U.S. gunships. The helicopters landed in a poppy field to give State Department officials and a reporter a chance to look around - for two minutes - encircled by guards with automatic weapons. The guards worry about violence, either from farmers who think their crop is threatened, or from insurgents protecting the poppy fields.

"You can get on the ground, but that's when you're the most vulnerable," warned Ed Morris, lead pilot in the U.S. military detachment providing protective cover for joint Afghanistan-American drug-eradication efforts in this area.

Drugs are already the nation's sole export of any magnitude, and threaten to turn it into a "narco-state," a country whose policies and politics are dominated by drug lords.

"The concern is that this government will fail and fall and the country will be a breeding ground for terrorists again," says Doug Wankel, director of the Counter Narcotics Task Force at the U.S. Embassy in Afghanistan. Former chief of operations for the Drug Enforcement Administration, he is a native of Bowling Green, Mo.

Poisoning "infidels"

There is also a little-noted bonus for al-Qaida in the burgeoning heroin production. Afghan sources say the terrorist group has acknowledged in private sessions its satisfaction that expanding heroin use is poisoning "infidels" in other countries. One example is a skyrocketing rate of AIDS, sparked by dirty needles, in Russia and former Soviet republics.

Kahir Ismailee of Kabul has worked for years with international groups on health, education and human rights issues in rural areas where anti-Western sentiment is strong.

He says that in the terrorists' "jihad against all Westerners, one of their tactics to ruin a society was to make them addicts, so they export heroin to the Western countries."

Ismailee says an influential Taliban cleric told him: "Drugs are illegal in Islam, but we want infidels to die."

Mohammad Nabi Hussaini directs the poppy eradication program in the Afghan Ministry of Counter Narcotics. It's dangerous work; when traveling around the country, he wears a turban to disguise himself.

"They say this, if you go to their gatherings, their religious gatherings: 'Western countries, they are sending us alcohol, they are sending us rockets - this is our rocket, poppy. This is how we can fight them,' " Hussaini says. "But they are also fighting their own people, because it brings the moral degradation of our society. It is against Islam."

And, he noted, more Afghans are becoming addicted to heroin or opium.

"It's not true that it's not our problem. It's becoming our problem," he says. "The rate of addiction will increase, I think, very badly. I believe it is something that is destroying our nation. My village has 120 families. When I was a kid, there was only one person who was taking raw opium, who was an addict. Right now in my village there are more than 12 very hard addicts."

Afghan President Hamid Karzai has put it bluntly: "If we don't destroy the poppy, it will destroy us."

The last two years have been the biggest in history for opium production in Afghanistan, each topping 4,000 tons of opium, and this year looms as a third banner year. Hoping to avert another flooding of the heroin market, Afghan forces and their allies, particularly the United States, are responding strongly - if belatedly - to the threat.

DOJ_NMG_0018541

Eradication is one element in a multipronged response to the mounting drug problem, an effort that also includes a range of educational, economic and legal approaches. The point man for the U.S. State Department is St. Louis native Tom Schweich, a top official for international narcotics and law enforcement who seeks to coordinate actions among Americans, Afghans and their international partners.

"The reason we went into Afghanistan was to eliminate the people who were responsible for 9/11," Schweich says. "There's now a nascent democracy here. The threats that are posed to this democracy are narcotics and terrorism. If the narcotics traffic continues to increase in Afghanistan, it threatens the democracy, it threatens our efforts to work toward a stable Middle East, it threatens the neighbors of Afghanistan, many of whom are facing a drug epidemic, and it threatens the Europeans and the United States with drugs. It really does have implications across the entire world."

The Taliban and the poppy

In some ways, the proliferation of poppy is an unintended consequence of the U.S. overthrow of the Taliban in 2001.

In earlier years, the Taliban had been content to allow the production of opium, even urging farmers to continue in defiance of the desire of the West that poppy cultivation cease - and often profiting from drug trafficking.

"The Taliban told people this was a fight against Muslims, that you should grow poppy. Even if you have no land, you should use your roof," says Asadullah Khalid, governor of Kandahar province.

But the Taliban abruptly switched gears at the start of this decade, as it faced growing international pressure to moderate its rule. Hoping to win diplomatic recognition from the West, the Taliban knew it had to make some concessions, and yielding on narcotics was the most palatable choice, Ismailee says.

In its last years in power, the Taliban clamped down on the drug trade in an effective but brutal way.

"There were executions without any transparent trials, hands were cut off, legs were severed," Ismailee says. By 2001, the extremist government had reduced the opium production to virtually nothing.

The U.S.-led removal of the Taliban removed the fear ordinary Afghans felt, spurring many to get back into poppy farming.

In addition, American and Afghan policies initially contributed to the growth of the narcotics problem. U.S. forces enlisted the support of warlords in the fight against the Taliban, turning a blind eye to their drug trafficking. After he assumed office, Karzai - hoping to solidify his hold on the country - brought some compromised provincial figures into his government.

Now, insurgents trying to weaken the U.S.-backed government find it advantageous to forge alliances with drug traffickers and encourage farmers to grow poppy - telling them "whenever the government tries to eradicate, the Taliban will be there to protect you," Ismailee says.

Insurgents also have issued warnings that those who stop growing poppy will be seen as "siding" with the government. It is no coincidence, officials say, that the areas where anti-government rebels are strongest are the same places where poppy production is at its highest.

Corruption, poverty, porous borders

Other factors have helped worsen the drug problem in Afghanistan.

Corruption, bribery and the quick release from jail of suspected drug traffickers.

Widespread poverty, which forces farmers to seek any possible means to support their families. Other crops pay a fraction of what poppies yield. And many traditional Afghanistan crops, such as fruits and nuts, were uprooted when Soviet troops destroyed trees to prevent guerrillas from hiding.

The return of Afghan refugees who had fled to Pakistan to escape Taliban rule. Some went into poppy farming on their own; others were compelled by landowners who made it a condition of their getting a parcel of land as tenant farmers.

Abysmal roads. Farmers often can't get legitimate crops to market, whereas poppy is so valuable that traffickers will come to the farmers.

The trend toward the processing of opium into heroin in Afghanistan, turning Afghans from opium exporters into heroin producers. Afghans have seen the profits to be made and, in recent years, provided necessary precursor chemicals by foreigners, began setting up their own labs to make the end product.

Porous borders that let drugs move freely into Iran, Pakistan or former Soviet republics to the north, often eventually going to Europe - which gets 90 percent of its heroin from Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0018542

The hardiness of the crop. Poppies require little care and little water, critical in a country suffering from massive environmental degradation and long arid periods and whose mountainside irrigation systems were largely destroyed over decades of armed conflict.

"The narcotics problem in our province is very, very complicated," said Engineer Daud, governor of Helmand, as he stood at an airfield flanked by Afghan and U.S. troops.

"Our land is productive land for narcotics, and we have more than 100 miles of border with Pakistan, with deserts and mountains," he says. "Because of the low capacity of our national police, it is difficult to control that part of the problem . Drug dealers and terrorists are carrying drugs across the border, and terrorists are getting money from narcotics."

"Both forces are mobilizing"

In the northern part of his province, people are so desperate for water that farmers trying to make a legitimate living on their tiny plots, with virtually no money for their own families, are forced to buy water to keep their chickens alive.

Daud understands why they "have the reason to cultivate cash crop like poppy," and he prefers to go after the larger and wealthy drug dealers rather than the simple growers, but the traffickers are more evasive, more powerful - and more threatening.

In many ways, Afghan officials and their international allies, preoccupied with overthrowing the Taliban and then keeping it and al-Qaida at bay, were caught off guard by the insidious drug trade and didn't get serious until relatively recently.

"The problem was . . . unique, because of its scope and because there are so many moving parts," said Craig Chretien, formerly a senior official at the Drug Enforcement Administration, where he spent 26 years in several South American countries. He is now deputy director of the counternarcotics task force at the American Embassy in Afghanistan, which is helping the Afghans tackle the problem.

"It's challenging, but is it impossible? No," Chretien says.

After a rather tepid Afghan response last year, and some faltering steps by the United States, both countries are launching a broader, better coordinated and more aggressive campaign.

The next few months will begin to signal how successful the effort is likely to be.

"We've got an increased ability to fight the drugs, and they've got an increased ability to grow the drug," Schweich says. "So both forces are mobilizing."

Taliban Rebels Team Up With Drug Barons (WT)

By Emmanuel Duparcq, Agence France-presse

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

LASHKARGAH, Afghanistan -- Taliban rebels determined to keep southern Afghanistan in chaos have teamed up with drug barons against the government and its opium eradication campaign, officials say.

The campaign to destroy opium poppy fields was begun March 8 in southern Helmand, the producer of most of Afghanistan's opium crop -- which makes up nearly 90 percent of the world total -- and also one of the provinces worst-hit by a Taliban-led insurgency.

"Terrorists and narcotics are very close; they're supporting each other," said Helmand province Gov. Muhammad Daud. "When narcotics production is up, terrorism automatically goes up."

Lt. Col. Henry Worsley of the 3,500 British forces deployed in the province agreed. "Taliban and drugs feed each other. You cannot separate them here."

In their final two years in power, before they were toppled in a U.S.-led invasion in late 2001, the Taliban banned opium and succeeded in drastically slashing its production to 185 tons from 3,300 tons.

Some observers say their motivation was to win international favor. Others say they wanted to push up the price of the raw ingredient of heroin.

Four years later, the Taliban rebels are willing to protect opium crops and farmers against the new administration in Kabul. The United States and other Western countries, which see opium as a source of terrorist funding, are pressuring the government led by President Hamid Karzai to eradicate the crop.

DOJ_NMG_0018543

Several anonymous letters attributed to the Taliban have been distributed in the past few months in Helmand and other insurgency-infested provinces that threaten farmers with reprisals if they do not plant opium, residents said.

Some letters also offer protection against government eradication attempts.

"Taliban will try to disrupt the eradication campaign," said the Helmand governor who has vowed to remove all the opium from his province in two months.

"Eradication will cause fighting," said Mohammed Sardar, an official from the nongovernmental group Mercy Corps that is trying to persuade opium farmers to switch to other crops.

"Poor farmers won't fight, but Taliban and smugglers will," he said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney Dismisses Suggestions Of Shake-Up (AP-Y2)

By Douglass K. Daniel

AP2, March 19, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney on Sunday dismissed suggestions that the Bush White House, hampered by a weak response to Hurricane Katrina and stumbles on policy questions, needs a shake-up.

"I don't think we can pay any attention to that kind of thing," Cheney said on CBS "Face the Nation." "The president has got a job to do. ... He ignores the background noise that's out there in the polls that are taken on a daily basis."

Bush's job approval in March was at 37 percent, which tied for his lowest rating in the AP-Ipsos poll. Senior Republicans and others have said the Bush team may need an infusion of fresh blood and ideas.

Cheney, in a rare Sunday morning television interview, told CBS that he heard similar grumbling 30 years ago when he was chief of staff for President Ford.

"Administrations go through peaks and valleys," he said. "When you're down in the polls you're going to take shots that you don't deserve, and when you're up in the polls you're probably going to get praise you don't deserve."

Asked if he and Bush had a "good cop, bad cop" partnership in which Cheney took the heat for controversial policies, the vice president said: "It may look that way. It's not conscious."

Added Cheney, who has said he will not seek the presidency: "My job is to do what I can to support him and to support the administration. My advice to him is untainted by any concern I might have on how the folks in Iowa look at me in connection with the 2008 Iowa caucuses."

Cheney chuckled when asked if he himself had ever considered resigning amid low poll numbers and suggestions by commentators that he was a liability for the administration.

"It's been a highlight of my career to be a part of this administration," he said. "I've now been elected to a second term, and I'll serve out my term."

To political strategists who say that he should step aside with a year or so remaining in his term to give someone a jump on gaining the Republican nomination for president, Cheney said such a move wouldn't make sense to him. "Nobody has suggested it to me," he said.

Cheney and the White House were criticized for not immediately notifying the national press corps after he accidentally shot a companion while hunting in Texas last month. On Sunday, the vice president said he still thought the situation had been handled appropriately.

Calling the circumstances unusual, the vice president quipped, "It's probably the first time the Secret Service ever had to worry about a protectee shooting somebody else instead of being shot at."

Cheney Comfortable In His Role (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018544

Dick Cheney's lack of political ambition to succeed his boss gives him unusual freedom to be a lightning rod for contentious issues and serve as an "untainted" adviser to the president, the vice president said yesterday.

"Frankly, I don't spend a lot of time worrying about the polls," said Mr. Cheney, who as vice president is spearheading some tough battles on Capitol Hill involving the treatment of terrorist detainees and the administration's terrorist surveillance program.

Historically, vice presidents have used their second term to plan their own presidential campaigns and, accordingly, walked on eggshells to appease voters.

"This has been a different kind of arrangement than most administrations have between the president and the vice president, primarily because I'm here to serve him; I'm not here to run for higher office," Mr. Cheney told CBS' Bob Schieffer on "Face the Nation."

"My advice to him is untainted by any concern I might have about how the folks in Iowa look at me with connection with the 2008 Iowa caucuses," Mr. Cheney said.

"And when I speak out on an issue, it's because somebody needs to speak out on the issue. And I can do it without fear [because] I'm not here to try to burnish my image or improve my standing in the polls. I'm here to do a job that needs to be done for the president of the United States," he said.

Mr. Cheney dismissed reports suggesting that he will be asked to step down and allow a presidential contender to take his seat.

Tongue-in-cheek, Mr. Cheney did confirm some Republican criticism that he has changed since becoming vice president: "I'm a lot older. I've got less hair," he said.

He added seriously: "The job I have now as vice president is to be an adviser to the president, primarily. I don't run anything. I'm not in charge of the White House."

"I don't talk about the conversations I have with him. I think presidents need to have somebody around them who is totally reliable and trustworthy and is going to protect those communications they have with the president."

When asked whether he and President Bush play "good cop, bad cop," with Mr. Cheney taking the political lumps on hot-button issues, the vice president said: "It may look that way. It's not conscious."

As for his accidental shooting of lawyer Harry Whittington on a recent hunting trip, Mr. Cheney said that even in hindsight and amid abundant late-night jokes, the White House press corps was adequately notified.

"I must admit the first thing I thought when I saw what had happened and rushed over to help Harry, I did not think, 'Gee, I better call the press corps and tell them what's going on here,' " said Mr. Cheney, who does not travel with the White House press corps on vacations.

"It struck me as a bit of a tempest in a teapot over the question of how it was announced. It was announced by us, I believe, in a timely fashion as soon as we knew what Harry's status was," Mr. Cheney said.

"I think it's one of those situations or circumstances that is obviously difficult and generates controversy. It's probably the first time the Secret Service ever had to worry about a protectee shooting somebody else instead of being shot at," he said.

The vice president declined to speculate about a major staff shake-up at the Bush White House. "The president hasn't indicated he plans to make any changes. If he does and when he does, I'm sure he'll announce it," Mr. Cheney said.

A 'Third Term' For Bush (WSJ)

By Fred Barnes

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

It's time for President Bush to think about a third term. No, he doesn't need to overturn the Constitution. He can start the equivalent of his third term now, by filling his presidential staff and cabinet with new faces -- or old faces in new positions -- and by concentrating on new or forgotten initiatives. The goal: rejuvenation of his presidency by shocking the media and political community with a sweeping overhaul of his administration. The impact would be enormous because it's exactly what his foes have been demanding and exactly what he is not expected to do. And it would give him a chance to escape the political doldrums that may otherwise doom his presidency through its final 34 months.

DOJ_NMG_0018545

Only a few months ago, it appeared the Bush administration didn't need emergency resuscitation. True, Mr. Bush had suffered a year of serious troubles -- failure of Social Security reform, Katrina, Harriet Miers, Iraq -- following his second inauguration. Yet he emerged bruised but politically alive. He'd even won the confirmation of two conservative Supreme Court justices.

Then he was belted with a new round of reversals. His State of the Union address was uninspiring, the Dubai ports deal had to be nixed, and his proposed spending cuts were going nowhere. This time the fallout was worse for Mr. Bush. Republican unity, so important to his past success, dissolved as congressional Republicans began criticizing the White House. And Iraq was again a political problem. Even several top Bush aides now suspect an infusion of fresh talent could liven up the administration.

A broad transformation, playing on the media's overreaction whenever surprised, would do more. Reporters would be forced to write stories about new officials, cover confirmation hearings, show up at press conferences they might have ignored, assess new policies, and -- this is most important -- take a fresh look at the president. It would be like the beginning of a new presidential term. Sure, the press and politicians would be cynical about Mr. Bush's bold moves, especially since he wouldn't be uprooting any policy or hiring Bush critics. In truth, there would be a large element of smoke and mirrors in his actions. The trade-off is that Mr. Bush might revitalize his presidency.

A sweeping overhaul on a smaller scale has worked before. In one swoop in 1975, President Ford replaced Defense Secretary James Schlesinger with Donald Rumsfeld, made Dick Cheney chief of staff, appointed George H.W. Bush as CIA director in place of William Colby, and stripped Secretary of State Henry Kissinger of his second post as national security adviser, installing Brent Scowcroft. These surprising and dramatic steps strengthened a weak Ford presidency. President Carter tried something similar in 1979 when his presidency was at a low point. But the overhaul was handled clumsily. Mr. Carter appeared to act arbitrarily and his presidency never recovered.

Mr. Bush's first task must be to jettison his admirable but unrealistic sense of loyalty. Unlike other presidents, he reciprocates the loyalty of his aides. But for the good of his presidency, he must let some of them go, regardless of whether they deserve firing.

The president's most spectacular move would be to anoint a presidential successor. This would require Vice President Cheney to resign. His replacement? Condoleezza Rice, whom Mr. Bush regards highly. Her replacement? Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, whose Bush-like views on Iraq and the war on terror have made him a pariah in the Democratic caucus.

Mr. Cheney would probably be happy to step down and return to Wyoming. But it would make more sense for him to move to the Pentagon to replace Donald Rumsfeld as defense secretary, a job Mr. Cheney held during the elder Bush's administration. The Senate confirmation hearing for Mr. Cheney alone would produce political fireworks and attract incredible attention. At Treasury, Mr. Bush has a perfect replacement for John Snow, someone he already knows. That's Glenn Hubbard, former chairman of Mr. Bush's council of economic advisers and currently dean of Columbia's business school. He is in sync with Mr. Bush ideologically and has the added value of being respected on Wall Street.

With these changes, Mr. Bush would have brought in new Cabinet chiefs at three of the big four agencies. Only Justice would be untouched, but it might be too much for the president to force his friend Alberto Gonzales out as attorney general.

At the White House, highly visible changes would be required, starting with the most visible post of all besides the presidency -- press secretary. Dan Senor, a Republican and former spokesman for Paul Bremer in Iraq, would be a perfect successor to Scott McClellan. He would be an articulate and forceful defender of Mr. Bush on Iraq. And if not Mr. Senor, then presidential counselor Dan Bartlett, who always does well in TV interviews.

As a new chief of staff, Mr. Bush's pal from his Harvard Business School days, Al Hubbard, could replace Andy Card. Mr. Hubbard is miscast as top White House economic adviser. To replace him, Kevin Hassett of the American Enterprise Institute would fit. He has close ties to the Bush White House. There's also a natural choice for national security adviser to replace Stephen Hadley. It's Zalmay Khalilzad, the tough-minded ambassador to Iraq. Once a permanent government is installed there, he could be summoned home.

The trickiest issue is how to handle Karl Rove, the deputy White House chief of staff and political adviser. He is the closest thing to indispensable -- on policy as well as politics -- at the White House. But any overhaul that didn't involve him would run the risk of not being taken seriously. The solution is to send Mr. Rove to the Republican National Committee as chairman and bring the current chairman, Ken Mehlman, back to the president's staff as communications chief. The president lauded Mr. Rove as "the architect" of his re-election in 2004. Now he could be the architect of a Republican comeback in 2006. Mr. Mehlman would sharpen the president's communication operation. He and Mr. Rove would work together, as they do now.

DOJ_NMG_0018546

New faces and personnel shifts are necessary but not sufficient to produce the aura of a new presidential term. Major policy initiatives are required, too. And there are plenty to choose from. For one, Mr. Bush could mount a fresh crusade for confirmation of federal appeals court judges: 11 of them are waiting in the wings. And there's always taxes, a hardy GOP perennial. Mr. Bush's tax reform commission was a bust, but that shouldn't stop him from proposing significant tax reforms and cuts. He doesn't have to win congressional approval. To revive his presidency, at this point he only need focus on them.

In foreign policy, there's a broad new alliance waiting to be packaged, now that NATO has lost its rationale. Suggested by Tom Donnelly of the American Enterprise Institute, it would bring together four antiterrorist, free-market democracies, all concerned about the growing power of China. They are the U.K., India, Japan and the U.S.

The new but still conservative look of the Bush administration and its new policy emphasis would thrill the base and perhaps independents as well. Should that lead to an unanticipated Republican victory in the midterm election in November, Mr. Bush would be empowered to return to old initiatives such as Social Security reform and his faith-based initiative.

Of course, there are risks and problems in trying to revitalize a flagging administration. The most worrisome risk is that Mr. Bush would look weak and desperate. Mr. Carter did in 1979 and became a laughingstock. That could happen to Mr. Bush. Also, it may be difficult to persuade outsiders to join what looks to them as a hopelessly lame-duck administration.

The president could lose a lot more than face. But the potential upside of a stunning facelift of his administration is great. It could make his presidency productive and enjoyable again rather than stymied and disheartened. Achieving the aura and feel of a new presidential term is not farfetched. Mr. Bush fooled everyone by becoming the president of big ideas and bold plans. He could fool them again.

Mr. Barnes, executive editor of the Weekly Standard, is author of "Rebel in Chief," published last month by Crown Forum.

Hardballs Replace Softballs, And Bush Takes A Few Swings (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON

At first it looked as if it was going to be another warm bath of a White House question-and-answer session with President Bush. There was a happy group of retirees arranged on a stage, a poster in red, white and blue that proclaimed "Strengthening Medicare" and a peppy president with microphone in hand.

But at the Riderwood Village retirement community last week in the Washington suburb of Silver Spring, Md., something different happened: the president got hit with hardballs by the crowd of 80-somethings. Not only did the retirees, many of them Democrats and former government officials, ask sharp questions about the day's topic, the Medicare prescription drug program, they took on Mr. Bush on global warming and nuclear war.

"I guess I'm one of the three left standing Americans who did the negotiation of the nonproliferation treaty," one of the retirees, Lawrence Weiler, a former official of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, told Mr. Bush. But the treaty can't hold, Mr. Weiler said, if the position of the United States is that it will initiate a nuclear war "if it is necessary." Would the president consider a "no-first-use" policy instead?

Mr. Bush, startled, said he would think about it, thanked Mr. Weiler for his contribution, then concluded the session with a "God bless you all." Afterward, White House officials insisted that they were pleased. "The president is at his best when he's answering real and difficult questions from a cross-section of Americans," said Nicolle Wallace, the White House communications director.

Whether that is the view of the people at the sessions is another question, but the fact remains that in the last three months, Mr. Bush has started taking questions, some of them tough, from audiences not stacked with supporters. Mr. Bush typically sidesteps the hardest questions, but his answers often produce news. It is a big change from last year and, particularly, from the 2004 campaign, when the president appeared before rapt crowds who had gotten in with tickets from local Republican parties.

DOJ_NMG_0018547

The result was Bush love-ins across red-state America, derision from Democrats and critical news coverage about canned events. White House officials say they took the heat because the events produced good sound bites for the local news and pumped up political troops. In 2005, they used a similar, equally criticized model — citizens screened by the White House sitting with Mr. Bush on panels and making points that underscored administration policy — in the president's failed campaign to overhaul Social Security.

The new approach began in Philadelphia in mid-December when Mr. Bush made a speech about Iraq to the World Affairs Council, a foreign policy group. With the campaign and Social Security out of the way and elections in Iraq pending, White House officials, along with Mr. Bush, reasoned that there was little to lose and much to gain by opening up. More to the point, the president had been criticized the week before for refusing to honor the tradition of taking questions after a speech at the Council of Foreign Relations in Washington.

"We like to mix things up so you'll pay more attention," said Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff, in explaining the new approach.

People did pay attention that day in Philadelphia, when Mr. Bush said in response to the first question that about 30,000 Iraqis had been killed in the Iraq war since the beginning of the American-led invasion in 2003. It was the first time that Mr. Bush had publicly given an estimate of Iraqi deaths, and White House officials scrambled to explain where it had come from — a Web site on Iraqi body counts, it turned out, and not an internal government accounting.

In February, White House officials scrambled again after Mr. Bush surprised them, and everyone else, by answering a question at a session in Tampa, Fla., with the news that he would support an expanded role by NATO and a doubling of United Nations peacekeepers in the Darfur crisis in western Sudan. Mr. Bush's comments were especially startling because the question had been about Uganda, not Sudan, although Mr. Bush segued by saying, "I presume if you're worried about northern Uganda, you're also worried about western Sudan, as am I."

Mr. Bush's answer reflected planning already under way at the United Nations and the State Department, but his public comments signaled a new American commitment to the crisis. The subject seemed to be on Mr. Bush's mind after a meeting earlier in the week with Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general. But his apparent off-the-cuff response underscored how a president could create policy with a few sentences on a Friday afternoon on the west coast of Florida.

"He doesn't have to check with the press office to see what we've said before," Ms. Wallace said. "He's the president; it's his prerogative."

In Silver Spring, Mr. Bush made news when he told a questioner who was struggling to help her 75-year-old mother decipher the complicated drug program that he was opposed to extending the May 15 deadline for enrollment.

"And the reason why is there's got to be a fixed time for people to sign up," Mr. Bush said flatly.

The president was less direct when another questioner asked if Medicare's chief actuary had really been threatened with dismissal if he told Congress the truth about the projected cost of the drug program, which was about $600 billion, not $400 billion, as the administration was saying publicly in 2003.

"There's been a lot of estimates of the cost of the program," Mr. Bush responded, neglecting to say that a 2004 investigation by the Department of Health and Human Services confirmed the man's question. The president did say, however, that "this is a good deal for you."

Lawmakers Get Out Of The House (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House of Representatives is on track this year to be in session for fewer days than the Congress Harry Truman labeled as "do-nothing" during his 1948 re-election campaign.

Members of Congress are taking an entire week off for St. Patrick's Day. It's the latest scheduling innovation to give members more time to meet with constituents.

DOJ_NMG_0018548

Through Friday, the House was in session for 19 days, compared with 33 for the Senate. If they stick to their current schedule — including two weeks off in April, a week in May and July, plus all of August — House members will spend 97 days in Washington this year.

The House was in session 108 days in 1948, according to the chamber's archives, compared with 141 days last year.

"This is an election year and people want to see more of their constituents," says House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

During the first two months of the year, House members logged a total of 47 hours in the Capitol. They took off almost the entire month of January, while the Senate confirmed Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court.

For both chambers, workweeks have become short in recent years. Roll call votes are seldom scheduled for Mondays or Fridays. In the House, they are often postponed until late Tuesday.

As a result, it's difficult to schedule committee meetings. Some panels meet when Congress is not in session, but not often.

When in Washington, lawmakers do a lot of multitasking. Last week, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., struggled to ready an immigration bill for the full Senate, as panel members drifted in and out of the room. They were juggling a floor debate on the budget and other meetings.

Critics contend Congress needs time to discuss important issues. "The Tuesday-to-Thursday work schedule is a detriment," says Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., who served five terms in the House during the 1980s and returned last year.

Some experts think an absentee Congress is not bad. "I don't think there's anything wrong with them being out of Washington," says John Samples of the Cato Institute, a think tank that favors limited government. "They might be better representatives."

Lawmakers will make $165,200 this year. Leaders get more.

GOP Struggles To Define Its Message For 2006 Elections (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

Republican efforts to craft a policy and political agenda to carry the party into the midterm elections have stumbled repeatedly as GOP leaders face widespread disaffection and disagreement within the ranks.

Anxiety over President Bush's Iraq policy, internal clashes over such divisive issues as immigration, and rising complaints that the party has abandoned conservative principles on spending restraint have all hobbled the effort to devise an election-year message, said several lawmakers involved in the effort.

While it is a Republican refrain that Democrats criticize Bush but have no positive vision, for now the governing party also has no national platform around which lawmakers are prepared to rally.

Every effort so far to produce such a platform has stumbled.

In January, Bush laid out a modest menu of ideas on health care and energy independence, but Congress has made little movement on them. Senior White House officials consulted with lawmakers earlier this year about jointly crafting an agenda that would allow Bush and Republicans in Congress -- both suffering from depressed public approval ratings -- to get off the defensive. A Republican familiar with the process said these discussions did not result in a consensus.

New House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) has been wrestling with the same problem, so far without success.

The struggles reflect philosophical differences among competing factions within the party, but they also underscore the political consequences of holding power. Republicans insist they remain united around core principles of smaller government, lower taxes and a strong national defense, but can no longer agree on how to implement that philosophy and are squabbling over their delivery on those commitments.

Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R) said the root of the problem is a failure of Washington Republicans to stick to principles, saying that his party risks losing power because it has done "a pretty poor job" of executing its small-government philosophy. "Republicans just need to take stock, go back and realize that the American people elected them because of their principles, and when you do not adhere to those principles, the American people are just as likely to turn you out and choose someone else."

DOJ_NMG_0018549

Lately, the drift Perry described has been on glaring display almost daily. A week ago, Republican speakers at a GOP gathering in Memphis complained about the breakdown in fiscal discipline. A few days later, lawmakers in Washington raised the federal debt ceiling by an additional $781 billion and voted to authorize more than $100 billion in new spending.

Republicans are engaged in a face-off in Congress over two sharply different views of how to deal with illegal immigration -- with no compromise in sight. The split between the White House and congressional Republicans over the Dubai port deal underscores cracks in the party's national security consensus and has given Democrats an opening to challenge the GOP on what has long been a core strength. Republicans do remain united behind Bush's Iraq policy, albeit nervously, with widespread concern that a violent and open-ended commitment in that nation will be a liability in November.

The president once clearly set the Republican agenda, and when his approval ratings were higher, congressional Republicans followed his lead. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said that model hit a wall last year when the president's centerpiece proposal to restructure Social Security "turned out to be not doable."

This year, Bush came back to Congress with a scaled-back agenda -- including tax incentives to expand health coverage and some money to study using wood chips and switch grass as alternative energy sources -- that Blunt said "is not as easily defined." And in Bush's weakened state, his proposals command less allegiance. "It's always the challenge of a second-term administration to keep the agenda fresh, to keep moving with the same intensity they had in the first term," Blunt said. "Combine that with less popularity, and people are much slower to salute the flag."

When asked last week whether Republicans had any broad visions to pursue this year, Boehner said, "Before the week is out, you will have a pretty good idea of what they are." But on Thursday night, after House members approved a $92 billion measure to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and ongoing hurricane relief, lawmakers left town for a week-long break with no agenda ready.

Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), the vice chairman of the House Republican Conference, said Boehner has been preparing an agenda based on four "silos": national security, retirement security, economic security and energy. But Republicans will have a difficult time turning those broad themes into legislative accomplishments.

The central plank of the national security agenda is border security and a crackdown on illegal immigration. But Republicans are deeply divided between those who favor increased enforcement at borders vs. those, including the president, who want to couple those measures with a guest worker program that would offer avenues for lawful employment for those already here illegally.

Under the retirement security rubric, House leaders would like to see a restructuring of the private pension system and permanent repeal of the estate tax. The former is within reach, although its political appeal may be limited. The latter almost certainly would die in a Senate filibuster. Likewise, the centerpiece of economic security -- an extension of Bush's first-term tax cuts -- faces long odds in the Senate.

Because of these realities, Republicans have adopted a midterm strategy designed to avoid making the election a national referendum on their performance or one that focuses on their policy divisions. Their goal is to concentrate less on the kind of positive message they have challenged the Democrats to produce and more on framing a choice that says, however unhappy voters may be right now with the Republicans' leadership, things would be worse if Democrats were in charge.

"If you are someone who favors small government," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "you're going to have a clear choice between someone who has cut taxes every year in office, who believes you ought to own your own health care . . . and who plans to cut the deficit over five years versus people who have consistently supported more spending, have opposed tax cuts and who oppose patients owning their own health care. The question is, who's on your side for reducing the size of government?"

Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, chided the Democrats last Thursday for not producing an agenda. But he insisted at the same time that such "inside-the-Beltway" debates will be of little consequence in November, when local issues will decide the closest congressional contests. "We have repeatedly guided our candidates: All politics are local," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0018550

In the absence of a positive national message, Republicans also hope to use long-standing "wedge issues" to galvanize their own base and try to put Democrats on record with unpopular votes. Congressional leaders, for instance, plan to push a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

Democratic pollster Geoffrey Garin said that even some once-powerful weapons in the Republican political arsenal have less appeal today than in the past. "Whether it's taxes or moral conservatism or national security, there's nothing the Republicans have said or done in their experimenting with message that outweighs this overwhelming sense Americans have that President Bush has misled the country onto a negative path," he said.

Republican pollster David Winston said his party can find broad consensus on jobs and competitiveness, fighting terrorism and securing U.S. borders. "Those are the three big items," he said. "There is unanimity on those three. Once you get beyond those three, there may be different senses of direction."

Blunt said it is more important for Democrats to produce a governing agenda because Republicans have a record to run on. But he also said action this year is essential. "We are, after all, legislators," he said. "We need to be making something better, eliminating something or moving in a new direction."

Republicans have a list of prospective priorities. Whether many will become law is problematic, although that does not seem to worry GOP leaders such as Blunt. "We'd like to see them become law, but a vote lets the people know where we stand," he said.

One Republican strategist, who asked not to be identified so he could speak openly about the party's problems, said divisions between moderates and conservatives have left the House and Senate Republican conferences in disarray. "Getting consensus on policy matters . . . is very difficult," he said. "That has caused stagnation and led to perceptions that Republican governance is going nowhere."

Bush Ignores GOP Rebuffs In Congress (CHIST)

By Robert Novak

Chicago Sun-Times, March 20, 2006

"Presidents come and go," Rep. Jerry Lewis told the House Rules Committee last Wednesday. That was a reason Lewis gave, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, for opposing President Bush's proposed line-item veto. But the broader meaning of what he said suggested the congressional Republican majority's mind-set: Bush's presence is evanescent and not to be equated with the permanence of legislators.

Lewis is a 71-year-old 14-termer who has been in public office continuously for 38 years and is known as a dependable Republican regular. It is not in character for Lewis to so casually dismiss the new fiscal initiative by a president under fire for lack of an agenda. The former insurance salesman from Redlands, Calif., is not known for swimming upstream against the Republican tide, and he was not doing so last week.

Lewis' opposition to the Bush proposal did not make headlines, and neither did similar acts of opposition to the Republican president by Republicans in Congress. As if responding to a silent signal, similar acts of defiance were simultaneously erupting all over Capitol Hill. This constitutes no rebellion and is not even a divorce. Rather, it is a trial separation of congressional Republicans from their president.

More than half a century has passed since an unpopular president has been subjected to such treatment from a Congress controlled by his own party. Harry Truman's Gallup approval rating reached its low of 23 percent in January 1952 as he began his last year as president. Burdened by the military stalemate in Korea, President Truman appeared uninterested in the wrecking of his program by the congressional Democratic majority. Bush, with his latest Gallup rating at 36 percent as he copes with another unpopular war, seemed similarly detached from the rebuffs handed him last week.

The White House did not react when Lewis called the president's line-item veto "a very serious error" because it would "change the relationship between the president and the legislative branch." Lewis told me he has not been contacted by the president or his agents. Nor was there a presidential reaction to these further indignities:

DOJ_NMG_0018551

*At a town hall meeting Wednesday in Silver Spring, Md., Bush rejected a delay in the May 15 deadline to apply for Medicare prescription drug subsidies because "there's got to be a fixed time for people to sign up." Two hours later, the Senate voted 76-22 for a delay.

*On that same Wednesday, the House International Relations Committee overrode Bush's opposition and voted 37-3 to force the president into imposing sanctions on Iran. Even Chairman Henry Hyde, a Bush supporter, changed his mind and ended up voting for this bill.

*To complete the week Thursday, the Senate piled an additional $16 billion on the budget resolution. At the same time, Bush's efforts to slow the growth of mandatory government spending were defeated.

Although there was no sign of the president lobbying to deflect this carnage, he was at the packed ballroom of the Washington Hilton on Thursday night for the House Republican fund-raiser ($2,000 a plate or $5,000 for the reception and a photo with Bush). GOP lawmakers may disdain Bush's policies, but they respect his ability to raise money for their campaigns.

Even when he was getting battered by Congress, Truman liked to call up his former Senate colleagues for a poker-playing cruise on the presidential yacht. Bush does not care to spend his spare time with members of Congress, and it was extraordinary that Bush traveled to the Capitol on Wednesday for National Hungary Day. Typically, the White House legislative affairs office was not consulted, and the president mistakenly talked about the March 15 event commemorating the 1956 anti-communist uprising rather than the 1848 revolution.

One of the president's top political operatives is telling the party's members of Congress that they should support Bush, not out of loyalty, but for self-preservation. In 1952, Democrats in Congress, accustomed to more than 20 years in power, thought they could survive by separating themselves from Truman. Instead, Republicans swept the November elections, which might be an object lesson about abandonment of their president.

Private Account Language Fails (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

In a little-noticed vote last Thursday, the Senate went on record, apparently for the first time, against President Bush's proposal to set up personal investment accounts under Social Security, with some unexpected Republicans helping a unified Democratic Caucus defeat the nonbinding proposal.

"This is now the starting point," said Wesley Denton, spokesman for Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), who offered the Social Security amendment to the fiscal 2007 budget resolution. "We now know where everybody stands. We know who the obstacles to reform are, and we can take the debate and go from there."

Eight Republicans joined all 45 Democrats in opposing the DeMint amendment, which would have directed the creation of a reserve fund for Social Security, but only after the Senate produced legislation allowing younger workers to divert a portion of their Social Security taxes into personal investment accounts or permitting some other type of "legally binding ownership" of a worker's Social Security money.

The 46-53 vote was sandwiched in with 20 consecutive votes on amendments to the budget resolution.

The Republican centrist votes in opposition — including Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.), Susan Collins (Maine), Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Olympia Snowe (Maine) — were hardly a surprise. But the amendment also forced the hands of some less likely Republican opponents, including Sens. Conrad Burns (Mont.), Pete Domenici (N.M.), Dick Lugar (Ind.) and Jim Talent (Mo.) — who have typically been more loyal to the GOP leadership.

Chafee, Burns, and Talent all have tough re-election races this year. Snowe and Lugar also will be on the ballot in November, though their seats are considered safe.

While the vote received little press attention at the time, Democrats — who have tried to turn all talk of personal accounts under Social Security into a campaign issue (See related story, p. 11.) — made note of the vulnerable Republican Senators who voted for it.

DOJ_NMG_0018552

In a news release, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee blasted three GOP Senators up for re-election next year — Rick Santorum (Pa.), Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Jon Kyl (Ariz.) — for voting "to raid the Social Security trust fund in an effort to advance the President's unpopular plan to privatize Social Security."

For his part, DeMint accused the 53 Senators who voted against his measure of raiding Social Security as well.

In his own release, DeMint excoriated his detractors: "Now, every senator will be on record whether they oppose or support the raid. This said absolutely nothing about personal accounts, it was about whether you believe Social Security should be saved or allowed to wither on the vine."

Though the Senate voted on several Social Security-related amendments during last year's budget debate, this is the first time Senators have actually voted on anything resembling Bush's personal account proposal.

Denton said the vote marks "the first substantive vote in years" on Social Security. He added that DeMint was pleased with the number of Senators who voted with him, given the Democrats' nearly uniform opposition to personal accounts.

"I think a lot of people expected us to get a lot less votes than we did," Denton said.

President Bush began the debate to overhaul the government's guaranteed retirement safety net when he proposed personal accounts during his 2005 State of the Union address as a part of his "ownership society" agenda. Though it was much discussed in Congress last year, GOP leaders concluded that they did not have the votes to pass Bush's Social Security plan and that they might suffer at the ballot box in November if they were to pass such legislation.

While DeMint insisted the language of his amendment would not necessarily require the creation of private accounts, Baucus took exception to that argument.

"My colleagues are not being fooled," said Senate Finance ranking member Max Baucus (D-Mont.) in a floor speech. "This is privatization, pure and simple."

The exact language of DeMint's amendment would have allowed the Senate Budget Committee to set up a reserve fund for the Social Security surplus, but only if the Senate Finance Committee approves legislation that, among other things, provides younger workers the "voluntary option ... to obtain legally binding ownership of a portion of their [Social Security] benefits."

Baucus wasn't the only one to say that DeMint's amendment appeared to be trying to lay the groundwork for personal accounts under Social Security.

"This clearly was a way to try to advance private accounts under Social Security, and Sen. Snowe has been clear that she's not against private accounts, per se, but she does have concerns about diverting money away from the traditional Social Security program in order to create private accounts," said Snowe spokeswoman Antonia Ferrier.

Denton said the amendment would obviously permit a bill with personal accounts, "but it would also allow Democrats or anyone else to come up with another plan that meets" the "ownership" criteria.

Sen. Mike Crapo (R-Idaho), a DeMint supporter, said he supported the amendment because it offered a way to ensure that Congress does not continue to dip into the Social Security trust fund coffers to pay for other programs — not because it had anything to do with personal accounts.

"I'm saddened this amendment was characterized inaccurately as a privatization move," said Crapo in a statement. "It is unfortunate that we continue to have partisan rhetoric cloud the issue."

Social Security Reform Rejected (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

Last week, during the Senate budget debate, Republicans raised the issue of Social Security reform, and Democrats -- surprised that the issue won't go away -- pledged to make it a major campaign issue this year.

"The issue that won't die," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer after the Senate narrowly defeated a Social Security amendment to the budget bill.

"It's going to be one of the big issues in 2006," pledged the New York Democrat, who is chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "They just gave us more fuel."

DOJ_NMG_0018553

Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, offered the proposal, which would have let Congress create a reserve fund protected under budget rules to save the Social Security surplus to pay for future benefits instead of other federal programs, as happens now.

"There is simply no way to save Social Security if we don't have the courage to stop using the surplus as a secret slush fund," Mr. DeMint said. "We will not be deterred by cynics who offer no solutions."

The Senate defeated the proposal 53-46, with eight Republicans voting no, but Democrats still called it a step towards creating the Social Security private accounts that President Bush wants.

Mr. Schumer pledged to tell voters that electing a Democratic Senate is the only way to "make sure Social Security isn't privatized."

"Any time there's an opportunity to privatize Social Security, they'll take it," said Sen. Max Baucus, Montana Democrat. He said the DeMint proposal was "evidence today that they're going to stick with it."

Mr. Bush's proposal to let individuals divert a part of the Social Security's payroll tax into personal retirement accounts was "soundly rejected by the American people," yet Republicans still pursue it, Mr. Baucus said.

But supporters of the proposal said Democrats just want the status quo, under which Social Security will crumble. Mr. DeMint said his proposal stated "absolutely nothing about personal accounts," but was "about whether you believe Social Security should be saved or allowed to wither on the vine."

"I'm saddened this amendment was characterized inaccurately as a privatization move," said Sen. Michael D. Crapo, Idaho Republican. "The American public and future generations of taxpayers will suffer if we cannot address the issues regarding Social Security and fiscal discipline."

Democrats aren't the only ones who see a campaign issue. "Those who voted against this amendment voted to raid Social Security," Mr. DeMint said. "Now, every senator will be on record whether they oppose or support the raid."

Including interest, Congress has raided $1.7 trillion from Social Security since 1985, according to Mr. DeMint's office. Mr. Bush's Social Security proposal never gained enough momentum in Congress, but administration officials, some Republicans and even Mr. Bush himself continue to raise the issue from time to time. In his State of the Union speech, Mr. Bush called for a commission to investigate options for saving the system, and just days later he mentioned his personal-accounts proposal in his long-term budget outline.

A Contractor's Purchase On Power (WP)

By Charles R. Babcock And Renae Merle

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

The consulting work that MZM Inc. received from a Pentagon agency in 2003 was for only $40,000, but to company owner Mitchell J. Wade, the face value was just the beginning.

Over the following year, the work grew to $4 million as MZM added employees that the government had not asked for; pressed successfully for the agreement to be on a "time and materials" basis so it could bill for hours worked; and left the impression that Wade could pull strings, if necessary, to get his way.

According to excerpts of e-mails collected by a Pentagon employee and provided to The Washington Post, one contract official inaccurately thought Wade was a former undersecretary of defense. Another wrote that "Mitch Wade is a force to be reckonned (sic) with . . . he has a lot of perceived power that can slow us down . . . maybe even grind us to a halt."

The recent corruption conviction of former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham -- and Wade's recent guilty plea for bribing him -- focused attention on Congress's practice of "earmarking," or setting aside, federal money for favored interests.

A review of the rise and fall of Wade and his company, based on interviews and MZM and government documents, shows that bribing Cunningham was only one part of Wade's formula for success. His firm, which had no prime federal contracts in fiscal 2002, collected more than $170 million over the next three years, thanks not just to Cunningham, but also to Wade's ability to take practices common among government contractors and push them to the limit.

In a tight labor market, he paid well above the going rate for workers with security clearances -- wages that left others in the government contracting industry puzzled. He freely distributed title and rank, appointing more than 100 vice presidents, executive vice presidents and "senior executive vice presidents" in a company of about 400 people. He aggressively used the "revolving door" between the government's defense and intelligence bureaucracy and the private industry, attracting top talent and often sending new hires back to work on contracts at their former agencies and to try to cultivate new business.

DOJ_NMG_0018554

MZM was able as the sole bidder to win a "blanket purchase agreement" for up to $225 million over five years in Pentagon technology work, though procurement regulations require at least three competitive bids.

Kenneth L. Wainstein, U.S. attorney for the District, said after Wade's guilty plea that the agreement amounted to "a $225 million blank check drawn on taxpayer funds."

Cunningham admitted accepting at least $2.4 million from Wade and three other men over the past several years in return for official favors, including steering money for contracts their way. The California Republican was sentenced to eight years and four months in prison earlier this month. That was a week after Wade pleaded guilty to four felony counts for his role in the case. MZM was sold last summer to a New York investment firm, which changed its name but kept many of its contracts and people.

Wade, who declined an interview request through his lawyer, had learned the intricacies of the procurement system from the inside. He was a civilian worker at the Pentagon, working at times on classified programs, from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s. He then became a consultant to Brent Wilkes, a San Diego defense contractor who was so close to Cunningham that competitors complained the congressman was giving Wilkes's company favored treatment. In the following years, Wade supplanted Wilkes as Cunningham's favorite, and Wilkes -- who has been implicated but not charged in the scandal -- ended up as an MZM subcontractor.

Wade first bribed Cunningham on Nov. 16, 2001, according to prosecutors' court papers. That Friday, barely two months after the terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, the contractor bought the congressman $12,000 worth of antiques, and Cunningham told Wade that he would make him "somebody." At the time, the government filings said, MZM had contracts of less than $1 million a year.

Their partnership became apparent early the next year as Wade requested a $15 million earmark for a counterintelligence program. He was also working at the time to get on the General Services Administration's schedule of companies authorized to seek federal business, a prelude to the broader intelligence-related "blanket purchase agreement" he pursued that summer and fall.

Cunningham requested that $7.5 million be set aside for MZM's program and made it his first priority, according to his office's internal chart, which prosecutors filed as an exhibit. The House approved the earmark in June, and it passed Congress as part of the defense appropriations bill in October, though at a slightly reduced level.

The GSA officials who approved MZM's application to join its schedule were supposed to ensure that the hourly labor rates Wade charged were "fair and reasonable." They were, however, higher than some other contractors from the region offering the same types of services, according to labor rates published by the GSA.

According to several sources inside and outside the company, including some former employees, Wade attracted staff by offering tens of thousands of dollars more than the going salary. The sources agreed to speak only on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject. As his company grew, he hired people like retired Army Lt. Gen. James King, who held several high positions at Pentagon intelligence agencies and now runs Athena Innovative Solutions Inc., MZM's successor company. Wade also hired David Holmes, a former CIA lawyer; John Quattrocki, a high-ranking FBI officer; and Kay Coles James, the former head of the Bush administration's Office of Personnel Management.

The blanket purchase agreement, signed with a Defense Department contracting office in September of 2002, was written so broadly that any agency inside or outside the Pentagon could order a wide variety of help. It seemed crafted for the Bush administration's post-Sept. 11 push for more defense and intelligence spending. It referred to homeland security, law enforcement planning, geospatial integration, document exploitation and what is called MASINT, for measurement and signature intelligence.

The Defense Information Systems Agency refused to answer questions about how it selected MZM. But it announced last summer, after Wade's relationship with Cunningham was exposed, that it was cutting off further work. It said it realized Wade's company was the only one that responded to its initial request, when federal regulations required three bidders.

DOJ_NMG_0018555

To ensure that MZM "could milk that account without interruption or interference" from the Defense Department officials who oversaw the contract, Wade enticed them with personal favors, the government said in court documents filed along with Wade's guilty plea. He hired the son of one Defense Department official at the Army's National Ground Intelligence Center in Charlottesville in early 2002, when MZM was still a subcontractor. In return, the official gave MZM inside information and favorable performance reviews ensuring further work, prosecutors alleged.

The matter is still under investigation.

The first order under the blanket agreement was in October 2002, a $193,281 order to do a "concept report" of a computer system in Charlottesville. Wade apparently felt so confident of his company's future with the ground intelligence center that he opened an office nearby.

The next order, in late January 2003, was much larger, though the client for the $6.1 million contract isn't clear from sketchy descriptions released under the Freedom of Information Act. A few weeks later, MZM got an order for $12.7 million.

Two days after the war in Iraq started, MZM won a $1.2 million contract to provide interpreters for "post conflict" work. And in March, Wade's company got a $6.2 million contract, this one with the Pentagon's new Counter Intelligence Field Activity. In fiscal 2003, MZM got a total of $38.6 million in orders through the blanket purchase agreement.

That climbed to $65 million, then $60 million in the following two years, as Cunningham continued to add earmarks to make more money available for programs Wade worked on, and the contractor continued his bribes for the congressman. Those included the use of a 42-foot yacht renamed the Duke-Stir, a used Rolls Royce, more antiques and the purchase of his home in San Diego for $700,000 more than it was worth -- even a check for $115,100 to pay the capital gains on Cunningham's inflated profit on the home sale.

As MZM's revenue soared, so did Wade's personal spending. He and his second wife owned a $3 million house in Kalorama. He took his staff on outings to the Greenbrier resort and Bermuda. He started the Sure Foundation, named after a Christian verse, to help children around the world who were victims of war and unrest.

The global war on terror was good for business. There was lots of work at the National Ground Intelligence Center and the Counterintelligence Field Activity. The Pentagon called on MZM to help seek counters to roadside bombs in Iraq. The Special Operations Command in Tampa needed help too. And thanks to an earmark from Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. (R-Va.), MZM was picked to run a Foreign Supplier Assessment Center in Martinsville, Va., to check out foreign-based contractors.

Last July, a month after the San Diego Union-Tribune triggered the investigation by disclosing the home sale, the Pentagon was still telling Cunningham's office that money was in the pipeline for his latest MZM earmarks.

'Phishing' Scheme Targets Thrift Savings Plan Holders (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

Last week's scare at the Thrift Savings Plan is an opportunity to offer this reminder: Do not click on Web links in unsolicited e-mails.

Someone, or some group, operating from somewhere, took advantage of the TSP's trusted name in a scam to rip off credit card and bank accounts. The scheme was built around a fictional TSP e-mail and a bogus TSP Web site.

After calls started pouring in from plan participants about the suspicious e-mail, the TSP staff played it safe and shut down part of the agency's Internet operation, stopping account transactions. They also called in the FBI.

"It was the first time we have had a phishing situation where they are sending people to something that looks like our Web site," a TSP official said.

The TSP, a 401(k)-type retirement savings program, has more than 3.5 million participants and assets of more than $178 billion. The plan uses the Internet to provide account information to participants and to process withdrawals, interfund transfers and other transactions.

TSP officials have no tally of how many people got the phony e-mail or how many responded and turned over personal financial information. Although it appears that many of the e-mails went to government employees and retirees, TSP officials said they have been contacted by persons who are not TSP enrollees. Some people did fall for the scheme, the officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0018556

The officials pointed out that TSP does not maintain e-mail addresses for participants and never asks participants to provide credit card or banking information, such as pass codes for automated teller machines.

The phony e-mail informed recipients that a new e-mail address had been added for their TSP accounts and directed them to click on a link to www.tsp.gov "if you did not authorize this change."

The link, however, did not take the recipient to tsp.gov but to a mock site, where people were directed to type in their Social Security number and TSP personal identification number, or PIN.

Once completed, the e-mail recipient was sent an "unblock form" that should have sent up red flags to readers because of poor grammar and misspellings.

"If you see this message means that your account is bloked and u got a notification email, enter the information below and click on the Unblock my Account button," the Web page began. It directed readers to type in a credit card number and their "Atm PIN Number."

The TSP is not the only federal agency exploited for online identity-theft schemes known as "phishing." E-mails claiming to be from the Internal Revenue Service have been on the increase, even though the IRS does not communicate with taxpayers electronically.

The TSP learned about 2 p.m. Thursday that it was being impersonated and stopped transactions on its Web site at about 6 p.m. On Thursday night, TSP posted a notice warning participants about the scam.

After the scammers turned off their bogus Web site on Friday, officials restored full service on the TSP site.

TSP officials suspect that the scammers were after credit card information and doubt they could meet criteria for taking money out of a TSP account. But they said reviews are underway to detect any suspicious activity in TSP accounts.

The scam, however, has disrupted processing of loans and withdrawals, which may be delayed for two days, in part because of the TSP internal review.

If you received one of the phony e-mails, TSP urges you to read a special notice posted on tsp.gov under the heading "E-Mail Scam" and use a toll-free phone number to contact a customer service representative.On the Move

Mark A. Robbins , who worked on E Street NW as general counsel at the Office of Personnel Management, is now working on F Street, as the executive director of the president's Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board.

The board was created by Congress to ensure that privacy and civil liberties issues are given appropriate consideration in the development of counterterrorism policy. Carol E. Dinkins serves as chairman and Alan Charles Raul as vice chairman.

Bogus Bush Bashing (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

"The single word most frequently associated with George W. Bush today is 'incompetent,' and close behind are two other increasingly mentioned descriptors: 'idiot' and 'liar.' " So says the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, whose most recent poll found that only 33 percent of the public approves of the job President Bush is doing.

Mr. Bush, of course, bears primary responsibility for the state of his presidency. But there's more going on here than his personal inadequacy; we're looking at the failure of a movement as well as a man. As evidence, consider the fact that most of the conservatives now rushing to distance themselves from Mr. Bush still can't bring themselves to criticize his actual policies. Instead, they accuse him of policy sins — in particular, of being a big spender on domestic programs — that he has not, in fact, committed.

Before I get to the bogus issue of domestic spending, let's look at the policies the new wave of conservative Bush bashers refuses to criticize.

Mr. Bush's new conservative critics don't say much about the issue that most disturbs the public, the quagmire in Iraq. That's not surprising. Commentators who acted as cheerleaders in the run-up to war, and in many cases questioned the patriotism of those of us who were skeptical, can't criticize the decision to start this war without facing up to their own complicity in that decision.

DOJ_NMG_0018557

Nor, after years of insisting that things were going well in Iraq and denouncing anyone who said otherwise, is it easy for them to criticize Mr. Bush's almost surreal bungling of the war. (William Kristol of The Weekly Standard is the exception; he says that we never made a "serious effort" in Iraq, which will come as news to the soldiers.)

Meanwhile, the continuing allegiance of conservatives to tax cuts as the universal policy elixir prevents them from saying anything about the real sources of the federal budget deficit, in particular Mr. Bush's unprecedented decision to cut taxes in the middle of a war. (My colleague Bob Herbert points out that the Iraq hawks chose to fight a war with other people's children. They chose to fight it with other people's money, too.)

They can't even criticize Mr. Bush for the systematic dishonesty of his budgets. For one thing, that dishonesty has been apparent for five years. More than that, some prominent conservative commentators actually celebrated the administration's dishonesty. In 2001 Time.com blogger Andrew Sullivan, writing in The New Republic, conceded that Mr. Bush wasn't truthful about his economic policies. But Mr. Sullivan approved of the deception: "Bush has to obfuscate his real goals of reducing spending with the smokescreen of 'compassionate conservatism.' " As Berkeley's Brad DeLong puts it on his blog, conservatives knew that Mr. Bush was lying about the budget, but they thought they were in on the con.

So what's left? Well, it's safe for conservatives to criticize Mr. Bush for presiding over runaway growth in domestic spending, because that implies that he betrayed his conservative supporters. There's only one problem with this criticism: it's not true.

It's true that federal spending as a percentage of G.D.P. rose between 2001 and 2005. But the great bulk of this increase was accounted for by increased spending on defense and homeland security, including the costs of the Iraq war, and by rising health care costs.

Conservatives aren't criticizing Mr. Bush for his defense spending. Since the Medicare drug program didn't start until 2006, the Bush administration can't be blamed for the rise in health care costs before then. Whatever other fiscal excesses took place weren't large enough to play more than a marginal role in spending growth.

So where does the notion of Bush the big spender come from? In a direct sense it comes largely from Brian Riedl of the Heritage Foundation, who issued a report last fall alleging that government spending was out of control. Mr. Riedl is very good at his job; his report shifts artfully back and forth among various measures of spending (nominal, real, total, domestic, discretionary, domestic discretionary), managing to convey the false impression that soaring spending on domestic social programs is a major cause of the federal budget deficit without literally lying.

But the reason conservatives fall for the Heritage spin is that it suits their purposes. They need to repudiate George W. Bush, but they can't admit that when Mr. Bush made his key mistakes — starting an unnecessary war, and using dishonest numbers to justify tax cuts — they were cheering him on.

Illogical Cutbacks On Cancer (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

When I was a kid I had the wildest crush on my Uncle Breeze's wife, Betty. She was beautiful and with all my heart I wanted to grow up and marry someone just like her.

I remember acutely the sadness I felt some years later when my mother told me that Aunt Betty was ill. She died not long after that. Cervical cancer.

This old memory was brought back to me by, of all things, a small but telling item in President Bush's mammoth budget proposal.

The federal government has a national breast and cervical cancer early detection program, run by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. It provides screening and other important services to low-income women who do not have health insurance, or are underinsured.

There is agreement across the board that the program is a success. It saves lives and it saves money. Its biggest problem is that it doesn't reach enough women. At the moment there is only enough funding to screen one in five eligible women.

DOJ_NMG_0018558

A sensible policy position for the Bush administration would be to expand funding for the program so that it reached everyone who was eligible. It terms of overall federal spending, the result would be a net decrease. Preventing cancer, or treating it early, is a lot less expensive than treating advanced cancer.

So what did this president do? He proposed a cut in the program of $1.4 million (a minuscule amount when you're talking about the national budget), which would mean that 4,000 fewer women would have access to early detection.

This makes no sense. In human terms, it is cruel. From a budget standpoint, it's self-defeating.

"The program is really designed to help working women," said Dan Smith, a senior vice president at the American Cancer Society. "They may be working at a job that doesn't provide health insurance, but they're not the poorest of the poor who would qualify for Medicaid."

In many cases, these are women who do not have family doctors who might encourage them to be screened. The program offers free mammograms, Pap tests and other early detection services. "If they're diagnosed," said Mr. Smith, "there's a complementary program that allows them to be immediately insured so they can actually have the coverage for their treatment. That's a great program, as well."

"The early detection program is a good program because it has saved lives," said Dr. Harold Freeman, a senior adviser to the Cancer Society. "The women who are served come from a population that has a proven higher death rate from cervical and breast cancer."

He added: "It's hard to get into the health care system when you are asymptomatic. It's much easier to get into the system if you're obviously sick, if you're bleeding or in pain. But the problem with cancer is, if you're going to be cured, you have to get in before those kinds of symptoms occur. So these women need to be screened."

Dr. Freeman, a New York physician who has long specialized in the prevention and treatment of cancer, made it clear that his first concern was the health and quality of life of his patients. But then he addressed what he characterized as the "shortsighted" economic rationale for the budget cut.

"It won't save money," he said. "You don't save money by not diagnosing cancer early. You end up spending more money because anyone who develops cancer will get into the health care system and they will be treated. And the cost at that point will be a lot more. The logic here is very simple: the later you diagnose cancer of the breast or cervix, the more expensive it is to the country."

This is just one program in a range of cancer services that rely on support from the federal government. As if immune to the extent of human suffering involved, President Bush has proposed a barrage of cuts for these programs.

"What's really amazing," said Mr. Smith, "is that the president cut every cancer program. He cut the colorectal cancer program. He cut research at the National Cancer Institute. He cut literally every one of our cancer-specific programs. It's incomprehensible."

A bipartisan movement is under way in the Senate to block the president's proposed cuts. How that ultimately will fare is unclear.

What is clear is that cancer is a disease that horrifies most Americans, and with good reason. One out of every two men will contract the disease in his lifetime, and one out of every three women.

This is an area in which we need to be doing more, not less.

Fining The Blues (WP)

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

THE FEDERAL Communications Commission is in a tough spot when it comes to enforcing the law against broadcast indecency. Determining what crosses the line from acceptable to indecent and therefore can't be broadcast before 10 p.m. isn't easy in an increasingly coarse culture. As network programming has become racier and more graphic, the FCC has been deluged with complaints in recent years, understandably so. Parental controls such as the V-chip can help shield children from inappropriate programs, but they aren't always effective; sports and awards shows, for example, aren't rated in advance.

At the same time, the theory that allows broadcasters to be fined for such speech consistent with the First Amendment -- that "uniquely pervasive presence" of broadcast media "in the lives of all Americans" -- seems increasingly obsolete in an age when the overwhelming majority of American households (more than 85 percent) get their television programming via cable or satellite -- receiving numerous channels that aren't subject to indecency rules. As a result, a single profanity uttered on one (broadcast) channel can result in a multimillion-dollar fine, while worse language spoken at the very same time on another (cable) channel is exempt from regulation.

DOJ_NMG_0018559

Last week the FCC once again ventured into this politically, legally and emotionally charged territory, ruling on complaints involving nearly 50 programs broadcast between February 2002 and March 2005 and signaling a renewed zeal for indecency enforcement under its new Republican chairman, Kevin J. Martin. The commission upheld a $550,000 fine against CBS for Janet Jackson's infamous "wardrobe malfunction" in which her breast was exposed during the 2004 Super Bowl halftime show, and it levied a record $3.6 million fine against the same network for an episode of the drama "Without a Trace" that featured what the commission called a "teen sex orgy."

One particularly disturbing aspect of the ruling involved a Martin Scorsese-produced documentary, "The Blues: Godfathers and Sons," broadcast by a community college public television station in San Mateo, Calif. The documentary included scenes in which musicians and a producer used numerous profanities. The FCC, citing a previous decision that profanity in "Saving Private Ryan" would not subject broadcasters to indecency fines, noted that "in rare contexts, language that is presumptively profane" will still be allowed "where it is demonstrably essential to the nature of an artistic or educational work or essential to informing viewers on a matter of public importance."

But the commissioners didn't find that standard was satisfied in the case of the documentary, whose educational purpose, it said, "could have been fulfilled and all viewpoints expressed without the repeated broadcast of expletives." Really? How do they know better than, say, Mr. Scorsese? As commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein, a Democrat, wrote in dissenting, "It is certain to strike fear into the hearts of news and documentary makers, and broadcasters that air them, which could chill the future expression of constitutionally protected speech." This is a dangerous kind of line-drawing -- one better left to filmmakers, or even television executives, than government bureaucrats.

Is Anyone Listening? (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, March 20, 2006

The banner hanging over President George W. Bush read united to victory. But as Republicans listened to Bush slog through his familiar pep talk at a $2,500-a-head fund-raiser last Thursday night, the party faithful knew they were anything but united. Over the last year, they ejected a majority leader, squabbled over ethics and spending, and openly criticized the president on Iraq, port security and a Supreme Court pick. If the Republican guests were hoping for a spiritual revival, they left disappointed. Bush's speech met with tepid applause, and GOP officials shuffled to the cash bar feeling deflated. "It just wasn't as celebratory as it has been," said one House aide who declined to be named when talking about a private event.

For five years nobody needed to blare the word "united" at Republicans; it was their biggest strength. The president handed his agenda to Congress and the party leaders delivered the votes. They twisted the arms of small-government conservatives to pass education reforms and Medicare drug benefits. They held their ranks together even as the Iraq occupation spiraled downward in 2004. And they picked up seats in two election cycles. But now that strategy has fallen apart. Members of Congress, tired of being taken for granted by an overbearing White House, have lost faith in the president's political touch. Social Security, Katrina, Harriet Miers, ports and, of course, Iraq have destroyed the aura of invincibility that once gave Team Bush its swagger.

The stress is starting to show. Republicans are beginning to look and sound like their own caricature of the Democrats: disorganized, off message and unsure of their identity. Fearful of defeat in November, GOP candidates are uncertain how to pull themselves together in the eight months left before the elections. The toughest question: whether to run, as they have in the past, as W Republicans, or to airbrush the president out of their campaigns. "What I've tried to tell people is that a political tsunami is gathering, and if we don't do something to stop it, we'll be in the minority a year from now," says Rep. Ray LaHood from Illinois. "But some people still don't get it."

The president won't have an easy time persuading wobbly Republicans to stick with him. Bush recorded his lowest approval rating in the NEWSWEEK Poll, with 36 percent; congressional Republicans trailed Democrats by 11 points (39 to 50 percent). Second-term presidents often suffer a six-year slump, losing seats for their party at this point in their tenure. But Reagan, Johnson and Eisenhower—who all watched their parties crater in their sixth year—enjoyed approval ratings in the high 50s or low 60s, according to Gallup. Bush has actually been lucky in one respect. He held his party together longer than most two-term presidents. Johnson kept control for just eight months until he suffered defeat on the parochial issue of home rule for the District of Columbia in 1965, when Democrats took him on—and won. "They saw they could vote against the president and wake up alive the next day," says presidential historian Michael Beschloss.

DOJ_NMG_0018560

Republicans in Congress had the same revelation when they slapped Bush down on the Dubai ports deal. Even so, the White House and its party operatives still believe they can muscle Capitol Hill back in line. Bush's aides say that it would be suicidal for members to run away from the president. In strategy memos circulated on the Hill, Republican National Committee pollsters argue that disunity will only discourage the base from turning out to vote. But even the party's analysts concede that standing shoulder to shoulder with Bush may not always be the best way to win. In one RNC memo, pollster Dave Sackett argues that incumbents need to demonstrate their "independence" and disagreements with party leaders, but still present "an overall unified front." (The easiest way to project unity: defend Bush against attacks from the other side. That's why the GOP seized on Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold's futile attempt to censure the president over the National Security Agency eavesdropping program.)

In one way, Bush has succeeded in uniting his own party: almost everyone is together in sniping at him. Some are pressing for staff changes at the White House. Sen. Norm Coleman told the Associated Press last week that he wanted to see a new White House team with "fresh political antenna." Others are telling Bush's aides to keep the current team away from the cameras. "You are losing the message," LaHood told one White House session on Iraq last week. "We don't need Don Rumsfeld or the generals or anybody in the military out trying to explain this to the American people." The White House responded tartly that there is no staff shake-up in the works.

Some candidates are happy to stand beside Bush, as long as nobody actually sees them together. Locked in a tight race for re-election, Sen. Mike DeWine chose not to accompany Bush on one trip to his home state of Ohio last month. A week later he attended a private fund-raiser with the president in Cincinnati—out of sight of photographers and reporters.

Even Hill leaders are substituting their own agendas for the president's. In the Senate, Bill Frist announced his own immigration bill last week that focuses on border security, not the temporary-worker program favored by the president. In the House, new Majority Leader John Boehner is also striking out independently. Boehner has drawn up an eight-week strategy, without White House input, that includes a Higher Education week and Protecting the Homeland week. "This is our plan and our message," says one GOP leadership aide, who spoke anonymously about strategy. "It is our a— on the line."

Republicans once happily attacked Democrats for second-guessing the commander in chief on Iraq and the war on terror. Now they are daring to do the same. Last week House and Senate leaders backed a new bipartisan panel to study Iraq policy and draw up alternatives to Bush's current war plan. A year ago GOP members would have saluted Bush and accused his critics of "undermining the troops." But now they are ready to march in a different direction. The only question is where they'll end up.

OTHER NEWS:

Snow Defends President's Handling Of Economy (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Confronting criticism of the Bush administration's economic record, Treasury Secretary John Snow said the widening gap between high-paid and low-paid Americans reflects a labor market efficiently rewarding more-productive people. But he insisted Americans are still broadly sharing in the economic expansion.

"What's been happening in the United States for about 20 years is [a] long-term trend to differentiate compensation," Mr. Snow said in an interview with The Wall Street Journal last week. "Look at the Harvard economics faculty, look at doctors over here at George Washington University...look at baseball players, look at football players. We've moved into a star system for some reason which is not fully understood. Across virtually all professions, there have been growing gaps."

DOJ_NMG_0018561

Mr. Snow said the same phenomenon explains why compensation for corporate chief executive officers has climbed so sharply. "In an aggregate sense, it reflects the marginal productivity of CEOs. Do I trust the market for CEOs to work efficiently? Yes. Until we can find a better way to compensate CEOs, I'm going to trust the marketplace."

Since the 1970s, CEO compensation has gone from 40 times to more than 300 times the average worker's salary, according to a study by Carola Frydman of Harvard University and Raven Saks of the Federal Reserve.

Mr. Snow, a former CEO of CSX Corp. who holds a doctorate in economics, said the administration intends to publicly challenge perceptions that typical workers and families haven't benefited much from the economic expansion. The extent to which the expansion has been broadly shared is "the new sort of battle line in the political arena," he said.

Economic output has increased at an annualized pace of almost 4% since mid-2003, and the unemployment rate has fallen to 4.8% from 6.3%. Despite that, polls show more Americans think the economy is worsening than think it is improving.

Mr. Snow distributed a fact sheet that showed after-tax income per person, adjusted for inflation, rose 8.2% from January 2001, when George W. Bush took office as president, through January 2006. The sheet also showed that per-person net worth -- total assets minus debt -- rose 24%, unadjusted for inflation, from early 2001 to the end of 2005. "People have more money in their pocket" and in their bank accounts, he said.

Mr. Snow's case relies on averages, which can be skewed by big gains among the wealthiest. Other data suggest the typical family has seen little advance in income or net worth since Mr. Bush took office. Census Bureau data show median family income -- half of families have income greater than the median, half have less -- fell 3.6% from 2000 through 2004. Incomes for the poorest families fell even further. The only group to gain was the family at the 95th percentile -- that is, richer than 95% of all families. Data for 2005 are unavailable.

Alan Krueger, a labor economist at Princeton University who served in the Clinton administration, cited Labor Department data that showed the real median wage rose 3% from 2000 to 2005. Gains were smallest for the lowest-paid workers and largest for the best-paid. "From the standpoint of the work force, it's been a very weak recovery," he said. Wage data don't incorporate the effects of taxes, investment income or government payments.

As for net worth, a triennial Federal Reserve survey found that the net worth of the median family rose 1.5%, after inflation, from 2001 through 2004. That is far less than the 17% increase from 1995 to 1998 and the 10% increase from 1998 to 2001. The survey wasn't conducted in 2000 or 2005.

Robert Gordon, an economist at Northwestern University, says the past few years represent the continuation of a 35-year trend in which a growing share of all labor income goes to a small group of "superstars: professional athletes, CEOs and top corporate officers." On top of this trend, income on capital -- such as interest, dividends, rent and capital gains -- has taken a growing share of national income from labor, and it "goes mainly to a small slice of the population at the very top."

Mr. Snow said inequality at "one philosophical level...is troubling. It's really a serious, far-reaching question about how to organize the economic affairs of a great country. We as a society have made two determinations. We're going to let more productive people have higher incomes and we're going to tax them more" through a progressive-tax system.

Mr. Snow argued the administration's tax cuts have made the tax code more progressive, because the rich now pay a larger share of total individual taxes. Some scholars counter that the tax cuts still widened the gap between the after-tax incomes of rich and poor Americans. The Tax Policy Center, a joint venture of the Brookings Institution and Urban Institute think tanks, estimates that after-tax incomes of the richest 1% of taxpayers were 4.6% higher in 2005 than they would have been without the tax cuts. Incomes of the middle 20% were 2.6% higher, and incomes of the bottom 20% were 0.3% higher.

Slowing Home Market To Ripple Through Many Layers Of Jobs (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh And Noelle Knox

USA Today, March 20, 2006

With the allure of easy money, thousands of Americans flocked to jobs in the real estate industry during the boom years.

“You saw it — there were dollar signs in their eyes,” recalls Nick Vayonis, a former real estate agent in Los Angeles, where median home prices rose 145% in four years.

DOJ_NMG_0018562

He left the business a year ago, just in time, he says. Home sales have declined nationwide for the past five months, and sales in Southern California fell to their lowest level in five years in February, DataQuick reported Tuesday.

"I could see the ebb and flow. It wasn't going to be like that forever," says Vayonis, 40, who just opened a coffee shop in Canton, Ga., near Atlanta with his wife Anne-Marie, also a former agent.

As the housing market slows, there will likely be a lot of stories of people who are bailing out of their real estate jobs and other professions related to housing — appraisers, mortgage brokers and home construction workers — and many not by choice. This could send shock waves through the job market and the economy.

That's because housing helped drive the economy out of the last recession. Almost four out of every 10 jobs created in the past four years were in housing-related fields. At the end of last year, a record 9.8% of U.S. workers were employed in the real estate industry, up from 8.2% a decade ago, according to Moody's Economy.com. Only the health care industry added more jobs.

"Job growth is the main engine for consumer spending," says Scott Anderson, senior economist at Wells Fargo in Minneapolis.

"If we don't get the job creation that we need to sustain spending, the economy could be in trouble as we get into '07," he says. "If we don't get any help from these other (non-housing) sectors, longer-term the implications are slower job growth, which means slower consumer spending, which would eventually discourage businesses from spending. You'd have this downward spiral in growth."

While it's too early to tell how deeply the housing industry will contract, many companies are already seeing some business evaporate.

Last month, Washington Mutual said it would close 10 mortgage processing centers and fire 2,500 employees. In November, mortgage company Ameriquest handed out 1,500 pink slips. The housing industry is braced for more belt-tightening.

"At best, people should prepare for no pay increase and no bonus, something they have been getting a lot of. At worst, they should be thinking they may need to change occupations," says Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com in West Chester, Pa.

While it's painful for those involved, Zandi calls the slowing in housing "a necessary adjustment." The economy had gotten so dependent on housing that it needed to come down a bit to make the economy more evenly balanced.

"Housing has been flying high, and it's now coming back down to earth," he says.

Existing home sales fell in January for the fifth month in a row, and home builders Toll Bros. and KB Home say more buyers are canceling their orders. In all, home sales are expected to fall 8% from last year's record, according to a group of economists surveyed by USA TODAY in January.

That's going to make it harder, for example, for the nation's 2.6 million real estate agents to make a living. In a "normal" real estate market, the median income for an agent in business for two years or less is $12,852, according to the National Association of Realtors. (However, it picks up rapidly after that, with agents making about $47,187, after three to five years.)

Your income "is very unpredictable," says Janice Hofferber, who left her job as a Wall Street stock analyst in 2003 and tried her hand as an agent in Bay Head, N.J. She quit last September and became an investment adviser for Smith Barney. "You're not really building a business, you're building a reputation," explains Hofferber, 41. "There's no recurring revenue. Every year, you start at zero again. That wasn't really attractive."

It was no easier in the mortgage loan business, says Toney Goucher, who closed his restaurant in Arkansas and became a mortgage broker in 2002. When he joined Leader One Financial in Kansas, home sales were hot, interest rates were low, and anyone who wasn't buying was refinancing. Last summer, the market started drying up.

"It seemed like every month, we had another interest rate hike, and it got harder and harder to find clients," recalls Goucher, 55. "I joined organizations and networking groups to find more business. I called on Realtors every day — cold calling — I just didn't enjoy what I was doing anymore."

Goucher threw in the towel and put on an apron. After traveling to St. Louis for a conference, he opened Fat Toney's barbecue restaurant there in January.

DOJ_NMG_0018563

So far, the economic impact of the downturn in housing has been soft. Other sectors of the economy are adding jobs. In February, employers added workers in a broad number of industries, such as retail, health care, restaurants and bars and state and local government. If that continues, those jobs will help take up some slack if people in housing-related fields find themselves out of work.

Plus, many economists expect housing to slow, but not to slide dramatically.

"We don't expect housing to completely collapse," says Anthony Chan, chief economist at JPMorgan Private Client Services, adding that the housing market might regain some momentum in 2007.

There are also a few trends that could reduce the blow to the economy:

•Construction. Although residential construction is weakening, commercial building is picking up, thanks to demand for new roads, government office buildings and retail shops. More than 768,000 people had jobs in the non-residential construction industry in February, the most in more than three years.

"The commercial market now seems to be on a pretty good upswing, and if housing loses ground, which I think is very likely, we will see some of those workers move into the non-residential side," says Dave Seiders, chief economist for the National Association of Home Builders.

Many of the skills used in home construction are transferable to commercial building.

"A carpenter can just as easily work in a non-residential building as … a residential building," says Michael Montgomery, an economist at Global Insight in Lexington, Mass.

•Hurricanes. Hurricanes last year damaged or destroyed 700,000 homes on the Gulf Coast, according to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, based on the number of families receiving federal housing aid.

Although it's unclear how many of those homes will be rebuilt, the process of rebuilding homes, businesses, roads and other infrastructure will likely create jobs for years to come.

•Refinancing. About 25% of outstanding mortgages in the fourth quarter were adjustable-rate mortgages, according to the Mortgage Bankers Association.

For those who got into the mortgage brokerage business, that's good news. Many homeowners will likely want to refinance their mortgages in the months and years ahead to lock in a fixed rate as interest rates are expected to rise, but not by a lot.

"That will kind of prop things (up) for awhile in terms of activity," Montgomery says

And plenty of people who got into the real estate market are determined to ride out any downturn.

One of them is Steve Wydler, 37, who left his job as a lawyer at AOL's headquarters in Virginia in December 2002 to join his brother, Hans, an entrepreneur with a Harvard MBA who is a real estate agent.

The two are getting their brokers' licenses in Virginia and Maryland so they can operate throughout the Washington, D.C., area. They now employ three people and work with four other agents as a team. He makes more money now than he did at AOL.

"Personally, I'm not scared," he says. "We're not in it for the next sale. We're in it for the long haul."

But back in St. Louis, at Fat Toney's, Goucher says he has already gotten a couple of calls from mortgage brokers he knew in Kansas asking about possible franchise opportunities for his barbecue restaurant.

"They say, 'You're lucky you got out.' "

Parties Test Messages On Social Security And Medicare Drug Plan (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

With Congress gone for the St. Patrick's Day recess, there's a flurry of activity on both sides of the aisle over the Medicare prescription drug plan.

Republicans are aggressively touting the program, which debuted in January, while responding to criticism from Democrats — and, apparently, from many senior citizens — that the plan is too complex and offers too few benefits.

Building on Democratic efforts to stoke the issue back home, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has unveiled an effort to boost challengers in key 2006 House contests by focusing on the drug benefit. The targeted districts so far include seats held by Republican Reps. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Heather Wilson (N.M.), Steve Chabot (Ohio) and Rob Simmons (Conn.).

DOJ_NMG_0018564

In this latest installment of our "Hot Topics" format, in which we gauge which competitive House and Senate races could be shaped by key issues this fall, we'll look at the impact of the Medicare drug plan and President Bush's efforts in 2005 to create personal accounts for Social Security.

Democrats are optimistic that they have a winning issue.

"Right now, seniors are squeezed on health care costs, energy prices and prescription medications, and I think that anxiety over retirement security has the potential to be a very important issue in the next election," said Brad Woodhouse, a spokesman for Americans United, the successor group to the now-defunct Americans United to Protect Social Security, a pro-Democratic group credited with helping kill Bush's Social Security overhaul.

Americans United last week announced a campaign attacking the drug plan, estimated to cost $3 million to $5 million, that will include advertisements and grass-roots organizing.

Because it's so new, the reaction to the Medicare drug plan is still evolving. But on another issue of special interest to seniors — Social Security — there's a long track record of politicians grappling with the fallout when they support major program changes. And, despite a reputation as the "third rail" of American politics, not all of that fallout has been decisively negative.

In an analysis published immediately after the 2002 election, Michael Tanner, director of the Cato Institute's Project on Social Security Choice, noted that Republicans Elizabeth Dole (N.C.) and Lindsey Graham (S.C.) breezed to victory in Senate races despite their open support for individual accounts. Dole taunted her Democratic opponent, Erskine Bowles, by brandishing a blank sheet of paper and labeling it the "Bowles Social Security Plan."

Other Republican supporters of a Social Security overhaul who won Senate races that year despite taking fire from Democrats on the issue included John Cornyn (Texas), Saxby Chambliss (Ga.), Jim Talent (Mo.) and John Sununu (N.H.), according to Tanner. On the House side, GOP Reps. Shelley Moore Capito (W.Va.), Chris Chocola (Ind.) and John Kline (Minn.) also won tight races in which Democrats aggressively hit them on Social Security.

One obvious contest in which these issues will play a major role is the battle between Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.) and Democratic state Sen. Ron Klein. Shaw represents a Democratic-leaning district that has one of the largest populations of senior citizens in the country. The 13-term Republican has weathered tough challengers before, but Klein is expected to be the toughest yet.

As a senior Ways and Means Committee member, Shaw plays a key role in shaping Social Security policy. While he came out in support of an approach that was different from the president's, Democrats see enough similarities between the two that they can make an issue out of it.

"We haven't gone too far at this early stage of the campaign, but Bush's Social Security plan certainly didn't fly in the district, and it was glaringly obvious that President Bush didn't come down here when he was promoting it," said Klein's campaign manager, Brian Smoot.

Smoot also sees the drug benefit as a potentially strong issue for his candidate. "The program is extremely complicated — there are editorials in local papers every day that voice the frustration of seniors in figuring it out," he said. Smoot added that "the plan does not do simple things, like allow the government to directly negotiate for lower prices, or reimport drugs from Canada. I think people will be extremely frustrated with it" by Election Day.

Shaw's office begs to differ. "In our district, seniors have expressed a need for reform because they're worried about whether there will be a Social Security system for the next generation or not," said Gail Gitcho, a spokeswoman for Shaw. "It's not just about what's happening to them but about what happens down the line, too."

Another hot race involving a key player in the Social Security debate is the dogfight between Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) and state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D). Santorum was an early and energetic ally of Bush on Social Security reform, then later criticized the White House for tactical errors in how it rolled out and pitched the proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0018565

Already, an air war has been launched in the Santorum-Casey race, with the conservative group Americans for Job Security placing ads that tout Santorum's commitment to Social Security and seniors. Casey and his allies have assailed the ad as misleading because it doesn't mention his support for personal accounts.

Another hot Senate race where Social Security has come up is in the re-election bid of Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.). While Chafee opposed Bush's Social Security overhaul, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee last year accused him of endorsing, in an interview with the Kent County Times, a related Bush proposal that Democrats blasted as a cut in Social Security benefits.

Seven of the 10 Congressional districts with the highest percentage of Social Security beneficiaries are held by Republicans, as are two-thirds of the top 25 districts. Of those top seven, five are in Florida, making the Sunshine State ground zero in the fight over Social Security and the Medicare drug benefit.

But so far, Susan MacManus, a political scientist at the University of South Florida, hasn't yet seen frustration with the drug benefit translate directly into anger at Members of Congress. "It doesn't appear to be creating animus — confusion, yes, but not blame yet," she said. "It's one of the balls in the air. I'm not sure if it will go flat or keep bouncing."

In addition to Shaw's seat, hot races in Florida that could be shaped by the issue include the contest between Sen. Bill Nelson (D) and Rep. Katherine Harris (R), as well as the races to fill House seats vacated by Harris and retiring Rep. Mike Bilirakis (R).

Longer-shot races in which Democrats seem likely to raise the issue against GOP incumbents include the re-election bids of Reps. Ric Keller, Mark Foley and Ginny Brown-Waite. The districts held by Foley and Brown-Waite cluster near the top of the rankings in proportion of constituents who receive Social Security benefits.

Still, MacManus urges caution when analyzing the potential impact of Social Security and Medicare on House Members: Seniors are not unanimous about the right policies to follow.

Some younger, more active and more affluent seniors do not automatically oppose reforming Social Security and would likely tolerate stricter means testing on benefit levels, she said. By contrast, the strongest support for keeping Social Security in its present form comes from lower-income seniors.

Politically, this distinction is important. Many of the Florida seniors who are more affluent live in Republican-held districts, she said, while lower-income seniors are likelier to live in Democratic-held districts. And that could lead to a status-quo result electorally — a reality that could put a damper on Democrats' hopes to ride Social Security and the Medicare drug benefit to victory in 2006.

Boehlert Hangs Up His Spikes (RC)

By Josh Kurtz and Ben Pershing

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, the senior Republican in New York's Congressional delegation and a leading House moderate, announced Friday that he would not seek a 13th term.

Boehlert, who first came to Capitol Hill more than 40 years ago as a Congressional aide, said he was ready to do something else.

"It's time," the 69-year-old Congressman said during an appearance at a historic train station in his home town of Utica.

Boehlert's departure ensures that his central New York district will become a top target of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and it could spark a bitter fight among Republicans seeking to replace him.

Boehlert's retirement creates the 18th Republican House vacancy heading into November; his district isn't in the top tier of competitive open GOP seats, but it isn't far down the list.

In the House, Boehlert was termed out as chairman of the Science Committee but held out some hope that he could be handed the Transportation and Infrastructure gavel in the 110th Congress.

In the wake of Boehlert's announcement Friday, both Democrats and Republicans sought to claim the advantage. Although Boehlert never had to sweat re-election — his toughest challenges came from the right in GOP primaries — the 24th district has only slightly leaned Republican in recent presidential and statewide elections.

DOJ_NMG_0018566

"This is a district that a Democrat can win and should win because New York families deserve a voice in Congress who will not become irrelevant or simply act like a rubber stamp for the special interest Bush agenda," said Bill Burton, communications director for the DCCC.

Four Democrats already are running for Boehlert's seat, with Oneida County District Attorney Michael Arcuri, who formally entered the race just a week ago, seen as the preference of national and New York party leaders. The other candidates are lawyer Leon Koziol, college professor Les Roberts and former Cortland Mayor Bruce Tytler.

In a statement Friday, Arcuri praised Boehlert's service but said his centrist views were ignored in a Congress dominated by conservative Republicans.

"I think the people in the district want a change in how Congress operates," said Arcuri, who has been his county's top prosecutor for a dozen years.

Early indications Friday were that the Democratic field was not likely to grow significantly following Boehlert's announcement, although state Assemblywoman RoAnn Destito and former Oneonta Mayor Kim Muller have been mentioned as possible candidates.

But Democratic hopes of an epic primary struggle between two prominent Republican state Senators were dashed shortly after Boehlert's announcement.

In anticipation of Boehlert's retirement, state Sens. Ray Meier (R) and Jim Seward (R) have spent the past several weeks angling for support, and both recently used state campaign funds to run TV ads — ostensibly to promote issues they were working on in the Legislature.

But Seward issued a statement late Friday saying he would seek re-election in the fall — sparing the GOP the pain of a primary between the two lawmakers and minimizing the number of open seats in the state Senate, which they are fighting desperately to keep control of this year.

Meier is expected to formally announce his candidacy today, and the state's GOP establishment will almost certainly coalesce around him.

"Senator Meier is clearly the only A-level candidate on the Republican side who's shown an interest," said Scott Armstrong, a GOP consultant in New York who is working for Meier.

But Meier probably won't have the field to himself. Former Seneca Falls Mayor Brad Jones (R) was already challenging Boehlert from the right and is expected to stay in the race. Jones, who had $49,000 in his campaign account at the end of 2005, did not respond to a phone message left at his campaign headquarters Friday.

Other possible Republican candidates for the seat are James Griffo, the Oneida County executive — a position Boehlert held before he was elected to Congress in 1982 — and Catherine Bertini, a former undersecretary of management at the United Nations who fits Boehlert's moderate profile.

Brian Adey, a Griffo spokesman, said Friday that his boss will "continue to keep all of his options open at this point."

The small but influential New York Conservative Party could play a decisive role in the Republican scrum. The Conservatives have always been estranged from Boehlert and frequently ran candidates against him. With the Democrats putting up only nominal opposition, it didn't matter; but with the DCCC showing a renewed interest in the seat, a Republican-Conservative split could prove fatal to the GOP's ability to hold on to Boehlert's seat.

Before Boehlert retired, Jones seemed like a shoo-in for the Conservative nomination, but Meier has run with Conservative support before.

"The guy's got a pretty good conservative base," said Shaun Marie Levine, executive director of the state Conservative Party.

Levine said the party's executive committee would designate a nominee in July in consultation with the Conservative chairmen in the Congressional district's 11 counties. Another candidate could choose to force a primary in September with the choice of the Conservative leaders.

Because Boehlert was one of the stalwarts of the House GOP centrists, moderate groups also may push hard to elect one of their own. Boehlert is the third Republican moderate from New York to step down from the House in the past two cycles — Reps. Amo Houghton (R) and Jack Quinn (R) called it quits at the end of the 108th Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0018567

Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, said the organization's leaders knew for weeks that Boehlert was considering retiring, but they were hoping that he'd change his mind.

"It's a loss, but it's not a death," Resnick said.

While Boehlert is well-respected by his fellow moderates and many lawmakers like the New Yorker personally, Boehlert will be remembered with mixed feelings by members of the leadership.

Boehlert has clashed frequently with Republican leaders on a variety of subjects, particularly environmental matters — and environmental groups lavishly praised him Friday.

Boehlert was a key player last year in persuading the Republican leadership to remove a provision from the budget reconciliation measure that would open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas exploration. Boehlert eventually voted for the bill, but only after leaders added money back for Medicaid, dairy subsidies and food stamps.

Boehlert's frequent rebellions on key party issues made him a long shot to chair the Transportation committee in the 110th Congress, even though he is currently third in seniority on that panel.

With Boehlert gone, the race for the Transportation gavel remains somewhat in flux, with GOP Reps. Tom Petri (Wis.), John Duncan (Tenn.) and John Mica (Fla.) all interested in the post.

On the Science Committee, the most likely contenders for the gavel are GOP Reps. Ralph Hall (Texas) and Vernon Ehlers (Mich.).

Hall previously served as ranking member on the Science panel before he switched parties in 2004. Ehlers recently became House Administration chairman but told the Grand Rapids Press in January, "I would not let this stand in the way of being chairman of the Science Committee."

To his colleagues, Boehlert is perhaps best known as a baseball fanatic whose district includes the baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown. He cited future Hall of Fame pitcher Roger Clemens in his farewell remarks Friday.

"When I reflect on these 24 years in Congress I, to use the language of the House in which I serve, identify with the words of the distinguished gentleman Roger Clemens who, when asked about retirement, said, '...when I shut it down, I'll be walking away with a smile on my face,'" Boehlert said. "There will be no regrets because I feel like I've done it the right way.'

"Those are my sentiments. I do feel like I've done it the right way."

Rep. Sabo Calls It A Career (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

Rep. Martin Sabo (D-Minn.) announced Saturday that he will retire at the end the 109th Congress instead of seeking a 15th term, as he previously said he would.

"It's time to move on," he said in a statement. "In my gut, I know the time is right."

The 68-year-old Congressman's announcement quickly set off a barrage of interest among potential candidates to succeed him in his heavily Democratic seat and on the Appropriations Committee.

Many Minnesota political observers believe that Sabo's chief of staff, Mike Erlandson, who surrendered the chairmanship of the state Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party last year, is the early frontrunner.

"It's a solid Democratic district so the question will be who will get the nomination and win the primary," said Jim Farrell, one-time spokesman to the late Sen. Paul Wellstone (D-Minn.). "I know Mike Erlandson is oft-talked about as a successor for that seat so I would think he would have the advantage."

Erlandson confirmed in an interview Friday evening that he hopes to succeed Sabo in the Minneapolis-based 5th district.

Other potential contenders, according to Minnesota Democratic sources, include: Peter McLauglin, who recently lost the Minneapolis mayoral contest; Sharon Sayles Belton, a former two-term Minneapolis mayor who lost to Mayor P.T. Rybak; state Sens. Scott Dibble and Satveer Chaudhury; state Rep. Keith Ellison; Minnesota House Minority Leader Margaret Anderson Kelliher; Julie Sabo, the Congressman's daughter and a former state Senator; Minneapolis City Council Majority Leader Scott Benson; and City Councilmembers Lisa Goodman and Gary Schiff.

DOJ_NMG_0018568

Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer (D), a professor at the University of St. Thomas, opened a campaign office and was challenging Sabo at party precinct caucus, according to the Minneapolis Star-Tribune.

Republicans are not expected to seriously contest the 5th district, which gave Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) 71 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential election.

Minnesota and national Democrats said they were surprised and saddened by the news that the 44-year public servant was leaving elective office.

"For his nearly 30 years in Congress, Martin Sabo has provided expertise and insight on crucial issues from national security to economic security," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said in a statement. "In his tenure as the senior Democrat on the Homeland Security appropriations subcommittee, Congressman Sabo has worked tirelessly to strengthen the security of our nation. From Chairman of the Democratic Study Group to Chairman of the Budget Committee, he has always been a leader in our Caucus. His knowledge and commitment has earned him the respect and trust of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

"He will be missed," Pelosi concluded.

For his part Sabo said in prepared remarks that he will continue to "fight for peace and for more responsible budget policies" during the remainder of his term, adding that he's "looking forward to having more time for other things."

Sabo, a ranking member on an Appropriations subcommittee, briefly led the Budget Committee, ascending to the chairmanship in 1993 but relinquishing the gavel in 1995 after Republicans won control of the House.

While chairman he helped pass the largest deficit-reduction package in history, which led to surpluses at the end of former President Bill Clinton's administration.

The son of Norwegian immigrants, Sabo was first elected to the Minnesota state House in 1960 at the age of 22. He served as Speaker from 1969 to 1973 and was sent to Congress in 1978.

A pet issue of Sabo's is economic disparity. With regularity he has unsuccessfully introduced an Income Equity Act, which puts a cap on the wages of corporate CEOs.

Sabo is an avid baseball fan and did not let his passion for the game lie while serving in Congress.

He has managed the Democrats in the Annual Roll Call Congressional Baseball Game for 20 years, and while his team has lost more than it has won, Sabo will head back to Minnesota with the coveted Roll Call trophy he won in 1994.

It's too soon to determine who will succeed Sabo as manager, although Erlandson, who worked the game for Sabo for many years, could be a contender for that job as well.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, March 20, 2006

SpongeBob on Brit Hume's Target List

The steady creep to the top for Brit Hume's nightly Special Report on Fox--not just the No.1 Washington-originated cable show but also the fourth in all basic cable at 6 p.m.--has the host eyeing the next victim. "We've been having a series of meetings here about how we can beat Nickelodeon," he says. "We just hope that they don't put SpongeBob SquarePants up against us." Fun aside, Hume's hourlong mix of news and debate now reaches 1.5 million nightly while dominating the key 25-to-54 age demographic. And it happened in a very un-Fox-like way: without fanfare, even though Hume has recently surged to the No. 2 spot among all cable news shows, after Bill O'Reilly.

When Special Report started in 1998, the goal was giving the growing Washington bureau some visibility. Now the top audience-getter of Washington shows, including CNN's Situation Room and MSNBC's Hardball, Hume says, "We kind of pinch ourselves." Like a good boss--Hume is the managing editor of the D.C. bureau--he credits his news team. But the "poisonous" mood in Washington doesn't hurt either. "For those who have a rooting interest in it," he says, "they want to hear about it."

While beating the pants off SpongeBob is a long-term goal, Hume has a more immediate worry: No. 12 ESPN's March Madness coverage. "If they've got games on at 6 at night," he frets, "that's gonna be tough."

California Condi Has a Nice Ring

DOJ_NMG_0018569

She doesn't want to run the country, she says, but Condoleezza Rice is the hottest thing in politics right now. Pollster Frank Luntz did a straw poll at the recent California Republican convention. Guess who won? Stanford University's provost before joining the Bush administration, Rice was first with 29 percent, followed by Virginia Sen. George Allen at 26 percent and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani at 16 percent. What's it mean? With Rice on the 2008 ticket, even as veep, California could go Republican.

CIA to Bloggers: Honor the Oath

The CIA's Publications Review Board is sending out terse reminders to agency veterans reminding them of the rules requiring that any writings--even blogs--must first get agency approval. Among those getting the warning is outspoken blogger and ex-agency man Larry Johnson, who smells censorship. "It's very selective," says Johnson, who has been critical of the CIA's failure to defend outed ex-spook Valerie Plame. His note from CIA brass referenced his blogging. A CIA spokesman described the reminder as standard operating procedure. "Should anyone be surprised if CIA reminds people of the obligations they voluntarily assumed?" asks the agency in a statement. Exempted from the review list: radio and TV appearances--unless written notes are used.

New Hints That, Yep, Rudy's In

Republicans looking for some excitement in the lead-up to the 2008 presidential race are starting to chant Rudy, Rudy, Rudy. While Rudolph Giuliani, New York's 9/11 mayor and national hero, hasn't talked about running, there are hints he's ready. A key Republican senator tells us that Rudy's peeps are already at work in Florida. And we hear that he's making a trip to Iowa--home of the first 2008 presidential caucus--to help raise money for Republican gubernatorial candidate Rep. Jim Nussle.

Rummy's Really a Pressroom Junkie

Imagine this: You're the dean of the Pentagon press corps and planning a retirement party miles away at your wire service's downtown Washington HQ. You invite SecDef Donald Rumsfeld, known for snarling at the press, and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs. And they show up! That's exactly what happened at Reuters last week at reporter Charlie Aldinger's retirement party. And attendees say it wasn't just a quickie stop. Pace gave Aldinger, 68, a medal for his service to the country--22 years on the beat--and he and Rumsfeld stayed for over two hours, a rare tribute to a journalist. "I was deeply moved by it all," says Aldinger.

The Coyotes on Old Wolf's Tail

OK, so we know that Fox is king of cable news, largely at CNN's expense, but now it looks like Ted Turner's brainchild is under attack from the other side. Little MSNBC is making an advance during the key 6 p.m.-to-9 p.m. period, hounding Wolf Blitzer's Situation Room, Paula Zahn, and Lou Dobbs. "This is really big news," says MSNBC's Jeremy Gaines. First, let's be clear: CNN has more viewers. But, as they say in TV, only the "demo" matters, and in the key 25-to-54 demographic that ad rates are based on, MSNBC is nipping at CNN. Here, The Abrams Report has seen a 35 percent jump in just a year, though it still lags behind Dobbs. But Hardball With Chris Matthews, up 52 percent, edges Blitzer by 1,000 viewers in the demo, and Countdown With Keith Olbermann, up 39 percent, ties Zahn. MSNBC's Gaines credits "consistency" and good hosts for the trend. At CNN, they note that total viewers are still higher and say that any February pop was due to MSNBC's Olympic coverage. "People were tuning in to watch Bode Miller slip and slide down a ski slope," says spokeswoman Edie Emery, "and they got Chris Matthews instead."

A Snapshot of Presidential Power

White House photographers last week got a lesson in presidential authority. Already in place for a Bush visit to a New York seniors facility, the newsmen were asked by the master of ceremonies if they'd take pictures of the crowd before President Bush arrived. No one stepped forward. That is until Bush heard and called on Reuters photographer Larry Downing to get snapping. "Ask and ye shall receive," grinned Bush. "The president just sort of ambushed me," said Downing. Downing is something of a Bush fave. In Istanbul in 2004, Downing recalls taking a picture of NATO officials, then pausing to write down their names. From behind, a man asked, "Do you need any help with the names?" It was the prez.

An Empire State Headache For Republicans? (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018570

Looking for a sign of whether a big Democratic wave is developing? Try New York.

Once a state with genuine political competitiveness where liberal Republicans (including Thomas Dewey, Jacob Javits, Nelson Rockefeller and Ken Keating) prospered, the Empire State has veered toward the Democrats over the past few decades.

Yes, New York Republicans have now held the governorship for three consecutive terms, and they retain their longtime lock on the state Senate. But Democrats hold more than a 2-to-1 advantage in the state's Congressional delegation as well as both Senate seats and an unassailable majority in the state Assembly. And, of course, no Republican presidential nominee has carried the state since Ronald Reagan's re-election landslide of 1984.

This cycle, Democrats are making a major effort to flip a handful of Congressional districts in the state, and they hope that strong Democratic showings at the top of the ticket, combined with a favorable national environment, could net them a seat or two in Congress.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) will coast to an easy re-election victory, and state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer is expected to win the Democratic nomination for governor and crush his eventual GOP opponent in November. Democrats also hope to make gains in the state Senate.

By contrast, New York political observers say Republicans have a chance to swipe only a single statewide office — attorney general — and even there, Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro, once thought of as a rising star, is off to another unimpressive start. Her competitiveness in that race stems from the baggage of the two leading Democratic contenders for the office, former Housing and Urban Development Secretary Andrew Cuomo and former New York City Public Advocate Mark Green.

Overall, national Democrats believe that the combination of good candidate recruitment in New York and a favorable political environment has put seven New York House districts "in play" this cycle. But do they really have a chance in any of them?

In many ways, the best Democratic opportunity is in the 20th district (Saratoga Springs to Lake Placid), currently represented by Rep. John Sweeney (R), a four-term Congressman who previously served as New York labor commissioner and executive director of the state party.

His opponent, attorney Kirsten Gillibrand, 39, has good political bloodlines and worked in the Clinton administration. Attractive and personable, Gillibrand raised an impressive $370,000 through the end of December.

Sweeney has been hospitalized with high blood pressure, and he has ruffled some feathers within his own party, including backing candidates in county party races who eventually lost. He also has strained relations with outgoing Gov. George Pataki (R).

Just based on the numbers, Democrats should have their best shot at GOP Rep. Jim Walsh. Unlike the other six districts Democrats are targeting in the state, Walsh's Syracuse-centered 25th district was carried by Democratic Sen. John Kerry (Mass.) in 2004, 50 percent to 48 percent.

From an incumbency point of view, two GOP-held seats look particularly inviting. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert's retirement creates an open seat in the 24th district (Utica/Rome), while first-term Rep. Randy Kuhl drew an unimpressive 51 percent in the 29th district against a weak opponent last time, making him an obvious target this time.

Elsewhere, Democrats think they have a shot against GOP Reps. Sue Kelly in the 19th district, Tom Reynolds in the 26th district and Vito Fossella in the 13th district.

Reynolds, as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, would be a particularly sweet trophy for Democrats, though his chairmanship gives him the means to fight back effectively against a strong challenge. Millionaire Jack Davis (D), who drew 44 percent against Reynolds last time, is running again.

As for Fossella's seat, Democrats hope that New York City Councilman Bill de Blasio will take him on.

Yet while this crop of Democratic opportunities is better than in the past, Democrats remain distinct underdogs in all of these seats.

State political observers argue that upstate voters turn out with clock-like consistency, and that any surge or decline in turnout is likely to occur downstate. And there are plenty of Bush Republicans in these Democratic-targeted districts. In 2004, Bush carried Sweeney's and Kelly's districts with 53 percent, Boehlert's with 52 percent, Kuhl's with 56 percent, and Reynolds' and Fossella's with 55 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0018571

The numbers simply are against the Democrats in these districts. “There are too many cows, too many trees and too many Republicans” for Gillibrand to knock off Sweeney, one insider told me.

In Boehlert’s district, Republicans are likely to nominate a popular GOP state Senator, probably Ray Meier, who actually looks to be stronger than Boehlert — who’s repeatedly faced tough primaries with conservatives — would have been in November. And Walsh’s likely opponent doesn’t look strong enough to threaten the relatively popular Congressman.

While I found Kuhl’s main challenger — retired naval officer and former Wesley Clark aide Eric Massa — to have an interesting background and potential appeal, I wasn’t impressed that he ended December with just more than $87,000 in the bank.

The most recent buzz about a de Blasio challenge to Fossella ignores the fact that de Blasio is a Brooklyn-based politician who would have a difficult time in Fossella’s district, which is dominated by Staten Island.

One last comfort for upstate Republicans is that state Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno will pour big money into GOP-held state Senate districts to try to retain the party’s 35-27 majority — a factor that could help Republican efforts to retain the seven Congressional districts Democrats are targeting.

Still, despite all the challenges facing Democrats in the New York Congressional races, the contests are worth watching. Political waves can build bigger and faster than anyone expects, and that fact alone makes the Empire State worth paying attention to. Just don’t lay down money on any of the Democrats just yet.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Bonnie And Clyde Budgeteers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Remember when Al Gore pledged to create a "lockbox" to protect Social Security trust fund surpluses from the annual Congressional spending raid? Well last week, while voting to raise the federal-debt ceiling to $8.96 trillion, Senators had a chance to terminate this notorious money-laundering scheme.

And guess what? Every Democrat in the Senate joined with eight Republicans to kill an amendment by GOP Senators Jim DeMint and Mike Crapo that would have stopped the Bonnie and Clyde budgeting. The vote was 53-46, and on the list of those voting to continue the Social Security raid is every potential 2008 Democratic Presidential aspirant in the Senate, including Hillary Clinton, John Kerry and Joe Biden. Worse, the list also includes Republicans Conrad Burns (Montana), Jim Talent (Missouri) and Gordon Smith (Oregon), who are running for re-election this year.

Apparently, these Senators want the money stored in a lock box, but only on the condition that they know how to pick the lock. The DeMint-Crapo proposal would deposit surplus payroll tax dollars in personalized bank accounts for each U.S. worker. This would in effect have created more than 100 million personalized lock boxes -- and as taxpayers' private property, well out of the reach of the politicians.

We're talking big dollars here. The payroll tax will collect some $80 billion more in taxes next year, and $436 billion more over the next five years, than Social Security will pay out to current retirees. Under today's law, Congress simply keeps that cash to spend itself. Under the DeMint-Crapo idea, the average young worker would be able to accumulate roughly $40,000 in tax-free wealth for retirement based on eight years of surplus tax payments and 30 years of interest.

And if you want to know why Members of Congress want to keep this annual spending raid going, all you have to do is look at the budget outline for Fiscal 2007 that this ostensibly Republican Senate passed last week. Gone was President Bush's proposal to reduce runaway entitlement spending by a modest $65 billion over five years. Gone, too, was the White House proposal to expand health-savings accounts, as a way to reduce the number of uninsured and reduce health-care costs. Making the 2003 tax cuts permanent? Not a chance.

Instead, the $2.8 trillion budget outline increased spending by $16 billion more than Mr. Bush requested. Some $7 billion of that was passed in an amendment by Senator Arlen Specter (R., Pa.), who has mastered the art of what are called "advanced appropriations," which means shifting spending items between fiscal years to evade even modest budget limits. "It's not sort of a gimmick. It is a gimmick," Mr. Specter was quoted in the Journal regarding this ruse. The vote on his amendment was 73-27, and a majority of Senate Republicans joined Democrats to pass it.

DOJ_NMG_0018572

Mr. Bush can't veto a budget resolution, which is one more reason to reform the deliberately opaque budget process. And judging from last week's votes, Republicans aren't learning from their low approval ratings. They think the way out of trouble is simply to spend more money -- that is, to behave like Democrats. As long as they're behaving that way, conservative voters might well oblige them and sit home in November so next year we can get the real thing.

Katrina Lost & Found: Loyalty (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

Politicians in Washington know bad things happen when you neglect the unglamorous but essential task of providing personal service to constituents.

Take the recent example of New York international banker and lifelong conservative Jeffrey Volk . Volk once worked in the Nixon White House for speechwriter Patrick J. Buchanan . He help draft Ronald Reagan 's economic platform in 1980.

Over the years he's contributed to and raised money for Republicans. In 1998, Volk was one of those who urged George W. Bush to run for president. He attended Bush's second gubernatorial inauguration that year in Austin and contributed to both Bush presidential campaigns, the Florida recount and attended the first presidential inauguration.

Volk, who saw the second plane hit the World Trade Center and ran away from a collapsing tower, found himself in New Orleans in August with his wife and daughter, a freshman at Tulane University, when Hurricane Katrina hit.

Volk figured they could ride it out at a downtown hotel. His daughter had no ticket home, he said and, besides, "usually they blow in and out." Not this time.

The huge hurricane struck on Sunday, and it wasn't long before arsonists and looters were prowling the streets, the hotel across the street was being ransacked, there were no lights and fresh water was barely running. Volk called the White House for help.

"I was sent to voice mail," he said, where he was told he could "leave your comments." He called back and asked to speak with someone from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. More voice mail. His third try got him to FEMA in Alabama, which had its own concerns. "I called a half-dozen times . . . there was no one to talk to."

"I decided I would call my senator," Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), whom he'd never met, Volk said. "An aide in Clinton's Washington Senate office took the call and said I needed to call Dan Burton , a caseworker in New York. When I called, he knew to expect a call from me.

"He basically said: 'What would you want Senator Clinton to do?' I said, 'Call [Gov. George E.] Pataki and get the National Guard plane and send it down for the New Yorkers.' "

Burton could not get the plane, but "he called two or three times a day to make sure we were okay," Volk recalled.

"I can't begin to tell you how much that meant to us in that hotel," he said. "The fact that anyone in government cared that we were there meant maybe there was a list somewhere, maybe we could get out. It was enough just that someone in government knew we were there."

Finally, on Wednesday, hotel employees put together a five-car caravan to move the guests to Baton Rouge.

Upon his return to New York, Volk said he called a White House aide who told him they were getting overwhelmed with people calling to complain. "I said I wasn't calling to complain but to try to figure out how I was supposed to get out."

"I also arranged to meet [Clinton] and to say thank you for Dan Burton," Volk said. They had a long chat, and while "she and I don't agree on a lot of things," he said, there was common ground on key issues such as the need for a balanced budget, strong armed forces and health care concerns. "We need to get an informed debate going," Volk said. "I am thoroughly unhappy with the direction of our government."

The Dec. 11 Clinton fundraiser that he co-hosted raised nearly $100,000 for her Senate campaign. Would he support her in 2008 if she runs for president? "I probably would," Volk said.

Remember, constituent service.Stealth Spokesman Under Pentagon Wraps

Reporters at the Pentagon are still hoping to meet, perchance to interview, J. Dorrance Smith , who's been assistant secretary for public affairs since Jan. 4. One reporter spotted Smith leaving his office, but he accelerated before a question could be asked. Another apparently bumped into him in the men's room. And another body-blocked him in a hallway and managed to chat for a few minutes.

DOJ_NMG_0018573

Things may not change soon because the Pentagon has decided to adopt the White House model of a communications director and a spokesman, with Smith directing and press aide Eric Ruff doing the speaking and the briefings.Longtime Pentagon Reporter Wraps It Up

Speaking of the Pentagon, retired Air Force Gen. Richard B. Myers , who left his post as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in September, has joined the board of directors of aerospace giant Northrop Grumman Corp. Under ethics rules, he's not allowed to go near his old F-4 for two years.

Also across the river, Reuters reporter Charlie Aldinger , dean of the Pentagon press corps, retired last week after 22 years covering seven secretaries. Aldinger won a word of praise, on the record, from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld , who said Aldinger -- "even I have to admit, almost always gets it right -- or about right."

Mass. Loses Ground In Faith-based Funding (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, March 20, 2006

Massachusetts has seen its share of faith-based grant funding from the US government plunge by more than a third over the past three years, new federal figures show.

Religious groups in the state took in $19.6 million in federal grants under the program last year, down from $29.9 million in 2003, according to figures released this month by the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. Only Idaho had a steeper drop during that period.

The 34 percent reduction for Massachusetts from 2003 to 2005, which came as funding to faith-based groups nationwide increased, occurred largely during the tenure of Governor Mitt Romney, a Republican who has touted his ties in Washington, D.C., as a boon for Massachusetts. Romney has also stepped up his outreach to evangelical and Catholic voters as he prepares for a potential run for president.

Last June, Romney, acknowledging the state could do more to help religious charities win federal money for their social service programs, appointed his wife, Ann, to lead the effort. Ann Romney, who has worked for years with charitable causes, was appointed with three months left in federal fiscal year 2005, so the newly released figures don't reflect her involvement.

"The reason Governor Romney established the state's first-ever, faith-based liaison and appointed his wife, Ann, to this new position is because we felt we could do more to help faith organizations in Massachusetts get access to money that would allow them to do good works in the community," Romney's communications director, Eric Fehrnstrom, said in an e-mail. "Previously, that wasn't being done."

GLOBE GRAPHIC: Reaching out

In Massachusetts, federal faith-based money has gone to housing, youth mentoring, and anti-drug programs, among others. The biggest recipients have been elderly housing organizations and the Black Ministerial Alliance of Greater Boston.

Since her appointment, Ann Romney has been a "dynamo" in encouraging more Massachusetts groups to go after federal grants, said Jim Towey, director of Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. The payoffs from the state's new focus will be evident down the road, he said.

"I think the fruit of their strides will be clear in future years," Towey said.

The decline in funding to Massachusetts has come as federal funding nationally to domestic faith-based programs has risen from $1.2 billion in 2003 to $1.6 billion in 2005, according to the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. The number of individual faith-based grants to the state has remained steady.

Massachusetts dropped from 13th place to 20th place overall during the three-year period. States in the West and Midwest saw the biggest increases, but every other New England state experienced a significant boost: Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont all saw their total grant funding more than double, while Connecticut saw a 69 percent increase. (The figures reflect federal fiscal years.)

DOJ_NMG_0018574

The Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives has no role in allocating funding. It compiles information on some 23,000 grants made to faith-based groups from federal agencies such as the US Department of Housing and Urban Development and the US Department of Health and Human Services.

Federal officials caution that the awards list is meant only to be a snapshot, not a complete accounting of federal grant dollars to organizations with religious affiliations. Indeed, several past grant recipients in Massachusetts that are not on the government's list for 2005 say they should have been, because they did receive money that year.

Over the past three years, grants have gone to an array of organizations in Massachusetts. In 2005, for example, Catholic Social Services of Fall River received almost $300,000 for housing and abstinence-education programs, and Jewish Community Housing for the Elderly in Framingham received $7.9 million for senior housing.

The Black Ministerial Alliance of Greater Boston received a $1.4 million grant in 2005. The organization uses the money to help a host of community organizations set up and run their social service programs. The alliance, for example, worked with dozens of groups to create the High-Risk Youth Network, an initiative to expand services for youths and reduce violence among teens.

"From our experience, the program works," Harold Sparrow, executive director of the Black Ministerial Alliance, said of the faith-based initiative. "At a grass-roots level it's been effective and we've helped people."

GLOBE GRAPHIC: Reaching out

It's unclear exactly why Massachusetts didn't attract as much faith-based money in 2005 as it did in prior years. One explanation could be that the state received a few sizable, one-time grants in 2003. Towey also said that the competition for federal money has intensified, with many first-time applicants around the country making a pitch for funding.

"You can argue about how big the pot of money is or should be," Towey said. "[But] this is what happens in competitive grant programs . . . You're going to see the variances."

Towey was in Boston last June for a roundtable with religious and social service leaders, and he's coming back in May for a similar meeting and to tour a program that relies on federal grants.

Massachusetts is one of 32 states that has a faith-based liaison or office, but other states have had theirs up and running longer, helping to connect religious organizations with federal grant opportunities. Ohio created its faith-based office in 2003, Oklahoma established one in 2000, and Texas opened its office in 2004.

Sparrow said that concerns about the church-state separation and political opposition to the faith-based initiative are particularly strong in Massachusetts, which he said could cause some leaders here to be more reluctant to get involved than their counterparts in other states.

"In Massachusetts it's not politically correct to do that," Sparrow said. But US Representative Edward J. Markey said faith-based grants make up only a small fraction of all the federal money Massachusetts receives, which he said has remained steady over the past five years even as the state has lost population.

"Massachusetts is doing very well overall," Markey, a Democrat, said in a statement.

President Bush launched the faith-based initiative soon after taking office in 2001, saying he wanted to remove barriers that had prevented religious organizations from accessing federal funds.

The measure stalled in Congress, but Bush later ordered federal agencies to rewrite regulations to allow religious charities to compete for federal contracts.

Many religiously affiliated charities had been getting government money before, but the change has opened the door for many others.

Critics say the faith-based initiative is little more than a political strategy to help Republicans court voters around the country, particularly African-Americans and Hispanics in so-called swing states. Bob Wineburg, a professor of social work at the University of North Carolina-Greensboro and critic of the effort, said the Bush administration is simply interested in shoring up support among conservatives.

"This is about politics," Wineburg said. "This is not about effective social-services delivery."

Towey rejects suggestions that the money is distributed for political advantage.

"The issue is not about regions, it's not about religions," he said. "It's about results."

For Bridge Over Troubled Waters, a Boston organization that helps runaway and homeless youths, the federal money has produced results.

The organization uses a federal grant to fund a mobile health van, manned by volunteers, that goes out every night to Harvard Square, Dudley Square, the Park Street T station, and other areas of the city to develop relationships with youths and connect them with other services.

"That's what opens the door to having a conversation with these kids," said Carol Phillips, director of development and public relations for Bridge Over Troubled Waters.

Work Starts On Islamic High School (WP)

By Daniel De Vise

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

Construction has begun on a 20-acre campus near Annapolis that will house an Islamic high school, a television station, athletic facilities and eventually a college, according to project directors.

Mohammad Arafa, executive director of the Islamic Society of Annapolis, said the Mekkah Learning Center will be the first Islamic high school in the region. Work will progress on the $8 million project only as fast as donations permit; religious law forbids the society to take out a loan with interest.

The school will complement two established Islamic schools in the region, Al-Huda School in College Park and Al-Rahmah School in Baltimore, each serving a few hundred students up to the middle-school grades. Arafa said he has the support of 22 Muslim leaders across Maryland.

He envisions the campus as a means "to help our children to be Americans and Muslims without having to compromise their identity" and as a place where Muslims and non-Muslims can gather to bridge their differences.

He hopes there will not be a fight. Islamic schools and mosques have engendered fear and suspicion across the Washington region, both before and since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, whose creators purported to be acting in Allah's name.

Perhaps the most explosive case, which preceded the 2001 attacks, was a proposed $80 million complex for the Islamic Saudi Academy in Ashburn. Partly financed by the government of Saudi Arabia, the project thoroughly divided the community in 1998. Some residents said the school, given its backing, might pose a security risk.

Protest later subsided, but in 2004, academy officials decided not to pursue the project, according to Dave Kovalik, school spokesman. The academy serves 1,000 students in preschool through grade 12 at campuses in Burke and Alexandria. It is the only accredited Islamic high school program in the Washington-Baltimore region, Kovalik said. Some students travel from as far as Waldorf.

Arafa said the idea for the Mekkah school took root in the 2001 attacks and the resulting need for Muslims in Maryland to express the peaceful nature of their faith. A release for the new school states that "it is imperative that area Muslims get the message out as to the true peaceful nature of Islam."

He recalls fielding 106 telephone calls after Sept. 11; 104 were supportive, and two were not.

But when he learned last year that the Islamic Society's lease in a strip mall on Forest Drive would not be renewed because of parking concerns, Arafa found the search for a new home to be an exercise in rejection. Arafa said at least eight prospective landlords turned him away after learning the identity of the tenant. Mosques and Islamic schools nationwide have been victims of anti-Muslim vandalism and other hate crimes, as well as allegations that their facilities are harboring terrorists.

"They turn around, as soon as they find out who it is, and say, 'Sorry, we don't want you,' " said Martha Scott, a spokeswoman for the society, which offers prayer services for a congregation of about 250 families.

The nascent school garnered its first publicity early this month, in a write-up in the Annapolis newspaper. Afterward, neither the county nor the society received any complaints, officials said, an encouraging sign. Scott said the news coverage even improved the group's reception as a prospective tenant, with some landlords indicating that they wanted to reconsider the society's application. The society will maintain its headquarters at a separate location.

DOJ_NMG_0018576

When Arafa first saw the Millersville property and learned that the asking price for the prospective campus was $550,000, he told the real estate agent that the society could never afford it: "First of all, we don't deal with interest. Second of all, we are broke. Third of all, we don't have assets."

Much to his surprise, the seller agreed to an interest-free installment plan. About two-thirds of the purchase price has been paid, he said.

Arafa cannot predict when classes will begin on the site, southwest of where Crain Highway meets Interstate 97. The next wave of fundraising will pay for grading work and a septic system. School organizers hope they can offer classes in fall.

The first building will house a prayer hall, assembly rooms and space for two ninth-grade classes, one for boys and one for girls. Arafa hopes to add one grade each year, eventually serving 250 to 300 students. Plans call for 171,000 square feet of building space.

If all goes as planned, he said, the school will be a place "where you can give me the child at 3 years old and he can finish with a PhD."

Shama Farooq, civil rights director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations for Maryland and Virginia, said Arafa is probably correct in predicting that the school will draw students from the broader Baltimore-Washington region.

"Obviously, people are sending their children to Islamic middle schools, and they're trying to find Islamic high schools as well," she said. "I know of people who drive their children 30, 40 miles to private schools."

Hamas Presents Proposed Cabinet (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 20, 2006

Hamas presented a proposed government Sunday, giving itself key ministries after failing to persuade more moderate parties to join in a coalition that could have softened its hard-line image and prevented likely economic sanctions.

Incoming Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh presented Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas with a 24-member Cabinet made up of Hamas activists and professionals, including one woman and one Christian. Fellow Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar would be the new foreign minister.

Earlier Sunday, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators reached a tentative agreement on opening at least one crossing into Gaza to get aid into the Palestinian area. The agreement was reached at a meeting called by the United States to alleviate the humanitarian crisis in Gaza.

Hamas swept to victory in January 25 parliamentary elections, but despite nearly two months of negotiations, it was unable to persuade any other faction to join. Hamas was not prepared to compromise on its basic principles — the right to violent resistance against Israel and refusal to accept the Jewish state.

Failure to bring moderate forces into its government is likely to strengthen Western resolve to cut off desperately needed aid. The United States and European Union have threatened to cut off hundreds of millions of dollars of aid to the Palestinians if Hamas does not renounce violence, recognize Israel and promise to honor existing peace agreements.

Last week a World Bank report warned of economic disaster in Gaza if aid is cut off. Hamas has killed hundreds of Israelis in suicide bombings.

Abbas said he would submit the list to the Palestine Liberation Organization executive committee and then to the parliament if it approves. PLO approval is expected to take several days.

Haniyeh said he was optimistic his Cabinet would win approval. "I can say that the indications are positive toward constitutional stability on the Palestinian platform," he said.

The Cabinet list also includes Gaza Hamas leader Said Siam as interior minister, in charge of some of the security forces. Ten of the ministers would be from Gaza and 14 from the West Bank.

Abbas, who favors negotiating a final peace settlement with Israel, has urged Hamas to moderate its violent ideology but likely will approve the Cabinet, his aides said.

Abbas was elected separately last year to a four-year term and wields considerable authority. He cannot impose his own Cabinet lineup on Hamas, however, because it controls an absolute majority in the legislature.

DOJ_NMG_0018577

With Palestinians facing severe shortages of bread, milk and other foods in Gaza, U.S. officials called an emergency meeting Sunday at the home of U.S. Ambassador Richard Jones and brokered a compromise with Israeli and Palestinian negotiators in a two-month-old border standoff.

Afterward, Jones told reporters, "We have agreed that the crossing from Kerem Shalom will open tomorrow for imports of food and other essential humanitarian products from Egypt," and details would be worked out Monday.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat, who took part in the Sunday meeting, said he hoped both Kerem Shalom and Karni would reopen Monday.

"I hope they will succeed in allowing goods to come into Gaza as of tomorrow to alleviate the dire humanitarian situation in Gaza," he told The Associated Press. He said Egyptian trucks were already lining up across from Kerem Shalom.

Israeli negotiator Amos Gilad said the Palestinians had to arrest militants before Karni could open. The vital cargo crossing between Israel and Gaza has been closed for most of the past two months, shutting off almost all exports and imports for the poverty-stricken seaside territory.

Palestinians charge Israel is punishing them for Hamas' election victory, but Israel insists it is keeping the crossing shut because of warnings of terror attacks.

Under an agreement brokered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in November, Israel and the Palestinians agreed to boost cargo traffic through the crossing. The accord was meant to give momentum to peace efforts and economic recovery programs after Israel's summer pullout from Gaza.

The Karni deal was never implemented, and Israel has closed the crossing for long periods, citing security concerns.

Hamas Presents Cabinet To Palestinian President (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, March 20, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Hamas on Sunday presented a new Cabinet to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas that is dominated by veteran members of the militant Islamic group.

Hamas' month-long effort to recruit other factions into the government after winning parliamentary elections Jan. 25 failed.

Prime Minister-designate Ismail Haniyeh unveiled his lineup of 24 ministers after presenting the list to Abbas. Haniyeh told reporters in Gaza that Abbas "will study the names and the program of the Cabinet" before deciding whether to accept the new Palestinian government.

"The president will approve Hamas' list," chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said in a telephone interview. Erekat added that Abbas retains the constitutional power to fire a Hamas Cabinet if it rejects previously signed Palestinian agreements.

Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel, is on the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist organizations.

Asad Mubarak, Hamas' parliament leader, said in an interview that the group's armed resistance to Israel's occupation of the West Bank would continue until "it totally withdraws from our land." He added: "We've fought for 100 years and can resist for 20 more, if that's what it takes."

Haniyeh tapped Mahmoud Zahar, who survived an Israeli bombing of his home in 2003, as foreign minister. Said Siam will be interior minister in charge of Palestinian security services. Omar Abdel Razik, an economist at An-Najah National University in Nablus, will take over as finance minister. Haniyeh described his Cabinet, which will include a woman and a Christian, as full of "professionals, experts and technocrats," Reuters reported.

Erekat said it could take a week for the Cabinet and Hamas' political program to receive final approval from the parliament.

Since Hamas' electoral victory, the United States and the European Union have cut almost $1 billion in annual aid and monetary transfers to the Palestinian Authority, citing Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel and peace agreements.

Israel also has refused to transfer tax money to the new Palestinian government.

Mubarak said Hamas is raising funds in Iran and other Persian Gulf states to fill the Palestinian treasury's $1 billion shortfall. "Iran has promised to cover whatever the U.S. and the European Union do not give," he said. He conceded that no money has reached the Palestinian treasury so far.

DOJ_NMG_0018578

An economic collapse could be insignificant when compared with the political fallout, said Iyad Barghouti, director of the Ramallah Center for Human Rights Studies. "For the first time since (the Palestinian Authority was established in 1994), there is no common ground at all between the Palestinians and Israelis," he said.

Suheil Tammuz, who owns a cellphone shop in Ramallah, voted for Hamas because he wanted "Fatah's reign of corruption to be over," he said, referring to Abbas' party. However, an isolated Hamas is bad for business and for the Palestinians, he said.

Tammuz had hoped for a national unity government. Without it, he worried that "foreign aid will end and people could go hungry." He said: "Spring has started, but the days ahead are dark."

Hamas Likely To Take Key Cabinet Posts (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, March 20, 2006

Hamas, the Islamist movement that won control of the Palestinian parliament in elections in January, has abandoned attempts to form a national unity government and was on Sunday night due to announce a cabinet in which it would hold the key posts.

A meeting was scheduled in the Gaza Strip between Ismail Haniya, Hamas's prime minister-designate, and Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian Authority president, who must approve the cabinet list before it goes forward to the 132-member parliament for confirmation.

With 74 seats in the assembly, Hamas was certain to have its nominees, many of them technocrats, accepted. However, people close to Mr Abbas said a vote might be deferred until after Israeli elections on March 28.

Hamas's failure to persuade Mr Abbas's defeated Fatah party and other factions to join the government looked certain to worsen the international isolation of the PA. International aid donors have said they would not deal with a government run by a party regarded by the US and the European Union as a terrorist organisation.

Fatah and a number of small moderate parties decided against taking cabinet posts, although all denied they were responding to US pressure to stay out of government.

Hamas was left entirely on its own on Sunday when the leftwing secular Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) belatedly announced it would also decline portfolios.

Ahmed Sa'adat, the PFLP's leader and one of its three elected representatives, was seized by Israeli forces in last week's Jericho prison siege and transferred to Israel where he is wanted for the murder of an Israeli cabinet minister.

According to an unofficial cabinet list circulating in Gaza, Hamas parliamentarians will take the senior ministries in a 24-member government. Most portfolios would go to technocrats.

Mr Haniya would serve as prime minister, a post introduced in 2003 under international pressure by a reluctant Yassir Arafat, Mr Abbas's predecessor, to dilute the powers of the presidency.

The Hamas members were likely to include Mahmoud Zahar, a Gaza leader, as foreign minister, with Said Siyyam as interior minister in charge of at least some branches of the PA's 70,000-strong security forces.

Omar Abdel-Razeq, a Nablus university economics professor recently released from Israeli administrative detention, was expected to be named finance minister.

His tasks will include finding the resources to pay salaries for the security forces and a similar number of other public employees in the face of a threatened international funding boycott. Public sector salaries support about a quarter of the 3.5m people of Gaza and the West Bank.

Mr Abbas was expected to approve the cabinet despite Hamas's refusal to commit itself to all agreements with Israel previously entered into by the Fatah-dominated PA

Key Hamas Cabinet Posts Go To Hard-liners (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018579

JERUSALEM - Hamas introduced a cabinet Sunday that creates a hard-line Palestinian government - lacking moderate forces and led by some of the Islamic organization's most militant actors. It's a signal, say analysts, that the Palestinian leadership appears willing to forgo much of the funding it has been receiving from Western nations.

The crucial diplomatic position of foreign minister, for example, went to Mahmoud Zahar, who is adamantly opposed to any softening of Hamas's position that Israel should be destroyed. Dr. Zahar is known for his fiery rhetoric and vocal support for the organization's use of suicide bombings.

"The international community has to respect the choice of the Palestinian people," says Ahmed Abdel-Aziz Mubarek, a newly elected Hamas legislator from Ramallah. "The majority of the Palestinian people gave their votes to Hamas to establish the new government, so the world has to deal with this reality."

The world's response, however, is an increasingly complicated matter. Countries that have in the past been actively engaged in the now-dormant peace process and in giving aid to the Palestinian Authority (PA) are facing a difficult choice: how to withhold political support for Hamas without turning off humanitarian aid, especially at a time of increased instability. It is not clear how much of the estimated $1 billion a year the Palestinians get in foreign aid might be withheld. Hamas has vowed to replace it with funds from Iran and other Muslim states.

Russia and Turkey, a moderate Muslim country, recently hosted Hamas delegations in the wake of the January election landslide. But Israel, the US, and the European Union have shunned any political contacts with Hamas unless it meets several criteria outlined by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan in January: recognize Israel, respect previously signed peace accords, and forswear violence.

Zahar, a physician, has risen to become one of the organization's most senior members, particularly since several others in the uppermost echelons of the Islamic organization were assassinated by Israel over the past few years. Zahar, too, has been the target of at least two Israeli attempts to kill him, making it unlikely, say analysts, that he or his Israeli counterparts will soon sit at the same negotiating table.

While Zahar is viewed as unbending in his beliefs, says Mr. Mubarek, that does not mean that he will define the entire outlook of the PA.

"The policy of the government will not be swayed by one member of the government only," says Mubarek. "That Mahmoud Zahar will be foreign minister will not make too much of a difference in how we approach things, because the government has its policy, and all the members will have to work according to this policy. We will ask the international community to force Israel to give the Palestinian people their rights."

In a government platform released this weekend, Hamas outlined what it believes those rights to be: the right of return for all Palestinian refugees to their land, a release of Palestinian prisoners, and an end to the Israeli occupation. The document, as translated by Reuters, says if Israel withdraws from the land it occupied in 1967, including East Jerusalem, "it will be possible to look into a mechanism of negotiation."

But Zahar, expressing a more rigid view of the conflict, has long said that all of historical Palestine is holy to Islam and must be liberated. He says that altering Hamas's charter, which calls for the Jewish state's destruction, is out of the question; Israel has said it won't deal with Hamas under the current charter.

From Israel's point of view, Zahar as foreign minister - a post that had never officially been filled in the past - is simply a symbol of what Israel faces with Hamas at the helm.

"The problem is not with the particular personalities in the cabinet: the problem is that it is a Hamas cabinet," says Israeli foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev. "Zahar is particularly outrageous in what he says, but he's more honest than some of the other ones." Without moderating their viewpoint, he predicts, the new cabinet may lead to a situation where the PA will become a pariah government.

Several other senior figures in Hamas named to the Cabinet are considered to be relatively moderate. These include Said Siyam, who was tapped to be interior minister, and Omar Abdel Razeq, who would serve as finance minister. About half of the seats in the 24-member cabinet go to Hamas members, while other ministries were expected to be given to independent lawmakers of professionals with technical experience.

DOJ_NMG_0018580

Western officials initially hoped that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of the heretofore ruling Fatah faction - whose leaders reached a historic peace deal with Israel in 1993 - could act as a go-between, bridging the gap between Hamas and Israel.

Mr. Abbas, who was directly elected more than a year ago following the death of long-reining PLO leader Yasser Arafat, technically holds presidential powers that enable him to override legislative branch decisions by vetoing them. But Abbas is in an increasingly weak position following Israel's raid last week on a prison in the West Bank city of Jericho, which embarrassed Abbas and only underscored his political ineffectiveness.

"Today I will meet [Prime Minister] Ismail Haniyeh and we will see the [formation] of the cabinet. After that the legal procedures will take place such as going to [parliament] and the swearing in," Abbas told a news conference Sunday at the Rafah terminal on the Egyptian border.

• Material from Reuters was used in this report.

Hamas, Failing To Find Partners, Proposes Cabinet (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 19 — Hamas delivered its proposed cabinet list to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, on Sunday night. Hamas is expected to control the most important government ministries after weeks of negotiations failed to persuade other Palestinian parties to join its government.

Ismail Haniya, the Hamas leader and prime minister-designate, presented the lineup to Mr. Abbas at a meeting in Gaza City. Pressed by reporters, Mr. Abbas declined to say whether he would give his approval, though aides said he was likely to do so. He said he would convene the Palestinian legislature, in which the militant Islamic Hamas has an absolute majority, for a vote of confidence on the cabinet.

"I pray to God to help us," Mr. Abbas said. "The task is not easy, neither for us nor for the new government."

He added: "There are great difficulties and many obstacles ahead. But with determination and the support of our people, things will move ahead."

Mr. Haniya declined to make public the names of the proposed ministers in the 24-member cabinet, though he said it would include "professionals, experts and technocrats," in addition to Hamas members. However, Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement and all other Palestinian parties rejected Hamas's invitation to join a government of national unity. Negotiations between Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a small, militant faction, continued until the last moment, but the group opted out.

In remarks to reporters, Mr. Haniya did say that two prominent Hamas leaders — Dr. Mahmoud Zahar and Said Siam — would be in the cabinet, though he did not give their positions. However, Dr. Zahar, more confrontational in his public comments than Mr. Haniya, is expected to become foreign minister, and Mr. Siam is believed to be the choice for interior minister, which would give him authority over the police and other branches of the security forces.

Since Hamas won the Palestinian parliamentary elections on Jan. 25, Mr. Haniya and other Hamas leaders have held a number of seemingly cordial meetings with Mr. Abbas. However, the relationship could become much more complicated once Hamas formally assumes power.

In another development, the United States ambassador to Israel, Richard H. Jones, brokered a Sunday night meeting in which Israel and the Palestinians reached a deal to allow food and other essential supplies to go into the Gaza Strip beginning Monday.

Citing security concerns, Israel has kept the Karni crossing, the main commercial goods terminal on Gaza's border, closed for most of the past two months. Palestinian and United Nations officials say Gaza is facing shortages of bread and other basic foods because the crossing has been closed.

Mr. Jones brought Israeli and Palestinian negotiators to his residence near Tel Aviv, and an agreement was reached to open the Kerem Shalom terminal, near where the borders of Israel, Gaza and Egypt converge.

DOJ_NMG_0018581

Israel's Agriculture Ministry on Sunday was supervising the destruction of hundreds of thousands of chickens and turkeys in southern and central Israel in response to the discovery of the A(H5N1) strain of bird flu.

"It is important to emphasize that at this stage, we are talking only about bird flu," the acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, said at the regular cabinet meeting on Sunday.

Mr. Olmert and other government officials have said there is no evidence that any people in Israel have been infected. Four farmworkers were hospitalized Friday, but health officials said tests showed they did not have the disease, which can be deadly to humans.

Hamas Party Dominates Palestinian Cabinet Picks (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Prime Minister-designate Ismail Haniyeh announced a Palestinian Cabinet dominated by his Hamas party yesterday as the U.S. diplomats pressed Palestinian and Israeli officials to head off a potential humanitarian crisis in the Gaza Strip.

The key posts went to Mahmoud Zahar, a trained physician who was tapped as foreign minister; Said Siam, a reputed former leader of the Hamas military wing who was nominated as interior minister; and Omar Abdul Razeq, an economics professor tapped as finance minister.

The 24-member Cabinet includes one woman and one Christian.

Despite the Islamic militant group's failure to persuade the defeated Fatah party to join the government, Mr. Haniyeh and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas appeared upbeat after a meeting in Gaza City to discuss the Cabinet and its policy guidelines.

Observers saw the atmosphere as a sign that Mr. Abbas will approve the first Palestinian government run by Islamists, even though Hamas rejected a demand by the president that the new government recognize international agreements reached by the outgoing Fatah-led administration.

"The meeting was positive," said Mr. Abbas, who told reporters that he plans to seek approval from the Palestine Liberation Organization for the new government within 48 hours. "There are obstacles and difficulties, but with good will we can overcome them."

Hours earlier, Israeli, Palestinian and U.S. negotiators agreed on a new crossing arrangement for the Israel-Gaza Strip border, averting the threat of food shortages. Israel has kept Gaza's only commercial crossing closed for much of the past two months because of security concerns.

During a meeting at the residence of the U.S. ambassador to Israel, Palestinians and Israelis agreed to open a second crossing, Kerem Shalom, to the limited passage of goods. Hamas was not a party to the negotiations, but the agreement will boost stability among Palestinians as the new government gets under way.

Hamas' failure to find a coalition partner means that the inexperienced Islamic militants will have to manage the Palestinian government on their own. Observers said a political conflict between Mr. Abbas and Hamas will be unavoidable if Mr. Haniyeh's government fails to establish domestic stability and maintain international support.

"Crises are expected unless Hamas is a surprise," said Sliman Shafi, a Palestinian affairs expert on Israel's Channel 2 television news. "If, within a month, nothing is progressing internally and externally, [Mr. Abbas] will say, 'Guys, get to work.' "

The choice of Mr. Zahar as foreign minister could complicate that effort. Mr. Zahar -- perhaps the most senior Hamas leader in Gaza alive after an Israeli assassination campaign two years ago -- speaks English but is known to be a blunt hard-liner.

Mr. Siam, a relatively unknown political figure, will get control of most of the Palestinian security services and will be expected to address effective anarchy in the Gaza Strip.

Abdul Razeq, who recently was released from an Israeli jail, is an economics professor at An Najah University in Nablus, and will be responsible for coping with a looming budgetary crisis created by the cutoff of financial aid from the United States and Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0018582

Mr. Haniyeh reportedly nominated a deputy, Nasser A-Din, to handle West Bank affairs because the Israelis refuse to allow the prime minister to travel between his Gaza Strip home and the West Bank.

If Mr. Abbas confirms the nominations, the Cabinet will be brought before the Hamas-dominated Palestinian parliament for what is expected to be routine approval.

Israeli Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz said the presentation of the Cabinet was a "moment of truth" for Mr. Abbas because he will have to decide whether to work with the Islamic militants or confront them.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni called for the international community to send a clear message to the new Palestinian lawmakers that they must come to terms with Israel.

Israel has said that it will not deal with a Palestinian government run by Hamas.

Hamas Is Alone In Cabinet Plan (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 19 -- Hamas finalized a proposed cabinet Sunday that would place several key ministries in the hands of senior leaders but not include any other Palestinian faction, precisely the narrowly partisan government that the radical Islamic movement had hoped to avoid.

Ismail Haniyeh, the designated prime minister, submitted the list to Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, whose secular Fatah party declined to join the cabinet. The cabinet's makeup is likely to complicate efforts to persuade international donors to continue funding the government once Hamas, designated a terrorist organization by the United States and European Union, assumes control of the ministries.

"Their task was to have as wide a government as possible with Fatah, other factions and independents," said Ali Jarbawi, a political science professor at Beir Zeit University in the West Bank. "The cabinet they have proposed will be, in effect, all Hamas. They are facing a deep problem."

Also Sunday, the U.S. ambassador to Israel assembled Israeli and Palestinian delegations to discuss mounting humanitarian problems in the Gaza Strip resulting from closures of the main cargo passage with Israel. The Karni crossing has been shut for most of the year because of Israeli security concerns, but shortages of food and medicine are beginning to threaten the welfare of Gaza's 1.3 million residents.

Richard Jones, the U.S. ambassador, called the meeting in Tel Aviv on a few hours' notice to salvage a U.S.-brokered deal setting out the terms of operation at Karni following Israel's withdrawal from Gaza last fall. In recent weeks, Israeli officials have made clear they want the Palestinians to use a southern passage at the intersection of Gaza, Israel and Egypt, far from the strip's economic center in the north, rather than Karni.

Palestinian officials had refused, citing terms of the deal. But the delegations decided Sunday to open the southern passage, known as Kerem Shalom, on Monday for humanitarian deliveries from Egypt.

"The ambassador took the initiative to bring the parties together to find a way to move humanitarian assistance into Gaza in a way that addressed security concerns on both sides," said Stewart Tuttle, the U.S. Embassy spokesman.

Haniyeh's proposed cabinet, which was due by the end of the month, could change in the weeks ahead. Hamas will probably continue seeking partners to broaden its domestic support and assuage international donors, who supply nearly half of the Palestinian Authority's roughly $2 billion annual budget.

Abbas has demanded that Hamas accept several signed agreements backed by his Fatah party that would, in effect, amount to a recognition of Israel. Although Palestinian law does not give him the authority to veto the proposed cabinet, Abbas could fire Haniyeh immediately after it is sworn in by the Hamas-dominated legislature elected in January.

Hamas leaders so far have rejected Abbas's demands and pledged to continue confronting Israel "by all means." Abbas's aides have indicated in recent days that he will give Hamas a chance to run the ministries while working to persuade its leaders to endorse a negotiated two-state solution to the conflict.

Abbas will likely wait a few weeks to forward the proposed cabinet to parliament, the Palestinian Legislative Council. The delay would allow Israeli elections on March 28 to conclude before Hamas takes control of the ministries, a transition that could otherwise boost the showing of Israel's most hawkish parties. It would also give Haniyeh more time to recruit another Palestinian party for the cabinet, ideally Fatah, which controls the second-largest parliamentary bloc.

DOJ_NMG_0018583

Haniyeh came close to bringing in the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a Marxist party that, like Hamas, appears on the U.S. list of foreign terrorist organizations. But the leaders of the party, which holds three of parliament's 132 seats, announced Sunday that they would not participate.

The Palestinian Authority is already in severe financial straits. International donors are considering ways of financing humanitarian programs for the Palestinians outside channels controlled by Hamas, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction.

Israel has frozen the monthly transfer of about $55 million in tax and customs revenue it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority under an arrangement established by the 1993 Oslo accords. Those transfers amount to roughly half of the authority's $115 million monthly payroll for 150,000 civil servants and trainees, nearly half of them in the security services.

Hamas officials said Haniyeh's cabinet, which was not made public, gives the interior and foreign ministries to members of the party, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement. But many of those nominated to run the 24 ministries are technocrats from outside the movement, although they have strong ideological connections to it.

Saed Siyam, a former teacher who won the most votes on the Hamas list in Gaza, has been nominated as interior minister with control of several Palestinian security services. Mahmoud Zahar, a thyroid surgeon and hard-liner, would run the Foreign Ministry, although Haniyeh has signaled that Abbas will be given wide latitude in dealing with foreign governments.

Haniyeh, considered a pragmatic figure within the movement, has been working since soon after the party's parliamentary victory to form a broad cabinet. But some Palestinian analysts say Hamas would have had a better chance of building a national unity government if it had selected a figure from outside the movement as prime minister.

A New Landscape: Hamas Digs In (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 19 — When the radical Islamic group Hamas presented a cabinet it dominates to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, on Sunday, Yossi Alpher was reminded of an earlier revolution.

Mr. Alpher was an Israeli intelligence analyst on Iran from 1978 to 1980, and for him, the Hamas victory has the paradigm-shifting quality of the Iranian revolution that brought the mullahs of Shiite Islam to power. Today, he recognizes the same kind of dislocation.

The "old Iran hands" were confident that the revolution could not last, he said, and that the mullahs would be tamed by the merchants of the Iranian bazaar, or the country's youth or the experience of power. "These people knew a very different Iran, and their analysis was not just useless but diversionary," he added.

"I have an incredible sense of déjà vu now when I talk to Palestinians about Hamas," said Mr. Alpher, co-director of a Web site dedicated to Israeli-Palestinian dialogue. "Secular Palestinians don't understand what's happened. They don't know what the Muslim Brotherhood is all about. They're in a state of denial."

After Hamas's victory in the Palestinian legislative elections, analysts and diplomats suggested that nothing fundamental would change: Hamas's win was not so resounding, some said, and its convictions would be moderated by power, keeping foreign aid and the peace effort continuing roughly as before.

After all, the job of diplomacy, like antacids, is to try to make the inedible digestible. But as Hamas completes its cabinet, there is a sense that the landscape has changed for some time to come.

The Hamas victory is not just a little local difficulty. Hamas is the Palestinian part of the Muslim Brotherhood and the first to win an election; its victory has enormous resonance for radical Islam. It is a defeat for secular nationalism, Nasserite corporatism and for Fatah, the chosen partner of Washington and Israel.

Many Muslims wish for Hamas to succeed, and some will give it money. The anxious Arab governments nearby — especially Jordan, with its many Palestinians, and Egypt, with its active Muslim Brotherhood, but also fragile Syria — will feel that they cannot set higher public hurdles for Hamas than, say, Russia or the European Union.

DOJ_NMG_0018584

Palestinian and Sunni, Hamas legislators say they are wary of further dependency on Iran and reject Al Qaeda. They say they prefer a period of quiet; how they will deal with Islamic Jihad, Iran's proxy in the Palestinian territories, remains unclear.

New elections are not scheduled for four years. That gives Hamas's leaders, whom Mr. Alpher calls "pragmatic ideologues," time for their long-view strategy: softly, softly; slowly, slowly.

Hamas calls for national unity. It is likely to push a domestic agenda of reform and social welfare. It seems unlikely that it will fire the Fatah security commanders. When new legislators have talked of Islamicizing education or imposing Shariah law, Hamas has silenced them.

The indications are that Hamas will continue to talk tough toward Israel but maintain a cease-fire that has lasted roughly a year. It will give Israel no sufficient pretext to reinvade Gaza, where Hamas's army of 6,000 men can operate openly; will appeal to the world's Muslims for support; and will blame Israel and Washington for every deprivation.

While many international officials want Hamas to be a partner, its leaders may have other ideas.

On Jan. 30, five days after the election, the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — known as the quartet — warned that a Hamas-led government must recognize Israel, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Given what even a partial reduction of aid will mean for Palestinians, the quartet is looking for ways to soften those demands.

The quartet has pushed Mr. Abbas to postpone H-Day, when a Hamas government takes over, until after Israeli elections on March 28. Now the European Union and the United Nations say that a Hamas government should be given time to prepare a program before any aid cutoff.

Some diplomats suggest that if Hamas supports a moribund 2002 Saudi peace initiative, it will somehow "recognize" Israel without having to say so; some suggest that a Hamas offer of another cease-fire may be enough to "forswear violence."

But so far, Hamas is not playing along. It sees the agreements with Israel as a honey trap and recognition of Israel as impossible. In the meantime, Hamas is working on the heartstrings and sense of justice of the West, to keep aid flowing.

Hamas's victory also signaled the death of the "peace process" as it has been practiced.

The diplomatic assumptions of recent years — a peace treaty after a territorial compromise, or "land for peace" — have been blown apart. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel tried to redefine the bargain as "a state for security" — an independent Palestinian state in return for dismantling all armed "terrorist" groups, including Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades. That was a commitment undertaken in the "road map" by Yasir Arafat and reconfirmed by Mr. Abbas.

But it seems unlikely that Hamas will dismantle itself. Nor, its leaders say, will it abandon "the right of resistance to occupation." Its religious conviction is that all of Palestine, including the current state of Israel, is Islamic waqf land, land belonging irrevocably to the world's Muslims.

Hamas talks of a long-term armistice with Israel, so long as Israel returns to its 1967 boundaries, unannexes East Jerusalem and lets all refugees and their descendants return to their pre-1948 homes. The state of Israel itself, they insist, has no right to exist on waqf land.

So with Hamas, the argument has moved from nationalism and territorial compromise, which can be negotiated, to religious conviction and a temporary Israeli lease on its sovereignty. In that light, the quartet seems to have given Israel a free pass for unilateral action.

Israel, which has done little to support Mr. Abbas, now says it has no partner. Hamas gives Israel more freedom in the West Bank, creating borders, thickening settlements, or dismantling them, as it pleases. Last Tuesday, as troops crushed a Jericho prison to extract wanted men, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel would keep the settlement bloc of Ariel in the West Bank. Washington did not complain.

U.S. Brokers Compromise On Gaza Crossing (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018585

With Palestinians facing severe shortages of bread, milk and other foods in Gaza, U.S. officials called an emergency meeting Sunday and brokered a compromise with Israeli and Palestinian negotiators in a two-month-old border standoff.

Ambassador Richard Jones said cargo traffic might start flowing as soon as Monday at one crossing, and a Palestinian official said a second crossing would be discussed at meetings Monday.

But Palestinian economic misery might take another hit after Hamas militants sworn to Israel's destruction presented their new Cabinet to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas on Sunday. The Islamic group's failure to bring moderate forces into its government is likely to strengthen Western resolve to cut off desperately needed aid.

The vital Karni cargo crossing between Israel and Gaza has been closed for most of the past two months, shutting off almost all exports and imports for the poverty-stricken seaside territory. Palestinians charge Israel is punishing them for Hamas' election victory, but Israel insists it is keeping the crossing shut because of warnings of terror attacks.

The lengthy closure has led to shortages of flour, milk and other goods, and bakeries are closing, United Nations workers said.

Jones invited Israeli and Palestinian negotiators to his residence Sunday to find a way to avert a humanitarian crisis in Gaza. He said later there was an agreement to open another crossing, Kerem Shalom at the convergence of Gaza, Israel and Egypt.

"We have agreed that the crossing from Kerem Shalom will open tomorrow for imports of food and other essential humanitarian products from Egypt," and details would be worked out Monday, Jones told reporters.

Jones did not mention Karni, but Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said a solution also was emerging for activating that crossing and he was hopeful it could be resolved in two meetings scheduled for Monday.

"I hope they will succeed in allowing goods to come into Gaza as of tomorrow to alleviate the dire humanitarian situation in Gaza," he told The Associated Press. He said Egyptian trucks were already lining up across from Kerem Shalom.

Israeli negotiator Amos Gilad demanded that Palestinians arrest militants before the Karni crossing is reopened, Israeli officials said.

Under an agreement brokered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in November, Israel and the Palestinians agreed to boost cargo traffic through the crossing. The accord was meant to give momentum to peace efforts and economic recovery programs after Israel's summer pullout from Gaza.

But the Karni deal was never implemented, and Israel has closed the crossing for long periods, citing security concerns.

During Karni's closure, Israel offered to open Kerem Shalom, 25 miles south of Karni, as an alternative crossing. But the Palestinians had rejected that up to now, saying it is too small and is completely inside Israeli territory.

"We'd like Karni to be fully functioning as soon as possible ... The only reason Karni is closed is the definite terror warnings," Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said. "We don't understand why the Palestinians refuse to have the Kerem Shalom crossing open to bring in required and needed produce into Gaza."

On Sunday evening, incoming Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh met Abbas to present his new Cabinet, which includes one woman and one Christian.

Speaking to reporters after the meeting, Haniyeh said the Cabinet would have 24 members, 10 from Gaza and 14 from the West Bank. Fellow Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar will be the new foreign minister, he said.

Abbas said he would submit the list to the PLO executive committee and then to parliament if it approves. Before the meeting, he said he would review the names but would not decide immediately whether to accept the list. As president, he has the authority to demand changes.

Haniyeh was optimistic his Cabinet would win approval. "I can say that the indications are positive toward constitutional stability on the Palestinian platform," he said.

Abbas, who favors negotiating a final peace settlement with Israel, has urged Hamas to moderate its violent ideology but likely will approve the Cabinet, his aides say. He will, however, warn Hamas that its refusal to soften its positions could hurt the Palestinians' international standing.

Hamas failed to form a coalition with more moderate parties that could have helped soften its hardline image.

DOJ_NMG_0018586

The United States and European Union have threatened to cut off hundreds of millions of dollars of aid to the Palestinians if Hamas does not renounce violence, recognize Israel and promise to honor existing peace agreements.

The group, which has killed hundreds of Israelis in suicide bombings, has rejected those conditions.

Last week a World Bank report warned of economic disaster in Gaza if aid is cut off.

Haniyeh, a top Hamas official in Gaza, had not announced his Cabinet lineup. But Hamas officials said privately the group would keep the top three posts — foreign affairs, finance and interior, which oversees some security forces. Professionals would fill some of the other posts.

Abbas was elected separately last year to a four-year term and wields considerable authority. He cannot impose his own Cabinet lineup on Hamas, however, because it controls an absolute majority in the legislature.

Emirates Aided Kin Of Palestinian Militants (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

In the last four years the United Arab Emirates has provided substantial financial support, through its Red Crescent Society, to families of Palestinians, militants as well as civilians, who have been wounded or killed by Israeli forces, according to Red Crescent documents.

The United Arab Emirates is a federation of seven small states including Dubai, where a government-owned company was due to take over some American port operations. Facing intense Congressional opposition, the company said recently that it would sell its operations in the United States to an unrelated American company within six months.

In 2002 and 2003, the United Arab Emirates Red Crescent Society, a quasi-governmental organization, made donations to Palestinian charities that included social groups associated with Hamas, the radical Islamic organization that won Palestinian parliamentary elections and has long been designated a terrorist organization by the United States.

A glimpse inside the Emirates aid programs comes from documents provided to The New York Times by Gary M. Osen, an American lawyer litigating cases in the United States federal courts on behalf of American victims of Palestinian terror attacks. The documents include unclassified materials seized by Israeli forces from Palestinian organizations in the West Bank.

Mr. Osen, of Oradell, N.J., said researchers in Israel who were helping him gather evidence for the lawsuits had found the documents there in archives of materials captured in Israeli military operations.

The records include international financial transfers from the Emirates Red Crescent Society as well as budget and program reports from its Jerusalem branch, which handles programs in the Palestinian territories. They show differences between American and Emirate views of Palestinian violence, although President Bush has said the countries see eye to eye on fighting terrorism.

In 2002, according to a spreadsheet of the annual budget, the U.A.E. Friends Society in Jerusalem, the local branch of the Red Crescent, designated $100,000 to pay 50 annual stipends of $2,000 under a "martyrs' families sponsorship" program.

Officials from the government and the Red Crescent Society said "martyrs" referred to any Palestinian who had died in the conflict with Israel, including civilians and armed fighters. In a news release on May 5, 2002, Mohammed Hamad Saif, a representative accompanying a 40-ton shipment of Red Crescent relief supplies, said "the priority" of that aid would be "the needy and families of the wounded and martyrs."

In one case, the documents show, the Emirates Red Crescent provided cash payments to the wife and two children of Anwar Awni Mustafa Abdel Ghani, who was identified in a news release on Feb. 15, 2002, from Palestinian Islamic Jihad, a militant organization, as a mujahid, or fighter, for the group. The news release, and news reports from that date, indicate that Mr. Abdel Ghani was killed in a clash that day with Israeli forces in a village near Tulkarm in the West Bank.

Emirates government and Red Crescent officials confirmed that the martyrs' family support continues, including payments for at least one of Mr. Abdel Ghani's children.

There are sharp differences between American and Emirates officials over assistance to "martyrs." United States officials say payments to families of violent militants constitute direct support for their cause and encourage others to join.

DOJ_NMG_0018587

Officials of the Emirates government and the Red Crescent Society said the payments helped create possibilities for younger Palestinians. They said most of the beneficiaries were relatives of civilians who had been killed, and that the society handed out cash payments only for Palestinians under 18. Spouses and older children receive coupons for food, medicine and housing materials.

"What is the fault of the orphans?" a government official said, referring to children in the martyrs' program. "By helping them, you are pulling them away from extremism."

Daniel Glaser, a deputy assistant Treasury secretary, said the Emirates was "one of our primary partners" in the Middle East in combating financing of terrorist groups. He said the Treasury had a close working relationship with the Emirates central bank, and that financial officials there had provided concrete cooperation in recent investigations.

Mr. Glaser said he was not familiar with the details of Red Crescent programs. But as a general matter, he said, "Charities that are supporting terrorist activities, including by supporting family members and orphans — we consider that to be terrorist financing."

The documents contain no evidence that the Emirates provided direct aid to armed militant groups.

In the ports controversy, President Bush hailed the Emirates as a like-minded ally in fighting terrorism. He cited support from the sheiks who lead the Emirates for American efforts in Iraq, including a United States military air base there.

But in Israel, some Palestinians regarded as terrorists by the United States are viewed as resistance fighters and martyrs by the Emirates officials.

The Emirates government condemns suicide bombings and terrorist attacks on civilians, and officials said the Red Crescent Society had taken increasingly strict precautions to avoid providing relief to Palestinian groups engaging in such attacks, or to social groups linked to them or to bombers' families.

After "bad experiences" during the mayhem of 2002 and 2003, when some Emirates Red Crescent money ended up in militants' hands, the organization has used modern controls to track its donations and vet its staff, the government official said.

The official said there was no direct cooperation between the Emirates Red Crescent Society and Hamas. He requested anonymity, saying he did not want to awaken new controversy between the Emirates and the United States.

Documents from before 2004 show that the Red Crescent made donations through the Tulkarm Zakat Committee, identified at that time by American officials as a Hamas front. A top administrator at the Red Crescent's Jerusalem offices was Najih Bakirat, whom Israel has identified repeatedly as a Hamas member.

But the Emirates officials said they had stopped sending money to the Zakat Committee and had cut ties with Mr. Bakirat when questions arose about his political activities.

The secretary general of the Emirates Red Crescent, Sanaa Darwish al-Kitbe, said the goal of its Palestinian programs was to "influence the negative atmosphere" to build peace. "By building homes and helping people to have a better life," she said, responding to written questions with a statement sent by e-mail, "you are creating some hope in the middle of all this suffering," allowing young Palestinians to "concentrate on the positive and move away from extremist views and actions."

In Egyptian Movies, Curses! We're The Heavies (WP)

By Daniel Williams

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

CAIRO -- When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited this city last month, Egyptians had an unusual choice: watch her on TV as she expounded on issues of war and peace in the Middle East, or go to a neighborhood movie theater and see her portrayed by a look-alike actress belly-dancing and placed in "adult" situations.

The film in question is "The Night Baghdad Fell," which depicts Egyptian obsessions with war, sex and the United States. Wildly anti-American, it has done a brisk business for two months, a long screen life for Egyptian-made films. In "Night," Egyptians fret about an American invasion of Egypt and the potential destruction of their capital. Americans are bullies, rapists and mindless killers.

By the way, "The Night Baghdad Fell" is a comedy.

DOJ_NMG_0018588

The film is only the latest bit of Egyptian pop culture to display deep unease about Americans. Beginning two years ago, Yanks emerged as bad guys on Cairo stages. In one play, "Messing With the Mind," the audience was ordered around by wild-eyed ushers dressed as Marines. In another, a Statue of Liberty was blown up in the lobby.

Ugly Americans began to emerge on-screen last year. In "Alexandria, New York," director Yusef Chahine rebuked U.S. attitudes toward Arabs. "No Problem, We're Getting Screwed," a black comedy, told the tale of an Egyptian who sends his son to Iraq to deliver mangoes and then must travel there to get him out of an American jail. Along the way, the father tumbles into the hole where Saddam Hussein was hiding, gets caught in insurgent crossfire, is arrested by the Americans and is taken to President Bush. Bush forces him to wear a beard and confess to bombing the American Embassy. Somehow, the Egyptian escapes, outwits his captors, sells his mangoes and gets his son back home.

Egyptians are not the only ones depicting villainous Americans on screen. "Valley of the Wolves: Iraq" debuted in Turkey last year and featured a Turkish hero who takes revenge on U.S. forces that detain Turkish troops in northern Iraq. The on-screen Americans shoot up civilians at a wedding, firebomb a mosque and carry out summary executions. Torture at Abu Ghraib prison makes a cameo appearance.

"These movies show that there is paranoia everywhere," says Nabil Shawkat, a humor columnist at the Daily Star newspaper. "In Egypt's case, the feeling of impotence in regards to the Americans is a common feeling."

Not everyone considers the anti-U.S. theme of "Night" valid. Many critics regarded it as sophomoric and a typical Egyptian effort to blame its problems on outsiders. A critic in the al-Ahram newspaper called it "a puerile comedy expressing the views of an enthusiastic teenager with little political knowledge."

Egypt is officially one of Washington's closest allies in the Middle East. By and large, workaday Egyptians are solicitous toward visiting Americans and endlessly reassure them they are loved here. Americans-as-heavies are a departure in Egyptian film. In the distant past, British colonialists were targets of negative portrayals. Later, unlabeled foreigners appeared on-screen to exploit Egyptian wealth. Americans, if portrayed at all, were cast as unwitting victims of crafty Egyptian tour guides or as people with charming if incomprehensible customs, like wearing shorts in public.

One old satire, called "The Visit of Mr. President," portrayed a village mayor who was comically eager to show his enthusiasm for Anwar Sadat's friendship for the United States -- funny because the mayor is at a loss to explain how, only a few years before, the U.S. was Egypt's enemy. The movie was banned in Egypt for many years.

Israelis have been the most common screen menace, even in comedy. In a film last year called "The Embassy Is in the Building," an Egyptian emigre returns home, wants to engage in sexual affairs in his old apartment, but can't because Israel's embassy is next door. Missiles fly in through windows and security guards block the exits and entrances. All the neighbors have moved away. When the harried man sues the Israelis, he becomes a national hero.

In "Night," a schoolteacher tries to recruit a brilliant former student to create a weapon for use in case the Americans invade Egypt. The student is strung out on hashish, but partly because of his admiration for the teacher's radical peacenik daughter, he takes up the project. The teacher even arranges for the daughter to marry the boy. "Do it for the nation," he urges her.

The men in the film have sexual problems. The student fails to get aroused on his wedding night, fantasizes in bed about Rice and also about a Marine named Jack. The teacher and his friends are impotent. All these conundrums are resolved when wives and lovers await in bed while dressed up in U.S. desert fatigues.

Reports of U.S. atrocities in Iraq pile up and the Egyptians form a rag-tag militia to confront a possible invasion. When a test of the new defense weapon fails, the teacher has a nightmare about his daughter being raped at Abu Ghraib. Near "Night's" climax, an Egyptian who goes out to greet invading Americans is shot dead by a U.S. soldier.

"I felt that an event like the fall of Baghdad could not pass without some sort of comment," director Mohammed Amin says. "All we Arabs could do was sit and watch it on TV. So I decided to make a movie about impotence. That is what it is all about."

The film is Amin's second comic outing. Last year, he made "Cultural Film," which told the tale of a group of young Egyptians trying in vain to find a place where they could be alone to watch pornographic videos.

In "Night," he satirizes Egyptian life and politics, too, though not through the kind of shocking imagery he uses on the Americans. When the teacher wants to boost the morale of his militia, he produces a video of Egyptian achievement since the 1973 war with Israel. It is composed of a single goal in a soccer game in which Egypt tied its adversary. He approaches a general to ask about developing weapons, but the officer says military industry is engaged in producing umbrellas. An acquaintance says Egypt already possesses weapons of mass destruction -- he knows it's so because, once, the entire country suffered a blackout when all energy was diverted to enriching uranium.

DOJ_NMG_0018589

The Condoleezza Rice fantasy sex scenes received a lot of negative commentary in Egypt, but Amin defends them on the grounds that a weak character naturally fantasizes about possessing someone more powerful. "The student hates U.S. officials, so he defeats them in bed in the form of Rice. Rice is always coming to Egypt to lecture us. It is like fantasizing about your sixth-grade teacher."

He insists he is not reflexively anti-American. His next project, he says, is a movie both about the horrors of Iraq but also the good some American doctors did recently in separating conjoined Egyptian twins. "I want to investigate how a country can do so much good and bad at the same time," he says.

Mexico Urged To Act On Border Tunnels (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

A bipartisan group of U.S. senators has asked the Mexican government to enact legislation to criminalize the construction or financing of border tunnels between the United States and Mexico.

In letters to Mexican President Vicente Fox and members of the Mexican Congress, the senators -- led by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat -- said 40 tunnels into the United States have been discovered since 2001 and urged the Mexican officials to enact legislation to crack down on those involved.

"Our countries must continue to work together to address this problem by discovering and shutting down those who build, finance or use border tunnels for illegal purposes," the senators said, urging Mexico to enact legislation similar to a bill offered March 2 by Mrs. Feinstein to criminalize the construction or financing of border tunnels.

In addition to Mrs. Feinstein, the letter was signed by Republican Sens. Pete V. Domenici of New Mexico, Conrad Burns of Montana, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Jim Talent of Missouri, and Democratic Sens. Barbara Boxer of California and Maria Cantwell of Washington.

The Department of Homeland Security has said tunnels typically have been built to smuggle drugs, but have quickly transitioned into passages for smuggling illegal aliens. The senators said they were concerned they could also be used to smuggle weapons and terrorists into the United States.

The Feinstein legislation was prompted by the discovery in January of a sophisticated tunnel between the United States and Mexico that could have been used to traffic drugs, humans, guns or terrorists between the two countries. The tunnel, which is more than 2,000 feet long and connected warehouses in Tijuana to San Diego, was the largest and most sophisticated illegal cross-border underpass Mexican and U.S. authorities said they had ever found.

Equipped with a pulley and ventilation system, the tunnel was six feet wide and 12 feet high. It had a cement floor and lights. Authorities said they were unsure how long the tunnel had been in operation.

That tunnel originated under a warehouse 150 yards south of the border, near the Tijuana airport, and surfaced about a half-mile north of the border in an abandoned warehouse in Otay Mesa, a community within the city of San Diego developed as an industrial area in 1985. Otay Mesa is California's largest commercial land-border port and one of the busiest commercial land-border crossings in the United States.

Mrs. Feinstein's bill, known as the Border Tunnel Prevention Act, would impose up to 20 years' imprisonment for constructing or financing a tunnel crossing the border into the United States and up to 10 years for anyone who negligently permits others to construct or use an unauthorized tunnel on their land.

It also would punish any person who uses a tunnel to smuggle aliens, weapons, drugs, terrorists or illegal goods by doubling the sentence for the underlying offense if convicted; calls for the forfeiture of the assets of those involved; and authorizes and funds homeland security efforts to fill in tunnels.

The bill is pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Thousands In Belarus Protest Against Poll 'fraud' (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0018590

By Stefan Wagstyl And Neil Buckley In Minsk

Financial Times, March 20, 2006

Up to 5,000 opposition supporters braved blizzards and threats of violence from the Belarus authorities to protest on Sunday in central Minsk against what they called a fraudulent election victory by President Alexander Lukashenko.

Initial returns showed Mr Lukashenko, denounced by the US as Europe's last dictator, winning more than 90 per cent of the vote. But supporters of the two opposition candidates, Alexander Milinkevich and Alexander Kozulin, converged on the central October Square to claim that the president's true share of the vote was less than 50 per cent and call for a rerun.

"We don't recognise these elections. They were a farce," said Mr Milinkevich, the main opposition candidate, whose aides claimed he had won 30 per cent of the vote. "They said we want revolution, but what we want is freedom and justice. We have already achieved a colossal victory. People have overcome their fear."

Protesters later laid flowers on a war memorial in the centre of Minsk. The two opposition candidates called on protesters to return to the streets tonight, once official results are known and observers from the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe have delivered what is expected to be a critical verdict on the election.

The European Union and the US, which have repeatedly pressed Mr Lukashenko to ease his repressive policies, are likely to consider further sanctions on Belarus.

The scale of the demonstration was a success for the opposition. The KGB secret police had promised to suppress any protests and treat as terrorism any attempt to stage a popular revolt on the lines of the 2004 Orange Revolution in Ukraine, which brought Viktor Yushchenko to power. Mr Lukashenko himself had threatened to "wring the necks" of anyone threatening public order.However, the protest is unlikely to be enough to overturn Mr Lukashenko's victory. The former collective farm boss has remained popular since gaining office in 1994 by promoting political stability and presiding over strong economic growth, partly supported by subsidised oil and gas from his most important ally, Russia.

Belarus President Expected To Win Reelection Amid Protests (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

MINSK, Belarus — Police were preparing to mobilize in the city center here today in an attempt to control election-day protests as President Alexander Lukashenko appeared headed for an overwhelming victory, but opposition leaders vowed to challenge the balloting in the streets.

Election officials said early returns had given Lukashenko 89% of the vote and his main challenger, Alexander Milinkevich, less than 4%.

In an echo of recent pro-democracy protests that have rocked authoritarian regimes across the former Soviet space, supporters of Milinkevich gathered in large numbers in the heart of the capital. They demanded a new vote and protested against a campaign they said was fraught with violations intended to preserve the reign of the 51-year-old Lukashenko, whom the Bush administration calls Europe's last dictator.

"I will be grateful to every person who comes out and says, 'We are human, we have dignity, and we no longer want to live on our knees,'." said Milinkevich, a pro-Western physicist who was chosen by a coalition of pro-democracy parties to challenge the authoritarian regime that has governed this small former Soviet republic since 1994.

"Today, the impression is that we're not holding elections, but preparing for war," added his campaign manager, Sergei Kalyakin, as authorities vowed they would not tolerate foreign-backed attempts to destabilize the government. "The psychosis has reached a crescendo in this country," he said.

An anonymous text message apparently delivered to every cell phone in Minsk warned of possible violence. "On the night of March 19, 2006, provocateurs are preparing a bloodshed. Protect your life and health," it said.

Lukashenko, a former collective farm manager who has raised salaries and pensions and fostered robust economic growth even while maintaining state control over 80% of the economy, appeared confident as he cast his own ballot this morning. He scoffed at the Bush administration's allegations that he has amassed what may be billions of dollars through corruption and sold equipment to Iran that could be used to create weapons of mass destruction.

DOJ_NMG_0018591

"Bush…is terrorist #1 on our planet, openly destroying states in different parts of the world and then killing presidents," he said, in a possible reference to former Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic.

"If someone thinks I'm a dictator, good luck to him. But it's impossible to have a dictator in Europe. Only stupid people would think that," he said.

The balloting unfolded without incident throughout the day, with many polling stations featuring folk dancers and concerts.

"We voted only for our father," said Yadviga Stashkevich, a 58-year-old pensioner who cast her ballot for the president at a suburban school. "He pays our pensions on time, and we have stability," she said.

But a group of young men said they had voted for Milinkevich.

"Why does one man have to rule a country for 15 years?" said Andrei Shimanets, a 23-year-old foundry worker. "But however we vote, Lukashenko wins."

Independent exit polling has been banned, but just four hours after the polls opened, the pro-government EcooM Center forecast an 84.2% victory for the president. Milinkevich was said to have polled 2%.

A later exit poll by the independent Levada Center of Moscow gave Lukashenko 47% and Milinkevich 25.6%. The remaining vote was split among two other candidates, according to the poll.

One of those, former university rector Alexander Kozulin, accused Lukashenko of secretly disposing of at least $12 billion in revenue from weapons sales through a parallel presidential budget not subject to public disclosure.

"Where is the money? Show me at least one civilized state with two or three budgets," he said in an interview.

Foreign Minister Sergei Martinov in an interview earlier this week denied that Belarus had improperly sold weapons material to Iran. "Belarus never ever in its arms trade violated UN sanctions. Iran is not under sanctions," he said.

"Iran is a friendly country and an important market for us, and we don't see why we would stop working in the Iranian market," he added.

A fourth candidate, Sergei Gaidukevich, is a Lukashenko ally and head of the Liberal Democratic Party. He has done little campaigning.

Opposition leaders accused Lukashenko of closing down independent newspapers, blocking legal campaign rallies, arresting opposition activists and encouraging large numbers of voters to cast ballots early in the days preceding the election in what opponents believed was an attempt to manipulate the vote tally.

"The legal [restrictive] provisions on campaigning, the manner in which they are being interpreted and actions of state bodies have limited the scope for a vibrant election campaign," the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which is monitoring the election, said in a statement before the balloting.

Milinkevich said the alleged campaign violations included the arrest of more than 450 campaign activists, with more than 160 of them subjected to substantial fines, and the seizure of 260,000 campaign leaflets paid for with state funding allocated to presidential candidates.

Milinkevich supporters in outlying regions, including the towns of Baranovichi and Bovruysk, said they were prevented from leaving town to join public protests in Minsk when authorities turned back buses or asserted there were no bus tickets.

Still, thousands of opposition supporters were allowed to stage a rally and rock concert "For Freedom" in the capital Saturday, with supporters waving European Union and Belarus nationalist flags and dissident bands singing songs critical of the regime.

"President, go home!" one musician sang.

"I was born in the Soviet Union," said another. "I don't want to go back to it."

Both Milinkevich and Kozulin said their supporters would be committed to nonviolence.

"If you have decided to take to the streets and defend your right to a worthy life in a free state, go with flowers, candies and presents. Belarus is a peaceful country and the Belarusians are peaceful people. Do not give the authorities cause to shed blood today and use force against peaceful citizens," Kozulin said in a message to his backers.

But Lukashenko's campaign spokesman, Dmitry Kostin, said those who are encouraging street protests are working against the interests of the country.

DOJ_NMG_0018592

"After they called on the people to come out to the square with their children at night, I understood that these politicians are worth nothing. Why should mothers and fathers want to bring children out to a mass rally? These calls are a provocation," he said.

He said if demonstrators attempt to block roads or railway stations, "the authorities will be obliged to use force against the violators."

President Wins Big In Belarus Vote; Thousands Protest Results (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 20 -- Thousands of people poured onto a snow-blown central square Sunday night to protest the results of a presidential election in which incumbent Alexander Lukashenko was heading to the kind of overwhelming victory that his opponents charge lacks any credibility.

With nearly all of the ballots counted, Lukashenko, 51, had won 82.6 percent of the vote, far ahead of three other candidates, the country's Central Election Commission reported early Monday.

Alexander Milinkevich, the favorite of the country's youthful opposition, had won 6 percent, followed by another opposition candidate, Alexander Kozulin, a former university rector. The fourth candidate was Syarhey Haydukevich, an ally of Lukashenko who analysts said was on the ballot to create a sheen of competition.

The protest, which drew at least 10,000 people at its peak, was peaceful. Hundreds of riot police who had massed in vans near the square stayed away from the crowd. The mostly youthful protesters chanted "Mil-in-kev-ich," "Long live Belarus" and, periodically, "Shame" when an image of Lukashenko flashed on a large TV screen on the square.

But the weather did not smile on the crowd, which began to dissipate after a blinding blizzard swept in. The rally was not sanctioned by the government, and for many in the crowd it was difficult to hear Milinkevich, who used a bullhorn because the government would not allow a public address system.

Milinkevich called on his supporters to return to the square Monday evening to continue to contest the results. "We demand new, honest elections," he told the crowd. "This was a complete farce."

But in a country where Lukashenko controls nearly all of the news media, which portray members of the opposition as criminal revolutionaries, it will be difficult to disseminate Milinkevich's desire to challenge the vote. State media all but ignored the rally Sunday night.

Absent in Belarus are many of the elements that recently helped enable popular protests to topple governments in Ukraine and Georgia after fraudulent elections. There is no independent broadcast media, the opposition is not well-financed and Milinkevich, a former physics professor, was virtually unknown three months ago.

Moreover, Lukashenko, seeking a third term after 12 years in power, remains popular with a large segment of Belarusan society that appreciates the political and economic stability of the former Soviet republic, which has been scarred by world wars and environmental disaster.

"He's the best in the world," said Nicolai Shebeka, a 33-year-old factory worker, after voting Sunday on the edge of Minsk, the capital. "The place where I work was awful before he came to power."

Many in the crowd on October Square recognize the limits of what they can achieve, but said the fact that thousands were still willing to protest in a climate of fear gave them hope. Before the vote, Lukashenko and the country's security service, which is still known as the KGB, had promised to crush any protests.

"We are dreaming about a free and independent country," said Snezhana Lisovskaya, a 22-year-old student. "We're here and we have the feeling that something will change -- if not tonight, then soon."

Lukashenko has ruled Belarus, which borders Russia and the European Union, since 1994. In 2004, in a referendum that outside observers condemned as rigged, a two-term limit for the president was lifted, essentially allowing Lukashenko to run indefinitely.

DOJ_NMG_0018593

Sunday's election was monitored by 400 observers from the 55-nation Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which is to issue a report Monday. Based on the group's interim reports leading up to the vote, the election is likely to be condemned as falling far short of democratic standards.

The head of the Belarusan Central Election Commission said she expected the report to be not just bad, but "very bad," because of what she said was the organization's Western bias. Both the United States and the E.U. have accused Lukashenko of dictatorial rule and threatened some kind of sanction if the presidential election was deemed fraudulent.

Lukashenko dismissed the anticipated criticism when he voted Sunday at a college in Minsk.

"We in Belarus are conducting the election for ourselves," he said. "What is important is that elections take place in accordance with Belarusan legislation. As for sweeping accusations, I've been hearing them for 10 years. I've already gotten used to them."

Lukashenko Wins Election; Opposition Calls For New Election (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

MINSK, Belarus -- Incumbent President Alexander Lukashenko handily won Belarus' presidential election, according to an incomplete tally released early Monday, and the main opposition candidate called for a new election as thousands of his supporters jammed a main square in central Minsk.

With 72.2% of the ballots counted from Sunday's balloting, Mr. Lukashenko had 82.3% of the vote compared to 5.8% for Alexander Milinkevich, the Central Election Commission said, pointing to a third term for the authoritarian leader, who has ruled the ex-Soviet republic since 1994. Turnout was 92.6%, it said.

Several thousand people heeded opposition candidate Mr. Milinkevich's persistent calls for a peaceful protest after polls closed across the nation of 10 million, defying a ban on election day rallies and massing in a bitter wind on Oktyabrskaya Square with shouts of "Freedom!" and "Milinkevich!" Some waved colorful light wands or flags.

"We demand new, honest elections," Mr. Milinkevich told the crowd through a small bullhorn, shouting to the snow-dusted crowd on Oktyabrskaya Square. "This was a complete farce."

Although snow had fallen sporadically all day, a squall that kicked up during the rally was suspected by many of being a police action: the snow was of a different texture than the previous flakes and it began blowing suddenly from a different direction, ending as abruptly as it began after about 10 minutes.

Mr. Milinkevich called on his supporters to return to the square Monday evening to continue their protest -- signaling a bid to hold a sustained protest of the sort that have brought opposition leaders to power in former Soviet republics including Ukraine and Georgia in recent years.

Fears of violent confrontation had mounted, with Mr. Milinkevich calling for the protests and officials saying they were banned on election day. But the authorities held back.

The crowd was the biggest the opposition had mustered in years, reaching at least 10,000, according to AP reporters' estimates, before it started thinning out. After about three hours, a smaller group marched to nearby Victory Square, some laying red, blue and white carnations at a monument there before dispersing around midnight.

"Tomorrow we will show the world our might!" said Alexander Kozulin, another opposition candidate.

He demanded authorities release what he said were hundreds of opposition activists detained during the campaign.

At Oktyabrskaya Square, demonstrators waved a national flag that Mr. Lukashenko scrapped in favor of a Soviet-style replacement, as well as EU flags. At one point, a trolley bus went by with a young man riding on the roof. He pumped his fist in a victory sign, and the crowd roared when he rode off carrying a national flag someone thrust into his hands.

People blew horns and shouted "Mi-lin-ke-vich!" -- echoing the much larger crowds on Kiev's Independence Square in Ukraine's 2004 Orange Revolution, which has inspired the opposition in neighboring Belarus.

Police made no move to disperse the crowd, though they closely guarded the building facing the square that temporarily houses the election commission. About a dozen identical unmarked white buses, filled with riot police behind draw curtains, idled on a nearby side-street.

DOJ_NMG_0018594

Mr. Lukashenko has vowed to prevent the kind of mass rallies that helped bring opposition leaders to power in Ukraine, Georgia and Kyrgyzstan following disputed elections, raising the threat of a forceful government response.

The use or threat of force neutralized opposition efforts to protest vote results in Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan last year, and a bloody government crackdown in Uzbekistan left hundreds dead.

Ahead of the vote, the government mounted a campaign of threats and allegations of violent, foreign-backed overthrow plots that its opponents said was aimed at frightening people off the streets and justifying the potential use of force against protesters.

"These elections will be recognized neither by us nor by democratic countries," Mr. Milinkevich told a news conference earlier in the day, after two groups authorized by the state to conduct exit polls released results just hours into the voting giving Mr. Lukashenko more than 80%.

"In Poland, people began laughing at communist authorities and this is when Solidarity won. We are getting there," he said. "I won't be surprised if someone allows himself to claim 120%."

Western countries have forged close ties with the opposition and made no secret of their contempt for the ruler of what Washington calls an outpost of tyranny in Europe. It condemned the campaign as "seriously flawed and tainted."

While Russia's relations with Belarus are sometimes strained, the Kremlin is wary of losing its only ally between its western border and NATO countries, and has signaled approval of a Lukashenko victory.

Mr. Lukashenko dismissed international criticism. "We in Belarus are conducting the election for ourselves," he said. "As for sweeping accusations, I've been hearing them for 10 years. I've already gotten used to them."

A dictator to his critics, many Belarusians see the 51-year-old former collective farm manager as having brought stability after the uncertainty that followed the 1991 Soviet collapse.

Even independent opinion polls suggested Mr. Lukashenko, who has pushed through a referendum scrapping term limits and hinted he plans to stay in office indefinitely, would win a majority and avoid a runoff.

Protesters Charge Fraud In Belarus Presidential Election (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers And C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, Monday, March 20 — An expected landslide for President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko drew several thousand Belarussians into the streets on Sunday, as protesters ignored swirling snow and official threats of arrest to denounce the election as a clumsily orchestrated sham.

With nearly all votes counted, Mr. Lukashenko, a former collective farm boss who has been in office 12 years, won 82.6 percent of the total, the chief of the Central Election Commission, Lidiya Yermoshina, said Monday morning, according to The Associated Press. That figure exceeded even the state's own surveys of voters leaving the polls.

Early indications that Mr. Lukashenko would be the easy winner had, though, already hardened his opponents' assertions that the results were fraudulent.

"They say we want a revolution," the leading opposition candidate, Aleksandr Milinkevich, told thousands of protesters who gathered peacefully in October Square, the central square in Minsk, as the polls closed at 8 p.m. Sunday. "No. We want only free and fair elections. What happened here was a farce. We do not recognize this election."

The election commission said Monday that Mr. Milinkevich trailed in a distant second place, with 6 percent.

The protest, drawing several thousand despite the snow and bitter cold, was the largest in years against Mr. Lukashenko, who is often denounced here and abroad as the last dictator in Europe. The protesters waved flags — including the former national flag, now banned, and that of the European Union, officially scorned — and chanted slogans demanding freedom.

"All they are saying is lies," Tatyana Agechich, an engineer who lost her job for disloyalty to Mr. Lukashenko's government, said as official statements were being broadcast on a large-screen television in the square, accompanied by jeers.

Although the authorities banned election day rallies and the country's security service — still known as the K.G.B. — warned that anyone causing disturbances could face charges of terrorism, the protest passed without the violent crackdown that many had feared.

DOJ_NMG_0018595

Scores of police officers and security troops assembled in buses on side streets, but did not intervene. At times the protesters — estimated at 5,000 to 10,000 — broke into chants of "The police are with us."

Mr. Milinkevich addressed the crowd from the steps of the neo-classical Palace of Trade Unions, near the building where officials were announcing the results. A second opposition candidate, Aleksandr V. Kazulin, joined him in ridiculing the outcome.

Acknowledging the genuine popularity that Mr. Lukashenko has, however, Mr. Kazulin demanded only a second round of voting, which is required if no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote.

"There is only one God," he said. "All others are servants of the people."

Although Mr. Lukashenko's opponents have modeled their campaign after the popular uprising that overturned a rigged presidential vote in Ukraine in 2004, the protesters in Minsk did not block traffic or try to set up camp, as the Ukrainians did in Kiev.

After three hours, they heeded a call to march half a mile down Independence Prospect to Victory Square. By early Monday, the crowd dispersed. The two opposition candidates called on the protesters to return Monday night once, as they expect, the final results are called into doubt by observers from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Sunday's vote has become a new conflict between Belarus, the United States and the European Union. Both Europe and the United States have threatened penalties if the election is determined to be undemocratic. It is also likely to become a fresh source of tension between the West and Russia, which has supported Mr. Lukashenko's rule, openly at times. Russia and other former Soviet republics have sent their own election observers, who said in preliminary statements that the election was fair.

Mr. Lukashenko, after voting at a sports complex in Minsk, dismissed the chorus of American and European criticism that coincided with the end of the campaign, which was marred by dozens of arrests, restrictions on campaign events and harassment of independent organizations.

"We are holding elections for ourselves," Mr. Lukashenko said in remarks broadcast live on state television.

The transmission was abruptly stopped when he was questioned about the accusations of vote-rigging. In response to questions about whether Belarus under his rule has become a dictatorship, he denounced President Bush.

He called Mr. Bush "terrorist No. 1 on our planet" and ridiculed a White House report released last week that accused Mr. Lukashenko of amassing a personal fortune from arms sales and corruption. "He is not even capable of calculating his own incomes, gained from the oil and the war," Mr. Lukashenko said of Mr. Bush, according to the Interfax news agency.

Election day, like the campaign, was divided into parallel worlds. Mr. Milinkevich's supporters reported instances of harassment and expulsions of observers sent to monitor the voting at polling places across the country.

State television, meanwhile, offered a series of interviews with analysts and observers, including a few Westerners, who praised the election. Mr. Lukashenko, elected in 1994 in what has been called the last free election in Belarus, has since orchestrated not only presidential and parliamentary elections, but also a constitutional referendum in 2004 that lifted the limits of him seeking a third term.

"What is going on today is the seizure of power by unconstitutional means," Mr. Milinkevich said in an interview in a cramped apartment that served as his campaign headquarters.

He noted that 10 of his 30 campaign managers had been arrested and remained in jail on election day. "What kind of election are we having if my campaign managers are in jail?" he said.

Many voters who were interviewed declined to state their names or their choices, but in Minsk and especially outside of it, Mr. Lukashenko's supporters praised his leadership over the last 12 years.

"I came to vote for our batka," Zoya A. Popkovskaya said loudly as she entered a polling station in Samokhvalovichi, a village south of Minsk, using a nickname for father that Mr. Lukashenko favors. "I want him to be elected for life — at least until he is a pensioner."

Ms. Popkovskaya, 69, explained her support for Mr. Lukashenko in ways often heard, especially in rural towns and among the elderly. "He has raised us," she said. "When he became president, he gave us our pensions and our children jobs."

It remains to be seen whether the protests will have any effect. Some in the crowd on Sunday expressed disappointment at the turnout.

"We would like more," Dmitry Yakovuk, 23, said, "but maybe people are not ready yet."

DOJ_NMG_0018596

Incumbent Remains Popular In Heartland's Rural Villages (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

KRUPITSA, Belarus, March 19 — Vladimir M. Grom pulled out of a case a bagpipe known here as a duda, assembled it and demonstrated its deep, resonant music.

"There is nothing like natural sound," he said. He explained that as a young man in the Soviet Union he played electric guitar and that electronics create even more music these days. "It is like synthetic clothes," he said, shaking the lapel of his suit.

Upstairs on this election day morning, a quartet of women played cimbaloms, a version of the dulcimer, practicing for their part in Sunday's election day concert at the House of Culture here, which doubled as the village polling place. "This is our tradition," the chairwoman of the local election commission, Lyudmilla Polichik, said of the concert.

"Please, come watch," she said, inviting unexpected foreign visitors to join in Krupitsa's celebration of an election that would return to power the man who, in her view, made all this possible, President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko.

"People have already felt the change in their lives," she said, describing a heightened sense of excitement for Mr. Lukashenko's third presidential election. "And they thank the president for it."

In the capital, Minsk, 20 miles to the north, Sunday's vote took place in an atmosphere of fear and anticipation of clashes between the security forces and Mr. Lukashenko's democratic opponents, who have accused the government of orchestrating a preordained victory.

Villages like Krupitsa, by contrast, offer a window into Mr. Lukashenko's popular support.

Everyone cites the evidence. The House of Culture recently underwent a complete renovation, after 20 years without repair. The old kolkhoz, or collective farm, recently merged with a production company to become a joint venture, owned by the state and called Raps, for the rapeseed it grows and the oil made from it. A clinic was built with money raised by performances of a folk music and dance ensemble, Krupitskaya Musika, which Mr. Grom directs.

The group has toured throughout Europe and even went to Japan in 1995, though the foreign trips tapered off after 2000, when Mr. Lukashenko's government became increasingly ostracized by its European neighbors.

"It is not window dressing, like we used to do in the old times," Mr. Grom said of the clinic, a stadium and the Raps headquarters. Most of all, of course, he praises the renaissance of a musical education program that teaches the village's children the traditions of Belarussian folk culture with the instruments that he collects.

"They are not professionals," he said of the women playing the cimbalom, "but they do not grow rape any more."

Mr. Grom, 55, earns roughly $500 a month, twice the national average. He does not agree with everything Mr. Lukashenko has done, including a system of contracts for state workers, almost everyone in Belarus, that critics say allows the government to punish the disloyal, politically or otherwise. Still, he said, "The people here are happy — we have reached a certain level."

Asked about limits on democratic freedoms, including artistic expression, he said he had experienced none. He had not heard of The Free Theater in Minsk, whose performances have gone underground because its repertory is not deemed sufficiently patriotic by cultural commissars.

"You see the other republics, where they broke down the old system," he said, referring to the 14 other nations that emerged from the Soviet wreckage. "We feel sorry for them."

On stage in the House of Culture, Yevgeniya Yakovleva, 8, played Rachmaninoff's "Italian Polka" on the dulcimer. Those in the auditorium, perhaps two-thirds full, clapped along with a girl who, in her own small way, represents the future of Belarus.

"We have simply chosen our own way," Mr. Grom said.

Europe's Last Dictator (WSJ)

By Matthew Kaminski

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Who will cry, after yesterday's fiasco of a presidential election, for Belarus? More to the point, who can find this nation of 10 million (mostly delightful) Slavic souls without a peek at a map? Safe to say, not many, which is good news for Alexander Lukashenko's career plans.

DOJ_NMG_0018597

In the club of democracy's enemies, Mr. Lukashenko is an elder statesman, a Hugo Chavez of the steppes. He is a clever populist who cultivates other pariahs and holds an old Bolshevik's contempt for opposition and political compromise. The 51-year-old collective farmer is widely known, thanks to Condi Rice, as "Europe's last dictator," though that nickname sells Vladimir Putin and other recent arrivals short.

This election will likely even the score, so to speak, in the democracy battles of the former U.S.S.R. After Georgia, Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan tossed out authoritarian regimes, the Kazakh and Azeri strongmen last year held on after their own rigged polls. Mr. Lukashenko, with Russia cheering him on, looks to make it three apiece. Official exit polls released two hours after voting started yesterday -- it was that sort of election -- gave Mr. Lukashenko over 80% in his bid for a third term, while his leading challenger Alexander Milinkevich, who'd scored up to 25% in opinion polls, got around 5%.

Mr. Milinkevich, a bearded physicist with a soft voice and pleasant manner, last night called the outcome a "farce" and his people onto the streets. He talks of a peaceful "denim revolution" to match Ukraine's orange or Georgia's rose. Jeans are still the symbol of youth, freedom and the West out East. Don't hold your breath. The riot police usually outnumber anti-Lukashenko demonstrators at opposition rallies. This time, taking no chances, the regime threatened to execute, on terrorism charges, anyone who dares take their grievances to the streets.

For promoters of democracy, Mr. Lukashenko is a reality check. Twelve years ago, he came out of nowhere to win nearly three in four votes in the country's first and last free elections. The young country's institutions were too weak to resist his frontal attack -- and the populace too scarred by decades of Soviet repression to care. Charismatic, to a Belarusan peasant at least, Mr. Lukashenko made wild allegations of corruption against the post-Soviet rulers. In power, he repressed in the name of fighting graft, proving a point I recently heard made by the Venezuelan editor of Foreign Policy magazine, Moisés Naím, that "anti-corruption campaigns" often end up subverting democracy in developing countries.

In addition to his KGB (the Soviet anthem and flag stayed the same, too) and selective murder of opponents, President Lukashenko used a series of popular votes -- the very symbol of suffrage -- to short-circuit democracy. In 1995 and 1996, the regime rammed through referendums that neutered parliament and boosted presidential powers. Independent polls show him to be the country's most popular leader, who has delivered strong economic growth, powered by Russian subsidies, while playing to nostalgia for Soviet days. With no independent press or TV widely available, most people don't know any better.

So things will stay as they are? Naturally Mr. Lukashenko, like a Milosevic or Saddam, wants nothing more than for the world to resign itself to a few more decades of him. A tyrant's best ally is fatalism.

Mr. Milinkevich at least recognizes the terms of the fight. "A majority of Belarusans want a change and want democracy," he said over dinner in Brussels recently. "People must start to believe that change is possible."

The Milinkevich candidacy was in itself a step forward. Last October, the opposition -- small except for the egos -- for the first time backed a single man to lead them. (Nothing moved in authoritarian Croatia, Serbia or Slovakia of the 1990s until the fractious democrats united.) Mr. Milinkevich surprised everyone by shooting up from nowhere in credible polls. He had no national media exposure, but word spread by mouth and blog, largely thanks to a lively student movement, Zubr. He went door to door to win votes, a first for a politician in Belarus. "Half the doors remained closed to him," said Vintsyuk Vyachorka, who leads the largest opposition party. "The main problem is the fear of the people. To overcome it, we must show this hesitant majority that there is a responsible leader who has no fear himself." A fortnight ago, Mr. Vyachorka, a key Milinkevich campaign aide, was jailed for 15 days for organizing "unauthorized rallies." Supporters fear for his life.

Belarus is as fallow ground for democracy as exists anywhere today, the Arab world included. Support from abroad helps make the playing field slightly less skewed against the opposition. The U.S. this year provided $21 million for democracy in Belarus. This money is best spent on media, Mr. Milinkevich told me, to better inform people about their own country. But foreign cash didn't bring the bodies out on the streets in Ukraine or Georgia, and can't do so here. That's up to Belarusans themselves.

In discussions of democracy-promotion today, it's fashionable to say, "Forget Poland." By that, skeptics mean that the experience of 1980s Poland, the first European Soviet satellite to fall, doesn't apply to "non-Western" cultures -- Arab or Russian or Central Asian. Try telling that to the Belarusans, who are the Poles' eastern neighbors and once shared a state with them. On hearing the early results, Mr. Milinkevich yesterday said that "People will laugh at those figures. In Poland people began laughing at communist authorities and this is when Solidarity won. We are getting there."

DOJ_NMG_0018598

It may take longer than Mr. Milinkevich might wish. Democracy isn't inevitable in Belarus, Europe or anywhere else. But nor is another 12 years of rulers like Mr. Lukashenko. "We are not romantics," Mr. Vyachorka told me before his arrest. "We are pragmatics."

Mr. Kaminski is editorial page editor of The Wall Street Journal Europe.

Furor Over French Employment Law Rages On (USAT)

By Claudia Sanchez And Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, March 20, 2006

PARIS — Growing protests by students and unions opposed to labor laws that will make it easier to fire young workers are testing France's government. (Related: Jobs law means little in poor suburb)

Crowds estimated by the French Interior Ministry at more than 500,000 turned out in about 150 cities Saturday in the largest of six weeks of anti-government protests. Labor leaders warned President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, the architect of the labor-law change, that the government had until tonight to back off or face more demonstrations and possibly a general strike.

"It is obviously an ultimatum," said Réné Valladon, confederal secretary of the Force Ouvriere union, which represents civil servants and workers at state-owned companies. "The government and the president of the republic have indeed 48 hours to decide," he said in a statement on the union's website.

Saturday's biggest protest, in the southeastern part of Paris, had the air of a street festival. Young and old turned out on a sunny day. However, the march turned violent for the second time in three days.

Police fired tear gas at rock-throwing youths at the Place de la Nation at the end of the march. Later, police fired a water cannon to disperse students who tried to storm blockades at the Sorbonne University in the Latin Quarter. The blockades were put up after police on March 11 removed 300 students who had occupied France's oldest university. The Sorbonne was the starting point of a May 1968 leftist student revolt against the French establishment. Those protests spread into general strikes across France and eventually led to the resignation of President Charles de Gaulle.

Clashes spread throughout country

Paris police said seven police officers were injured, four cars were set on fire, and 167 people were arrested Saturday. The Associated Press reported similar skirmishes in Marseille, Rennes and Lille.

Tens of thousands of high school and university students converged Thursday on Paris for a daylong, nationwide student protest. Up to 58 of France's 84 public universities were closed or partly closed during the week, according to the Ministry of National Education.

The point of controversy is a new law that allows employers to fire new workers younger than 26 during their first two years on the job without giving a reason. The change was proposed Jan. 16 by Villepin and approved March 9 by Parliament after being rushed through with little debate. It is aimed at attacking France's high youth unemployment rate.

The jobless rate is 22.8% for workers age 18 through 26. That is more than double the 9.6% overall unemployment rate. The jobless rate for youth in some suburbs in major cities, where many African immigrants and their French-born children live, is as high as 50%, the Interior Ministry says.

Villepin, who oversees France's economy, advocated the change partly in response to youth riots that began in the Paris suburbs in October and spread to other cities. The rampaging youths complained that they couldn't find jobs or places to live because they were Muslim or did not have French names.

The new law was designed to give employers greater flexibility in firing so that they would be less wary of taking on new workers, become more productive and create more jobs. It takes effect next month.

Many of Saturday's protesters in Paris, such as Johanna Etchecopar, 22, an arts student at the University of Evry, say the change in the law undermines job security. "The law will increase the precarious situation," Etchecopar says.

Celine Bureau, 17, a high school student, says, "The law will make us go from employed to unemployed very easily and very often. We want the government to prepare solutions for our future."

DOJ_NMG_0018599

Images of students battling police at the barricades at the Sorbonne in Paris' Left Bank evoked memories of May 1968, when utopia-minded students protested a bourgeois university system and demanded change in society. As the clashes grew, unions joined to protest police brutality. The unions also demanded a wage increase and launched a nationwide strike. In April 1969, de Gaulle resigned after a no-confidence vote on a referendum to restructure French government.

While the protests by students and unions against unpopular government policies appear similar, the issues are far different now. "It looks like '68. It smells like '68. It sounds like '68. But it's not," says Dominique Moisi, deputy director of the French Institute of International Relations in Paris, who was a student in 1968.

"In 1968, after 30 years of full employment and economic growth, students were bored to death," Moisi says. "Today, after 20 years of unemployment, the students of 2006 are looking for security."

The change in the law evokes such hostility because of the relationship that the French feel that they have with employers, says Iain Begg, an economist with the London School of Economics' European Institute.

Prime minister not backing down

While American and British workers may view their jobs as economic contracts, Begg says, the French see them as social contracts in which employers are obliged to provide stable employment. If the French are going to solve their high unemployment, he says, they must take more steps like this one to make companies more competitive and productive.

The prime minister has not backed away from the new law. Chiraq has stood behind him. In an interview published Sunday in Citato, a monthly for high school students, Villepin said he is convinced the law will work. What happens this week could determine not only the fate of the law, but Villepin's political future. He hopes to replace Chiraq as president next year.

The president of the Sorbonne, Jean-Robert Pitte, speaking in a telephone interview from his office behind the barricades on Friday, said he saw a comparison between the student revolt of 1968 and now. "We change by revolution. It is how we have done it over the last 200 years."

Sanchez reported from Paris, Stinson from London.

Contributing: Wire reports.

French Unions Threaten To Strike (NYT)

By James Kanter, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

PARIS, March 19 — Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin of France on Sunday faced an ultimatum from union leaders to withdraw the employment law that set off huge nationwide demonstrations and sporadic violence over the weekend, or face a general strike.

After the protests ended in outbreaks of violence late Saturday, union leaders gave Mr. de Villepin a deadline of Monday evening to withdraw the law, known as the First Employment Contract, which was intended to make it easier for businesses to hire and fire young people.

"If nothing moves, we will propose preparing a day of general work stoppages in the coming days," said Bernard Thibault, secretary general of the powerful C.G.T. labor union.

A front-page editorial in the Sunday newspaper Le Journal du Dimanche predicted that Mr. de Villepin, who has been in office for 10 months, would hold firm. But further conflict could damage his prospects of running for president next year.

The employment measure, set to go into effect in April, would allow employers to lay off new workers younger than 26 without cause for two years. Protesters say the law erodes vital employment rights and could be turned into a charter to exploit young workers.

Security forces arrested 167 people at the protests on Saturday and were still holding 70 on Sunday morning, said Catherine Castéran, a spokeswoman for the National Police. She said 34 members of the security forces and 18 demonstrators had been hurt in the violence. None of the injuries were serious, she said.

There was little sign that the tension over the contract would ease this week. On Monday, union leaders will meet to discuss the timing of a possible general strike, said Maurice Marion, a spokesman for the C.G.T.

Student groups could resume their street protests as soon as Thursday, the newspaper Le Monde reported.

DOJ_NMG_0018600

So far the government has refused to cancel the measure, saying only that modifications are possible. But commentators say that Mr. de Villepin now looks trapped after the ultimatum from unions, a call by university presidents to suspend the measure and a recent opinion poll indicating that 68 percent of French citizens favor overturning the law.

"Watering down the contract could be a quick escape route for Villepin," said Emmanuel Rivière, the director of political research at TNS Sofres, a polling firm. "But that would be a political liability for him, too, because then the contract probably wouldn't do as much to lower unemployment."

Mr. de Villepin pushed through the law to ease chronic high unemployment, particularly among the young. One in four young people in France is out of work.

But Mr. de Villepin's plan has come unstuck as union members fight to retain their job security and students accuse the government of age discrimination and of leaving them vulnerable to unscrupulous employers.

French Unions Threaten To Strike (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

PARIS -- Buoyed by big protests Saturday across France, French trade-union leaders threatened yesterday to call a nationwide strike to increase pressure on the government over a new labor law.

The strike threat escalates the stakes in a protest movement initially driven largely by students but now grown into a far broader campaign of opposition to an overhaul of France's rigid labor market.

The alliance of students and labor is a powerful force in French politics. It drove a 1968 revolt that, like the current movement, centered on the Sorbonne, a venerable academy in the middle of Paris that has been shut for more than a week following clashes between students and riot police.

Trade unions are much weaker now, hit by declining membership that has left only a small portion of the total work force unionized. Nonetheless, unions still have muscle, thanks to their ability to disrupt the national railway and other state-run services.

In a radio interview yesterday, Bernard Thibault, head of France's biggest union, the CGT, said he would propose a one-day general strike if the government doesn't abandon its labor changes. The CGT and other trade unions will meet today to make a decision, he said. The leader of Force Ouvrière, another union, also dangled the possibility of a strike, but it is unclear whether union members would support such drastic action over labor overhauls that don't directly affect them.

The strike warnings followed protest marches Saturday in more than 150 cities and towns. Authorities put the turnout at 500,000; organizers claimed three times that many. In Paris, a march across the city drew about 100,000 people, including leaders of the socialist and communist parties. It was the biggest protest so far, attracting not only students but also many older people anxious about the encroachment of "Anglo-Saxon" free-market methods.

At the end of Saturday's Paris protest, police fired tear gas to halt a small riot near Place de la Nation. Several cars were torched and a McDonald's restaurant was attacked. Protesters also tried to break a police blockade around the Sorbonne in the Latin Quarter. In Marseille, police used tear gas against youths who clambered up a City Hall flag pole to replace the French flag with a banner reading "Anti-Capitalism."

The snowballing protest movement risks derailing the government's efforts to tackle what many economists see as a major obstacle to economic growth. They also could reshape a presidential election next year. Seriously weakened by the conflict is Dominique de Villepin, France's center-right prime minister and a presidential hopeful. France's normally fractious left-wing opposition, meanwhile, has united in opposition to the labor-law changes.

The government says the changes, which make it easier to hire and fire young workers, will ease unemployment, particularly in deprived urban areas that erupted in violent rioting last fall. Protesters, however, say the centerpiece of the changes -- a contract for workers younger than 26 that frees employers from legal constraints on dismissing them within the first two years of hire -- will erode workers' rights and create only "junk jobs." In Paris Saturday, students waved placards denouncing the measure as a "garbage job contract" and a "slave contract." Some marched wrapped in blue plastic garbage bags. "We don't want law-of-the-jungle capitalism," said Clara Borarier, 20, an art-history student.

DOJ_NMG_0018601

French unemployment stands at 9.6% but is more than twice as high for young people. Among older marchers, anger at a new labor law mingled with nostalgia for 1968 and alarm over globalization. "We were much stronger in 1968. We had all high hopes then. Now our horizons are much lower," said Gerard Daniel, a 56-year-old veteran of the 1968 unrest and CGT trade union activist. He said the goal now, in contrast with 1968, is "not to change the world" but to "protect what we've gained."

France's unrest plays into a debate across Europe over how to cut unemployment and lift sluggish economic growth without demolishing cherished worker rights introduced at a time when European economies were growing much faster. "Reform is ineluctable in Europe; if not, we'll lose everything," José Manuel Barroso, the head of the European Commission, said yesterday. "The status quo is not an option."

Jobs Law Means Little In Riot-torn Suburb (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, March 20, 2006

CLICHY-SOUS-BOIS, France — When Gnoro Biady saw youths running past his store with Molotov cocktails in this northern Paris suburb last fall, he feared that his store and livelihood would be incinerated.

But Biady, 47, an immigrant from the Ivory Coast, says he understood the frustrations that led youths here to launch nightly rampages starting Oct. 28. The riots spread over three weeks to almost 300 other enclaves of African immigrants and their French-born children.

"There are few jobs," Biady says. "And if you're black or Arab, they are hard to get."

The rioting began after teenagers Zyed Benna and Bouna Traore were electrocuted after climbing into an electrical substation. Some local residents said they were hiding there from police. Police have denied they were chasing the teens.

The rioting shook France and raised questions about whether every citizen enjoys the liberté, egalité, fraternité — "liberty, equality and brotherhood" — promised in its national motto. It also helped prompt French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin to push through Parliament a change in labor laws designed to tackle the high unemployment by encouraging employers to be more willing to hire new, young workers.

The change, which takes effect next month, would allow employers to fire workers younger than 26 without stating a cause during their first two years on the job. The passage of the law set off a rash of protests, some violent, by students and union workers across France who say the measure takes away job security.

There have been no demonstrations in this poor suburb against the new law. People don't expect any measures undertaken or proposed by the government to provide more opportunities for minority youth.

Oliver Klein, deputy mayor of Clichy-sous-Bois, says he has seen few changes in the suburb of about 28,000 since the unrest erupted last fall.

"We still have the same problems," he says. "Transportation, housing, employment issues are still a big problem here." The only thing that has changed, he says, is that the Interior Ministry has promised to build Clichy-sous-Bois' first police station.

Karen Boucheron-Didry, 31, teaches French at the Robert Doisneau high school, where the student body is mostly minorities.

She says the future will be very hard for many of her students, despite government promises of more open university admissions and greater job opportunities.

"They (government promises) are very far from reality," says Boucheron-Didry, whose school has the national motto emblazoned on the front of the building.

Biady, whose store offers groceries and African products, sees little future in France for his five children and is contemplating returning to the Ivory Coast.

"The jobs aren't going to be long-term," he says. "If things don't change, they will grow up suffering the same. They live here. They're educated here. But they can't find a job here."

China Puts Energy At Top Of Agenda For Putin's Visit (WSJ)

By Gregory L. White And Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018602

Russian President Vladimir Putin is scheduled to visit Beijing tomorrow for talks in which energy will be high on the agenda. China intends to push its energy-rich neighbor to deliver on past promises to supply it with more power.

During Mr. Putin's two-day stay, his hosts are likely to convey growing frustration that Russia hasn't provided as much energy assistance as China has wanted. Beijing is expected to push the Russian leader to commit to specific plans for building oil and gas pipelines to China.

"China isn't satisfied with the development of cooperation in energy," Zhang Guobao, vice chairman of the National Development and Reform Commission told Russia's Interfax news agency early this month, in a rare display of open concern. "The practical level of cooperation in my view is still very insignificant."

The lack of progress is disappointing to China, which has scoured the globe for energy to supply its fast-growing economy, even though Russia, the world's largest gas producer and No. 2 in oil, is next door. At present, Russia supplies no gas to China and roughly 5% of China's oil imports.

A legacy of Cold War tensions between the two giants, there are no major pipelines and limited rail links across the shared border. Last year, Russia shipped 7.7 million metric tons of crude by rail to China. It had promised 10 million tons.

This week's discussions are expected to center on reviving talks to build a spur that would carry oil directly to China from a $7 billion pipeline Russia plans to build across east Siberia to the Pacific, as well as a stalled gas pipeline.

For years, China has pressured Russia to build more links and expand shipments. But Kremlin politics, Russia's legendary bureaucracy and Moscow's persistent suspicions of its more-dynamic neighbor have led to delays and broken promises. Beijing's efforts to buy up Russian energy assets, meanwhile, have run into roadblocks from the Kremlin.

China is particularly eager to foster closer energy ties with Russia because routing resources by land could be more secure than sea shipping. Currently, some four-fifths of China's oil imports pass through the Straits of Malacca in Southeast Asia, which Chinese planners fear could be easily blocked.

Officials on both sides say a deal on a spur for the oil pipeline to the Pacific could be signed during Mr. Putin's visit, although Russia's record on following up pledges has Beijing wary.

"Take the question of building the oil pipeline. ... One Russian official says Russia has made the decision, another says it hasn't," Mr. Zhang told Interfax, in comments that were confirmed by his office in Beijing last week. "The whole process is unsatisfactory."

Japan, meanwhile, has been pressuring the Kremlin to ensure that any pipeline runs to the Pacific -- not directly to China -- thus preventing Beijing from monopolizing Russian supplies. Despite Russian assurances that there will be enough oil for both customers, Tokyo officials are concerned that China's surging demand could mean that no Russian crude flows to the Pacific Ocean, and on to Japan.

Within Russia, meanwhile, there is infighting over who will carry the oil. The national railroad was planning to spend more than $1 billion to expand lines to carry crude to China. It now wants the government to guarantee that the planned pipeline won't divert those flows, even though rail shipments are more costly.

Russian officials insist they want to see more oil flow to Asia, especially China, and hope the planned pipeline will stimulate growth across the desolate Siberian region. When completed in 2008, the line is slated to carry 600,000 barrels of crude a day. Moscow has said it will expand daily capacity to 1.6 million barrels, although officials have given no indication of when that might happen.

Han Xiaoping, senior vice president of Beijing-based energy consultancy Beijing Falcon Pioneer Technology Co., said the negotiations may still take time. "Russia isn't market driven. But maybe this [Putin] visit is slowly the turning point."

Moscow is only beginning talks on links to supply gas to China. An official from the state gas company OAO Gazprom said it will sign an agreement in Beijing this week spelling out planned volumes and the pricing formulas for future gas shipment. But officials indicate key issues including where the multibillion-dollar pipelines will be run remain unresolved.

"In Russia, the contract signing is only the beginning of the negotiation," said Stephen O'Sullivan, an analyst at United Financial Group, a Moscow brokerage. "The Chinese are increasingly strident in their view that 'We're not just going to wait for you.' "

DOJ_NMG_0018603

While Beijing would clearly prefer the security and low cost of pipeline gas from Russia, the Chinese government could also build more terminals for liquefied natural gas from elsewhere in Asia as an alternative.

Beijing had been working with BP PLC on a deal to bring in gas from the huge Kovykta field, which lies relatively close to the Mongolian border near Lake Baikal. But Gazprom blocked that project, saying it wants to determine where pipelines are built.

In an interview with Chinese media Friday, Russian First Deputy Premier Dmitry Medvedev, who also serves as chairman of Gazprom's board of directors, seemed to provide a ray of hope for Kovykta, citing it as an example of what he called "significant potential for cooperation in the gas sphere."

Russian officials have expressed concern that building a gas pipeline directly to China would leave them hostage to a single buyer. Analysts and officials said Gazprom needs to decide quickly on its plans for fields and pipelines to be able to deliver gas by early in the next decade.

Beijing Passes On Intervening Over Iron Ore (WSJ)

By Rebecca Blumenstein

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

BEIJING -- China's top economic planner said the government won't intervene in continuing negotiations between Chinese steelmakers and foreign mining companies that supply the iron ore they need, despite earlier warnings by Chinese officials that the country couldn't tolerate higher prices.

"The government will not interfere," Ma Kai, head of the National Development and Reform Commission, told a group of U.S. newspaper editors Friday. "This price will be decided on the basis of market and enterprise negotiations."

China is increasingly concerned about prices of key commodities needed to feed its surging economy, such as oil, copper and steel. Prices for China's iron-ore imports surged 71.5% last year from 2004. The sharp jump has hurt Chinese steelmakers, which have banded together in the current negotiations with global iron-ore suppliers.

Earlier last week, China's Ministry of Commerce issued a statement warning that China can't tolerate higher iron-ore prices. The ministry warned it may take unspecified measures if prices are deemed too high.

Speaking to a visiting delegation from the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Mr. Ma reiterated China's broader development goals approved earlier last week by China's National People's Congress, or legislature. The goals include balancing economic growth with measures to protect China's environment. Surging pollution levels in China's air and water have become an issue of national and international concern.

"We are aware that we cannot develop our economy at the expense of tomorrow," Mr. Ma said. He said local officials will be judged not only by how much their regional economies grow, but also by their success at protecting the environment.

He said China's leaders are committed to reducing a widening income disparity that is making some Chinese very rich while the country's annual per capita income averages slightly more than $1,700. "All we can say is that they are growing pains ... it is a historic and long-term process."

Mr. Ma, who has headed the NDRC since 2003, is among the country's most influential economic policy makers. Indeed, the commission, which was built on the foundation of the former State Planning Commission and a number of industrial ministries, is so powerful that it is sometimes called the "Little State Council." Besides setting macroeconomic policies, the NDRC continues to oversee a number of industrial sectors and is involved in such key issues as energy.

Mr. Ma said he isn't overly worried about inflation. If prices rise, he said, the government "has enough economic instruments to control it."

Americas Brazil, Mexico, Chile Are Expected To Fuel Strong Area Growth (WSJ)

By Patricia San Juan

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile -- The economies of Latin America and the Caribbean will likely expand an overall 4.3% in 2006, according to Jose Luis Machinea, head of the United Nations' regional-research group.

"We are [forecasting] between 4% and 4.5%, but I think it will be more like 4.3%," said Mr. Machinea, head of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, or Eclac.

DOJ_NMG_0018604

The official said the forecast is based on expectations that Brazil and Mexico, the region's two largest economies, may expand slightly faster than expected. Furthermore, Chile also may perform better than the 5.5% forecast of Eclac, Mr. Machinea said. For now, however, the group isn't changing its estimate.

Argentina may expand closer to 7% this year, faster than the previous Eclac forecast of 6%, because a surge in growth at the end of 2005 may spill over into this year, he said.

Consumers In Japan And Europe May Help To Drive Global Growth (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse And Jathon Sapsford

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

An important shift is taking place in the global economy: Japan and Europe, until recently among the biggest drags on world growth, may soon be playing crucial supporting roles.

In a trend that has caught many economists by surprise, companies and consumers in the euro zone and Japan, the world's second- and third-largest economies after the U.S., have started spending again -- or appear poised to do so -- for the first time in years.

The new climate has prompted moves by central bankers in both places to push up interest rates to curb inflation, a policy that could weigh on stock and bond prices everywhere by slowing the flow of cash around the globe. But the re-emergence of spending in those nations has implications far beyond financial markets.

For one thing, it means that the world might be less dependent on the American consumer, whose willingness to borrow and spend has been a primary driver of world growth for the past five years. If U.S. economic growth starts to taper off later this year, as some economists predict, Japanese and Europeans might help pick up the slack, a global rebalancing act that many had hoped for but few had thought probable. Growing local demand in emerging economies such as China and India could make a difference, too.

"I feel nervous as hell thinking it, because it's such a ridiculously optimistic thing to think," says Jim O'Neill, chief economist at Goldman Sachs in London. But, "if the U.S. was ever going to slow down, in many ways there couldn't be a better time for it."

Even if U.S. growth doesn't slow anytime soon, stronger growth abroad would be welcome news. It could help rein in the widening U.S. trade deficit by giving American companies more opportunity to sell their goods and services overseas.

"The businesspeople in both Japan and Europe are beginning to feel their oats," U.S. Treasury Secretary John Snow said last week in an interview with The Wall Street Journal. The trend, he said, is "good for us."

For the time being, the U.S. is on a roll, fueling growth in the rest of the world by buying much more stuff from abroad than it exports. The current-account deficit, a measure of how much the U.S. borrows from overseas to pay for foreign goods and services, widened to a record $805 billion in 2005 from $668 billion in 2004. That's a sign that the world's dependence on U.S. demand has been growing.

Some economists, though, expect the U.S. economy to slow in the second half of 2006, as stagnant or falling home prices make Americans feel less wealthy, and thus less willing to spend. Economists polled by the Journal expect annualized growth in U.S. gross domestic product to slow to 2.9% by the fourth quarter of this year from 4.6% in the current quarter. That could be a significant blow to the global economy: U.S. consumers buy about a fifth of everything the world produces.

Until recently, there were few candidates to step up and buy if the U.S. consumer stepped down. Japan has been growing for three years, but slowly and without much help from its consumers. Europe, too, offered little hope of buoyancy. Household consumption in Germany, for example, fell in each of the past four quarters.

But change has come quickly. In Japan, for example, fourth-quarter GDP grew at an annualized 5.4%, the highest rate among the Group of Seven industrialized nations. More significantly, Japanese consumers have regained some of their urge to buy. After barely budging for much of the past decade, Japan's household spending grew by an annualized 3.5% in the final quarter of 2005.

Anecdotal evidence suggests a society that is learning how to spend money again. New restaurants are opening in Tokyo's posh neighborhoods, as are high-end boutiques. Apple Computer Inc. sold 14 million iPod portable music devices in the last quarter of 2005 -- its best sales since introducing the iPod to Japan in 2001. Coach Inc., a maker of upscale handbags, expects its Japanese sales to jump 20% to about $410 million for the fiscal year ending in June.

DOJ_NMG_0018605

The picture is less clear in Europe. In France and Spain, robust household spending is fueling an economic upturn. But in Germany, Europe's largest economy, official data still show consumers in the doldrums. Many economists hope Germans will feel better about opening their pocketbooks if -- as some surveys suggest -- employers start taking on more workers.

The widely followed Ifo survey, for example, shows German business confidence at levels not seen since the reunification boom of 1991. And in the most recent Manpower survey of hiring expectations, German businesses said they expect to increase their work forces by 5% in the second quarter, reversing an expected decline of 4% in the current quarter.

U.S. multinational companies see signs that German industry is tooling up to produce for local consumers. Nordson Corp., which makes systems that apply glue and paint to packaging for the kinds of food and other products that go to local markets, says that European orders in December through February were up 12% from a year earlier, largely due to German demand. Nordson, based in Westlake, Ohio, does two-thirds of its manufacturing in the U.S., so more foreign demand means more exports.

"Talking to other industrial companies, they're having a similar experience," says Peter Hellman, president and chief operating officer at Nordson.

To be sure, even Japan and Europe won't be able to compensate if U.S. consumer demand falls sharply. And both face deeper problems that will keep their economies from growing very fast in the long run. They have aging populations and shrinking labor forces. Germany also faces another hurdle: Many of its manufacturers are relocating to cheaper locales in Central and Eastern Europe.

Still, if Japanese and European consumers start buying more over the next year, it could help curb the gaping U.S. current-account deficit, which many economists have cited as the most glaring sign of a global economic imbalance. "We will be getting worse more slowly, or possibly improving a little bit," says Michael Mussa, senior fellow at the Institute for International Economics in Washington.

Further down the road, emerging economies could play a bigger role in correcting the world's imbalances. Already, people and companies in the largest emerging economies, most of which have grown mainly by selling to the rest of the world, are making their own contributions to global demand. Data from the International Monetary Fund suggest that in 2005, China, India, Brazil and Russia together contributed about 30% of total growth in global demand, which includes consumer, corporate and government spending. That's more than double the level in 2000.

Investment has been the main driver of China's consumption growth. Massive government spending on everything from highways to sports stadiums for the 2008 Olympics has led to surging demand for imports. And China's emergence as a global center for product assembly has driven demand for high-tech parts from around the world. As the Chinese economy advances, however, consumers are playing a larger role, increasing their spending at an annualized rate of around 12%.

The rapid emergence of a middle class in cities like Shanghai and Beijing is attracting many of the world's top brands, as well as retailers such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc., Carrefour SA and Ikea. Still, Beijing isn't satisfied. It hopes consumer spending will expand much faster, replacing investment and exports as a leading engine of growth. Such a shift will take time, partly because a lack of health and welfare measures encourages the Chinese to save more and spend less. Chinese savings are among the highest in the world, at more than 40% of GDP.

India, too, is experiencing a consumer boom, driven by low interest rates, a rocketing stock market and a growing number of young urbanites employed in technology, one of the hottest corners of the global economy. Over the past year in India, sales of air conditioners and DVD players have risen 25%, washing machines 18% and microwaves 27%, according to a recent survey by the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry.

The emerging economies' growth is still coming from a relatively low base. China must expand about seven times as fast as the European Union to make the same dollar contribution to global demand growth. But the gap is closing -- a fact not lost on businesses in the U.S.

"In the very near term, the strength in Europe is more important," says Paul Meister, vice chairman of Fisher Scientific International Inc., Hampton, N.H., which has recently seen stronger demand for everything from beakers to high-precision scales as European firms ramp up research spending. "But in the medium term, strength in Asia [outside Japan] is more important, particularly in China and India."

DOJ_NMG_0018606

EU Raps Ankara For Pace Of Reforms (WT)

By Andrew Borowiec

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

NICOSIA, Cyprus -- The Turkish government has ducked a confrontation with the military over Kurdish unrest -- at the price of incurring fresh criticism from the European Union that it is not making needed reforms.

Signals from Ankara indicate the problem is likely to surface again as the EU presses Turkey for changes in the treatment of the Kurdish minority and the role of the military.

The EU said recently that Turkey "has lost its appetite for reform."

Tension remained high yesterday in southeastern Turkey, where security forces were reinforced as Kurds prepared to celebrate the Newroz spring holiday tomorrow.

Authorities in Diyarbakir, one of the centers of Kurdish unrest, banned civil servants from taking part in the festivities, warning violators of disciplinary action. Newroz is not an official holiday in Turkey.

At the same time, the government authorized two regional radio and television stations to start limited programs in the Kurdish language, use of which was until recently banned in public statements. The EU wants Turkey, a membership candidate, to eliminate all such restrictions.

Relations between the government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan and the military have been strained by a report that a leading general had organized a special autonomous military force to fight Kurdish nationalist guerrillas.

When a prosecuting judge called for an investigation of the report, Mr. Erdogan ordered a probe of the judge instead, saying, "No one will gain anything by making the country's military appear weak."

"The army is one of our most important institutions," he added, in what was seen by diplomats as an effort to placate the military.

The general involved, Gen. Yasar Buyukanit, is head of Turkey's land forces and is due to take over as chief of general staff in August. He publicly supports Turkey's bid to join the EU, but thinks certain reforms demanded by the union would threaten Turkish society and traditions.

Since the creation of the republic in the 1920s, the army has served as the ultimate guardian of the republican system. In 1997, it forced the resignation of Necmettin Erbakan, Turkey's first openly Islamist prime minister.

The relationship of the military and Mr. Erdogan's ruling Justice and Development Party has undergone periodic strains, mainly because of the party's Islamist roots and some government measures seen by the army as encouraging fundamentalism.

Prodded by the EU, Turkey has limited the army's role in the National Security Council, accepted the concept of civilian control over military finances and reduced the army's judicial autonomy.

But the EU says the reforms fall short of expectations and has asked for the appointment of an ombudsman to fight corruption and an easing of property restrictions for non-Muslim minorities.

Dowries Running Dry In Drought-Stricken East Africa (WP)

By Emily Wax

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya -- They were neighborhood friends who occasionally flirted amid the once lush elephant grass of the East African savanna.

He was a gregarious 28-year-old cattle herder who had a college education, spoke five languages and supplemented his income by working for an international safari business.

She was a lively 22-year-old high school graduate, respectful of her parents and a captivating storyteller who met his main physical requirement: She was tall.

He arranged to meet her parents, who brewed a traditional welcome drink of sugar, honey, herbs, sour milk and cow's blood at their farmhouse. For her dowry, he offered his best bulls and most productive dairy cows.

DOJ_NMG_0018607

Then, with her parents' blessing, Moses ole Samante proposed marriage to Evelyn Kutingala last spring.

But the engagement of the two young Kenyans, both from the Masai tribe, proved stressful. As the region's worst drought in a generation swept across East Africa, turning grazing fields to rock-strewn expanses of dust, Samante's chances for a wedding grew as thin as his bony cattle.

Each month, more of his 300 cattle collapsed. Soon, nearly all were dead. By December, he had lost cattle worth more than $10,000 in a country where most people survive on $350 a year. The wedding was canceled. And Samante moved to Nairobi to find work.

"It's such a sad time," he said. "I had to leave my beautiful fields."

"Is there any way you can mate remaining cows quickly?" he recalled Kutingala pleading in a phone call from their village of Ntulele, about 120 miles south of Nairobi. "I fear they will give me to another, to an old and richer man. My mother doesn't want me to waste my youth."

The men of marrying age in East Africa are calling the current dry season "the drought that killed the dowry." On the world's poorest continent, droughts and changing weather patterns are pushing more and more Africans into cities, putting pressure on already strained resources and changing cultural practices, from diet to marriage traditions.

Humanitarian organizations estimate that 3.5 million people, mostly nomadic herders, are facing food shortages in Kenya. About 40 people have died of hunger-related illnesses, and 70 percent of livestock in the drought-affected northeast have perished.

Masai herders trying to escape the drought are streaming into Nairobi, letting their cattle feed on the city's grassy traffic circles. Police blotters are filled with reports of herdsmen being hit by cars. The Masai are also building congested shantytowns to live in and wandering the city begging for jobs.

"The drought and changes of weather patterns are disrupting a whole way of life," said Doug Keating of Oxfam International, which is helping distribute aid in the region. "If one was to take the view that the pastoralist way of life is no longer viable and they should give up their cattle, then what's the alternative? Millions head for the cities. I think we know cities in Kenya can hardly sustain the populations they have."A Hard Life in 'Nai-Robbery'

Samante first came to Nairobi, a city of high-rises and high crime, after a punishing two-year drought started in 1999, the seventh to hit East Africa since 1975. His parents begged him to seek a college education, and it was his father's dying dream, Samante said, that his eldest son learn foreign languages and earn a living that did not depend on cattle.

Samante arrived in Nairobi with $300 for his college tuition. But he lost it to a pickpocket shortly after arriving in a city Kenyans have nicknamed "Nai-robbery."

"We didn't have cars, we have cows, so I was looking this way and that. Not paying attention," he said, laughing at his former innocence. "And there were so many people, some banging smack into me. I would just smile and shake their hands. They gave me odd glances."

He returned to his village to sell more cows to make money. But when he returned to Nairobi a second time, he was robbed again.

This time, he thought he spotted the thief, a man who had stood very close to him asking questions about his Masai life. He ran after the man, and a fight broke out, he said.

Both men ended up in jail. Samante was beaten up by some inmates and teased as a "country Kenyan." He watched in shock as the thief used his college money to bribe his way out of jail, he said.

Samante eventually got out himself by having a friend also bribe the guards. But he had to work several jobs as a security guard to pay for college, and it took him years to graduate.

"We just aren't city guys," said Simon Kiraison, 22, a friend of Samante's from Ntulele who now works in Nairobi. "I can't marry. And I keep getting mugged. The city does not soothe my heartaches. It only brings more."

Samante and his friends in the city said they were afraid of the crime and frustrated that they could not afford milk, which they used to drink for free, or find cow's blood, a staple of their diet.

"Cow blood is very fantastic," Samante said. "I couldn't understand why the Nairobi tribes didn't want any."

Worst of all, they were lonely without their girlfriends and prospective wives.

DOJ_NMG_0018608

Some of the rural men who moved to Nairobi took to having sex with prostitutes, a taboo in Masai culture. Cases of HIV infection began to increase in the Masai community, which historically has had a lower rate then the rest of the country, according to a government survey.

"We were losing all our self-respect," Samante said. "I wanted to try and remain a true Masai."A Debate About Dowries

Samante and Kutingala's wedding was to be a village celebration with more than 1,000 guests. A month beforehand, Kutingala's parents prepared a traditional wedding chest for her that contained fabrics, beaded necklaces and silverware.

But at the end of November, after he had lost nearly all of his cattle, Samante met with his fiancee's parents.

"When I told them," Samante said, "they wouldn't even look at me."

The drought has forced elders to revisit a debate about dowry and its role in a rapidly urbanizing Africa. Some of the arguments against dowries draw on stories like Samante's. Community leaders cite examples of girls being forced into early marriage by fathers eager to get the dowries to replace their livestock. Last month, educators rescued 20 schoolgirls in the herding district of Samburu from early marriage, according to national television reports.

The Catholic Church in Kenya, which has helped coordinate relief efforts, has blamed the government for failing to prepare for the droughts. In recent weeks, several high-level officials have been accused of pocketing a total of $1.3 billion in public funds, money that critics say should have gone to irrigation projects.

"It's really a big issue to see our culture being stamped out by drought, corruption and urban ways," said Julius Lemanken, a Masai who works for World Vision, an organization that is helping fund feeding projects. "Sometimes, culture changes naturally, on its own. But could this have been avoided? Will my grandchildren be able to herd like I did? Will they even know our good traditions?"

Young Kenyans say they are caught between strong traditions, which they still feel they must obey, and new ideas about wealth. Masai children are taught a proverb that says: "All cattle of the world actually belong to the Masai. Even the ones in India and the west were stolen from our lands."

"I love cows. I can't remove this mentality. If I do, we are lost people," Samante said. "The minute I have money in my pocket, I just buy cows. When I have money in the bank and no cows, it's like I am poor and pathetic."

Samante still hopes to wed, maybe in a year when he can mate his few remaining cattle. He just hopes Kutingala's family will allow her to wait for him.

"She met all of my needs for a young lady," he said. "I was so very happy."

"He was a successful and kind man in my age-set," Kutingala said she told her parents recently. "I am still longing for our married life."

At World Forum, Support Erodes For Private Management Of Water (NYT)

By Elisabeth Malkin

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

MEXICO CITY, March 19 — For more than a decade, the idea that private companies would be able to bring water to the world's poor has been a mantra of development policies promoted by international lending agencies and many governments.

It has not happened. In the past decade, according to a private water suppliers trade group, private companies have managed to extend water service to just 10 million people, less than 1 percent of those who need it. Some 1.1 billion people still lack access to clean water, the United Nations says.

The reality behind those numbers is sinking in. At the fourth World Water Forum, a six-day conference here of industry, governments and nongovernmental organizations, there is little talk of privatization.

Instead, many people here want to return to relying on the local public utilities that still supply 90 percent of the water to those households that have it.

There is a "big-time shift" in tone, said David Boys, a water policy expert with the Public Services International labor federation. Mr. Boys is a member of an advisory panel appointed by United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, that presented its recommendations at the forum, beginning with a call to strengthen local public utilities.

"The companies have lost tons of dough and tons of respect," Mr. Boys said. "They are pulling out."

DOJ_NMG_0018609

Nowhere has that been more evident than in Bolivia, where, in the city of El Alto, residents have been fighting a subsidiary of the French company Suez. The government is now negotiating for Suez to leave, arguing that it did not extend service to people too poor to pay enough to make it profitable.

"The water rates have to conform to reality," said Abel Mamani, an activist from El Alto who is now Bolivia's new water minister.

An uprising in the city of Cochabamba five years ago chased out a subsidiary of the United States company Bechtel after it raised rates but failed to improve service.

Bolivian officials at the World Water Forum admitted that the old public municipal water systems were mired in corruption, bureaucracy and nepotism.

"The solution is for the community to get involved in water management," said Pablo Solón, an economic adviser to the government.

That kind of citizen oversight is already in place in many cities, like Porto Alegre, Brazil, which created a permanent council of 12 citizens' groups to oversee its water utility.

Even officials of the World Water Council, the organization that runs the forum and is heavily weighted toward multinational water companies, appear to be giving up on wholesale privatization.

"Let's finance infrastructure for the 50 countries most in need and the twenty poorest megacities through a more intense donation policy," said Loïc Fauchon, president of the council, in his opening speech last week.

The debate over privatization is driving the controversy inside and outside the forum, which ends Tuesday. Across town, international and local groups held an alternative forum for activists opposed to privatization, who are unconvinced that governments and organizations like the World Bank have given up on the idea.

"The state does not assume its responsibilities properly," said Cuauhtémoc Abarca, a Mexico City activist. "In many cases there is a deliberate intention to show that public utilities work badly" as an excuse to privatize them.

For all the focus on privatization, much of the serious work of the forum was rooted in heart-wrenching statistics.

One in three people in the world, 2.6 billion, does not have access to any kind of toilet or latrine, according to a United Nations report to be presented at the conference on Tuesday.

Water-related diseases cause more than three million deaths a year, mostly of children younger than 5. Unicef, the United Nations children's agency, estimates that women and girls in the poorest countries and regions walk nearly four miles a day to carry water.

Only $3 billion in aid a year goes to improve water access and sanitation, the United Nations World Water Development Report said, and very little of that gets to the people who need it most.

But there was encouraging news, too, that local activists, even very young ones, could make a difference.

"We were scolded for being young people with big ideas," said Suresh Baral, 13, who organized a sanitation club in his school in rural Nepal. With help from Unicef, the children set up a microfinance program to help villagers pay for installing toilets.

Dolly Akhter, 15, started a hygiene group for adolescent girls in her slum in Dhaka, Bangladesh. Many teenage girls stayed away from school, too embarrassed by the lack of privacy for hygiene.

But when the group brought in new latrines, the girls returned and several were able to avoid early marriages by continuing their studies.

As her news conference ended, she looked up and said in broken English, "I hope water for all in the world."

Wise Council (WSJ)

By Kofi A. Annan

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

In just seven weeks time, on May 9, the U.N. will elect its first Human Rights Council. That moment can, and must, mark a new beginning for all the U.N.'s human-rights work. One hundred and seventy nations, including all of America's NATO allies, voted last Wednesday for the resolution creating this new Council. Belarus, Iran and Venezuela abstained. Sadly, the U.S. voted against, joined only by Israel, the Marshall Islands and Palau.

DOJ_NMG_0018610

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador, explained his vote in a constructive speech, pledging that, despite its disappointment with the text, his country "will work cooperatively with other member states to make the Council as strong and effective as it can be." That is very encouraging. Ever since Eleanor Roosevelt helped to draft the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, the U.S. has been a leading champion of human rights at the U.N. I hope and believe it will remain so.

Why were some Americans disappointed with the text? Essentially because they fear that in the new Council, as in the Commission that it replaces, some notorious human-rights abusers will win seats and shield themselves from scrutiny. That concern is shared by many other states, which -- like the U.S. -- would have preferred that Council members be elected by a two-thirds majority of the General Assembly. I had myself suggested this when I first proposed the Council a year ago. But in exchange for dropping it the president of the assembly, Sweden's Jan Eliasson, was able to persuade the assembly to include other provisions, which will make it more difficult for gross human-rights violators to sit on the Council.

First, Council members must be elected, "directly and individually by secret ballot by the majority of the members of the General Assembly." This means that nations will not get on the Council, as they did on the Commission, simply because there is no rival candidate from their own region. There will be a separate vote on each candidate, and any state that does not win an absolute majority of all U.N. members (not just those present and voting) will not get in. Its region will have to put up another candidate instead.

Second, Council members are required to "uphold the highest standards in the promotion and protection of human rights," and to submit their own human-rights record to the Council's scrutiny during their term of membership. Already some governments have produced manifestoes, pledging specific improvements in their human-rights performance, in the hope of winning election. This was unheard of under the old system. And third, the General Assembly will have the power to suspend Council members that do commit gross and systematic violations during their term. It had no such power over the old Commission.

Taken together, these provisions should make it very hard for a notorious violator to win election, and should deter the worst offenders even from running. How effective they are depends, of course, on how seriously the U.N. membership takes them. Already a large number of states have pledged not to vote for candidates that are under Security Council sanctions for human rights-related reasons. If all governments that really care about human rights take a similar attitude, and use their powers of diplomacy to persuade others to do likewise, the membership of the new Council will be significantly different from that of the Commission.

And that will not be the only difference. Being chosen by the entire U.N. membership, the Council will have greater authority than the Commission, which was elected indirectly. It will also be faster on its feet. Unlike the Commission, the Council will meet regularly throughout the year, and can respond more promptly to human-rights crises by holding special sessions at short notice. (The Commission had only one six-week session each year, while its procedure for calling special sessions was much slower.)

Equally important, instead of singling out some countries for attack while ignoring human-rights violations in others, the Council will regularly review the human-rights record of all countries -- starting, as mentioned above, with its own members. It is required to "be guided by the principles of universality, impartiality, objectivity and non-selectivity," while eliminating "double standards and politicization." And whereas the Commission was entirely reactive, the Council is mandated to contribute to preventing human-rights violations.

Some had feared that the General Assembly would use the change to strip away some of the more valuable aspects of the U.N. human-rights system, such as the use of independent experts as special rapporteurs, or the important role of non-governmental organizations. But these are explicitly continued.

In short, there is every reason to hope that the new Council will combine the best features of the old system with some much-needed changes. All those who want it to fulfill this promise now have seven weeks to make it happen. Let no one who cares about human rights remain on the sidelines of this struggle.

Mr. Annan is U.N. secretary-general.

The Case For Caring Now (WP)

By Fred Hiatt

DOJ_NMG_0018611

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

On one of her visits to her native Liberia, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf told a joint session of Congress last week, she was placed in a jail cell with 15 men. "All of them were executed a few hours later," she said. "Only the intervention of a single soldier spared me from rape."

Now Johnson-Sirleaf, 67, is the newly elected president of her unhappy African country, and if you think she was trying to seize Congress's attention with that anecdote of 20 years past, you are no doubt correct.

After all, the world is full of unhappy countries that have won sympathy here, and then been rapidly discarded. Think Haiti, for example, or Afghanistan, which was of interest to Ronald Reagan, forgotten by George H.W. Bush, neglected by Bill Clinton and then (not coincidentally) a crisis again.

Now Johnson-Sirleaf, Africa's first female elected leader, is enjoying her moment of fame and good feeling. Laura Bush and Condoleezza Rice attended her inauguration in January, Congress greeted her as a hero last week, President Bush will receive her tomorrow. After a quarter-century of coups, dictators and civil wars in Liberia, this is a moment of restored democracy and hope.

Do not assume, however, that Johnson-Sirleaf therefore will stoop to unseemly flattery or diplomatic spin. After all her years of exile, harassment, surveillance and prison, with all the misery waiting for her back home, she seems to have no time for that.

As in: When she is asked during a visit to The Post how she will plead her case for aid to Bush, given draining U.S. commitments to Iraq and Afghanistan, she replies, "For the reason you said -- he needs a success. Billions are being spent on Iraq, billions are being spent on Afghanistan -- and it will take a fraction of those billions to make Liberia a success story.

"I think he needs one, and we're going to give him an opportunity to have one."

It's not that Johnson-Sirleaf, stately in traditional dress, comes across as ungrateful. In her address to Congress, she thanked the United States for its help in brokering an end to Liberia's vicious civil war and for sending money to get the country going again.

But, she says, "we still have problems. I can't tell you we're out of the woods."

Any Western leader might regard that as an astonishing understatement. Johnson-Sirleaf works out of a dilapidated palace that, like the rest of her country, depends on generators for electricity.

"We have a city that's dark," she says. "We have a city where many young children don't know that water comes out of a tap." At night, children gather on street corners to do their homework by the spillover from private floodlights, since they have no light at home. Many others do no homework because they can't afford pencils, or can't attend school at all.

Civil war drove most of the country's 3.5 million people from their homes. Some 45 percent of the population is 14 or younger; many of those children were press-ganged into armies and know no other life. Life expectancy is 42.5 years. Unemployment is 80 to 85 percent. Of every 1,000 children born, 132 die in infancy.

Why should the United States care? The standard answer of traditional historical ties, based on the freed American slaves who founded Liberia, may have worn thin after all these years. But there are two others.

One is that helping is cheaper in the long run than the alternative. When conditions in a country become too atrocious to bear -- when drug-addled marauders take to chopping off the hands of children who get in their way, as in Liberia's neighbor Sierra Leone -- public opinion may (at least some of the time) force the United States, Britain or the United Nations to intervene. By the time that demand comes, the destruction is so complete -- in Liberia, roads, hospitals, water pipes, everything has crumbled -- that repair is far more difficult and expensive.

The second is Johnson-Sirleaf herself: Harvard-trained economist, former World Bank and U.N. official, democrat. She espouses an anti-corruption, socially inclusive vision that aid officials can only dream of finding in most poor countries. Courageously, for he still has many followers, she has asked that former dictator Charles Taylor, now in Nigeria, stand trial for his crimes.

When her hour at The Post is over, she waves off the usual pleasantries and asks: What will emerge from this interview? What will Liberia get out of it? And suddenly "grandmotherly," the adjective you often hear applied to her, reminds you less of the woman who sneaked you an extra cookie when your mother wasn't looking and more of having your hands checked for cleanliness before being seated at the Sunday dinner table.

DOJ_NMG_0018612

Well, Madam President, I'm afraid this column is the best I can do. I hope you get more out of President Bush tomorrow.

Spreading Genocide To Chad (NYT)

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

After the Holocaust, the world vowed it wouldn't stand back and allow genocide to happen again. Bosnia, Cambodia and Rwanda showed how empty that promise was. Darfur was yet another reminder that when it comes to standing up to stop the slaughter of entire peoples, the nations of the world remain pitifully inadequate.

And now, as if the hundreds of thousands of Africans killed in Sudan weren't enough, the Arab militias financed by the government of Sudan to "cleanse" Darfur of blacks are moving across the border into neighboring Chad. Our colleague Nicholas Kristof reports that the janjaweed — the name given to the Arab militias — have unleashed their fury on villages in Chad, riding in and killing and raping, accompanied by their standard shouting of racial epithets like "black slaves."

Mr. Kristof is one of the few journalists willing to venture into the lawless region. He took along NBC's Ann Curry of the "Today" show on his trip this month, and wrote about a market town in Chad near the Sudan border called Koloy, where villagers were actually waiting to be massacred. There was no one to help them. Chad's government sent a handful of troops, but when the soldiers realized that they would be facing more than 500 janjaweed armed with heavy machine guns, they fled. Diplomats don't dare visit because it's not safe. Ditto for United Nations aid groups. Only one organization, Doctors Without Borders, goes to Koloy, Mr. Kristof reported, "sending in a convoy of intrepid doctors three days a week to pull bullets out of victims."

Is this really what we have come to? The United Nations has described the carnage in Darfur as the world's biggest humanitarian crisis but continues to prove itself completely useless at doing anything to stop it. In the Security Council, China protects Sudan. Europe, for its part, has been inert.

That leaves the United States, where the Bush administration has made a few strides. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick appears to be close to getting the United Nations to supplement, if not replace, the woefully ineffective African Union peacekeeping force in the region with United Nations peacekeepers. The United States should also commit to providing specialized reconnaissance and air support for the United Nations force. Sudan's government doesn't like the idea of a multinational peacekeeping force, and has even organized demonstrations in the capital against the idea, although the protesters tend to look suspiciously like government military types.

The African Union soldiers have done their best, but they are poorly equipped for one thing, and low in numbers for another — there are only 7,000 of them in an area the size of France. They don't have much in the way of intelligence capability and they are lightly armed. That's a recipe for stalemate, and stalemate is the last thing villagers waiting to be massacred need.

A Chinese Huff (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Ever wonder why India's economy might overtake China's one day? China's Commerce Minister, Bo Xilai, might acknowledge India's English-language capabilities and its younger population. But never mind those pesky ideas about the rule of law and democratic principles.

At the Asia Society's annual corporate conference in Mumbai yesterday, we asked Mr. Bo what the Middle Kingdom might learn from India's experience, particularly as the Chinese economy becomes more integrated with the rest of the world. To our surprise, and to the shock of the audience -- save the mainland rent-a-clap crowd who were along to lend a literal hand -- Mr. Bo embarked on a tirade against democratic freedoms.

"Democracy is not the ultimate goal," Mr. Bo, the princeling son of Long March veteran and former Vice Premier Bo Yibo, declared. "We need to raise the living standards of the people." (Cue: rent-a-clap.) "I've been to lots of developed countries where there are also a lot of poor people," he added, jabbing his finger at us. (Encore rent-a-clap.) "I don't think it's good to separate countries into democratic or non-democratic countries." (One more clap.)

Now, Mr. Bo happens to be one of the more enlightened Beijing bureaucrats. A former mayor of Dalian, a northeastern port city in Liaoning province, he won praise for boosting foreign investment, among other things. In his new role as commerce minister, he's also reacted calmly to bouts of European and U.S. trade protectionism.

DOJ_NMG_0018613

But despite prolonged contact with open societies, Mr. Bo still doesn't seem to understand the secret of their success. Near the end of his huff, Mr. Bo backtracked and claimed that Beijing is "listening" to the voices of its people, and that its citizens are gradually gaining more democratic freedoms. If only it were so.

King Abdullah: Protector (WT)

By S. Rob Sobhani

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

As the rest of the Muslim world was engulfed in violence over the publication of sacrilegious cartoons of the prophet Muhammad, one country at the heart and soul of the Muslim world remained surprisingly silent. Yet that country, Saudi Arabia, is where one would have expected the most virulent and violent demonstrations, since it is the birthplace of Islam. But extremists failed to capitalize on the European press' lack of respect for the prophet of Islam.

The extremists' failure to widely incite the population of Saudi Arabia is largely due to the nature of its new leader, King Abdullah. The new king is a pious and popular leader of the most significant Muslim country in the world, and he has reset the tone and tenure of political life in Saudi Arabia by emphasizing restraint and tolerance.

At his home in the outskirts of the capital, Riyadh, King Abdullah's gracious and reform-minded son, Prince Miteb, explained his father's vision as one of "constructive engagement." As custodian of Islam's two holiest shrines, King Abdullah understands the enormous responsibility he carries as the flag-bearer of Islam. Therefore, one of the most important themes that King Abdullah has been stressing is unity both within Islam and among the various faiths of the world. For example, at a recent gathering in Riyadh, he emphasized that the "clash of civilizations" is only likely to occur if instigators of discord are allowed to spread hatred without any intervening authority.

Unlike irresponsible Muslim clerics and "leaders" who encouraged violence in response to the cartoons, this reformist leader called on Muslim intellectuals to project the true picture of Islam as a moderate and tolerant religion: "We should tell the world that the mistakes committed by a small minority of extremists and fanatics do not represent the spirit of Islam and its heritage." The king led the way by expressing his satisfaction with the apologies issued by Danish authorities expressing their deep sorrow and thereby showed statesmanship on a grand scale.

Prince Miteb, who represents a new, more progressive generation of Saudi leaders, highlighted the National Dialogue Forum as an example of the king's commitment to democratization of the kingdom, individualized to adapt to the country's culture and norms. The forum was founded in 2003 on the instructions of then-Crown Prince Abdullah as a channel for "responsible expression." These Saudi-style town hall meetings have become an effective means of fighting fanaticism and extremism by enabling Saudi men and women from all walks of life to publicly discuss previously taboo subjects.

For the first time in the kingdom's history, Saudis are enjoying a culture of public dialogue that is bringing about societal change. The first two forums covered issues of religious tolerance and women's rights. As a result of these dialogues, King Abdullah was able to peacefully return the formerly shunned minority Shi'ite Muslims into the mainstream of Saudi society.

The third forum focused on education reform, whereupon most Saudis opined that the present education system produces students who are experts at memorization but who cannot think logically and rationally. Another forum was called "Us and the Other" and dealt with how Saudis relate to the rest of the world. A majority of participants were fiercely critical of the Saudi curriculum, which blames "the other" for most international problems.

As the United States faces the uncomfortable fact that its goal of energy independence is increasingly at odds with reality, America's energy security remains in lock-step with Saudi Arabia's oil strategy. Luckily for American consumers, King Abdullah's vision of a stable global-energy market is reflective of a deep understanding of the responsibility that Saudi Arabia has as the world's No. 1 oil producer.

The key policy for King Abdullah is price stability. He has ensured that Saudi Arabia is on track to increase its production capacity by 15 percent by 2009 to more than 12 million barrels per day. This bodes well for the United States because it could be importing 70 percent of its oil in 2020 (compared to 58 percent today and 33 percent in 1973). Furthermore, the king understands that globalization of the energy sector makes energy security a common responsibility of consumers and producers.

DOJ_NMG_0018614

His vision expands the concept of energy security to include the new super consumers -- China and India -- and acknowledges that the worldwide energy-supply value chain needs to be protected.

Under the leadership of King Abdullah, Saudi Arabia is undergoing a political and social reformation. It is incumbent upon the United States to work with this distinguished statesman to ensure that his vision becomes a permanent feature of this strategic, yet combustible, region.

S. Rob Sobhani is president of Caspian Energy Consulting.

DOJ_NMG_0018615

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, MARCH 20, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

The Letter Of The Law (USNEWS) ... 3
Democrat: Punish Bush If Law Broken (USAT) ... 5
Durbin: It's Too Early To Censure Bush (AP-Y2) ... 5
Feingold's Censure Call A Distraction For His Party (WT) ... 6
Democrats Should Declare Censure Move 'Irresponsible' (RC) ... 6
Revising The Old Plan (USNEWS) ... 8
Sri Lankan Ordered Freed From Border Jail (AP) ... 8
Rules For An Unruly New War (USNEWS) ... 9
The President And The Courts (NYT) ... 10
Gitmo Goat Or Hero? (TIME) ... 11
A Legal Loose Cannon (TIME) ... 11
Another Blown Case? (WP) ... 12
Terror Case: 'Bizarre' Testimony (NSWK) ... 13

Homeland Response:

SSA Raises Hurdle In Proposal For DP World To Sell U.S. Holdings (WSJ) ... 13
Nation's Security Is At Stake (USAT) ... 14
Scuffle Over Ports Deal Stirs Up Protectionist Fears (USAT) ... 14
Increase In Contracting Intelligence Jobs Raises Concerns (WP) 15
WTC Talks To Resume Next Week (WSJ) ... 16
Multiple Layers Of Contractors Drive Up Cost Of Katrina Cleanup (WP) ... 17
Behind Louisiana Aid Package, A Change Of Heart By One Man (NYT) ... 18
FEMA Asking Some To Return Money Received For Hurricane Relief (AP) ... 20
Citizens Panel To Share Its Post-Katrina Vision (LAT) ... 20

War News:

President Bush To Stop In Cleveland On Monday (ABJ) ... 21
Bush Trying To Rally War Support (CLPD) ... 22
Bush Marks Anniversary, Never Says 'War' (AP) ... 22
Assessments At Odds On War's Anniversary (USAT) ... 24
Some Say Civil War Already Started (LAT) ... 24
On Anniversary, Bush And Cheney See Iraq Success (NYT) ... 26
Bush Still Upbeat On Outcome In Iraq (WP) ... 27
In Iraq, US Influence Wanes As Full-scale Civil War Looms (CSM) ... 29
Bush Vows Strategy Will Win In Iraq (WT) ... 30
Quiet Disapproval In US Marks War's Anniversary (FT) ... 31
Allawi Says Iraq Is In Civil War; U.S. Forces Clash With Gunmen (WSJ/AP) ... 32
Deaths Fall For U.S., Rise For Iraqis (USAT) ... 33
Clashes, Accusations Mark Anniversary Of Iraq Conflict (WP) ... 34
Top Iraqi Leaders Agree To Form A Policy Council (NYT) ... 35
Iraq's Factions Agree To Form Security Council (LAT) ... 36
My Vision For Iraq (WP) ... 38
Justice: Talking Trash (NSWK) ... 38
Next Chapter As Iraq War Rages, Army Re-Examines Lessons Of Vietnam (WSJ) ... 39
Realism Pushes US And Iran A Bit Closer (CSM) ... 41
Iranians See Talks With U.S. As Historic (WP) ... 42
U.S. General Doubts Talks With Iran Will Promote Mideast Peace (AP) ... 44
Top U.N. Members To Try To Break Stalemate On Iran (WP) ... 44
Tehran Courts Support Of Arabs (WP) ... 45
Ayatollahs Aside, Iranians Jump For Joy At Spring (NYT) ... 46
Where Comedy Isn't King (NYT) ... 48
Afghan Man Prosecuted For Converting (USAT/AP) ... 49
Democracy And Security (WSJ) ... 49

DOJ:

Federal Prosecutor Joins Arent Fox's D.C. Office (WP) ... 50

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Prosecutors Have Another Key Witness, From Jail (NYT) 50
Executive Pay Rises Show Big Slowdown In US (FT) ... 52
CEOs Report Stricter Rules (USAT) ... 53

Criminal Law:

Defendant In Plame Case Switches Focus To WMD (USAT/AP) 54
Why Clearing A Cop's Name Matters In Abramoff Scandal (WP) 55
An Unassuming Witness, Steeped In The Underworld (NYT) ... 56
Pellicano Wiretap Witness Admits Scheme (LAT) ... 57
Men Accused In Child Prostitution Ring Describe Teens As Partners (ABJ) ... 58
Corruption Case Swallows The Police Force Of A Texas Town (LAT) ... 59
Killing In Texas Spotlights Attacks On Social Workers (NYT/AP) 61
Victim's Kin Denounce Shooting By Md. Deputy (WP) ... 61
Quest To Heal Leads Abuse Victim To Face Old Demons (WP) 62
When Words Bear Witness (NYT) ... 63

Civil Law:
Judge Grants Google A Reprieve (WSJ) ... 64
Tobacco Lounge Blows Smoke In The Face Of Chicago's New Ban (WP) ... 64

Civil Rights:
Oakland Nears Final Payouts For Protesters Hurt By Police (NYT) ... 66
Plight Deepens For Black Men, Studies Warn (NYT) ... 66
A Moral Battleground, A Civil Discourse (USAT) ... 69

Antitrust:
Zurich Financial Unit To Settle Bid-Rigging Case With 9 States (WSJ) ... 70
Prudential PLC Rejects Aviva Bid As Big Insurance Battles Mount (WSJ) ... 70
U.K. Tallies Market Abuse (WSJ) ... 71
Roche, Amgen Engaged In 'Arms Race' On Patent Law (RC) ... 72
Justices Reach Out To Consider Patent Case (NYT) ... 73

Environment/Indian Affairs:
For Interior, A Collaborative Conservative (CSM) ... 74
Utilities Offer Energy Dept. Site For Waste (New York Times) ... 75
State-U.S. Revenue Sharing At Core Of Offshore Plans (USAT) 76
Court Deals Blow To EPA's Relaxed Rule On Air Emissions (CSM) ... 77
The Road To Nowhere (NYT) ... 78
Eastern Law Firms Roll The Dice On Indian Law (LAW) ... 78

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Many N.Y. FBI Agents Have Neither E-mail, Internet-ready Phones (NYDN) ... 80
Official: Some New York FBI Agents Don't Have E-mail Accounts (NSDY/AP) ... 81
Internet Untouchable For FBI Agents In City (NYDN) ... 81
12 Accused Of Making Marijuana-Laced Candy, Soda (LAT) ... 82
Bitter Fight Over Sweet Pot Treats Drug Agents Fear Candies Appeal To Kids -- Medical Marijuana Users Insist They're Legal (SFC) ... 83
Raided Pot 'Edibles' Trouble Advocates (CCT) ... 84
27,800 Bags Of Heroin; Eight Arrests (HRE) ... 85
Lawyer Criticizes D.E.A. On Death Threat Response (NYT) ... 86
Detroit Dealers Invade West Virginia Town (PPG) ... 87
High Crimes, Or A Tokin' Figure? (WP) ... 88
(SLPD) ... 90
Taliban Rebels Team Up With Drug Barons (WT) ... 92

Congress-Administration:
Cheney Dismisses Suggestions Of Shake-Up (AP-Y2) ... 93
Cheney Comfortable In His Role (WT) ... 94
A 'Third Term' For Bush (WSJ) ... 94
Hardballs Replace Softballs, And Bush Takes A Few Swings (NYT) ... 96
Lawmakers Get Out Of The House (USAT) ... 97
GOP Struggles To Define Its Message For 2006 Elections (WP) 97
Bush Ignores GOP Rebuffs In Congress (CHIST) ... 99
Private Account Language Fails (RC) ... 100
Social Security Reform Rejected (WT) ... 101
A Contractor's Purchase On Power (WP) ... 102
'Phishing' Scheme Targets Thrift Savings Plan Holders (WP) ... 104
Bogus Bush Bashing (NYT) ... 104
Illogical Cutbacks On Cancer (NYT) ... 105
Fining The Blues (WP) ... 106
Is Anyone Listening? (NSWK) ... 107

Other News:
Snow Defends President's Handling Of Economy (WSJ) ... 108
Slowing Home Market To Ripple Through Many Layers Of Jobs (USAT) ... 109
Parties Test Messages On Social Security And Medicare Drug Plan (RC) ... 111
Boehlert Hangs Up His Spikes (RC) ... 112
Rep. Sabo Calls It A Career (RC) ... 114
Washington Whispers (USNEWS) ... 115
An Empire State Headache For Republicans? (RC) ... 116
Bonnie And Clyde Budgeteers (WSJ) ... 117
Katrina Lost & Found: Loyalty (WP) ... 118
Mass. Loses Ground In Faith-based Funding (BOS) ... 119
Work Starts On Islamic High School (WP) ... 121
Hamas Presents Proposed Cabinet (AP) ... 122
Hamas Presents Cabinet To Palestinian President (USAT) ... 123
Hamas Likely To Take Key Cabinet Posts (FT) ... 123
Key Hamas Cabinet Posts Go To Hard-liners (CSM) ... 124
Hamas, Failing To Find Partners, Proposes Cabinet (NYT) ... 125
Hamas Party Dominates Palestinian Cabinet Picks (WT) ... 126
Hamas Is Alone In Cabinet Plan (WP) ... 127
A New Landscape: Hamas Digs In (NYT) ... 128
U.S. Brokers Compromise On Gaza Crossing (AP) ... 129
Emirates Aided Kin Of Palestinian Militants (NYT) ... 130
In Egyptian Movies, Curses! We're The Heavies (WP) ... 132
Mexico Urged To Act On Border Tunnels (WT) ... 133
Thousands In Belarus Protest Against Poll 'fraud' (FT) ... 134
Belarus President Expected To Win Reelection Amid Protests (LAT) ... 134
President Wins Big In Belarus Vote; Thousands Protest Results (WP) ... 135
Lukashenko Wins Election; Opposition Calls For New Election (WSJ/AP) ... 136
Protesters Charge Fraud In Belarus Presidential Election (NYT) 137
Incumbent Remains Popular In Heartland's Rural Villages (NYT) 139
Europe's Last Dictator (WSJ) ... 140
Furor Over French Employment Law Rages On (USAT) ... 141
French Unions Threaten To Strike (NYT) ... 142
French Unions Threaten To Strike (WSJ) ... 143
Jobs Law Means Little In Riot-torn Suburb (USAT) ... 143
China Puts Energy At Top Of Agenda For Putin's Visit (WSJ) ... 144
Beijing Passes On Intervening Over Iron Ore (WSJ) ... 145
Americas Brazil, Mexico, Chile Are Expected To Fuel Strong Area Growth (WSJ) ... 146
Consumers In Japan And Europe May Help To Drive Global Growth (WSJ) ... 146
EU Raps Ankara For Pace Of Reforms (WT) ... 148

DOJ_NMG_0018617

Dowries Running Dry In Drought-Stricken East Africa (WP)..... 148
At World Forum, Support Erodes For Private Management Of Water (NYT)..... 150
Wise Council (WSJ)..... 151
The Case For Caring Now (WP)..... 152
Spreading Genocide To Chad (NYT)..... 153
A Chinese Huff (WSJ)..... 153
King Abdullah: Protector (WT)..... 154

TERRORISM NEWS:

The Letter Of The Law (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan
U.S. News and World Report, March 20, 2006

In the dark days after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, a small group of lawyers from the White House and the Justice Department began meeting to debate a number of novel legal strategies to help prevent another attack. Soon after, President Bush authorized the National Security Agency to begin conducting electronic eavesdropping on terrorism suspects in the United States, including American citizens, without court approval. Meeting in the FBI's state-of-the-art command center in the J. Edgar Hoover Building, the lawyers talked with senior FBI officials about using the same legal authority to conduct physical searches of homes and businesses of terrorism suspects--also without court approval, one current and one former government official tell U.S. News. "There was a fair amount of discussion at Justice on the warrantless physical search issue," says a former senior FBI official. "Discussions about--if [the searches] happened--where would the information go, and would it taint cases."

FBI Director Robert Mueller was alarmed by the proposal, the two officials said, and pushed back hard against it. "Mueller was personally very concerned," one official says, "not only because of the blowback issue but also because of the legal and constitutional questions raised by warrantless physical searches." FBI spokesman John Miller said none of the FBI's senior staff are aware of any such discussions and added that the bureau has not conducted "physical searches of any location without consent or a judicial order."

In December, the New York Times disclosed the NSA's warrantless electronic surveillance program, resulting in an angry reaction from President Bush. It has not previously been disclosed, however, that administration lawyers had cited the same legal authority to justify warrantless physical searches. But in a little-noticed white paper submitted by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to Congress on January 19 justifying the legality of the NSA eavesdropping, Justice Department lawyers made a tacit case that President Bush also has the inherent authority to order such physical searches. In order to fulfill his duties as commander in chief, the 42-page white paper says, "a consistent understanding has developed that the president has inherent constitutional authority to conduct warrantless searches and surveillance within the United States for foreign intelligence purposes." The memo cites congressional testimony of Jamie Gorelick, a former deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration, in 1994 stating that the Justice Department "believes, and the case law supports, that the president has inherent authority to conduct warrantless physical searches for foreign intelligence purposes."

"Black-bag jobs." Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse says the white paper cited the Gorelick testimony simply to bolster its legal defense of the NSA's electronic surveillance program. Roehrkasse points out that Justice Department lawyers have told Congress that the NSA program "described by the president does not involve physical searches." But John Martin, a former Justice Department attorney who prosecuted the two most important cases involving warrantless searches and surveillance, says the department is sending an unambiguous message to Congress. "They couldn't make it clearer," says Martin, "that they are also making the case for inherent presidential power to conduct warrantless physical searches."

It could not be learned whether the Bush administration has cited the legal authority to carry out such searches. A former marine, Mueller has waged a quiet, behind-the-scenes battle since 9/11 to protect his special agents from legal jeopardy as a result of aggressive new investigative tactics backed by the White House and the Justice Department, government officials say. During Senate testimony about the NSA surveillance program, however, Gonzales was at pains to avoid answering questions about any warrantless physical surveillance activity that may have been authorized by the Justice Department. On February 6, Patrick Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, asked Gonzales whether the NSA spying program includes authority to tap E-mail or postal mail without warrants. "Can you do black-bag jobs?" Leahy asked. Gonzales replied that he was trying to outline for the committee "what the president has authorized, and that is all that he has authorized"--electronic surveillance. Three weeks later, Gonzales amended his answer to Leahy's question, stating that he was addressing only the legal underpinnings for the NSA surveillance program but adding: "I did not and could not address operational aspects of the program, or any other classified intelligence activities." In the past, when Congress has taken up explosive issues that affect the bureau, Mueller has made it a point, officials have said, to leave Washington--and sometimes the country--so as not to get pulled into the political crossfire. When Gonzales testified February 6, Mueller was on his way to Morocco.

DOJ_NMG_0018618

Government officials told the magazine that Mueller and then Deputy Attorney General James Comey, who also questioned the NSA spying program, both believed that while it was a close call legally, the president did have authority to conduct electronic surveillance of terrorism suspects in the United States without court approval; both men, however, raised grave concerns about the possible use of any information obtained from any warrantless surveillance in a court of law.

At least one defense attorney representing a subject of a terrorism investigation believes he was the target of warrantless clandestine searches. On Sept. 23, 2005--nearly three months before the Times broke the NSA story--Thomas Nelson wrote to U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut in Oregon that in the previous nine months, "I and others have seen strong indications that my office and my home have been the target of clandestine searches." In an interview, Nelson said he believes that the searches resulted from the fact that FBI agents accidentally gave his client classified documents and were trying to retrieve them. Nelson's client is Soliman al-Buthe, codirector of a now defunct charity named al-Haramain, who was indicted in 2004 for illegally taking charitable donations out of the country. The feds also froze the charity's assets, alleging ties to Osama bin Laden. The documents that were given to him, Nelson says, may prove that al-Buthe was the target of the NSA surveillance program.

The searches, if they occurred, were anything but deft. Late at night on two occasions, Nelson's colleague Jonathan Norling noticed a heavyset, middle-aged, non-Hispanic white man claiming to be a member of an otherwise all-Hispanic cleaning crew, wearing an apron and a badge and toting a vacuum. But, says Norling, "it was clear the vacuum was not moving." Three months later, the same man, waving a brillo pad, spent some time trying to open Nelson's locked office door, Norling says. Nelson's wife and son, meanwhile, repeatedly called their home security company asking why their alarm system seemed to keep malfunctioning. The company could find no fault with the system.

In October, Immergut wrote to Nelson reassuring him that the FBI would not target terrorism suspects' lawyers without warrants and, even then, only "under the most exceptional circumstances," because the government takes attorney-client relationships "extremely seriously." Nelson nevertheless filed requests, under the Freedom of Information Act, with the NSA. The agency's director of policy, Louis Giles, wrote back, saying, "The fact of the existence or nonexistence of responsive records is a currently and properly classified matter."

"Maximum speed." For the FBI, the very mention of the term "black-bag jobs" prompts a bad case of the heebie-jeebies. In 1975 and 1976, an investigative committee led by then Sen. Frank Church documented how the FBI engaged in broad surveillance of private citizens and members of antiwar and civil rights groups, as well as Martin Luther King Jr. The committee's hearings and the executive-branch abuses that were documented in the Watergate investigation led to numerous reforms, including passage of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act in 1978. The law created a special secret court tasked with approving electronic wiretaps in espionage and other national security investigations. After the Aldrich Ames spy case, Congress amended FISA to include approval of physical searches. After 9/11, the law was further amended to allow investigators to place wiretaps or conduct physical searches without notifying the court for 72 hours and to obtain "roving" wiretaps to allow investigators to tap multiple cellphones.

In justifying the NSA's warrantless surveillance program, Gonzales has argued that the review process required for a FISA warrant is too cumbersome for a program that is of "a military nature" and that requires "maximum speed and agility to achieve early warning."

White House lawyers, in particular, Vice President Cheney's counsel David Addington (who is now Cheney's chief of staff), pressed Mueller to use information from the NSA program in court cases, without disclosing the origin of the information, and told Mueller to be prepared to drop prosecutions if judges demanded to know the sourcing, according to several government officials. Mueller, backed by Comey, resisted the administration's efforts. "The White House was putting pressure on Mueller to broadly make cases with the intelligence," says one official. "But he did not want to use it as a basis for any affidavit in any court." Comey declined numerous requests for comment. Sources say Mueller and his general counsel, Valerie Caproni, continue to remain troubled by the domestic spying program. Martin, who has handled more intelligence-oriented criminal cases than anyone else at the Justice Department, puts the issue in stark terms: "The failure to allow it [information obtained from warrantless surveillance] to be used in court is a concession that it is an illegal surveillance."

Mueller has been criticized by some agents for being too close to the White House. His predecessor, Louis Freeh, made his break publicly from President Clinton, even returning his White House security access badge. Until recently, Mueller reported to the White House daily to brief Bush and Cheney. But Mueller has not shied away from making tough decisions. He refused to allow FBI agents to participate in CIA and Defense Department interviews of high-value prisoners because of the administration's use of aggressive interrogation techniques. In Iraq and at the Pentagon-run camp for terrorism suspects at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, it has been FBI agents who have called attention to what they viewed as abuse of detainees.

DOJ_NMG_0018619

It is unclear how much resistance from the FBI the White House and the Justice Department will be willing to brook. What is clear, however, is the extraordinary extent to which officials in both places inject themselves in the bureau's operations. In late 2004, President Bush asked then FBI Deputy Director Bruce Gebhardt, filling in for Mueller during the daily White House briefings, minute details about a suspected terrorism threat in Kansas. "Don't worry, Mr. President," responded Gebhardt, straight-faced. "We have Kansas surrounded."

Democrat: Punish Bush If Law Broken (USAT)

USA Today, March 20, 2006

A top Senate Democrat said Sunday that President Bush should be held responsible if he violated the law in authorizing a domestic spying program. But Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois said it is too early to tell whether censure or impeachment of Bush would be appropriate. “I don't want to prejudge it,” Durbin, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, said on Fox News Sunday. “But if this president or any president violates the law, he has to be held accountable.” Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., introduced censure legislation last week, saying Bush violated the law in not informing Congress or getting approval from a secretive court to conduct the eavesdropping program.

Accidents involving commercial airlines and private aircraft rose last year, but fatalities declined, the National Transportation Safety Board says. NTSB Chairman Mark Rosenker called the increase in accidents to 1,779 last year from 1,717 in 2004 “disappointing,” but said the decrease in fatalities is a “hopeful sign." Fatalities fell to 600 last year — most involving small plane crashes — from 636 in 2004. Twenty-two deaths occurred in three commercial incidents. In December, a Southwest jet skidded off a snowy runway at Chicago's Midway Airport and hit a car, killing a boy in the vehicle. Also in December, a Chalk Ocean Airways plane broke up shortly after takeoff from Miami, killing 20 people. Last June at Washington's Reagan National Airport, a ground worker operating a mobile baggage loader was killed after striking a plane.

Vice President Cheney dismissed suggestions that the White House needs a shake-up in the wake of President Bush's record-low job-approval ratings. “I don't think we can pay any attention to that kind of thing,” Cheney said on CBS' Face the Nation. “The president … ignores the background noise.” Bush's approval sank to 36% in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken March 10-12. Cheney said he heard grumbling 30 years ago as chief of staff for President Ford. “Administrations go through peaks and valleys,” he said. “When you're down in the polls you're going to take shots that you don't deserve, and when you're up in the polls you're probably going to get praise you don't deserve.”

President Bush's Cabinet simulated a smallpox attack Saturday as the government tested plans to counter the potential use of bioweapons. White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said there is no indication that a smallpox attack is imminent. The government has stockpiled vaccine for everyone in the USA, she said. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Director Julie Gerberding joined the secretaries of Homeland Security, Health and Human Services, Agriculture, Transportation and Veterans Affairs in the four-hour exercise to identify gaps in local, state and federal preparedness plans.

Durbin: It's Too Early To Censure Bush (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 19, 2006

A top Senate Democrat said Sunday that President Bush should be held responsible if he violated the law in authorizing the domestic spy program.

But Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois said it is too early to tell if either censure or impeachment of Bush would be appropriate.

"I can't rule anything out until the investigation is complete. I don't want to prejudge it," said Durbin, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat. "But if this president or any president violates the law, he has to be held accountable."

Durbin's colleague, Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., last week introduced censure legislation, saying Bush violated the law in not fully informing Congress or getting approval from a secretive court to conduct the eavesdropping program. A censure resolution, if adopted, would amount to Congress scolding the president.

Since then, few Democrats have embraced the proposal, while some Republicans have sought to the cast the move as a shameless political ploy over a vital national security issue. Feingold is considered a presidential contender for 2008.

Appearing on "Fox News Sunday," Durbin said he so far has not heard a valid legal justification for the spy program that was put in place after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. But he said considering the stronger sanction of impeachment was not a "valuable discussion at this point."

"It's valuable that Senator Feingold is moving us forward to finally be a catalyst to have the kind of hearings and the kind of deliberations as to what lies behind this warrantless wiretap situation," said Durbin, calling the overall inquiries so far by the Republican-controlled Senate inadequate.

"We have a responsibility to ask the hard questions, to find out what the nature of the program is and whether the president violated the law," Durbin said.

Feingold's Censure Call A Distraction For His Party (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

Congressional Democrats say Sen. Russell D. Feingold's move to censure President Bush for authorizing warrantless surveillance is a distraction from their quest to take back Congress in the fall.

"Every time we get in a great strategic position, we manage to energize the Republican base," Rep. James P. Moran, Virginia Democrat, told The Washington Times.

"Everything is going well for the Democrats and President Bush is tanking in the polls, and then Russ Feingold comes up with the idea of censure, which is going to go nowhere and is not just quixotic but is somewhat self-serving," he said.

Mr. Moran's comments echoed a theme used by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi last week during a briefing with reporters.

The California Democrat said that Republicans want censure to become an election issue to make the minority party look bad and that she would not support censuring the president.

"I have no idea why anybody would censure someone before they have an investigation," she said. "Why doesn't everybody just channel their energy into winning the election?"

The Senate's No. 2 Democrat, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, said it is too soon to make a decision about censuring Mr. Bush for his approval of domestic warrantless surveillance to investigate terror suspects.

"It's valuable that Senator Feingold is moving us forward to finally be a catalyst to have the kind of hearings and the kind of deliberations as to what lies behind this warrantless wiretap situation," said Mr. Durbin on "Fox News Sunday." "We have a responsibility to ask the hard questions, to find out what the nature of the program is and whether the president violated the law."

Already, the Republican National Committee seized on the censure effort put forth by Mr. Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat, last week.

"Sen. Feingold has become a hero again amongst the out-of-the mainstream liberal Democrat base," reads a release on GOP.com.

Mr. Feingold defended his efforts and accused his party members of "cowering," saying Mr. Bush has broken the law and has lied to Congress for ordering the eavesdropping within the United States.

"All Americans want to fight terrorism and protect our country from those who wish to do us harm, but they don't want to sacrifice the rights and principles our country was founded upon," Mr. Feingold said. "One of those fundamental American principles is that the president doesn't get to pick and choose which laws he follows."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, defended the wiretapping as a vital national security tactic.

Other Republicans dismissed Mr. Feingold's censure resolution as a "political stunt." Mr. Frist tried to force a floor vote on the measure, bypassing the Senate Judiciary Committee, but, Senate Democrats have refused to allow that.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said the censure effort should go through the proper committee channels before it comes to the Senate floor. He praised Mr. Feingold as a "man of principle."

"The Judiciary Committee should hold hearings on this, so that the American people and Congress can find out what's going on with the program," he told reporters last week. "I'm going to wait until the committee does its work."

"People should cool their jets and let the process take its course."

Mr. Moran said the censure measure put forth by Mr. Feingold has no chance of being considered by the Republican-controlled House or Senate, "So why do it?"

"You can find lots of reasons to censure President Bush, but we have no power to do so," Mr. Moran said. However, two Democratic senators -- Barbara Boxer of California and Tom Harkin of Iowa -- added their names to Mr. Feingold's censure resolution.

"We have an out-of-control president whose arrogant and, now, illegal behavior is running our country into the ditch," Mr. Harkin says on his Web site. "It's time to rein him in."

Democrats Should Declare Censure Move 'Irresponsible' (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

The best thing that can be said about the call by Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) to censure President Bush is that practically none of his colleagues is backing him up.

DOJ_NMG_0018621

Democrats are not, as he charges, "cowering" in the face of possible Republican allegations that they are pro-terrorist. Rather, they don't want to distract attention from the main Democratic assaults on Bush and the GOP — that he's "incompetent" and that Republicans are in "disarray."

Moreover, as The New York Times reported Thursday, Feingold's move is being used by Republicans, right-wing talk show hosts and conservatives in general to motivate the base.

It's suddenly occurring to Republicans that if Democrats capture control of either chamber of Congress, they'll use their subpoena power to make life pure hell for Bush and the GOP over the next two years.

And, if it's the House that Democrats carry, it's not out of the question that impeachment proceedings could be launched against him in a Judiciary Committee chaired by firebrand lefty Rep. John Conyers (Mich.).

However demoralized Republicans are about Bush and the state of the country, the prospect of seeing him pilloried should help bring out GOP voters.

Moreover, the idea that Democrats might impeach Bush could turn off ordinary voters, much as the impeachment of President Bill Clinton did in 1998. That cost Republicans four House seats, a loss that led to the ousting of then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.).

Feingold himself has said he thinks Bush has committed an impeachable offense by ordering "secret" and "illegal" National Security Agency wiretaps of "domestic" terrorist targets. He claims he's being "moderate" by moving to only censure Bush.

In fact, the whole enterprise is irresponsible — and I'd like to believe that's another reason why Democrats are ducking endorsement of Feingold's action, even though no party leader has actually used that word in public.

While Democratic leaders don't want to endorse Feingold's move, they also are evidently cowering at the prospect of being further savaged by left-wing Web loggers who already are denouncing them for being "soft" on Bush.

Feingold himself admits that he favors wiretapping terrorists and would not stop the program Bush has undertaken, which he says "can easily be done" under existing law.

If that's the case, then the responsible thing for a Senator to do — especially someone who wants to be president — would be to find a way to adjust the law to enable the government to find out what terrorists are up to, rather than punishing a president who believed he had to skirt the law to do it.

In any event, Bush did report what he was doing to Congressional leaders, including Democrats, so it was not entirely "secret." It's not clear — because details of the program are secret — why Bush believed he could not comply with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and obtain warrants for the taps. If FISA procedures are too onerous, the responsible thing would be to make them less so.

Moreover, there's no evidence whatsoever that any innocent Americans have been harmed as a result of the NSA wiretaps or that Bush has ordered them for some nefarious or political purpose.

Feingold wants to censure Bush — and personally believes it's impeachable — for, at worst, an excess of diligence in protecting the country from terrorists who have vowed to kill millions of us if they can. This is scarcely a "high crime" or even a "crime."

Feingold has the reputation of being a sincere and principled civil libertarian, liberal and foreign policy dove. So, it seems he's being honest in his irresponsibility.

On the other hand, what he's doing is also politically advantageous, short-term, for his presidential prospects, even as it's politically disastrous for the Democratic Party as a whole. I'd say it's also politically polarizing and dangerous for the country.

Feingold hopes to distinguish himself among all the other male candidates chasing front-running Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) — and steal some of the ardent lefties who might otherwise support her and who now see him as more courageous than she.

Feingold wants to become the leading 2008 candidate of the anti-war left of the Democratic Party — the wing that nominated another sincere, principled anti-war liberal, Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), in 1972. He lost 49 states to President Richard Nixon that fall.

Feingold's move reinforces the party's image as "McGovernite" — weak on national security — at a time when Bush's inept Hurricane Katrina response and the Dubai ports disaster has given Democrats an opening to knock Bush on homeland security.

Democrats seem to understand the danger of repeating the McGovern mistake. That's why they rejected now-Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean as their 2004 nominee and picked Vietnam War veteran Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) as an "electable" alternative. Right now, most Democrats are similarly shying away from Feingold's censure initiative, deeming it too far out.

On the other hand, Bush-hatred and partisanship is so intense among Democrats that their leaders often go far out themselves, as when House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) embraced the proposal for a rapid withdrawal from Iraq by

DOJ_NMG_0018622

Rep. John Murtha (Pa.), and when Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) labeled various GOP Senators as corrupt and had to apologize.

Such conduct is a gift to Republicans. As Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) told me, “every time us Republicans get into trouble, along come the Democrats to help us out.”

Still, if Feingold’s move is another gift to the GOP, it’s not a gift to the country. The more left-wing activists pressure Democrats and right-wing activists pressure Republicans, the less chance there is that the two parties can come together to win the country’s wars and solve its problems.

The latest bipartisan George Washington University Battleground survey shows that the public hates this back-and-forth. Asked whether they preferred that Members of Congress possess “strength of values and convictions” or “willingness to find practical, workable solutions,” respondents favored “workable solutions” by 58 percent to 38 percent.

This suggests that the country hungers for a real “uniter” not “divider” as president in 2008. And that would not be Russ Feingold.

Revising The Old Plan (USNEWS)

By Linda Robinson

U.S. News and World Report, March 20, 2006

The Bush administration released a key document last week, following on the signing of a classified directive that gives new orders to government agencies about their roles in the war on terrorism. As a result, the National Counterterrorism Center must now produce a National Implementation Plan in the next 90 days. The NCTC, created by Congress after the 9/11 attacks, has already compiled a database of some 200,000 suspected terrorists or terrorist facilitators. Last week, the deputy director of the center, Kevin Brock, said that law enforcement in the United States is turning up about 60 "hits" a day from that list.

The new version of the administration's national security strategy was unveiled by senior White House adviser Stephen Hadley. In a change from the September 2002 version, which said that neither religion nor ideology was the enemy, the new document describes the terrorist threat as a "murderous ideology" that will require both military forces and a "battle of ideas" to defeat. New emphasis is also placed on relying on other countries to help fight the war on terrorism and spread democracy. Iran, believed to be developing a nuclear weapons capability, came in for a veiled warning. Diplomacy to dissuade the regime in Tehran "must succeed," the 49-page document states, "if confrontation is to be avoided." The White House wants to keep Tehran guessing about President Bush's intentions, but there was little confusion about his policy of pre-emption--striking at America's adversaries before they strike first. Bush is still all for it.

Interagency conflicts. The National Security Presidential Directive gives new marching orders to each agency for its role in the war on terrorism. That classified document is colabeled National Security Presidential Directive 46 and Homeland Security Presidential Directive 15, since it also directs domestic agencies on their responsibilities. A major goal of the new NSPD is to resolve discrepancies among previous presidential directives and chronic conflicts among agencies with overlapping responsibilities: The State and Defense departments have wrangled over jurisdiction for the war on terrorism in countries where the United States is not at war, and the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security have had similar turf disputes at home. The Central Intelligence Agency and the Pentagon have both claimed roles in intelligence collection abroad.

Now it falls to the National Counterterrorism Center to make sure each entity does what it has been ordered to do. Congress created the NCTC and gave it two mandates: to fuse the intelligence from all the disparate U.S. intelligence and law enforcement entities and conduct "strategic operational planning" across all those agencies to ensure there is a common plan implemented at home and abroad.

Among other things, the NCTC maintains a database of "people we want to know about because we believe they are linked to terrorism," Brock, the NCTC's deputy director, explained. The database has 325,000 names on it, including aliases; Brock estimates the names represent as many as 200,000 individuals. The database is being provided to local police, and Brock says they are responding: "We are getting about 120 hits a day, and about half of them are real."

Sri Lankan Ordered Freed From Border Jail (AP)

By Peter Prengaman

AP, March 20, 2006

SAN DIEGO - After more than four years in a U.S. detention center, Ahilan Nadarajah will soon gain the freedom he sought when he fled Sri Lanka and the government forces there that he says repeatedly jailed and tortured him.

He had reached the United States in October 2001 only to be detained on the same accusations that almost got him killed in his home country: He was suspected of being a member of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a separatist group listed as a terrorist organization by the U.S. State Department.

DOJ_NMG_0018623

Nadarajah denies the claims, and immigration judges have twice granted him asylum. But the federal government refused to release him.

The latest order came Friday from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, telling the U.S. government it was violating federal law by continuing to hold him even though he wasn't criminally charged and couldn't be deported in the foreseeable future. His lawyers said they now expect him to be freed in a few days.

"I lost my time and my life, and I almost lost my mind, too," Nadarajah said in a phone interview from the Otay Mesa detention center, at the U.S.-Mexico border south of San Diego. "It's not fair. They put me in jail without reason."

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said the decision was being reviewed but would not elaborate. It wasn't immediately clear if the government would appeal the court's decision.

Nadarajah, an ethnic Tamil who turns 26 on Wednesday, came from a family of farmers in northern Sri Lanka, the island nation of 20 million off the coast of India.

In 1995, the Sri Lankan army bombed the area, killing Nadarajah's older brother and forcing the family to relocate. When they later returned, Nadarajah was accused of being a member of the Tamil Tigers, a group that was fighting for an independent state for the ethnic minority on Sri Lanka.

Nadarajah says he was repeatedly jailed and tortured by government forces there that pistol-whipped him, forced his head into a plastic bag with gasoline and left him hanging upside down for hours. Finally, he got a passport and exit visa from a smuggler and traveled through Thailand, South Africa, Brazil and Mexico before he was arrested at the U.S. border on Oct. 27, 2001.

He applied for asylum, arguing that if he were sent back to Sri Lanka he would be tortured and possibly killed.

The U.S. government opposed his application, saying he was affiliated with the Tamil Tigers.

In the 9th Circuit's ruling Friday, Judge Sidney R. Thomas said Nadarajah's detention was "unreasonable, unjustified and in violation of federal law," and called a government argument "patently absurd." The ruling followed a 2001 Supreme Court ruling that immigrants must be freed if their deportation is "no longer reasonably foreseeable," a period interpreted by many legal experts as being about six months.

Nadarajah's attorney described the case as one of the Bush administration's repeated violations of immigration law in the name of national security.

"The government got it completely wrong about whether he was a terrorist, and overreached for detention powers Congress never granted," said Ahilan Arulanantham of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Nadarajah is anxious to be free. He wants to improve his English - which he learned in jail after arriving without speaking a word of the language - go to college and get some "good food."

"I'm tired of this place," said Nadarajah. "I want to be outside, you know? But this was worth it because it saved my life."

ON THE NET

9th Circuit: http://www.ca9.uscourts.gov/

Rules For An Unruly New War (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, March 20, 2006

It was November 2001, barely two months after the 9/11 terrorist attacks, when Osama bin Laden's personal driver was captured in Afghanistan and later shipped to the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Half a world away, President Bush was ordering up a new military tribunal system to try foreigners designated as enemy combatants and accused of war crimes in the ongoing "war on terror."

Next week those events will collide at the U.S. Supreme Court. In what is destined to be a landmark case, justices are scheduled to hear an appeal by that driver, Yemen native Salim Ahmed Hamdan, challenging the legality of Bush's tribunals--the first since World War II. The high court will finally have to weigh in on some of the most contentious and polarizing issues in the post-9/11 world: How should the United States treat non-American prisoners whose allegiances lie not with a country but an ideology? Does the president have the power to unilaterally decide not only which prisoners qualify as enemy combatants but what rights they have and under what justice system they should be tried? And, at the heart of it all, should past rules of war apply, or does the war on terrorism--so different from previous wars--require its own special standards?

Recruits. Hamdan, now in his mid-30s, was a poor, part-time taxi driver in Yemen just 10 years ago when he was recruited to fight with Islamic insurgents in Tajikistan, according to journalist Jonathan Mahler, who is working on a book about Hamdan. But when those recruits were rebuffed at the Tajik border, they decided to look for bin Laden, who had recently moved his militant organization to Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0018624

Hamdan's lawyers acknowledge that their client went to work for bin Laden, but they argue that he was just a functionary, serving as the al Qaeda leader's driver--not involved in plotting or training for attacks on America. But the U.S. government alleges that Hamdan was much more. After his capture, he was designated an "enemy combatant," charged with conspiracy to commit terrorism and murder, and tapped as one of the first Guantanamo detainees to be tried under the new military tribunal system.

His challenge to that system will test the administration's ongoing effort to broadly expand presidential wartime authority--from conducting warrantless domestic surveillance to establishing the military tribunals, which allow unsworn statements in lieu of testimony and can impose the death penalty. And unlike a traditional court-martial, the tribunal system does not allow a review outside the military. The last line of appeal under the tribunals, except in limited circumstances, is Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld. The eight justices who will hear the Hamdan case (Chief Justice John G. Roberts has recused himself because he participated in an appeals court ruling on the case) will also examine whether legal protections afforded prisoners of war under the international Geneva Conventions should extend to detainees like Hamdan, who do not operate under the flag of a country.

Dismissed? But there is a wild card: Government lawyers want the high court to simply dismiss Hamdan's appeal. They argue that a law enacted by Congress last December blocking detainee access to U.S. courts also applies to cases pending at the time. The high court is expected to consider this issue first, and if justices agree with the government, Hamdan's appeal will be moot--as will cases filed by hundreds of Guantanamo's 500 detainees--and his case will revert to the military tribunal.

The administration argues that the president has inherent constitutional power during wartime to establish the tribunals and also draws authority from legislation authorizing the use of military force that Congress passed in the wake of the 2001 attacks. There is historical precedent for the controversial tribunals, and lawyers like Richard Samp of the conservative Washington Legal Foundation argue that if detainees had access to open civilian courts, it would flood the courts and officials could be forced to reveal sensitive U.S. intelligence information.

Whatever the outcome, the justices will be drawn into a profound and emotional debate over the treatment and rights of the Guantanamo detainees--a debate that civil libertarians say has damaged America's reputation. "Military [tribunals] have been used throughout our history--there seems to me plenty of legal authority for that," says Richard D.Rosen, who spent 26 years as an Army judge advocate and now directs Texas Tech University's Center for Military Law and Policy. "But I think the courts should be allowed to get to the merits of this case. The military [tribunal] is not a court, and it's not equipped to decide these constitutional issues." The place for that, argues Rosen, is the Supreme Court. And in taking the case, the justices seem to agree that at the very least they need to establish some rules in a war that often seems not to have any.

The President And The Courts (NYT)

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

Since the Republican majority has decided to allow President Bush to usurp Congress's role in matters of national security, the battle to save the constitutional balance of powers moves to the judiciary. A critical test of judicial independence will come this month, when the Supreme Court hears arguments in a case that has become a focus of Mr. Bush's imperial vision of the presidency.

Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Yemeni national accused of having been a bodyguard and driver for Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan, has been detained since 2002 in Guantánamo Bay. He filed suit to challenge the legitimacy of the military commission that upheld his designation as an "unlawful enemy combatant" — a term Mr. Bush invented after 9/11 to deny the protections of the Geneva Conventions, international statutes or United States law to certain prisoners.

Mr. Hamdan argued, rightly, that the commissions are not legitimate because prisoners are routinely barred from seeing evidence, much less confronting their accusers or having access to real legal representation. But his case has now become a much larger battle over the principle of habeas corpus, which is embedded in the Constitution and says that a prisoner cannot be denied the right to challenge his detention. Mr. Bush's decision after 9/11 that he had the power to put prisoners beyond the reach of the law at his choosing was the first attempt to suspend habeas corpus on American territory since the Civil War.

The Supreme Court two years ago emphatically rejected the president's claim that its jurisdiction did not extend to Guantánamo. Seeking to reverse that ruling, the White House in December helped push through a special amendment as part of the deal that also saw Mr. Bush sign a watered-down ban on torture of military detainees. The amendment, sponsored by Senator Lindsey Graham, a Republican, and Senator Carl Levin, a Democrat, stripped Guantánamo detainees of the normal rights of judicial review. It also designated a single appellate court to conduct a limited review of decisions by the military commissions, and left "enemy combatants" held without a trial in a seemingly inescapable legal black hole.

As soon as Mr. Bush signed this law, he declared that the administration was going to apply it to all pending cases, about 160 or so, and the solicitor general told the Supreme Court it no longer had a right to hear Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. This is court-stripping — the attempt by another branch of government to prevent the court from deciding a particular issue. The White House tried to justify this outrageous tampering with the judiciary by ignoring the new law's actual language and legislative history to argue that the new legislation took away the power of the courts to hear not just future cases but also cases already filed and accepted for review. The Supreme Court responded by adding the jurisdictional objection to the list of issues it will consider when the case is heard on March 28.

DOJ_NMG_0018625

At a minimum, we hope the court will rule that Congress and the president may not deny the justices the power to review pending cases. But it should also reject the defective military commissions, as well as the idea of denying access to the courts for future valid claims brought by Guantánamo detainees, including claims of torture.

If Congress wants to take the extreme step of suspending the Supreme Court's jurisdiction over habeas corpus, especially pending appeals, it must say so in unmistakable terms, which it has not done. Both the text and the legislative history of the Graham-Levin amendment demonstrate an intention to avoid touching pending cases. Moreover, the Constitution itself requires an "invasion" or a "rebellion" as a prerequisite for suspension of habeas corpus. It's hardly likely that the founding fathers intended to give Congress the right to eliminate judicial review during an ongoing international struggle against terrorism that may well go on for generations.

The retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor observed in a recent speech that the framers created three separate and equal branches of government because they knew that preserving liberty requires that no single branch or person can amass unchecked power. According to NPR's Nina Totenberg, who heard the speech, Justice O'Connor cited Republican court-stripping efforts as an example of dangerous overreaching. "It takes a lot of degeneration before a country falls into dictatorship," Justice O'Connor said, "but we should avoid these ends by avoiding these beginnings."

The president seems to forget that and Congress clearly will not remind him. The nation cannot afford for the Supreme Court to forget as well.

Gitmo Goat Or Hero? (TIME)

By Adam Zagorin And Sally B. Donnelly

Time, March 19, 2006

Did Major General Geoffrey Miller--commandant at GuantÃ¡namo Bay and a top adviser on interrogations at Abu Ghraib--do wrong? No, says a new report by Lieut. General Stanley Green, the Army Inspector General (IG), that TIME obtained last week. A Pentagon panel recommended last summer that Miller be reprimanded for poor oversight of a high-value prisoner at Gitmo. But Green told TIME that the evidence is not there to back charges against Miller of dereliction and lying to Congress about his role in the scandal. The report concludes that at Gitmo Miller was unaware a canine had been used to intimidate alleged "20th hijacker" Mohammed al-Qahtani, or that al-Qahtani was forced to don women's underwear and perform dog tricks--even though Miller was intimately involved in planning al-Qahtani's interrogation. The report even lavishes praise on Miller, noting the "strength, energy and effectiveness of [his] leadership." Miller's military lawyer told TIME: "The IG is entirely correct in fact and law."

Miller's exoneration may only inflame his critics. At a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing last week, chairman John Warner pointedly suggested to one of Miller's superiors that he "go back over this entire matter," warning that Miller will be recalled before the panel to explain himself. Sources close to the powerful committee say that anger at Miller has escalated sharply since he invoked his right to avoid self-incrimination and refused to testify in the detainee-abuse trial of an Abu Ghraib dog handler. In that case, defense lawyers argued that their client was following guidelines from Abu Ghraib military-intelligence chief Colonel Thomas Pappas, who in turn has said under oath that Miller advocated using dogs to "get information" from prisoners.

Green, the Army IG, says that people need in the abuse-scandal investigations to find a "donkey to pin the tail on." But he insists "Miller is not the one." Which leaves the question: Who is?

A Legal Loose Cannon (TIME)

By Douglas Waller

Time, March 19, 2006

The roots of the bungle seem to come down to this: Carla Martin, a government lawyer with a small role in the sentencing trial of confessed 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, thought the chief of the prosecution team was overplaying his hand. In his opening statement, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Spencer argued that if Moussaoui had told the FBI what he knew about the 9/11 plot in advance, authorities "would have prevented" the hijackings and thousands of lives could have been saved. Martin, 51, a veteran in the aviation field, thought defense attorneys could "drive a truck" through that assertion, as she later e-mailed a scheduled witness in the case. Thus she took it upon herself to coach that witness and six other current or former government aviation experts scheduled to testify in ways to fend off the opposing lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0018626

While experienced litigators know how to prep witnesses without crafting their testimony, Martin crossed a line, informing her experts what she would tell the jury and feeding them transcripts from the trial in violation of an explicit order from U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema. It was no small mistake. When Brinkema found out, she angrily barred all aviation-security witnesses from testifying--experts prosecutors were counting on to make their case that had Moussaoui shared what he knew, officials could have prevented 9/11, and since he didn't, he should be executed.

How could such a high-profile case have been handled so sloppily? Certainly Martin, a lawyer for the Transportation Security Administration (TSA), was never meant to be a player. In court documents filed after the blowup, prosecutors painted her as a misguided "miscreant" with only a bit part in the government's case preparation--arranging witness interviews and retrieving aviation documents for prosecutors. A former flight attendant who followed her father into law, Martin developed a reputation for tenaciousness both at the TSA and, before that, at the Federal Aviation Administration, where she started working even before she graduated from law school. But she did hardly any litigating in court. Her work was focused more on administrative matters. For instance, when sensitive aviation-security issues came up in the civil suit brought against Pan Am by families of those who died in the Flight 103 bombing, she advised the presiding judge on whether to clear the courtroom. When she started delving into criminal trial tactics, say colleagues, she was simply out of her element.

Martin's coaching of the Moussaoui witnesses was discovered when one of them became so put off by her persistent e-mails that she showed them to prosecutors, who then informed the judge of Martin's misconduct. "In all my years on the bench, I've never seen a more egregious violation of the rule about witnesses," Brinkema said. She warned Martin that she may face criminal charges. Martin, who has been placed on paid administrative leave by the TSA, wouldn't comment. Her mother, Jean Martin Lay, told TIME that her daughter is "really devastated" by the accusations. Martin's lawyer, Roscoe Howard, claims that prosecutors have unfairly "vilified" her and that her side of the story, which he says she is preparing, "will show a very different, full picture of her intentions."

Moussaoui, 37, a French Moroccan who was detained about a month before the 9/11 attacks, has pleaded guilty to conspiring with al-Qaeda to hijack planes, but denies direct involvement in the 9/11 plot, claiming that he was preparing for a future attack instead. If he is not executed, he faces life imprisonment. Prosecutors were counting on the witnesses barred by Brinkema to explain to jurors how airport security could have been increased had Moussaoui come clean with FBI agents who interrogated him before 9/11.

In the end, prosecutors managed to persuade the judge to let them present to the jury a new set of aviation experts who have had no contact with Martin. But the case for executing Moussaoui remains tenuous. Legal experts, and even Brinkema, have questioned whether prosecutors are overreaching in arguing that he should be put to death for what he did not do. Martin, in one of her e-mails, said she doubted that airport screeners could have detected all the short-blade knives the hijackers took aboard, even if Moussaoui had told agents before 9/11 what he knew. Of course, that is an opinion that prosecutors wish she had kept to herself.

Another Blown Case? (WP)

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

THE DEATH penalty case against accused Sept. 11 conspirator Zacharias Moussaoui has barely survived the government's latest bout of incompetence. In a blatant violation of a court order, a Federal Aviation Administration lawyer working on the case sent key aviation witnesses a transcript of the government's opening statement, along with her comments on it. This led U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema to exclude those witnesses -- potentially crippling the prosecutors' case for execution of the only person to face trial for the attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center. On Friday, Judge Brinkema revised her order, allowing the testimony of aviation witnesses untainted by the misconduct. So the case will now limp forward.

Americans opposed to capital punishment, as we are, have little reason to regret this development. Mr. Moussaoui already has pleaded guilty and faces life in prison, which is the sentence he should get. While he is by his own admission an al-Qaeda operative sent here to do America harm, his links to the attacks -- which took place after he was in custody -- are weak.

This case nevertheless joins a line of big terrorism prosecutions marred by government misconduct, overzealousness, hyping of charges or just plain ineffectiveness. A conviction in Detroit had to be set aside because of prosecutorial misconduct. The government brought spectacular charges against accused Islamic Jihad activist Sami al-Arian, only to see a jury reject many of them -- and convict on none -- after a lengthy trial. Then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft announced the arrest of Jose Padilla with great fanfare as the foiling of a plot to detonate a radiological "dirty" bomb; after holding him for years as an enemy combatant, the government indicted him for far lesser matters. Mohamed Qahtani, the Guantanamo Bay inmate the government has labeled the 20th hijacker -- when it wasn't busy making the same claim about Mr. Moussaoui -- was subjected to such abusive interrogation that he probably cannot face trial at all.

More generally, the military still hasn't managed to try a single person at Guantanamo before its much-vaunted commissions, whose main selling point was their efficiency. More than four years after the Sept. 11 attacks, the United States lacks a stable, predictable system for trying accused terrorists.

Prosecuting terrorists isn't easy, as Mr. Moussaoui's trial has repeatedly illustrated, but much of this is the Bush administration's fault. The administration failed to work with Congress to create viable legal structures to handle these cases, proceeding in whatever way seemed most convenient in any given situation. The results are abysmal. And, ironically, they undermine the case for the more secretive military trial procedures the government is trying to create. If authorities fail so often to play by the rules in the relatively open federal court system, it's hard to believe their behavior will be better when the spotlight is turned off.

Terror Case: 'Bizarre' Testimony (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff and Karen Breslau

Newsweek, March 20, 2006

The justice department's case against accused 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui is in trouble. The Feds also have a problem in another case. The credibility of the FBI's star witness against a Pakistani-American accused of Qaeda ties is under fire after he testified he saw Ayman al-Zawahiri at a mosque attended by the de-fendant in Lodi, Calif., in 1999. The testimony by informant Naseem Khan, who has been paid $250,000 by the bureau, startled counterterrorism experts: Zawahiri, Osama bin Laden's chief deputy, was in Afghanistan at the time, under indictment for the bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa. Jack Cloonan, a former FBI agent who had tracked Zawahiri for years, told news-week the testimony was "bizarre" and "seriously wrong." While conceding "there may have been some puffery" by the informant, a Justice official who asked not to be ID'd because of legal sensitivities said prosecutors are still confident about the case against Hamid Hayat, 23, accused of attending a Qaeda camp in Pakistan, and his father, Umer Hayat, 48, who allegedly lied to the FBI about his son's travels. Defense lawyers say the testimony raises new questions about Khan, a fast-food worker with a burglary conviction who was recruited by the FBI after 9/11 and paid up to $4,500 a month to ID terror suspects. An internal FBI doc obtained by NEWSWEEK shows Khan claimed to have seen Zawahiri—and two other most-wanted terrorists—at the Lodi mosque in late 1999, describing them as Pashto-speaking Pakistanis. (They are Arabs.) The FBI first used Khan to target two radical imams in Lodi. They were deported. Meanwhile, Khan befriended the younger Hayat, a fruit packer, and secretly taped conversations while encouraging Hayat to visit a Pakistani camp in 2003. Hayat later confessed going to the camp; there is no evidence he plotted any terror acts.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

SSA Raises Hurdle In Proposal For DP World To Sell U.S. Holdings (WSJ)

By Daniel Machalaba

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

SSA Marine Inc.'s decision to explore a sale of the company could complicate Dubai Ports World's plans to sell its U.S. holdings to an American buyer.

SSA Marine, the largest U.S. container terminal operator, has been considered one of the possible bidders for DP World's terminal operations in the U.S. With SSA Marine disclosing that it is a potential acquisition target itself, the number of viable U.S. purchasers for DP World's U.S. holdings could be reduced.

In a statement Friday, closely held SSA said it has received inquiries from "many companies looking to partner with, or invest in SSA Marine" and is exploring its strategic alternatives. The Seattle company noted "opportunities to acquire additional operations," suggesting it still could be a bidder for DP World's U.S. holdings. SSA said it is working with its financial advisor, Citigroup Inc., to evaluate its options.

DP World declined to comment on the SSA Marine announcement.

The SSA statement adds to the frenzy of interest in marine container terminals, which have seen their value soar amid rising trade, limited expansion room in some ports and global consolidation of a handful of large non-U.S. container terminal operators. SSA has operations in 150 ports throughout the world, including 11 marine container terminals on the U.S. West Coast and in Latin America. Some maritime executives have said SSA could be valued at as much as $2 billion.

At the same time, the political firestorm in the U.S. over DP World has put some U.S. terminal operations back on the market. DP World's purchase of Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. of London for $6.8 billion included container terminal operations in five U.S. ports. Many in Congress objected to the deal, citing national security concerns because DP

DOJ_NMG_0018628

World is controlled by the Dubai government. DP World agreed to defuse the controversy by committing to sell the U.S. terminal operations to a U.S. buyer.

The Dubai deal could make it more difficult for some companies to bid for SSA. SSA Marine spokesman Bob Watters said in a statement that "none of the alternatives we are exploring would involve selling control of our U.S. operations to a company owned by a foreign government."

That would appear to bar Singapore's PSA International Pte. Ltd. and some Chinese operators from bidding for SSA. It would leave the door open to A.P. Moller-Maersk of Denmark and Hutchison Whampoa Ltd., the world's largest terminal operator, which is based in Hong Kong.

Nation's Security Is At Stake (USAT)

By Duncan Hunter

USA Today, March 20, 2006

In the post-9/11 world, America's No. 1 priority must be national security. But the process that OK'd government-owned Dubai Ports World's takeover of terminal operations at major U.S. ports was geared less toward national security and more toward economic opportunity. Otherwise, how did it overlook red flags like these: (Related: Opposing view)

As recently as 2003, customs officials in the United Arab Emirates (UAE), of which the government of Dubai is a member, allowed 66 high-speed electrical switches, which can be used for detonating nuclear weapons, to go to a Pakistani businessman with ties to that country's military — despite U.S. protests. Further evidence shows Dubai spurned U.S. requests to inspect containers holding the switches. Among other troubling examples, Pakistani physicist and nuclear proliferator A.Q. Khan shipped black-market materials through Dubai, prompting one Middle East expert to call it an "atomic bazaar."

The UAE has been our ally. But we cannot disregard its role as a point of transshipment for dangerous materials — either with governmental acquiescence or great governmental negligence. Right now, we're optimistic that DP World will keep its commitment to sell its interests in U.S. port operations.

But the need to secure critical domestic infrastructure extends beyond our maritime interests and the DP World deal.

That is why I introduced legislation that not only reforms the foreign-investment review process but goes even further to protect all of America's critical infrastructure — stipulating that any asset or system so vital that its incapacity or destruction would debilitate national security, economic security or public health and safety must remain in the hands of reliable, American-owned companies. It also mandates that appropriate authorities inspect all in-bound cargo.

Much of this isn't novel. In fact, the legislation's so-called protectionist elements are already required from Department of Defense contractors. In a post-9/11 world, we must ensure that our critical infrastructure is every bit as secure as critical parts of our defense industrial base.

Today, we can take nothing for granted. We must continue to enhance our security instead of creating even greater vulnerabilities.

To those who say this smacks of protectionism, I say this: America is worth protecting.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., is chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

Scuffle Over Ports Deal Stirs Up Protectionist Fears (USAT)

USA Today, March 20, 2006

Each day, some $3 billion of foreign money pours into the United States, buying stocks, bonds, whole companies, real estate, home mortgages and more. Without that money, interest rates would skyrocket for lack of investors to finance the government's staggering debt. Job growth also would wilt as foreign investment declined. (Related: Opposing view)

You'd think those facts — and they are not in dispute — might prompt lawmakers to tour the globe drumming up more investment, or at least to recognize that we now live in a world economy. Instead, some seem intent on doing just the opposite.

Eager to tap the deep vein of anti-foreign sentiment exposed by the Dubai ports deal, they are pushing a ban on foreign purchases of any assets considered part of the nation's "critical infrastructure."

The plan may never get off the ground. It certainly won't if even a sliver of reason enters the debate. But at a time when the nation is concerned about immigration, foreign outsourcing of jobs and terrorism, it is a useful measure of just how foolish protectionism can be.

The proposal comes from Rep. Duncan Hunter, a California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. He would like to set a series of draconian standards for any company wishing to buy a part of the nation's "critical infrastructure." Its chairman and CEO would have to be American, as would at least half of its board. The secretary of Defense would have to approve half of the board members and the company would have to keep tabs on the citizenship of its shareholders to make sure that no more than half were non-U.S. citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0018629

The idea that the government would be allowed to choose who controls private companies is bizarre by itself. More so coming from a Republican. But that's only the beginning of the problems the bill would create.

· Much of the economy could be shut off to foreign investment since the concept of critical infrastructure is inherently vague. This would dramatically slow economic growth and eliminate jobs. Hunter defines critical assets not just as those affecting national security, but those critical to economic security and public health as well. Virtually any large company could be considered economically vital.

· If "critical" industries were shut off to foreign buyers, then virtually any domestic company would claim its goods and services were critical to avoid having to compete with foreign companies. Competition would decline, driving prices up.

· Other countries would surely retaliate against U.S. firms. The protectionist tit-for-tat would quickly escalate, derailing economic growth that has been critical to raising living standards here and abroad since World War II. Similar events preceded the Great Depression.

There are, to be sure, many security issues surrounding critical infrastructure sites. The Department of Homeland Security's efforts to beef up port security have a long way to go. And the chemical industry has beaten back legislation mandating new safety measures at plants near major cities.

But these have nothing to do with corporate ownership. Shutting off foreign investment amounts to using 9/11 as a pretext for economic nationalism and protectionism. That's bad policy. And, given the USA's need for foreign capital, a bad case of biting the hand that feeds us.

Increase In Contracting Intelligence Jobs Raises Concerns (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

AllWorld Language Consultants Inc., a Rockville firm, is seeking experienced military interrogators to work in Iraq for $153,500 a year plus bonuses, with proficiency in Arabic "preferred but not required," according to Yahoo's Hot Jobs listings.

The U.S. Army element of the Multi-National Force-Iraq is looking for a private contractor to provide airborne surveillance over that country that will "provide situational awareness of the entire area of operations," according to another Web announcement.

Lockheed Martin Corp. is seeking a counterintelligence analyst to work for the Pentagon's newest intelligence agency, the Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), in its Colorado Springs facility to "create and deliver briefings, write reports, and represent Counterintelligence Field Activity," according to a Web classified ad.

These positions and thousands like them are part of a growing trend at the Pentagon to contract out intelligence jobs that were formerly done primarily by service personnel and civil service employees.

But, by using contract employees, government agencies lose control over those doing this sensitive work and an element of profit is inserted into what is being done. Also, as investigations have revealed, politics and corruption may be introduced into the process.

The office of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte has quietly begun to study the contracting issue because "it already is a problem," a senior intelligence official said in a recent interview.

A related concern for intelligence agencies inside and outside the Pentagon is that the government is training people and getting them security clearances, but they then leave for better pay offered by contractors, sometimes to do the same work.

"Once cleared, they can get a higher salary outside and they are gone," the official said. "We're leasing back our former employees."

The phenomenon is partly the result of Congress's approving large funding increases for intelligence activities but not increasing the limit on the number of full-time persons that agencies can hire. "We don't have the billets," the official said, so the surge is taken care of by contracting out the jobs.

Retired Maj. Gen. Paul D. Eaton, who ran Iraqi military training from 2003 to 2004, describes the hiring of civilians to do jobs previously done by the military as a "shell game" created by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to keep the "force strength static on paper." In an op-ed piece in yesterday's New York Times, Eaton wrote, "This tactic may help for a bit, but it will likely fall apart in the next budget cycle with those positions swiftly eliminated."

"The Pentagon ramped up so fast, it had to turn to contract personnel to have continuity," said another former senior intelligence official who now does contract work. He pointed out that some jobs are so complex, military personnel on three-year rotations are facing reassignment just as they master their jobs.

The trend toward contracting for intelligence analysts will hurt the ability of the CIA and the Defense Intelligence Agency to retain and keep high-quality people, said a former senior intelligence official who helped supervise the rebuilding of the CIA's case officer and analyst corps. "It takes time to get the young up to snuff, and you need 10 to 20 years to get the value for that investment," this former official said, asking for anonymity because of his past role in government.

DOJ_NMG_0018630

John O. Brennan, the longtime CIA official who started up and headed the National Counterterrorism Center before his retirement, said contract personnel "bring on recognized expertise that exists outside government" and "often are needed as new [intelligence] systems are being built."

Now a contractor himself, Brennan said it should come as no surprise that many younger military and government-trained intelligence personnel, who have top security clearances, are resigning to take jobs in the private sector.

The CIA's contracting has generally been limited to technical support, but almost two years ago a "spy drain" was described in a column by intelligence expert James Bamford, who warned, "Private contractors are taking over jobs once reserved for highly trained agency employees." Because of the rush to expand activities, Bamford said some newly hired former CIA officers said that "their talents are being wasted on unsophisticated tasks."

Attention has also been focused on the rapid growth of Pentagon intelligence contracting because of recent guilty pleas by former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and contractor Mitchell J. Wade, who used contributions and job offers to get his former company, MZM Inc., more than $100 million in mostly intelligence contracts between 2002 and 2004. In one case, according to court papers, Wade drafted and gave Cunningham an outline of the work that CIFA then contracted with MZM to perform.

Federal investigators are reviewing CIFA's contracts, according to a government prosecutor involved in the inquiry. CIFA Director David A. Burtt II said in a recent interview that 70 percent of his agency's work is handled by contractors.

Brennan said that contract employees frequently cost less for government agencies when they are needed for short durations while new agencies get fully staffed. Thereafter, higher pay given to contract employees over government employees can be justified only in part because contractors offer less job security than the government does.

Brennan said he introduced a rule at the National Counterterrorism Center that personnel cannot resign and return to do the same job with a contractor until a certain amount of time had elapsed.

The contracting for intelligence personnel is "neither black nor white," according to Brennan, but it "needs to be watched."

The Arabic-speaking interrogators that AllWorld Languages is seeking must be U.S. citizens, have security clearances, and be willing to start immediately and deploy to any city in Iraq. AllWorld is a subcontractor of L-3 Communications Holdings Inc., a multibillion-dollar defense contractor that recently got a six-month, $420 million extension to its no-bid Army contract for translators. About 80 percent of the 5,000 translators L-3 employs for the Army are working in Iraq.

William Golden, who runs IntelligenceCareers Inc., maintains a Web site listing thousands of jobs, including senior posts within the intelligence community. In a slide presentation on his site, Golden points out that as the number of contract positions in the intelligence field increases, the number of candidates for such jobs decreases -- in part because the number of people leaving military and government service in the intelligence field is less than the number of jobs being opened up to contract employees.

In a recent presentation, Golden said 65 to 70 percent of new contract employees who took contract jobs after they left government with security clearances came from the military. Less than 15 percent earned their clearances while working for contractors. One reason for the difference is that it takes a year or more to get a top-secret clearance; meanwhile, an employee is waiting to be hired or is hired and doing a non-cleared job. Those who had clearances just need to have them updated, which takes far less time.

As a result, someone with a top secret and special compartmented information clearance, meaning access to electronic intercepted data, can get as much as 35 percent more pay than others with lesser clearances or no clearances, according to Golden. Brennan, who now runs his own intelligence consulting concern, the Analysis Corp., agreed that "a security clearance in the Washington area means money."

WTC Talks To Resume Next Week (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

NEW YORK -- Talks to resolve how to rebuild the World Trade Center will restart next week after private developer Larry Silverstein offered a revised proposal Friday for his role in the long-troubled project.

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, said it would respond to Mr. Silverstein's proposal.

While calling aspects of Mr. Silverstein's latest proposal "unacceptable," Port Authority spokesman Steve Coleman said the agency "will develop a counter-proposal that we believe will work for both parties to get this deal done."

DOJ_NMG_0018631

Negotiations between Mr. Silverstein and the Port Authority broke down Wednesday after failing to meet a deadline imposed by New York Gov. George E. Pataki. The Port Authority walked out on the talks saying the 74-year-old real estate tycoon was bargaining in "bad faith," a charge he denied.

Mr. Silverstein's revised proposal closes the gap between the two sides and contains some new ideas, according to a person close to the talks. In a statement, Mr. Silverstein said "the sooner we get this done the better."

Before talks failed, the two sides had the broad outlines of a deal in place that would have Mr. Silverstein give up the rights to build two of the five planned towers, including the signature Freedom Tower. The sticking points revolved around how much each side would bear of the $7 billion cost.

Little has been rebuilt 4 1/2 years after the attacks that destroyed the Twin Towers. Gov. Pataki, the Port Authority, which Gov. Pataki controls with New Jersey's governor, and Mr. Silverstein have come under heavy criticism for the lack of progress.

Multiple Layers Of Contractors Drive Up Cost Of Katrina Cleanup (WP)

By Joby Warrick

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- How many contractors does it take to haul a pile of tree branches? If it's government work, at least four: a contractor, his subcontractor, the subcontractor's subcontractor, and finally, the local man with a truck and chainsaw.

If the job is patching a leaking roof, the answer may be five contractors, or even six. At the bottom tier is a Spanish-speaking crew earning less than 10 cents for every square foot of blue tarp installed. At the top, the prime contractor bills the government 15 times as much for the same job.

For the thousands of contractors in the Katrina recovery business, this is the way the system works -- a system that federal officials say is the same after every major disaster but that local government officials, watchdog groups and the contractors themselves say is one reason that costs for the hurricane cleanup continue to swell.

"If this is 'normal,' we have a serious problem in this country," said Benny Rousselle, president of Plaquemines Parish, a hurricane-ravaged district downriver from New Orleans. "The federal government ought to be embarrassed about what is happening. If local governments tried to run things this way, we'd be run out of town."

Federal agencies in charge of Katrina cleanup have been repeatedly criticized for lapses in managing the legions of contractors who perform tasks ranging from delivering ice to rebuilding schools. Last Thursday, Congress's independent auditor, the Government Accountability Office, said inadequate oversight had cost taxpayers tens of millions of dollars, by allowing contractors to build shelters in the wrong places or to purchase supplies that were not needed.

But each week, many more millions are paid to contractors who get a cut of the profits from a job performed by someone else. In instances reviewed by The Washington Post, the difference between the job's actual price and the fee charged to taxpayers ranged from 40 percent to as high as 1,700 percent.

Consider the task of cleaning up storm debris. Just after the hurricane, the Army Corps of Engineers awarded contracts for removing 62 million cubic yards of debris to four companies: Ashbritt Inc., Ceres Environmental Services Inc., Environmental Chemical Corp. and Phillips and Jordan Inc.

Each of the four contracts was authorized for a maximum of $500 million. Corps officials have declined to reveal specific payment rates, citing a court decision barring such disclosures. But local officials and businesspeople knowledgeable about the contracts say the companies are paid $28 to $30 a cubic yard.

Below the first tier, the arrangements vary. But in a typical case in Louisiana's Jefferson Parish, top contractor Ceres occupied the first rung, followed by three layers of smaller companies: Loupe Construction Co., then a company based in Reserve, La., which hired another subcontractor called McGee, which hired Troy Hebert, a hauler from New Iberia, La. Hebert, who is also a member of the state legislature, says his pay ranged from $10 to $6 for each cubic yard of debris.

"Every time it passes through another layer, $4 or $5 is taken off the top," Hebert said. "These others are taking out money, and some of them aren't doing anything."

Defenders of the multi-tiered system say it is a normal and even necessary part of doing business in the aftermath of a major disaster. The prime contracts are usually awarded by FEMA or other government agencies well in advance, so relief services can be brought in quickly after the crisis eases. These companies often must expand rapidly to meet the need, and they do so by subcontracting work to other firms.

The two federal agencies that administer most disaster-related contracts, FEMA and the Army Corps of Engineers, say the system benefits small and local companies that do not have the resources to bid for large federal contracts. At the top end, prime contractors must be large enough to carry the heavy insurance burdens and administrative requirements of overseeing thousands of workers dispersed across a wide area, agency officials say. They also note that contractors have a legal right to hire subcontractors as they need them.

DOJ_NMG_0018632

"Our purview of a contract goes to the prime contractor only," said Jean Todd, a Corps contracting officer.

But watchdog groups that monitor federal contracting say Katrina has taken the contract tiering system to a new extreme, wasting tax dollars while often cheating companies at the low end of the contracting ladder. In some cases, the groups say, companies in the top and middle rungs contribute little more than shuffling paperwork from one tier to the next.

"It's trickle-down contracting: You're paying a cut at every level, and it makes the final cost exponentially more expensive than it needs to be," said Keith Ashdown of the watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense. "And in almost every case, the local people who really need to be making the money are at the bottom of these upside-down pyramid schemes."

The gap is particularly large for roof repairs. Four large companies won Army Corps contracts to cover damaged roofs with blue plastic tarp, under a program known as "Operation Blue Roof." The rate paid to the prime contractors ranged from $1.50 to $1.75 per square foot of tarp installed, documents show.

The prime contractors' rate is nearly as much as local roofers charge to install a roof of asphalt shingles, according to two roofing executives who requested anonymity because they feared losing their contracts. Meanwhile, at the bottom of the contractor heap, four to five rungs lower, some crews are being paid less than 10 cents per square foot, the officials said.

At least the prime contractors for roofing and debris removal owned equipment that could be immediately applied to the job at hand. In the world of Katrina contracting, this has not always been the case.

For example, one company hired as an ice vendor owns no ice-making equipment. Landstar Systems Inc., a $2 billion Florida company placed in charge of the bus evacuation of New Orleans, is a transportation broker that specializes in trucking and has no buses of its own. In 2002, the company was awarded a $100 million contract to provide emergency transportation services for the federal government during major disasters. The contract, which is administered by the Federal Aviation Administration, was expanded in the fall to a maximum $400 million. Landstar declined a request for an interview.

Thousands of New Orleanians had been stranded in the Superdome for more than 48 hours by the time FEMA issued the first order for a bus evacuation early on the morning of Aug. 31. The order was passed to Landstar, which then turned to other companies to locate buses, according to an official chronology prepared by the Department of Transportation. Landstar hired Carey International Inc., of Washington, which then hired the BusBank, of Chicago, and Transportation Management Systems of Columbia, Md. Bus Bank and TMS called private charter-bus companies -- some from as far away as California and Washington state -- asking them to send buses and drivers to New Orleans.

More than 1,100 buses eventually responded, some arriving four days later, after traveling hundreds of miles. Daily earnings averaged about $700 per bus, according to bus company owners. Landstar's daily earnings were nearly $1,200 per bus, government records show.

"A lot of that money is going to brokers who didn't have to do anything," said Jeff Polzien, owner of Red Carpet Charters, an Oklahoma bus company that sent coaches to New Orleans as a fourth-tier subcontractor.

Lower pay is hardly the worst problem subcontractors face. With many tiers to navigate, money trickles down slowly, delaying payment by weeks and months, and frequently imposing hardships on the smallest firms.

Several bus company owners said they were still owed tens of thousands of dollars for work they did in the fall. For some, the delays have been ruinous.

Thomas Paige, owner of Coast to Coast Bus Line of Dillon, S.C., laid off staff, and two of his four buses were repossessed by creditors after payment for his New Orleans work fell behind by three months.

"I went to New Orleans to help people -- and hopefully to help myself -- but now I feel like I've dug a ditch and fallen into it," Paige said. "If I would have known what I know now, I never would have gotten involved. It's just not worth it."

Behind Louisiana Aid Package, A Change Of Heart By One Man (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

Louisiana was in a foul mood on the February day that President Bush's Gulf Coast rebuilding coordinator, Donald E. Powell, stood before an audience of fellow bankers in Baton Rouge.

Two weeks before, the administration had rejected Louisiana's housing recovery plan. Mr. Powell's own idea of housing aid excluded thousands of homeowners, many of them poor, who lived in the flood plain but did not have flood insurance when Hurricane Katrina hit.

Asked about those who had counted on federally built levees to protect them, Mr. Powell, a wealthy man from the dry Texas Panhandle, noted that he had been responsible enough to buy flood insurance for his home in Amarillo.

The members of the Louisiana Bankers Association were not won over. Nor was The Advocate, Baton Rouge's newspaper, which demanded Mr. Powell's dismissal, calling him a "flint-souled" bean counter whose only concern was "guarding the money."

DOJ_NMG_0018633

Those with a more charitable view, Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, among them, complained that he lacked the authority to be effective, and some critics wondered if he was simply another presidential crony.

But barely a week would pass before Mr. Powell did an about-face that turned many of his critics into fans, showing that not only had he listened to the locals, but also that his conclusions had carried weight with Mr. Bush.

With Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and Mayor C. Ray Nagin at his side, Mr. Powell announced that the president would seek $4.2 billion more for Louisiana to compensate homeowners — even those in the flood plain.

Mr. Powell's epiphany came after hours of listening to Louisianians: the decision makers; the woman who cleaned his room at the Sheraton; Victoria Reggie Kennedy, the wife of Senator Edward M. Kennedy (whom he called after hearing she was a Louisiana native); the inspectors examining high-water marks in homes. As he drove through New Orleans with Mr. Bush on March 8, he pointed to a small restaurant in the Ninth Ward and rattled off the owner's real estate woes.

"He had a learning experience," said Walter Isaacson, vice chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority. "It's the most amazing thing for somebody of his stature. It's because by himself, he walked around. He walked around and talked to people."

Mr. Powell says walking about in the region incognito, in blue jeans and boots, is becoming a bit harder now that people are starting to recognize him. "I went with no preconceived thoughts," he said. "And I realized that while Mississippi was an act of God, Louisiana was an act of God and man. There were some flaws. The levees breached."

Last week, Mr. Powell spent much of his time lobbying House members, successfully, to preserve the appropriation. For several days, other states mounted an effort to siphon off some of the money, and conservatives said the entire amount was too large, but on Thursday the House overwhelmingly approved it.

Mr. Powell's work on the housing plan made many Louisianians think that in appointing him, the administration had finally done something right. Garland Robinette, a talk-radio host in New Orleans who has interviewed Mr. Powell several times, recalled telling him, "I was totally prepared to not like you at all, and it aggravates me that you're doing something to make me think you might be a good guy after all."

For Mr. Powell, former chief executive of the First National Bank of Amarillo, the listening tour was part of any banker's due diligence. Texas bankers are a particular breed — conservative, unpretentious and keenly competitive. One newspaper columnist recalled that years ago, after being offered a job in Amarillo, he received a solicitation call two hours later from Mr. Powell's bank. Asked about the incident, Mr. Powell said, "I probably was mad at our people because it was two hours."

Given his prominence in the Texas Panhandle, Mr. Powell's political connections go almost without saying. To the first President Bush, he is an old friend; to the second, he was a top fund-raiser. He had been to Washington only three times, he said, before he was appointed chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation in 2001, a position he left several months early to take his current post in November.

Mr. Powell, 64, is from a working-class family in Amarillo, where he helped his father peddle tobacco and snacks to shopkeepers. A football scholarship made him the first in his family to go to college. He began his career by walking into a bank and asking for a job. During the Texas banking crisis of the 1980's, Mr. Powell hauled the Amarillo bank from the brink of failure.

The $4.2 billion was not his first accomplishment as recovery czar. Until he intervened, state officials had spent hours trying to ensure that the federal government would continue to pick up all recovery expenses, a routine matter that, nevertheless, was authorized for a month at a time.

He also persuaded the president to ask Congress for an additional $1.5 billion for the state's levee system, doubling the previous request. And he became a go-to guy for local officials who hit snags in issues like debris removal and trailer placement.

But his rejection of the housing buyout plan, called the Baker bill after Representative Richard H. Baker, the Louisiana Republican who created it, infuriated many state officials. State leaders had taken great pains to build support for the plan, which called for the creation of a federal agency to buy and sell damaged property. Mr. Powell caused further outrage by skewering the Baker bill — gratuitously, many thought — in an opinion article in The Washington Post.

But he continued to push for an alternative. The first step was to agree on how many houses were damaged, and how badly. Mr. Powell forced Louisiana to justify its figures house by house, using aerial photographs and numbers collected from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Red Cross and insurance companies.

He was involved in details including how to reward those who had carried insurance and how to provide incentives for people to rebuild more safely. But he made no promises.

"He's a good poker player," said Andy Kopplin, a former chief of staff for Governor Blanco who is now the executive director of the Louisiana Recovery Authority. "I'd been getting calls and making calls to those guys at 10 o'clock on a Saturday night and sending data sets up. There was an extraordinary effort going on that gave us hope; at the same time, it was never clear to us that we were going to get a breakthrough."

Some Louisiana Democrats suggested the $4.2 billion was nothing more than damage control by the administration, noting that the president had been hammered for his lack of attention to Hurricane Katrina in his State of the Union address and quickly responded by announcing $18 billion in new money for the Gulf Coast. Further reviled after rejecting the Baker bill, they say, Mr. Bush opted to devote the $4.2 billion to Louisiana, which had been shortchanged in an earlier appropriation.

DOJ_NMG_0018634

But Mr. Powell said that the entire effort was influenced not by politics, but by hard data. "I'm on a mission, and I can't — while I'm sensitive to it — that can't guide me," he said of public opinion. "I can't be either pushed or held back. I know if we're attempting to do the right thing. I have a conscience. If you're moving, someone's going to be critical."

In the meantime, the flint-souled banker seems to be winning the battle for hearts and minds. Louisianians who might have been his adversaries have taken to inviting him over for brunch with the family and praising his frugality.

But Mr. Robinette, the talk-show host, reserves the right to change his mind if Mr. Powell starts to deliver bad news despite Mr. Bush's promises to the region.

"It could still be good cop, bad cop," Mr. Robinette said, "and we just haven't seen the bad cop yet."

FEMA Asking Some To Return Money Received For Hurricane Relief (AP)

The AP, March 19, 2006

BEAUMONT — Thousands of people who received money from the federal government after Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma might be asked to give it back.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency started sending letters last week asking people to return money they received in error.

Some 1.7 million households received FEMA assistance after Hurricanes Rita, Katrina or Wilma. About 2 to 3 percent or 34,000 to 51,000 families will reimburse the agency, Donna Dannels, acting deputy director of FEMA's recovery division.

"The truth is after Rita, FEMA was stretched awfully thin. Information they were giving out to people was extremely inconsistent," said U.S. Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands. "Someone could have easily received it in error."

Similar to an audit, the agency goes through a process after disasters to determine if payments were properly made, Dannels said.

"It goes back to if we have made the appropriate award to the appropriate person for the damages that they incurred," she said.

Those who receive a letter requesting repayment can appeal if they believe they were entitled to the funds.

But FEMA officials encourage them to make payments while the matter is resolved or to at least set up a payment plan. If the amount isn't paid in full within 30 days, a 2 percent interest will be added.

Citizens Panel To Share Its Post-Katrina Vision (LAT)

By Sam Quinones

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — A commission that has been a magnet for criticism as well as a channel for emerging citizen activism will wind up its work today, bringing to a close the first planning stage for a post-Katrina New Orleans.

The Bring New Orleans Back Commission formally issues its final report to Mayor C. Ray Nagin tonight, though the reports of its seven committees have been public for several weeks.

Nagin formed the commission in the fall to recommend how the city might respond to the destruction of Hurricane Katrina. Since then, it has become a symbol of a new volunteerism and activism among Orleanians. It was also lambasted by many residents for one committee's proposal that large swaths of the city be returned to wetlands and open space.

As a post-hurricane entity, the commission went far beyond just storm and flood protection.

The committees also have recommended ways to overhaul land-use planning, rebuild neighborhoods, consolidate duplicative elected offices, revive the city's cultural life, reorder its health and public education systems, and modernize the criminal justice system.

Michael Cowan, a theology professor at Loyola University who worked on the commission's education and government effectiveness committees, said such a broad approach was necessary because so many problems needed addressing. "A lot of the status quo was a disaster," Cowan said.

Before the Aug. 29 storm, the city's schools were failing, poverty and crime were high, and opportunities for economic advancement and homeownership were low. City government was widely viewed as inefficient, inept and corrupt. The population was declining as young and talented people moved elsewhere.

Meanwhile, Cowan said, "the power structure was so locked in that reform efforts just bounced off it. Good people … gave up."

But Katrina's destruction, as well as the news coverage that followed the flood, embarrassed and reenergized people. Amid the destruction, many New Orleanians saw a chance to organize the city differently.

DOJ_NMG_0018635

"It shook a lot of us up," said Gary Solomon, a banker and chairman of the commission's government effectiveness committee. "There's a lot of good people down here who want to see change."

The Bring New Orleans Back Commission itself was a sign of how different things were after Katrina. Before the storm, residents acknowledged an apathetic civic culture. The panel, however, was made up of dozens of volunteers from many professions and classes, some of whom put in weeks of work.

"This was a citizen-led process," Cowan said. "Our public officials did not lead this process and get this work done."

In January, many residents were alarmed when they learned that the urban planning committee recommended a moratorium on building permits in the hardest-hit neighborhoods, and a return of many of the neighborhoods to wetlands and open space.

The committee has also proposed forming a Crescent City Recovery Assn. to direct neighborhood rebuilding, with the power to issue bonds and buy and sell property for redevelopment, including through eminent domain.

But the commission's proposals are merely advice, and whether any of them will be followed is an open question. Moreover, it's unclear where the funding for the proposals would come from, though one place Louisianians are looking to is just off their coast.

Louisiana's offshore wells have provided oil and natural gas for the nation since the 1940s. Though other states receive half the money generated off their shores, Louisiana receives very little. Most of it goes to the federal government.

Rep. Bobby Jindal (R-La.) has introduced a bill that would increase the state's share of the royalties from offshore oil and gas drilling for use in hurricane preparedness and economic development.

"This is going to be a land of opportunity. [But] we can't build it from scratch," said Bruce Thompson, owner of a measurement-equipment company and a member of the committee studying levees and flood protection. "There needs to be a state revenue source. We've got to be treated fairly."

Few commission members believe anything will happen before April 22, when New Orleanians elect a mayor and City Council.

Still, some hope their ideas will become part of the campaign debate.

Preparing for that, Cowan has formed Common Good — an umbrella organization of homeowner associations, nonprofits, universities and religious groups.

Common Good will bring the candidates together in public forums and ask them to commit to changes they will support, he said. After the election, the group will hold bimonthly meetings with the elected officials to see what progress has been made.

"Sometimes people in elected office need to have a broad, diverse group of citizens helping them do the right thing, because they're just subject to a lot of different pressures," Cowan said.

Among many recommendations, the commission report will propose:

· The consolidation of the sheriffs' offices. New Orleans has a criminal sheriff and a civil sheriff, performing the duties that a single sheriff handles in most U.S. counties.

· Establishing regional forensic and DNA labs, as well as one regional police academy and training facility.

· Preventing the City Council from overriding the Planning Commission's land-use decisions.

· Forming an ethics review board for city government.

WAR NEWS:

President Bush To Stop In Cleveland On Monday (ABJ)

By Lisa A. Abraham

Akron Beacon Journal, March 19, 2006

Just days after reaffirming his national security policy of pre-emptive military strikes, President Bush will be in Cleveland to sell his agenda.

Bush is expected to discuss the global war on terror in a speech Monday at the City Club of Cleveland. More than 1,000 are expected to attend.

On Thursday, the Bush administration issued its updated national security strategy -- a key component of which includes the first-strike military action that led to the U.S. invasion of Iraq three years ago.

As polls show support for the war is waning, the president is making speeches to bolster his strategy.

Ohio Democrats are balking at the president's initiative.

U.S. Rep. Sherrod Brown of Avon has scheduled a telephone conference for the media Monday to talk about how Bush's policies have alienated ``everyday Ohioans."

DOJ_NMG_0018636

U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Cleveland sent Bush a letter encouraging him to spend some time in the city to get to know Cleveland residents who are dealing with a different sort of terrorism.

``With all due respect, Mr. President, the people of Cleveland are familiar with the `war on terror.' They are familiar with the terror of joblessness, the terror of cutbacks in pensions and health care, the terror of foreclosure, the terror of trade policies that have gutted our manufacturing base and the terror of economic policies that have left many of them behind," his letter states.

Bush is expected to arrive in Cleveland shortly before noon, and will present the President's Volunteer Service Award to Lois Hagood of Garfield Heights, who volunteers as a reading tutor for first-graders in Cleveland.

Bush's speech is expected to begin about 12:30 p.m. and last about an hour, said Karen Reaves of the office of presidential advance.

City Club spokeswoman Missy Toms said sticking to the club's traditional format, the president will be expected to spend about a half-hour answering unrehearsed questions from the audience after his address.

The club moved the Bush speech from its Euclid Avenue headquarters to the ballroom of the Renaissance Hotel on Public Square to increase seating capacity to about 1,000, she said.

Ordinarily, tickets to a City Club event would be open to the public, but for Bush all of the seats were taken by club members and their guests, Toms said.

The speech is Bush's 41st visit to Ohio since taking office, and his third visit this year. In February, he was in suburban Columbus for a speech on health care and he also attended a fundraiser for Republican U.S. Sen. Mike DeWine in suburban Cincinnati.

The speech will be broadcast live on the Internet with the help of the University of Akron.

The webcast can be viewed by going to the City Club's site at www.cityclub.org and clicking on ``view the webcast." Audio and video fromWVIZ Adelphia Cable will be routed to a server at UA for a live webcast.

``To see a president in person is a unique opportunity, but unfortunately, the capacity of the auditorium is limited. With this live webcast, anyone across the country and around the world can join the City Club for the president's address," City Club Executive Director James Foster said.

Bush's appearance marks only the third time a sitting president has spoken to the City Club, a nonpartisan free-speech forum. President Clinton spoke in 1994 and Ronald Reagan in 1988.

Bush Trying To Rally War Support (CLPD)

By Sabrina Eaton

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, March 20, 2006

Three years after U.S. troops thundered into Iraq with promises of swift victory, President Bush is visiting Cleveland to shore up enthusiasm for both the lingering war and his leadership.

His luncheon speech before the City Club at the Renaissance Cleveland Hotel today comes as the president's approval ratings hit record lows and polls show increased displeasure with a war that has claimed the lives of more than 2,300 U.S. troops.

Bush will discuss how the United States is "working with all aspects of Iraqi society" to defeat terrorists, restore order and rebuild Iraq, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said. It is part of a monthlong effort by Bush to update Americans on the war's progress and "how we're fixing what was not working."

"Oftentimes, the progress that is being made doesn't get as much attention as the dramatic and horrific images of violence that people see on their TV screens," McClellan said Friday. "It's important to continue to put things in the broader context."

Republican supporters of Bush's strategy, like Ohio Sens. George Voinovich and Mike DeWine, say Cleveland is a good place for him to explain his policies. Democratic critics, like Reps. Sherrod Brown and Dennis Kucinich, insist he has handled the war ineptly.

John Alterman of Washington's bipartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies credited Bush with disrupting terrorist networks enough to prevent another attack on U.S. soil, but said U.S. allies believe Bush has "destabilized" the world.

"The question is how to keep control of post-conflict environments when you don't have a clear enemy and a clear physical objective," Alterman said. "That is not going to be solved with a presidential speech."

Bush Marks Anniversary, Never Says 'War' (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

The Associated Press, March 19, 2006

President Bush marked the anniversary of the Iraq war Sunday by touting the efforts to build democracy there and avoiding any mention of the daily violence that rages three years after he ordered an invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0018637

The president didn't utter the word "war."

"We are implementing a strategy that will lead to victory in Iraq," the president assured a public that is increasingly skeptical that he has a plan to end the fighting after the deaths of more than 2,300 U.S. troops.

Administration officials repeated the mantra that progress continues toward building a unified Iraqi government and nation.

"Now is the time for resolve, not retreat," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld wrote in a column for The Washington Post. "Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis."

Yet there were acknowledgments from the top commander of U.S. forces in Iraq that the situation is fragile and that he did not predict the strength of the insurgency.

"I did not think it would be as robust as it has been," Gen. George W. Casey said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "And it's something that, obviously, with my time here on the ground, my thinking on that has gained much greater clarity and insight."

Bush did not mention the insurgent attacks, the car bombs or the mounting Iraqi deaths in a two-minute statement to reporters outside the White House after returning from a weekend at Camp David. Avoiding the word "war," he called the day "the third anniversary of the beginning of the liberation of Iraq."

The president only indirectly referred to the violence when he said he spent the morning reflecting on the sacrifices made by U.S. troops. Bush said he spoke by phone earlier in the day with the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, and had received a positive report.

The White House is trying to remind the disapproving public of Bush's vision for Iraq with a public relations blitz. The president plans to give a series of speeches on Iraq, beginning Monday in Cleveland.

More than three-fourths of the public thinks it's likely that Iraq is headed toward civil war, according to an AP-Ipsos poll taken in early March.

And two-thirds of Americans say the U.S. is losing ground in preventing civil war in Iraq, according to a Pew Research Center poll taken in the same period. That's up from 48 percent in January.

On Sunday, Vice President Dick Cheney did not express any regret for predicting in the days before the invasion that U.S. troops would be greeted as liberators or his assessment 10 months ago that the insurgency was in its "last throes." On the contrary, he said the optimistic statements "were basically accurate, reflect reality."

Like Bush, Cheney touted the political progress in Iraq, pointing out that the Iraqis have met the political deadlines set for them and predicting they will form a unified government "shortly."

In an interview on CBS' "Face the Nation," Cheney flatly rejected a statement made earlier Sunday by Iraq's former interim prime minister that the increasing attacks killing dozens each day across his country can only be described as a civil war. "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is," Ayad Allawi told the British Broadcasting Corp.

Instead, Cheney described the violence as the actions of terrorists who have "reached a stage of desperation."

"What we've seen is a serious effort by them to foment a civil war," Cheney said. "But I don't think they've been successful."

Cheney blamed the negative perception on news coverage of the daily violence instead of the progress being made toward democracy.

"There is a constant sort of perception, if you will, that's created because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad," the vice president said. "It's not all the work that went on that day in 15 other provinces."

White House critics bemoaned the fact that the third anniversary of fighting ever came to pass and accused the Bush administration of incompetence.

"By any measure, in my view, we're worse off in Iraq today than we were a year ago," Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., said on CNN's "Late Edition." He cited increased deaths and violence, incomplete government services and a long path to building a consensus government.

Rumsfeld urged Americans to continue supporting the fight and said he believes history will show that the terrorists were defeated. Meanwhile, his detractors issued another round of criticism and calls for his resignation.

In a New York Times column, retired Gen. Paul D. Eaton, who was in charge of training the Iraqi military from 2003-2004, called the defense secretary "incompetent strategically, operationally and tactically, and is far more responsible for what has happened to our important mission in Iraq. Mr. Rumsfeld must step down."

Nearly three years ago Bush announced the end to major combat in Iraq.

Last week, U.S. forces launched Operation Swarmer, described by the Pentagon as the biggest air assault since April 2003. However, Casey said Sunday that he wouldn't categorize Swarmer as a major combat operation, noting that other operations had used far more troops.

"It was an operation to go out into an almost uninhabited area," Casey said. "I think, frankly, it got a little bit more hype than it really deserved because of the use of the helicopters to get the Iraqi and the coalition forces there."

DOJ_NMG_0018638

Assessments At Odds On War's Anniversary (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — On the third anniversary of the start of the U.S.-led war in Iraq, the Bush administration insisted the effort is making progress and said Iraq is doing more to fight insurgents.

Critics in Washington and protesters around the world called for a new approach.

President Bush called Sunday a "time to reflect" about the sacrifices of U.S. troops in Iraq over the past three years. He said he was pleased by Iraqi efforts toward democracy. The top U.S. general in Iraq, meanwhile, predicted "a couple of more years" of violent insurgency, but with U.S. troop presence going down.

However, Iraq's former prime minister, Ayad Allawi, said the country is in a state of civil war. Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., a critic of the administration's handling of the war, said it was time for "new thinking." And Anthony Cordesman, a leading Iraq expert and war supporter, said, "We may well fail in all our efforts because they came far too slowly."

Protests around the world focused criticism on the Bush administration. Police in London estimated 15,000 people marched from Parliament to Trafalgar Square; last year's protest drew 45,000. About 800 people rallied in Tokyo compared with about 2,000 last year. In the United States, the biggest rally was in Chicago, where about 7,000 people marched. Smaller protests were held in other cities, including Boston, San Francisco, Pittsburgh and New York.

Avoiding the word "war," Bush said Sunday marked "the third anniversary of the beginning of the liberation of Iraq." Speaking to reporters upon his return from Camp David, Bush said he talked by phone Sunday morning with the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, and came away "encouraged by the progress" the Iraqi government is making to establish a balance across Sunni Arab, Shiite Muslim and Kurdish factions.

Top Bush administration officials sought Sunday to convey a message combining a realistic assessment of continuing violence in Iraq with optimism about the future.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld issued a message to the 132,000 U.S. troops in Iraq acknowledging their sacrifice. "The progress on all fronts has been murderously contested at every turn by terrorists aligned with al-Qaeda. But they are not succeeding," he said in the statement posted on the Pentagon's website.

Vice President Cheney, appearing on CBS' Face the Nation, rejected Allawi's assessment and said insurgents have "reached a stage of desperation." Cheney also said he did not regret previous statements — that U.S. forces would be greeted as liberators and that the insurgency was in its last throes — and said they "were basically accurate, reflect reality."

Cheney blamed the media for focusing on violence instead of Iraq's progress toward rebuilding. Violence is intensifying, he said, because the enemy knows that if democracy succeeds in Iraq, its extremist agenda throughout the Middle East will be imperiled.

"There's a lot more at stake here," Cheney said.

Appearing on three networks, Army Gen. George Casey, commander of coalition forces in Iraq, described the violence there as centered in and around Baghdad.

Fifteen of 18 provinces have six incidents of violence or fewer per day, Casey said. In 12 Iraqi provinces, he said, the number of violent incidents is two or fewer per day. He predicted that current troop levels would continue over the next few months but that U.S. forces could be reduced later in 2006 and next year.

Cordesman, of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, predicted Iraq will not stabilize until 2007-08. He said there is "a real risk that Iraq will degenerate into full-scale civil war or a level of divisiveness that will paralyze or limit" the country. As to the idea that Iraq is a model for spreading democracy across the region, Cordesman was dismissive: "Iraq is not a model of anything."

Hagel, a possible Republican presidential contender in 2008, said on ABC's This Week that the war is "helping bankrupt this country" and that U.S. policy options must include withdrawal. The United States so far has spent about $400 billion on the Iraq war.

Among Democrats, Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, said on NBC's Meet the Press, that "Republicans in Congress will get a rude awakening" on Iraq in the November elections if the administration does not change course.

Some Say Civil War Already Started (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and his senior advisors Sunday sought to mark the third anniversary of the Iraq war with declarations of progress, but found themselves embroiled in renewed debate about whether the nation had fallen into civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0018639

In statements to reporters, appearances on Sunday morning TV news shows and an op-ed article, Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Army Gen. George W. Casey, the senior U.S. military commander in Iraq, declared that the United States was making progress toward stabilizing Iraq and defusing sectarian tensions.

But those upbeat assessments faced sharp skepticism from U.S. legislators from both parties and from a senior Iraqi political leader, former interim Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, who has been a staunch American ally. They contended that Iraq was now in the midst of a civil war between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

The issue of whether Iraq's sectarian fighting constitutes a civil war has taken on political significance. Polls have shown American support for the Iraq war dropping since the bombing last month of a Shiite shrine in Samarra led to widespread communal violence. Strategists in both parties have said that Bush will have a more difficult time sustaining support for the U.S. military presence in Iraq if the public believes that troops are caught in the middle of a civil war.

On a day of sweeping arguments from both sides, the most dramatic comments came from Allawi.

"It is unfortunate that we are in civil war," the former prime minister told the British Broadcasting Corp. "We are losing each day, as an average, 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more. If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

Allawi added: "Maybe we have not reached the point of no return yet. But we are moving toward this point. We are in a terrible civil conflict now."

In separate television interviews, both Cheney and Casey rejected Allawi's characterization.

The vice president, speaking on CBS' "Face the Nation," said that "terrorists" in Iraq wanted to provoke civil war, but added, "I don't think they've been successful."

"That's been their strategy all along," Cheney said, "but my view would be they've reached a stage of desperation from their standpoint."

Appearing on CNN's "Late Edition," Casey contended that Iraq was still "a long way from civil war."

But he portrayed overall conditions much more cautiously than the vice president had, saying on NBC's "Meet the Press" that the situation in Iraq was "fragile."

"Is the situation here fragile because of the increased … sectarian tensions and increased levels of violence?" Casey said. "That's absolutely right, and I don't want … to sugarcoat it. The situation here is fragile, and I suspect it will remain fragile until we get a new government, a government of national unity formed."

In Baghdad, political leaders made their first measurable progress toward forming such a government, agreeing to create a council that would give each of the country's major political factions a voice in making security and economic policies.

Bush, speaking briefly to reporters after returning from a weekend at Camp David, said he had spoken Sunday morning with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in Iraq about the government negotiations.

"I'm encouraged by the progress," Bush said. "The ambassador was encouraged by it."

But Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the United States needed to move more aggressively to resolve the long-running negotiations over a new government, perhaps by threatening to begin removing U.S. forces if the Iraqis could not agree on a consensus government.

"The only leverage we have is our troop presence," Reed said on ABC's "This Week."

"And I think we have to make it clear to the Iraqi political leaders that if they're not able or willing to come together … that our presence can't be indefinite there."

The political effect of the continued fighting in Iraq can be seen clearly in recent polls. Since the Feb. 22 bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, support among Americans for both the war and Bush's performance as president have fallen to some of the lowest levels of his tenure.

In a CNN/USA Today/Gallup national survey released last week, for instance, 55% of Americans said that chaos and civil war were the most likely outcomes in Iraq; 40% said they expected that a stable government would be formed.

Only 37% of those polled said they believed the war in Iraq had been worth the cost, down from 46% in January. Fully 60% of those surveyed said the war had not been worth the cost; that equaled the highest percentage Gallup has recorded on that question.

As administration officials sought to rebut the idea of a civil war, lawmakers, also speaking on the Sunday interview programs, supported Allawi's conclusion.

"I think … the former prime minister is correct," Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said on "This Week."

"I think we have had a low-grade civil war going on in Iraq, certainly the last six months, maybe the last year. Our own generals have told me that privately."

Rep. John P. Murtha, a traditionally hawkish Democrat from Pennsylvania who has urged Bush to remove American forces from Iraq, echoed Hagel. "Our troops are caught in a civil war," Murtha said on "Meet the Press."

DOJ_NMG_0018640

Hagel, who has become a frequent critic of the war, said that the invasion had weakened America's security position. "Are we better off than we were three years ago?" he asked. "Is the Middle East more stable than it was three years ago? Absolutely not. It's more unstable."

Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, also expressed concern about the direction of events in Iraq.

"Materially things have worsened … for ordinary Iraqis," he told "Late Edition." "Certainly more Iraqi civilians are being killed, substantially more, and the government is not yet in operation."

Both Bush and Cheney, in their comments, said trends in Iraq were much more positive than such assessments suggested. Cheney rejected charges that he had been too optimistic in earlier assessments of the war, such as his assertion in May 2005 that the insurgency was in its "last throes."

Cheney said good news from Iraq had not been reported. Public disillusionment "has less to do with the statements we've made, which I think were basically accurate and reflect reality, than it does with the fact that there's a constant sort of perception, if you will, that's created because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad," Cheney said. "It's not all the work that went on that day in 15 other provinces in terms of making progress toward rebuilding Iraq."

In an op-ed article in the Washington Post, Rumsfeld declared that the "terrorists seem to recognize that they are losing in Iraq" and that the U.S. must remain in the country long enough to ensure stability.

"Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis," Rumsfeld wrote.

On Anniversary, Bush And Cheney See Iraq Success (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 19 — On the third anniversary of a war that they once expected to be over by now, President Bush and senior officials argued Sunday that their strategy was working despite escalating violence in Iraq, even as a former Iraqi prime minister once favored by the White House declared that a civil war had already started.

Displaying a carefully calibrated mix of optimism about eventual victory and caution about how long American troops would be involved, the officials who marked the day — including Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld — sounded much as they had on the first anniversary of the invasion. At that time, the rebuilding effort had just begun, the insurgency was far less fierce, and the American occupation had suppressed, temporarily, the sectarian violence scarring Iraq today.

The picture painted by the administration clashed with that of the former interim prime minister, Ayad Allawi, once hailed by Mr. Bush as the kind of fair-minded leader Iraq needed. He declared in an interview with the BBC that the country was nearing a "point of no return."

"It is unfortunate that we are in civil war," said Mr. Allawi, who served as prime minister after the American invasion and now leads a 25-seat secular alliance of representatives in Iraq's 275-seat National Assembly. "We are losing each day, as an average, 50 to 60 people through the country, if not more."

"If this is not civil war," he said, "then God knows what civil war is."

Mr. Allawi's assessment was contradicted by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander in Iraq, who said on CNN's "Late Edition" that "We're a long way from civil war."

As politicians in Baghdad moved incrementally forward on Sunday on forming a unified government, at least 15 more bodies were discovered around the capital, bringing to more than 200 the number of people believed killed in sectarian violence in the past few weeks. [Page A10.]

On CBS News' "Face the Nation," Mr. Cheney sought to place the war in a broader context. "It's not just about Iraq, it's not about just today's situation in Iraq," he said. "It's about where we're going to be 10 years from now in the Middle East and whether or not there's going to be hope and the development of the governments that are responsive to the will of the people, that are not a threat to anyone, that are not safe havens for terror or manufacturers of weapons of mass destruction."

The war has taken more than 2,300 American lives, and those of 33,000 to 37,000 Iraqis, according to the estimates of the Iraq Body Count Project, an independent group that monitors the news media.

Mr. Rumsfeld dismissed calls for withdrawal by comparing the current battle to the two great struggles of his generation: World War II and the cold war. "Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis," he wrote in an op-ed article published in The Washington Post. "It would be as great a disgrace as if we had asked the liberated nations of Eastern Europe to return to Soviet domination."

DOJ_NMG_0018641

Mr. Bush is entering the fourth year of the war able to declare success in the dismantling of Saddam Hussein's tyrannical government and in providing a framework for democratic elections, though the country has so far failed to put together the institutions to make a democracy work. Mr. Bush's approval rating, which soared in the early days of the invasion as Americans rushed to Baghdad, has sunk to the low-to-mid 30 percent range as the chaos and number of Iraqis meeting violent deaths has escalated.

Mr. Cheney was challenged on "Face the Nation" about his statement three years ago that "we will be greeted as liberators" and his assertion 10 months ago that the insurgency was in its "last throes."

He insisted that in both cases his facts were right, but that the news media had created a different perception with vivid imagery of killing.

"I think it has less to do with the statements we've made, which I think were basically accurate and reflect reality, than it does with the fact that there's a constant sort of perception, if you will, that's created because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad," he said.

The administration could take heart this weekend from the relatively small antiwar protests around the country, compared with protests held on the previous anniversaries of the invasion. An estimated 7,000 people demonstrated in Chicago on Saturday and smaller protests were held over the weekend in Boston, San Francisco and other cities. In Times Square, the figure was about 1,000.

Television was the forum where the administration's representatives and opponents marshaled the statistics that they believe made their cases. Mr. Bush argued last week that by year's end, Iraqi forces would control more than half the country; Representative John P. Murtha, the hawkish Pennsylvania Democrat who late last year called for American withdrawal, said Sunday on NBC News' "Meet the Press" that the statistic was meaningless.

"I flew for an hour and 15 minutes over desert," he said of a recent trip. "Wasn't a soul. And that's the territory I guess they're talking about." Meanwhile, he noted, unemployment has soared in areas hardest hit by sectarian violence. Oil production, which the administration once said would pay for Iraq's rebuilding, was markedly below last year's levels.

As midterm elections approach, the White House is concerned that support for the war is ebbing fastest among Republicans who supported the war, including some influential conservatives who argue that the job of liberation is done, and American troops should not be left in the crossfire of civil strife.

Mr. Bush talked about the war in a two-minute statement to reporters on Sunday when he returned to the White House from Camp David, urging Iraq to form a unity government, and saying, "I'm encouraged by the progress." Then he entered the White House with his wife, Laura.

He offered no answers to questions about the gap between his expectations three years ago and the realities of Iraq today, seemingly underscoring the problem the White House has faced in explaining the war. Suspicions that Mr. Hussein had unconventional weapons, an original justification for the invasion, have proved unfounded.

Mr. Bush halted eroding support for his Iraq strategy last December, explaining his military, political and economic strategy and admitting some early errors. But that was before images of Shiites fighting Sunnis began a new erosion of support.

On the critical political question — how long American forces will stay — General Casey has said a significant presence will be required for "a couple more years," and "over 2006, we will continue to see a gradual reduction in coalition forces."

When the war was launched, the Pentagon expected a short conflict. Its classified plans called for the withdrawal of the majority of American troops by the fall of 2003. Today there are roughly 133,000 still there.

As of Friday, 2,313 American military personnel and Defense Department civilians had died during the Iraq effort; of those, 1,811 were killed in action and 502 in non-hostile events, like accidents, a Pentagon spokesman said Sunday. The spokesman also cited statistics that 7,912 American military personnel had been wounded so severely in action they could not return to duty, and 9,212 had been wounded in action but could return to duty.

Mr. Rumsfeld, whose refusal to send larger numbers of troops into Iraq after the invasion has made him a lightning rod for critics, said in his published remarks on Sunday that terrorists, not the American-led coalition, are losing in Iraq, a message repeated by Mr. Cheney.

And like Mr. Cheney, Mr. Rumsfeld insisted the problem was the imagery from a 24-hour news cycle. "Fortunately, history is not made up of daily headlines, blogs on Web sites or the latest sensational attack," Mr. Rumsfeld wrote. "History is a bigger picture, and it takes some time and perspective to measure accurately."

Bush Still Upbeat On Outcome In Iraq (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018642

President Bush and Vice President Cheney hailed the progress being made by Iraqi leaders to form a unity government yesterday, as the administration tried to dispel a growing perception that a continuing wave of sectarian violence has pushed Iraq into a full-fledged civil war.

Bush, speaking on the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion that toppled Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, assured Americans that his administration is pursuing a strategy "that will lead to victory in Iraq," an outcome about which polls show the public is increasingly skeptical.

Cheney, meanwhile, dismissed assertions made by former Iraqi prime minister Ayad Allawi that the nation is in the throes of civil war. He said Iraq is holding together as a new constitutional democracy even as terrorists are desperately trying to cause its dissolution.

"What we've seen is a serious effort by them to foment civil war, but I don't think they've been successful," Cheney said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

The upbeat appraisals by Bush and Cheney came as other voices struck a more ominous note. Allawi contradicted Bush's progress report, saying the country is edging toward "the point of no return."

"We are losing a day as an average 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more," Allawi said on BBC's "Sunday AM" program. "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

Three years after U.S.-led forces quickly swept through Iraq, the country remains in the grips of a bloody insurgency. The war and its aftermath have left more than 2,300 U.S. troops and at least 30,000 Iraqis dead. Negotiations to form a unity government to lead Iraq have been deadlocked since parliamentary elections in December.

The anniversary was marked by protests around the country and around the world, as thousands of antiwar demonstrators gathered in cities from London to Tokyo. In New York, a crowd of about 200 people marched down Fifth Avenue to protest the war. Demonstrators also marched through storm-ravaged New Orleans, saying the slow pace of recovery there illustrates the cost of the war in Iraq.

Meanwhile, a growing majority of Americans believe the effort is not worth the cost both financially and in lives lost. A Washington Post-ABC News poll earlier this month found that two-thirds of Americans questioned whether the United States has a clear plan for handling the situation in Iraq.

As the administration offered optimistic appraisals of the war's progress, Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), a frequent administration critic who is weighing a run for president in 2008, echoed Allawi's assessment, saying that Iraq is already in the midst of a "low-grade civil war."

"I think it's important that we stop this talk about we're not going to leave until we achieve victory," Hagel said on ABC's "This Week." "Well, what is victory? We achieved victory, Saddam's gone, the Iraqis have a constitution, they had an election, it's now up to them."

Hagel said a precipitous U.S. withdrawal from Iraq would be a mistake, but he added that the Bush administration should work harder to achieve a political settlement in Iraq by engaging other Middle Eastern countries in a negotiated solution.

Despite Americans' growing pessimism, the Bush administration is continuing to press ahead with its strategy, saying that it is steadily moving toward success. Bush is scheduled to deliver a speech in Cleveland today, which is part of a continuing administration effort to rebuild the eroding public support for the war by having the president speak regularly to specific elements of the war strategy.

Bush, who spoke on the White House South Lawn after returning from a weekend at Camp David, said that he is encouraged by Iraq's continuing steps toward democracy, and that he is urging Iraqi leaders "to work hard to get this government up and running." Bush said he spoke by phone yesterday to U.S. ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, who he said remains encouraged by the political progress being made in Iraq.

Sectarian violence intensified after last month's bombing of the Golden Mosque, a revered Shiite religious site in Samarra. Hundreds of Iraqis have been killed in brutal attacks, counterattacks and kidnappings since the mosque bombing.

Although a growing majority of Americans have come to believe that the U.S. invasion was an error and that the nation is headed toward civil war, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the U.S. military commander in Iraq, brushed aside the idea on "Fox News Sunday." "I personally don't believe one, that we're there now; two, that civil war is imminent; and three, that it is inevitable and it will happen," he said.

Meanwhile, Cheney said that Iraq is progressing toward establishing a functioning democracy. He pointed out that Iraq has gone from the brutal rule of Hussein to negotiations to form a government in three years. In addition, he said, the United States is making substantial progress in training Iraqi security forces, who he said are leading about half the missions in Iraq.

Cheney also dismissed a statement by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who said the war in Iraq should never have been fought: "I would not look to Ted Kennedy for guidance and leadership on how we ought to manage national security. . . . I think what Senator Kennedy reflects is sort of the pre-9/11 mentality about how we ought to deal with the world and that part of the world."

DOJ_NMG_0018643

But CBS anchor Bob Schieffer bluntly challenged Cheney on his own string of prognostications, such as his pre-invasion assertion that U.S. troops would be welcomed in Iraq as liberators and, 10 months ago, that the insurgency was in its "last throes."

Cheney replied that those statements were "basically accurate and reflect reality," but that public perceptions of Iraq's progress are being skewed "because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad."

Again linking the war in Iraq to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Cheney called the conflict part of "an aggressive, forward-leaning" strategy that has prevented terrorist incidents in the United States since then.

Kennedy, meanwhile, put out his own statement chastising Cheney: "He was wrong about the link between al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein. He was wrong about Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. He was wrong about America being greeted as liberators. He was wrong about the insurgency being in the last throes. Now he rejects the idea of civil war."

In Iraq, US Influence Wanes As Full-scale Civil War Looms (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD - Every day, more violence. And more uncertainty for Iraqis than they have ever known, as they mark three years since American troops invaded.

The wave of optimism that once buoyed Iraqis after the fall of Saddam Hussein is now being marked as yet another casualty of the bombs and murders that are part of daily life here.

But even as Iraq slides toward full-scale civil war, Iraqi analysts are trying to envision a way out of a vicious insurgency, political deadlock, and sectarian bloodshed.

One factor they are considering is the changing American role. Despite the continued presence of 130,000 American troops, and arm-twisting efforts by US diplomats to forge a unity government, Iraq's democratic political process is, by definition, giving the US even less leverage to shape this broken nation's future.

"The majority of Iraqis are now against this occupation, whether they are Sunni, Shiite or Kurd," says Wamidh Omar Nadhmi, a political scientist who heads a Sunni-led group called the Foundation Conference. "But those in government positions are trying to unleash a campaign of suppression, to take advantage [of the violence], to dominate.

"Now we are told: '[The Americans] are not going to take sides,' " says Mr. Nadhmi, referring to remarks by US officials last week that Iraqi forces must handle sectarian strife on their own. "But if it comes to civil war, and the US does not try to keep order, as the controlling power, then why do they stay in Iraq?"

Tens of thousands of Iraqis have died in a maelstrom of insurgent violence. Many hundreds more are dying in sectarian killings that flared a month ago, after the destruction of the gold-domed Shiite shrine at Samarra.

The grim reality today - and the perception among so many Iraqis that the US is responsible - could not be in sharper contrast from the faith Iraqis once held, that the all-powerful Americans would solve their problems.

"It is unfortunate that we are in civil war," Iyad Allawi, Iraq's former prime minister, told BBC news Sunday. "We are losing each day an average of 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more. If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

That view is hotly disputed by US officials and commanders, but is on the lips of many Iraqis here. "Maybe we have not reached a point of no return yet, but we are moving towards this point," said Mr. Allawi.

But escaping that vortex will not be easy, analysts say.

"The new government is incapable of ruling the street without the American presence," says Ahmad al-Rikabi, head of the popular Radio Dijla in Baghdad. "If [US forces] left Iraq, the future of the country would be in the hands of the militias. This is the case already, but we still have some hope [the US] will keep some balance."

The stakes could not be higher, for Iraq or for the region, President Bush said last week. "The battle lines in Iraq are clearly drawn for the world to see, and there is no middle ground," he said. "The enemy will emerge from Iraq one of two ways: Emboldened or defeated."

US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad has been pushing Iraqi leaders to form a unity government, that would mend rifts inside the main Shiite bloc, and ensure a significant role for the minority Sunni Arabs. At the formal opening of parliament last Thursday, he had a place in the handshaking line alongside Iraqi political leaders.

But diplomats close to the talks say not all Iraqi leaders welcome the forceful US intervention. Both Washington and Tehran have signaled that they could commence talks to solve the crisis, in what would be the first publicly acknowledged contact since Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution.

DOJ_NMG_0018644

"Saddam Hussein is still ruling Iraq - he may be behind bars, but he created the mentality we have today," says Mr. Rikabi. "Saddam has to be executed. It's not revenge, and won't be satisfying for his victims. But it will be good for Shiite and Kurds, and even Sunnis, to help them focus on their leaders."

"The symbols of the past are still in front of our eyes; we're still living in the past, and must get rid of the past," says Rikabi. Sectarian violence grows

But getting rid of the past means getting rid of business as usual, and that means coming to terms with the increasingly pervasive Shiite militia influence in Iraq's security forces, which are accused of abuse, torture, and operating death squads that target Sunni Arabs. They also reportedly let other Shiite militias, like the Mahdi Army of anti-US cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, operate with impunity.

"The first thing is to change the minister," says a Shiite police colonel who asked not to be named, referring to Bayan Jabr, the minister of interior and a former Badr militia leader. "We need an independent one."

Ambassador Khalilzad has pushed for such a change. Shiites are targeted almost exclusively by the Sunni Arab extremist insurgents. But Sunni Arabs say they see little change on the ground.

"Nobody obliged the minister of interior to resign - he should be arrested," says Mr. Wamidh. "There have been no actual steps in favor of the Sunnis, but accumulated attacks against them."

The daily toll was again evident Sunday, as hundreds of thousands of Shiite pilgrims made their way by foot to the sacred city of Karbala, south of Baghdad, to mark Monday the death of Hussein, the grandson of the prophet Muhammad.

Pilgrims have been subject to drive-by shootings and bombings by Sunni Arab extremists that have killed four. A mortar landed near the shrine of Imam Hussein but caused no harm. An extra 700 American troops were deployed from Kuwait, to boost security during the religious event.

In Baghdad four bodies killed execution-style were found Sunday; 22 were found, by one count, the day before.

Whatever the result of the political wrangling, many Iraqis say it will not be enough to correct three years of US mistakes - from disbanding Saddam Hussein's 400,000-strong army with the stroke of a pen, to a vigorous de-Baathification plan that swept capable bureaucrats from government - that helped fuel insurgency. Out of touch politicians

But there is a further problem, analysts say, that no amount of US influence can help: The fact that insecurity is so pervasive, that Iraqi leaders and the government meet inside the bubble of the Green Zone, among a labyrinth of 12-foot-high concrete blast walls woven together with coils of concertina wire that keep them safe, as well as isolated.

"The politicians are out of touch with the street, so it is like a group of blind people negotiating," says Rikabi. "They have nothing to do with the Republic of Iraq ... they do not feel a power cut for a second, while outside, [electricity] is off for 22 hours a day. You can't make the right decision, when the prime minister still has his family in London."

Relying on such politicians also risks the endgame for the US, which wants a unity government to take control - and control Iraqi security forces - so American forces can begin withdrawing.

"I can see their dilemma," says Nadhmi. "[President George] Bush is triumphant about democracy in Iraq, but if he tries to intervene and put in a prime minister of his own, it would be a contradiction." Seventy-five daily insurgent attacks

Still, options are limited for the US - both military and political - which last week accused Iran of "meddling" in Iraqi affairs, and claimed that Iran had helped insurgents improve their explosive techniques.

The US military's "kinetic or muscular approach has failed to produce sustained success," says a report last month from the International Institute of Strategic Studies (IISS), noting that insurgent attacks at a tempo of 75 per day against coalition forces show "no signs of diminishing."

It notes that several key non-Al Qaeda insurgent groups secretly agreed to a 21-point "principles for dialogue" with US forces last December. Such talks have not taken place in part, the IISS says, because "the very logic of elections, bringing to power an indigenous government with a mandate, has directly reduced US influence over Iraqi politics."

This has been clear for months to many in Iraq, who look back with nostalgia on Saddam Hussein, in the way that older Russians often crave the order once instilled upon the Soviet Union by Josef Stalin.

"People were executed in Saddam's days, but it is the same today," says Rikabi, of Radio Dijla. "Then it was behind high walls, now it is by this or that militia.

"Before, people respected the traffic police, there was an organization, a state; today we have the smell, the shadow of a government," says Rikabi. "Before, people would go to restaurants until 2 a.m.; today their lives are full of fear.

"Then, we had one Saddam Hussein," concludes Rikabi. "Today, we have many Saddam Husseins."

Bush Vows Strategy Will Win In Iraq (WT)

By From combined dispatches

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018645

President Bush yesterday marked the third anniversary of the beginning of the Iraq war, saying the U.S. strategy will "lead to victory."

"A victory in Iraq will make this country more secure and will help lay the foundation of peace for generations to come," Mr. Bush said in a brief statement on the South Lawn of the White House after returning from Camp David.

Other administration officials echoed the president's call for resolve in the face of enemy attacks that have killed more than 2,300 U.S. troops in Iraq.

"Now is the time for resolve, not retreat," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld wrote in a column for The Washington Post. "Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis."

While protesters around the world also observed the anniversary of Operation Iraqi Freedom -- with anti-American rallies that drew smaller crowds than similar demonstrations in the past -- the president paid tribute to the nation's armed forces.

"Today ... marks the third anniversary of the beginning of the liberation of Iraq, and it's a time to reflect," Mr. Bush told reporters. "And this morning, our reflections were upon the sacrifices of the men and women who wear our uniform.

"Ours is an amazing nation where thousands have volunteered to serve our country. ... Many volunteered after 9/11, knowing full well that their time in the military could put them in harm's way. So, on this third anniversary [of] the beginning of the liberation of Iraq, I think all Americans should offer thanks to the men and women who wear the uniform, and their families who support them," he said.

The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, said Iraq has made "huge progress" toward democracy, holding three nationwide elections and adopting a constitution.

"If you think about it, three years ago Saddam Hussein was still in charge of the country. Now he's on trial, and will be held accountable by the Iraqi people," Gen. Casey said on "Fox News Sunday."

The Army general said progress has also "been made with the Iraqi security forces, barely from almost nothing to the point now where two of the Iraqi divisions, 13 of the Iraq brigades and almost 60 of the Iraqi military and special police battalions are actually in the lead conducting counterinsurgency operations across Iraq."

Gen. Casey acknowledged the continuing efforts of foreign terrorists to foment civil war in Iraq.

"So, is there violence in Iraq? Sure. Is there terrorism in Iraq? Sure," he said. "And the terrorists and insurgents are doing everything in their power to convince both the Iraqis and our public that this endeavor can't succeed. But I think the Iraqis are right now ... on the threshold of a very significant step toward their future."

Turnout for anti-war rallies was lower than on the first and second anniversaries of the war. Only about 200 demonstrators showed up yesterday for a march down New York's Fifth Avenue, with signs including, "We the People Need to do More to End the War."

Attendance was also down at anti-war events in other countries, including Japan, where about 800 showed up in Tokyo for a march to the U.S. Embassy.

"The Iraq war was President Bush's big mistake and the whole world is against him," Tokyo organizer Ayako Nishimura told the crowd.

Similar sentiments were expressed yesterday by Democrats.

"The American people can see the truth for themselves every day," said Democratic National Committee communications director Karen Finney. "We don't need more of the same permanent commitment to a failed strategy from this administration. The American people know that we need to change course in Iraq, so 2006 can be a year of transition in which the Iraqis truly take control of their country."

On NBC's "Meet the Press," Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and war critic, dismissed the administration's reports of progress in Iraq and compared the situation to the war in Vietnam 40 years ago.

"When the whole world is against you, when our international reputation has been diminished so substantially, when all the countries in the region say, 'We'd be better off without us being in Iraq,' when the people themselves in Iraq say -- and American people say it, I mean who is right?" Mr. Murtha said.

Quiet Disapproval In US Marks War's Anniversary (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, March 20, 2006

On the third anniversary of the US-led invasion of Iraq, the US capital's historic protest venues were surprisingly serene on Sunday. Outside the White House tourists had their pictures taken next to a cardboard cut-out of the president, families enjoyed the sun on the Mall and several bored-looking policemen stood guard outside the vice-president's DC home. Not a placard in sight or a chant to be heard.

DOJ_NMG_0018646

Americans may have turned decisively against the war in Iraq in recent months, but their change of heart has been largely expressed quietly to pollsters rather than in loud public protests. The micro-protests that have taken place around the third anniversary – including a few hundred who gathered to hear anti-war speeches in the affluent DC neighbourhood of Dupont Circle – pale by comparison with the monster demonstrations against the Vietnam war.

A clue to this curiously low-key response may be found in the bustling shopping centres. Despite the mounting cost of the war in Iraq, the economic consequences have remained relatively contained. There have been no signs of a decline in consumer confidence and no uptick in inflation.

Americans have not even been asked to stump up the cash for the war effort – at least not yet – with the administration and Congress opting for higher borrowing rather than higher taxes.

As of Friday military casualties had mounted to 2,313 killed and 17,000 wounded. This is enough to make many Americans question the conflict, but the toll still falls far short of the 58,000 Americans who died in Vietnam.

But the simmering concerns over the conflict have been taking a heavy toll on support for George W. Bush, dragging the president's approval ratings close to the levels of support for President Richard Nixon in the wake of Watergate.

A poll for Newsweek magazine at the end of last week showed that just 29 per cent of Americans approve of the president's handling of the war, down from 69 per cent in the months after the conflict began in March 2003. Almost 60 per cent of Americans now feel less confident that the war will come to a successful conclusion, with fears mounting that the country will slide into civil war.

The administration has launched a new campaign to rebuild support for the war. In a television interview on Sunday, Dick Cheney, the vice-president, said there was "overwhelming evidence" that the US was making progress in Iraq. Set-piece speeches are planned this week by both the president and vice-president.

Yet despite the reassurances, recent pronouncements of the president have had an uncharacteristically dour tone. In a speech over the weekend, Mr Bush acknowledged that there had been "horrific images from Iraq" and that a "tense situation" prevailed in parts of the country. He urged Americans to brace for "more fighting and sacrifice." That is not what was being predicted three years ago.

Allawi Says Iraq Is In Civil War; U.S. Forces Clash With Gunmen (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Iraq is in the middle of a civil war, Iraq's former prime minister, Ayad Allawi, said in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp. aired on Sunday.

Mr. Allawi, who heads the Iraqi National List, a secular alliance of Shiite and Sunni politicians, said there was no other way to describe the increasing violence across the country.

"It is unfortunate that we are in civil war. We are losing each day as an average 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more," Mr. Allawi told the BBC. "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

Mr. Allawi said playing down the current problems in Iraq would be a mistake, telling the BBC he had warned against a power vacuum and the prevalence of militias. Mr. Allawi said the formation of a national unity government was what Iraq needed to achieve peace.

Iraq's newly elected parliament was seated Thursday, and representatives of its Shiite Arab, Sunni Arab and Kurdish blocs have been meeting in an effort to overcome deep divisions and agree on the makeup of a new government. The minority factions want to block broad Shiite control of powerful ministries.

British Defense Secretary John Reid, who is visiting Iraq, expressed concern about "a greater degree of sectarian violence," but said he didn't believe civil war was imminent. "The most urgent need at the moment is the speedy formation of a government of national unity," he said.

Meanwhile, on the eve of the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion, American troops clashed with gunmen north and west of Baghdad Sunday and insurgents lobbed a mortar round into Karbala, the holy city south of Baghdad where a million Shiite pilgrims assembled for a major religious commemoration.

U.S. Troops to Remain in Iraq for Years

Separately, the top commander of U.S. forces in Iraq said Sunday that U.S. troops likely will remain there for the next few years though the numbers will be scaled back as Iraqi forces gain strength. "I see a couple of more years of this with a gradually reducing coalition presence here in Iraq .. as the Iraqi security forces step forward," Gen. George W. Casey said.

Mr. Casey said he did not think at the time the war began that the insurgency in Iraq would have been as robust as it has been. Appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," he said didn't believe Iraq was in danger of falling into civil war, although he said it remained a possibility because of increased sectarian tensions and violence. "The situation here is fragile," he said. "I suspect it will remain fragile here until we get a new government, a government of national unity, formed."

DOJ_NMG_0018647

Continuing Violence

Iraqi police said eight civilians, including a child, were killed in clashes between U.S. troops and gunmen in Duluiyah, 45 miles (75 kilometers) north of Baghdad. The town is located in Iraq's Sunni heartland where the Iraqi army and U.S. forces opened an airborne campaign last week to hunt down insurgents.

The Americans said it was the largest "air assault" operation since the 2003 invasion.

During operations in Duluiyah, police said, U.S. troops arrested Col. Farouq Khalil, an Iraqi interior ministry official, after raiding his house. The American military didn't immediately respond to a request for comment. Earlier it said scores of suspected insurgents had been detained.

Elsewhere, two civilians were killed and 10 wounded when gunmen attacked U.S. troops stationed at the governor's office in Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad.

In the capital, police found the bullet-riddled bodies of three men bound hand and foot and dumped in a sewage treatment plant in the southeast neighborhood of Rustamiyah. The victims appeared to be the latest in the wave of revenge killings after the bombing Feb. 22 of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

The mortar round fired at the holy city of Karbala landed in a parking lot a half mile from the shrine that is the destination of the pilgrims marking the 40th and final day of mourning for Imam Hussein, the Prophet Muhammad's grandson. No one was hurt.

In violence against police, gunmen killed four guards at archaeological sites in the northern city of Mosul. A fifth policeman and a bystander were wounded. A roadside bomb exploded on a police patrol in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, killing one officer and injuring 10 others, the Iraqi military said.

A Baghdad policeman driving on a rural road in Latifiyah, about 20 miles south of the Iraqi capital, was also killed by gunmen, police said. Four men riding in the car were wounded in the attack.

Near the southern city of Basra, two officials of the Iraqi Islamic Party were gunned down by four assassins. On Saturday, a dozen bodies were found in Baghdad in the shadowy war of Shiite-Sunni reprisals.

In a U.S. radio address, President Bush said the violence in Iraq "has created a new sense of urgency" among Iraqi leaders to form such a government.

Those leaders -- representatives of the squabbling Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish blocs in Iraq's new parliament -- were taking a break from negotiations to observe Monday's Shiite holiday and Tuesday's Kurdish New Year. They are deadlocked over how to apportion the most powerful jobs in the new government, as minority factions seek to limit domination by Iraq's Shiite majority.

The U.S. military reported that two 101st Airborne soldiers were killed Thursday by indirect fire, usually meaning mortars, at the Speicher operating base, north of where the joint Iraqi-U.S. operation was in progress.

At least 2,314 American military personnel have died since the Iraq war began in the early hours of March 20, 2003.

Deaths Fall For U.S., Rise For Iraqis (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. military deaths during the past month have dropped to an average of about one a day, approaching the lowest level since the insurgency began two years ago, according to a USA TODAY analysis of U.S. military data.

The decline in U.S. deaths comes as Iraqi casualties are the highest since the U.S. military began tracking them in 2004.

In the past month, nearly five times as many Iraqi forces and civilians were killed as troops in the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, U.S. military data show.

The shift from spring 2004, when U.S. and Iraqi casualty rates were comparable, reflects an insurgency that increasingly targets Iraqis and the growing presence of Iraqi forces on the front lines.

“The Iraqi army is far bigger in number, far higher in training capability and far more willing to go where the fight is and take casualties,” British Defense Secretary John Reid said in an interview.

On the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion, however, a wave of violence against Iraqis is prompting talk of civil war. In an interview Sunday with the British Broadcasting Corp., former interim prime minister Ayad Allawi said, “We are losing each day as an average 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more. If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is.”

Vice President Cheney disagreed. Speaking on CBS' Face the Nation, Cheney said, “What we've seen is a serious effort by (insurgents) to foment a civil war. But I don't think they've been successful.”

According to U.S. military data, about 15 Americans and 73 Iraqis are killed or injured each day. A USA TODAY analysis of U.S. military data shows the number of U.S. forces killed during the war has declined steadily since November.

DOJ_NMG_0018648

RAND Corp. military analyst Nora Bensahel says the increasing level of Iraqi casualties "means Iraqi security forces are in positions of responsibility." The United States, which has 132,000 troops in Iraq, is "doing fewer patrols on its own and more in support of Iraqi operations," reducing U.S. casualties.

The U.S. military also has cut the number of American deaths by thwarting the homemade bombs that are the insurgency's prime weapon. Soldiers and Marines now find and neutralize more than 40% of the bombs, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said in an interview. That compares with 30% in September. Lynch said that 41 insurgent bombmakers have been killed or captured. Insurgents "are losing skilled bombmakers," he said.

Meanwhile, Iraq's 240,600 security forces increasingly are fighting insurgents directly, the Pentagon says. Sixty-three Iraqi units are operating independently or in a lead role with coalition support, up from 37 in September. Iraqi Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari says military recruiting remains strong, despite the rising casualties.

Clashes, Accusations Mark Anniversary Of Iraq Conflict (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 19 -- Clashes between U.S. forces and suspected insurgents, and allegations of American troops killing noncombatants, marked the third anniversary Sunday of the start of the American-led invasion of Iraq.

In Duluiyah, a stretch of farms along the Tigris River about 45 miles north of Baghdad, soldiers of the 4th Infantry Division's 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team battled insurgents, the U.S. military said in a statement.

The statement said American troops were responding to insurgents who opened fire with small arms and rocket-propelled grenades in the area, predominated by Sunnis. Seven of the attackers were killed, and two U.S. soldiers were wounded.

A top police official, as well as a resident who claimed he saw the fighting, said U.S. troops also shot and killed a family of three during house-to-house searches after the firefight.

"I saw corpses on the ground that I believe were of armed men who had clashed with the American forces" and with the Iraqi army, said Ahmad Hashem, the resident. "Then the American soldiers appeared and started searching homes. They raided a house which was close to my home and killed a man named Ahmad Khalaf Hussein, his wife and his 10-year-old son."

Western news agencies also reported civilian deaths in the fighting. The U.S. military, in the statement from spokesmen in Baghdad, said it knew of no civilian deaths in the engagement.

U.S. military officials said the fight was not connected to another ongoing offensive, Operation Swarmer, in which U.S. and Iraqi forces have been searching for Sunni insurgents and weapons caches in arid countryside between the Tigris River and Samarra, about 65 miles north of Baghdad.

American officials announced last week that they had ordered a further investigation into a deadly incident four months ago in the town of Haditha in far western Iraq.

At least 15 civilians were killed in the incident on Nov. 19. The military's original statement on Nov. 20 said that the civilians and a U.S. Marine were killed by a roadside bomb. Time magazine reported Sunday that U.S. officials are now investigating whether Marines killed the 15 civilians, including seven women and three children, after the insurgent bombing that killed their fellow Marine.

The newsweekly said it had given military officials accounts from a doctor and survivors that said the 15 unarmed townspeople were killed as they hid in their houses, or tried to run to safety, as Marines searched the area after the bombing. Time said it had also given the military a videotape showing some of the bodies. It quoted unidentified military officials as saying that Marines had believed U.S. troops were coming under fire from the houses, and that the initial investigation indicated that Marines, rather than a bomb, had killed the 15.

"We take these allegations very seriously, and I believe the fact that two additional investigations are ongoing concerning this incident clearly demonstrate that," a U.S. military spokeswoman in Baghdad, Lt. Col. Michelle Martin-Hing, said in an e-mail on Sunday. Martin-Hing said the shootings were "the first in a series of engagements that day that began when the Marine patrol was ambushed in a residential neighborhood with an IED followed immediately by small arms fire from multiple directions. Over the course of five hours, the Marines actively tracked insurgents moving through the town among civilian homes, other structures and palm groves, on foot and by vehicle. The investigation will examine whether any rules of engagement were violated."

A roadside bomb exploded near a police patrol Sunday morning in Baqubah, killing a policeman and injuring 10 other people, according to Lt. Col. Fakhri Tamimi Hassman, an official with the Diyala provincial police. Baqubah is about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad.

In Baghdad, the bodies of three men who had been bound hand and foot and shot were found dumped in the west of the city, and another man was shot dead Sunday as he left a Shiite mosque, news agencies reported. The number of execution-style killings in Baghdad -- with the victims shot, often after being tortured or bound -- has climbed to an average of about 30 a day since mid-2005, according to Baghdad morgue figures. Many of the killings have allegedly been carried out by militias or police forces allied with Iraq's governing Shiite parties.

DOJ_NMG_0018649

Iraq's former prime minister, Ayad Allawi, told the BBC that the increasing attacks across his country can only be described as a civil war.

Sunni, Shiite, Kurdish and secular political leaders said Sunday that they had agreed on the creation of a National Security Council that would represent all of Iraq's major political factions. The move appeared designed to counter Shiite dominance of Interior and Defense ministry forces.

"The agreements that we have declared today prove that civil war is not a possibility, and the Iraqi people could not allow for a civil war to take place," President Jalal Talabani told reporters.

The war in Iraq began on March 19, 2003, Washington time -- early morning March 20 in Baghdad -- when President Bush authorized an early strike by U.S. fighter-bombers and offshore Tomahawk cruise missiles on a Baghdad bunker where Saddam Hussein was reported to be sleeping. The Defense Department confirmed 2,313 U.S. military deaths as of Friday, with unofficial totals indicating 207 other coalition military deaths.

Tens of thousands of Iraqi civilians have died in the war, from U.S. and Iraqi military actions, insurgent attacks and, increasingly, raids attributed to government-allied Shiite Muslim squads that allegedly operate both inside and outside Iraq's new, Shiite-dominated security forces.

Top Iraqi Leaders Agree To Form A Policy Council (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 19 — Iraqi officials announced Sunday that they had agreed to form a council of the country's top politicians to make policy on security and economic issues in the new government. The council, which will include the prime minister and president, is an attempt to include all the country's major factions in decision making at a time of rising sectarian tensions.

The Iraqi Constitution approved by voters last fall does not have language supporting the creation of such a council. The 19-member body will essentially concentrate power in the hands of the country's political party leaders, and supersede the cabinet and Parliament in making broad decisions.

The move is a step forward in the snail-paced negotiations over the formation of a full, four-year government. Debate over creating the so-called national security council, and what powers it would wield, had contributed to the deadlock in the talks.

The main Shiite political bloc, which is expected to hold the most executive power in the new government, had opposed formation of the council, while the Kurds, Sunni Arabs, secular politicians and the Americans had pushed for it.

Many Shiite leaders viewed the idea of the council, first proposed by Massoud Barzani, the president of Iraqi Kurdistan, as an attempt to hamstring the prime minister, expected to be a Shiite, and check the power of the main Shiite bloc, known as the United Iraqi Alliance.

But on Sunday, after five hours of negotiations at President Jalal Talabani's guest villa here, the Shiites agreed to the council's formation. Because of the way the council will be set up, the Shiites, who constitute the largest political bloc in Parliament, will have an effective veto over council decisions.

Furthermore, the prime minister or president will be able to override any decisions they disagree with if the decisions conflict with the executives' constitutional authority, Iraqi officials said.

Otherwise, the council's actions will be considered binding.

"It's a good thing," said Adnan Pachachi, the temporary speaker of Parliament and a secular politician. "It's a safety valve in a way. Decisions will be taken in which all major political parties will be part of. No one will accuse the prime minister of making decisions on his own."

The council is expected to make policy on security issues, like how to build up and deploy the Iraqi Army and the police, how to disarm the country's many militias and what to do about insurgent territories like Anbar Province in western Iraq, Iraqi officials said. The council will also address economic matters, including oil revenue and the budget.

Any decisions that require legislation will be put before Parliament, Mr. Pachachi said. But the Parliament will probably support any decisions made by the council because all the leaders of the major parliamentary blocs will sit on the council, he added.

The council's decisions require a two-thirds vote of its 19 members. The president, prime minister, speaker of Parliament and the leader of any autonomous region (only Iraqi Kurdistan, for now) get seats on the council. The rest will be given to other party leaders. Over all, the seats will be distributed in proportion to the percentage of Parliament controlled by each major bloc.

DOJ_NMG_0018650

According to that system, the main Shiite religious bloc will get nine seats, the Kurds four, the main Sunni Arab religious bloc three, the secular bloc two and a smaller Sunni Arab bloc one, Mr. Pachachi said. The two-thirds vote requirement effectively gives the Shiite members final say over any decision, as long as they remain united.

The council will operate parallel to the cabinet but will have greater responsibility for broad policy decisions. The cabinet will run the day-to-day affairs of the government ministries. Part of the motivation for creating the council is a desire to check the power of the ministers, especially those in charge of security.

Control of the Interior and Defense Ministries has been one of the most hotly debated issues in the talks to form a government. Each political bloc suspects the others of sectarian motives in trying to control the armed forces. With heightened sectarian tensions and talk of impending civil war on the rise, whoever controls the army and the police would have a guaranteed arms supply. Besides the prime minister and president, who have yet to be chosen, the politicians expected to sit on the national security council include Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Shiite bloc; Tarik al-Hashimi, leader of the main Sunni Arab bloc; Saleh al-Mutlak, leader of the smaller Sunni Arab bloc; Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister and a secularist; and Mr. Barzani, the president of Iraqi Kurdistan.

"It's true that there's no explicit mention of it in the Constitution," Mr. Hashimi said at a news conference at Mr. Talabani's villa. "We think that the salvation of Iraq for the time being lies in showing a lot of flexibility in establishing new political bodies that include all the components of the Iraqi people."

The political leaders must now tackle other deeply contentious issues in the talks to form a government. At the top of the list is the Shiite nomination of Ibrahim al-Jaafari, the current prime minister, to retain that post. The other blocs oppose Mr. Jaafari's nomination, and have demanded that the Shiites present a new candidate. Mr. Jaafari has come under sharp criticism for failing to quell the violence and for the huge shortcomings in postwar reconstruction.

The political jockeying took place as Mr. Allawi, the former prime minister, told the BBC News on Sunday that the country was already mired in civil war. "It is unfortunate that we are in civil war," he said. "We are losing each day, as an average, 50 to 60 people throughout the country, if not more. If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

At least 15 bodies, all of them shot, were found across Baghdad on Sunday, police and hospital officials said. More than 200 bodies have been discovered in nearly two weeks, virtually all believed to be victims of sectarian violence.

A homemade bomb killed a police commando in Baghdad on Sunday. In Kirkuk, a cluster bomb left from the American invasion of 2003 exploded, killing a shepherd and a 6-year-old boy, said Lt. Col. Yadgar Abdullah of the Kirkuk police department.

The police found two Iraqi soldiers shot dead in Hawija, west of Kirkuk. Officials in Basra said two employees of the South Oil Company were shot to death on Saturday night. Both were members of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a conservative Sunni Arab group, and had been handcuffed.

Iraq's Factions Agree To Form Security Council (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraqi officials agreed Sunday to set up a council that would give each of the country's main political factions a voice in making security and economic policies for a new government.

The accord, announced after nearly a week of negotiations, was aimed at deflating rising sectarian tensions and represented the first breakthrough in the U.S.-guided effort to form a unity government after parliamentary elections Dec. 15.

President Bush applauded the deal, which came as the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion focused public attention on the troubled effort to stabilize Iraq and start bringing home 133,000 troops after toppling President Saddam Hussein.

"I encourage the Iraqi leaders to continue to work hard to get this government up and running," Bush told reporters in Washington.

The 19-member national security council would include the Iraqi president and prime minister and hold more power than the Cabinet, which is yet to be formed. It is expected to set policies governing the army and police, the counter-insurgency campaign in Sunni Muslim Arab areas and the disarmament of Shiite Muslim militias accused of sectarian killings.

The council also will oversee economic matters such as the budget and the allocation of oil revenues.

As outlined by participants in the talks, the council would represent political parties in rough proportion to their electoral strength — with nine members from the Shiite alliance that fell just short of a majority in the 275-member parliament, four each from the Kurdish and Sunni blocs, and two from secular parties.

Leaders of those factions took the unusual step of agreeing to form the council before what was expected to be a more contentious discussion of who would hold the positions of president and prime minister and head the Cabinet ministries controlling the army and police.

DOJ_NMG_0018651

A council with powers beyond those of the Cabinet is not mentioned in the constitution ratified by voters in October. It was proposed in January by Kurdish leaders to check the power of the Shiite alliance, which is entitled to nominate the prime minister and is expected to dominate the Cabinet.

Shiite negotiators had resisted the idea of a broad policymaking council as unconstitutional. But other political blocs contended that it would help stem Iraq's sectarian bloodshed and avert all-out civil war; they won quiet backing for the proposal from U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who has been deeply involved in the talks from the start.

"We think that the salvation of Iraq at this time lies in showing a lot of flexibility in establishing new political bodies that include all the components of the Iraqi people," Tariq Hashemi, leader of the main Sunni party, said Sunday at a news conference.

At least 34 Iraqis were killed or found dead Sunday in the continuing violence, which has soared since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in the predominantly Sunni city of Samarra. Worried that the power vacuum was fostering the violence, interim President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, summoned political leaders last week to try to speed up efforts to form a government. Iraq has been run for nearly 11 months by an interim leadership formed from the transitional assembly elected in January 2005.

After the December election left no party with a parliamentary majority, all factions agreed, under U.S. pressure, to work toward a broadly representative government — one that might undermine the insurgency by including Sunnis in the Cabinet.

But the effort got bogged down a month ago after the Shiite bloc nominated interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, a religious conservative with close ties to Iran's theocratic leadership, to continue in his post for a full four-year term.

The other political groups, supported by the more secular Talabani, pledged to block Jafari's ratification, which requires a two-thirds vote in the parliament. The rival blocs have demanded that the Shiites offer a less divisive candidate, but the Shiites have balked.

In an effort to break the deadlock, Talabani last week shifted the focus of the talks to the proposed council.

Shiite negotiators succeeded in limiting some of the council's proposed authority. Its policies will require approval by 13 members, allowing the nine Shiite members a chance to thwart any decision if they stick together.

Hussein Shahristani, a Shiite negotiator, said leaders agreed that the council's decisions on the Cabinet would be binding "as long as they do not contradict the constitutional prerogatives of the president or prime minister." That formula, other politicians countered, might lead to conflicts.

"In reality, the authority of the council is uncertain," said Dhafir Ani, a spokesman for the main Sunni bloc. "It hasn't been settled."

Iraqi politicians said the formation of the council in effect added ground rules to replace the ad hoc manner in which decisions had been made in the last year, when party leaders brokered deals behind closed doors and presented them to the parliament. This time, Sunni parties would be better represented.

As political leaders wrangled in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, violence continued outside. Iraqi sources and Western news agencies reported the discovery Sunday of 17 bodies of men tortured or shot to death in Baghdad alone, 11 of them flushed by city sewers into the tanks of water-purification plants.

Police said three civilians were killed in crossfire when insurgents attacked U.S. and Iraqi forces guarding the provincial governor's office in Ramadi, a Sunni city 60 miles west of Baghdad.

Other deaths included civilians and Iraqi policemen killed in Mosul, Baqubah, Basra and Baghdad.

In Duluiya, a Sunni town about 55 miles north of the capital, Iraqi officials said American troops killed a teacher, his wife, their 13-year-old son and four other people during clashes set off before dawn by a rocket-propelled grenade ambush on their armored patrol.

Maj. Tim Keefe, a U.S. military spokesman, contested the account from police officials and the deputy governor, saying the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team of the 4th Infantry Division had killed seven "attacking terrorists."

Keefe said two U.S. soldiers were wounded in the clash, which occurred south of Samarra. More than 1,500 airborne U.S. and Iraqi troops staged a fourth day of raids in suspected insurgent bases north of Samarra, but the patrol in Duluiya was not part of that operation, Keefe said.

Police officials said the teacher and his family were shot when American soldiers raided their home after the ambush. An 18-year-old boy from another family was killed after he left home "to see what was going on," according to a Reuters reporter in the town.

Deputy Gov. Abdullah Hussein said in a telephone interview from Tikrit that two of the seven killed were insurgents.

After the clash, Reuters reported, American troops handed out leaflets saying they did not regard Sunnis as their enemy and wanted to withdraw from Iraq as soon as the country's newly formed government and army were able to stand on their own.

DOJ_NMG_0018652

My Vision For Iraq (WP)

By Ibrahim Al-jafari

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The elections last December in Iraq were a monumental stage in my country's history and a testament to the courage of its people, who refuse to bow to any dictator or terrorist. As the wheels of democracy have begun to turn in Iraq, the people's wishes are becoming clearer and their representatives identified. To this end I am humbled and honored to be chosen by my coalition to lead Iraq's first democratically elected full-term government.

My government's first challenge will be to stifle the terrorism that has plagued our country and defiled the name of Islam. While we are making good progress in expanding and developing Iraq's security services, the war against the terrorists cannot be won by military means alone. It is paramount that all Iraqis work together to build a democratic, free Iraq.

Since I took office, I have sought to bring every community into the political process. I refused to marginalize the Sunni Arabs after the January 2005 election boycott, ensuring they made up over a fifth of the cabinet.

Sidelining Moqtada al-Sadr's group from the Governing Council was a mistake. Had it been integrated into the political process back then, long before the formation of the Mahdi Army, events would have turned out differently in the south. I corrected this policy and brought Sadr's group into the democratic process. This inclusive approach resulted in the huge nationwide turnout for the December elections and a parliament that truly reflects Iraq.

During my term as elected prime minister, Sadr's group has not attacked any coalition troops. Furthermore, Sadr and several Sunni leaders are now catalysts for maintaining the peace in Iraq, calling on their followers not to retaliate against terrorist provocations, which aim to ignite civil war.

Unfortunately, we have suffered setbacks during the past year. The most troubling was the discovery of prisoner torture in an Interior Ministry jail in November. As soon as I learned of these despicable acts I formed an investigative committee made up solely of Sunni leaders, and I await its findings.

The long-term solution to this problem will be multifaceted. We must ensure that all security forces receive proper training and that there is a chain of command that holds commanders and officers responsible for such abuses. In addition, the various militias that fought Saddam Hussein's regime honorably must be fully integrated into Iraq's security forces without concentrating any particular group into any one division. Finally, we need to strengthen the country's nascent judiciary, which suffered years of coercion and corruption under the former regime, to guarantee its independence and impartiality.

The other major challenge my government will face is reviving Iraq's economy. Iraq has been drowned by decades of Baathist socialist policies that have made millions reliant on government handouts. We must encourage entrepreneurship and enterprise, while establishing adequate safety nets for the less privileged.

Economic rehabilitation also requires some tough and unpopular changes, such as the reduction in government subsidies for gasoline that my administration began a few months ago. Such steps can be made only by a popular government that has the trust of the people. My administration has the political capital to be able to bring about these necessary changes.

Ultimately, I will work to secure the reality of a democratic, liberal, peaceful Iraq -- a beacon for freedom in the Middle East. This is not merely a wish but an article of faith. Having lived in London for the majority of my years in exile, I appreciate the importance of liberty for both guaranteeing democracy and ensuring human development.

I am hopeful that with Iraqi determination, and the support of the multinational force, we can defeat the terrorists and make Iraq the first democratic Arab country. I believe in working toward a peaceful, stable and nuclear-free Middle East, where Iraq is not the rogue state that it was under the previous regime.

The road ahead will be tough, but the Iraqi people have demonstrated their bravery, determination and resolve. The world should not falter at such a crucial stage in history.

The writer is prime minister of Iraq.

Justice: Talking Trash (NSWK)

By Rod Nordland

Newsweek, March 20, 2006

Saddam Hussein had a point when he described his trial as a "farce." In five months of proceedings, the Iraqi High Tribunal has managed only 17 actual court days amid tight security, hunger strikes and boycotts by lawyers. Assassins have killed a judge, a court employee and two defense attorneys. At one point Saddam's codefendant, Barzan al-Tikriti, the once feared head of the Mukhabarat intelligence service, came to court in his underwear. The ex-dictator himself complained of having guards watch him take his pants down to use the toilet during recesses. Saddam's appearance last week brought a new low, with the prosecutor and defense lawyers screaming at one another, and the chief judge repeatedly hitting a red button that cut off the mike as Saddam declared himself not only president, but "commander in chief of the mujahed [holy warrior] armed forces." Finally the judge closed the hearing, threw out the press and shut down TV transmissions—all as Saddam ranted on.

DOJ_NMG_0018653

Saddam's diatribes were better informed than they had been in previous court appearances. Held in solitary confinement since his capture in December 2003, Saddam has had little contact with the world beyond his cell. His American jailers strictly purged his reading material of any news about events in Iraq. But since the trial began, Saddam has been allowed to see attorneys, and on Wednesday he made the most of the information he was getting, praising the resistance while calling on Iraqis to avoid civil war. "Let the people unite and resist the invaders and their backers," he said at one point. "Don't fight among yourselves." The chief judge hit the red button and silenced the audio feed, but Saddam's speech was still audible in the courtroom. "The invaders and their supporters know they're on their certain way to being swept out, like the trash they are."

Lost in the chaos was the case itself. Saddam and his seven codefendants are on trial for the executions of 148 Shiites in the village of Dujail, in reprisal for a failed 1982 assassination attempt on Saddam as his motorcade passed by the village. Of all the accusations against Saddam, it's a relatively small one—but one where the alleged chain of responsibility is well documented. By his own statements, Saddam has tied himself to the reprisals, saying in court on March 1 that he had personally ordered the Dujail villagers tried—and their orchards razed—for an ambush that involved only 20 attackers. "Where is the crime?" Saddam declared. "[Since when] is trying a suspect accused of shooting at a head of state a crime?"

The Saddam-era trial, before the Revolutionary Court in 1984, is the heart of the prosecution's case, which maintains it was a sham. Forty-six of the defendants were "liquidated under torture" —before they were recorded as appearing at the trial. Eleven of the accused were minors, one as young as 12. A few years after the trial, Saddam's officials discovered that the kids had never been executed because of their ages. "We recommend executing them in a secret manner," reads one document. There's an arrow from that sentence to the margin, where Saddam allegedly wrote "Yes. It is preferable that they are buried by the Mukhabarat."

Saddam could well be executed soon after the Dujail case ends, without waiting for other cases against him to proceed. The defense still has a chance to make its arguments, which could extend well into the summer. But once a verdict is rendered by the five-judge panel, "if any defendant were sentenced to any penalty, no matter whether it were the death penalty or imprisonment, that penalty should be executed within 30 days of the court's verdict," chief prosecutor Jafar al Musawi told NEWSWEEK. Although there would be an automatic appeal of a death sentence to the court of cassation, that court has no backlog of cases, Musawi says, and an appeal "would only take days."

Many more cases involving Saddam could follow—if he's still alive. Already, charges are being prepared in the poison-gas attacks against Kurds in Halabja, the wider Anfal massacres and the slaughter of Shiites after an abortive uprising in 1991. But if Saddam doesn't hang for Dujail, the other 12 cases being prepared against him could, at the present rate, take more than a decade to try. Even many Iraqis unhappy with the American occupation wouldn't like that. "I think most Iraqis share the opinion that I have," said Ahmed Taha, 42, a Sunni primary-school teacher from Babylon. "Let's get done with it and execute him."

At one point in last week's trial, after Saddam quieted down and apparently agreed to address the Dujail charges, the judge pressed the green button to switch on his audio. But the defendant soon rounded on him: "If it were not for the Americans, neither you nor your fathers would have been able to bring me here." It was then that the judge declared the trial closed to the public. Shia politician Ali al Dabbagh was in the visitors' gallery. "Saddam was trying to pass messages to the insurgents and encourage them to attack," he said. "The judge had to stop this." With months more to go, Saddam's only defense is to make a mockery of the entire proceeding. So far, he's succeeding.

Next Chapter As Iraq War Rages, Army Re-Examines Lessons Of Vietnam (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

The last time Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld visited Baghdad, back in December, the top U.S. military commander there gave him an unusual gift.

Gen. George Casey passed him a copy of "Learning to Eat Soup with a Knife: Counterinsurgency Lessons from Malaya and Vietnam," written by Lt. Col. John Nagl. Initially published in 2002, the book is brutal in its criticism of the Vietnam-era Army as an organization that failed to learn from its mistakes and tried vainly to fight guerrilla insurgents the same way it fought World War II.

In the book, Col. Nagl, who served a year in Iraq, contrasts the U.S. Army's failure with the British experience in Malaya in the 1950s. The difference: The British, who eventually prevailed, quickly saw the folly of using massive force to annihilate a shadowy communist enemy.

"The British Army was a learning institution, and the U.S. Army was not," Col. Nagl writes.

DOJ_NMG_0018654

Col. Nagl's book is one of a half dozen Vietnam histories -- most of them highly critical of the U.S. military in Vietnam -- that are changing the military's views on how to fight guerrilla wars. Two other books that have also become must-reading among senior Army officers are retired Col. Lewis Sorley's "A Better War," which chronicles the last years of the Vietnam War, and Col. H.R. McMaster's "Dereliction of Duty," which focuses on the early years.

The embrace of these Vietnam histories reflects an emerging consensus in the Army that in order to move forward in Iraq, it must better understand the mistakes of Vietnam.

In the past, it was commonly held in military circles that the Army failed in Vietnam because civilian leaders forced it to fight a limited war instead of the all-out assault it longed to wage. That belief helped shape the doctrine espoused in the 1980s by Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Colin Powell. They argued that the military should fight only wars in which it could apply quick, overwhelming force to destroy the enemy.

The newer analyses of Vietnam are now supplanting that theory -- and changing the way the Army fights. The argument that the military must exercise restraint is a central point of the Army's new counterinsurgency doctrine. The doctrine, which runs about 120 pages and is still in draft form, is a handbook on how to wage guerrilla wars.

It offers Army and Marine Corps officers advice on everything from strategy development to intelligence gathering. Col. Nagl is among the four primary authors of the doctrine. Conrad Crane, a historian at the U.S. Army War College, is overseeing the effort.

One of the doctrine's primary goals is to shatter the conventional wisdom that defined the post-Vietnam Army. "We are at a turning point in the Army's institutional history," Col. Nagl and his co-authors write in a forthcoming essay in "Military Review," an Army journal.

The doctrine's biggest emphasis is on the need to curb the military's use of firepower, which created thousands of refugees and horrific collateral damage in Vietnam. "The more force you use when battling insurgents, the less effective you are," the draft states.

The Army is also using its Vietnam experience to highlight the importance and difficulty of building local security forces that can carry on independently after U.S. forces go home. For most of the Vietnam War, the U.S. gave spotty attention to South Vietnamese forces. Without U.S. air support and artillery they quickly crumbled.

Drawing on its frustrating struggle to prop up a corrupt government in Saigon, the Army in its new blueprint counsels soldiers that anti-guerrilla operations must be focused on building a government that is seen as legitimate in the eyes of the locals. "Military actions conducted without analysis of their political effectiveness will be at best ineffective and at worst help the enemy," the draft doctrine states.

Within the Bush administration, there's broad support for the Army's new direction. It matches President Bush's own shift away from a pre-9/11 aversion to nation-building and guerrilla wars. The current national-security strategy seeks to spread freedom and democracy -- even if it means committing troops to guerrilla fights in places like Iraq and Afghanistan.

For most of the 1980s and 1990s the Army's understanding of what went wrong in Vietnam was dominated by retired Col. Harry Summers's history "On Strategy: A Critical Analysis of the Vietnam War." That account argued Viet Cong guerrillas were used by the communist regime to distract the U.S. from the real threat -- the conventional North Vietnamese Army. The U.S. didn't lose because it fought a guerrilla war badly, Col. Summers asserted, but rather because it was prohibited by the civilian leadership from launching a conventional attack on North Vietnam.

His book, commissioned by the Army and published in 1981, gave Army officers reason to ignore guerrilla warfare for the two decades that followed. It quickly became part of the curriculum at the Army's war colleges and remained on reading lists until a few years ago. "The timing was perfect," says George Herring, a Vietnam scholar at the University of Kentucky who also taught at the United States Military Academy at West Point. "Summers was selling a message a lot of top people in the army wanted to hear."

Army histories that challenged Col. Summers's narrative were rebuked. In 1986, Andrew Krepinevich, then an Army major, published "The Army and Vietnam," an alternative account of the Army's failings in the war. Instead of fighting a classic guerrilla war, the Army fought a large-scale conventional war and alienated potential allies in Vietnam, Mr. Krepinevich wrote. One four-star general blasted the book in a review as "a long rambling, one-sided discourse." It wasn't widely read.

By the 1990s Army officers interested in successful careers didn't study counterinsurgency. A few, however, were drawn to it. One of those officers was Col. Nagl, who graduated from West Point and went on to study international relations at Oxford University as a Rhodes Scholar. After the first Gulf War, where he served as a platoon leader, Col. Nagl went back to Oxford to get his doctorate.

The first Gulf War seemed to vindicate the Army's big-war approach. The Army had finally been allowed to fight the conventional, firepower-intensive war it wanted to mount in Vietnam. It prevailed quickly and with few casualties. "By God, we've kicked the Vietnam syndrome once and for all," the President George H.W. Bush gushed in 1991.

DOJ_NMG_0018655

To Col. Nagl, the Army's quick, low-casualty win wasn't necessarily a good news story. "The lesson of the Gulf War was: Don't fight the U.S. conventionally," Col. Nagl says. "The way to defeat the U.S. Army is to use guerrilla warfare and exhaust the will of the U.S. At least you have a chance to win."

Col. Nagl reread Mr. Krepinevich's account of the Army in Vietnam, which he says had a big influence on his doctoral thesis. "I stole from it shamelessly," he says today, although he fully credited the work in his own. He also immersed himself in the papers of Sir Gerald Templer, who led British counterinsurgency efforts in Malaya in the 1950s. "I wanted to figure out why the British Army was able to learn how to defeat an insurgency after starting out badly and why the American Army was not able to learn as well in Vietnam," Col. Nagl says.

He concluded that the Army did learn in Vietnam, but far too slowly. By 1969 the military had shifted away from large-scale search-and-destroy missions and was putting a far greater emphasis on building indigenous security forces, safeguarding villagers and developing the local economy. However, "at that point the American people had already lost their faith," he says.

Col. Nagl's book was released in October of 2002 by Praeger Publishers, on the eve of the Iraq invasion. (It was later published in paperback by the University of Chicago Press.) He took the "Learning to Eat Soup with a Knife" title from a famous aphorism of T.E. Lawrence, also known as Lawrence of Arabia: "To make war upon rebellion is messy and slow, like eating soup with a knife."

A few months later, Col. Nagl was dispatched to Iraq to serve as the third-highest-ranking officer in a 700-soldier battalion based outside Fallujah. "I thought I knew something about counterinsurgency until I tried to do it," he says today. He quickly discovered the challenge to be even more difficult than he'd expected. His unit took heavy casualties and his battalion's efforts to build an Iraqi police and Army force sputtered in the face of insurgent attacks, poor equipment and a lack of funds.

While Col. Nagl was in Iraq, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's top officer, picked up his book and was taken by its argument that the Army's big-war culture in Vietnam often overpowered innovative ideas from inside the service and out.

The general ordered his fellow four-star generals to read it. Before he went to Iraq to take over as the top commander, Gen. Casey read Col. Nagl's book as well. "The thesis that the U.S. military was too prone to [big offensive strikes] to be good at counterinsurgency was something I noted to watch for when I got here," says Gen. Casey in an email from Baghdad.

The tome has already had an influence on the ground in Iraq. Last winter, Gen. Casey opened a school for U.S. commanders in Iraq to help officers adjust to the demands of a guerrilla-style conflict in which the enemy hides among the people and tries to provoke an overreaction. The idea for the training center, says Gen. Casey, came in part from Col. Nagl's book, which chronicles how the British in Malaya used a similar school to educate British officers coming into the country.

"Pretty much everyone on Gen. Casey's staff had read Nagl's book," says Lt. Col. Nathan Freier, who spent a year in Iraq as a strategist. A British brigadier general says that "Gen. Casey carried the book with him everywhere." Both Col. Nagl's and Mr. Krepinevich's books are included on a recommended counterinsurgency reading list included in the draft doctrine.

Other Vietnam histories have also drawn the interest of senior Army officers. Lt. Gen. John Vines, who was until recently the No. 2 commander in Iraq, recommended his staff read Col. McMaster's "Dereliction of Duty." The book portrays the military's senior Vietnam-era generals as a feckless lot, unwilling to confront President Lyndon Johnson over what they believed to be a bankrupt strategy. Its message: Military commanders must always speak the truth to their civilian bosses.

Similarly, Mr. Sorley's "A Better War" in recent months has become popular among senior Iraq and Afghanistan strategists. Mr. Sorley's book argues that the military, in the latter years of the war under the leadership of Gen. Creighton Abrams, radically shifted its approach. Instead of just hunting North Vietnamese soldiers and Viet Cong guerrillas in the jungle, commanders in 1969 began focusing far more on providing security to Vietnamese villagers, a strategy dubbed "clear and hold."

Mr. Sorley posits that in the early 1970s, Gen. Abrams's "clear and hold" approach was winning the war. Congress's precipitous withdrawal of support for the South Vietnam government and a fickle American public turned that victory into defeat, he writes. Most historians consider Mr. Sorley's account to be far too sanguine on the war's latter years. (Of late, the Bush administration has adopted Gen. Abrams's language. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has described the American strategy in Iraq as "clear, hold and build.")

Going forward, the big question is whether the Army's newly popular Vietnam views survive after the war in Iraq. If things go badly, there is likely to be intense pressure from within the Army to blame the political leadership for not sending enough troops, the news media for negative coverage, or the American public for its unwillingness to stick it out. None of those analyses, however, recognize the Army's own failings -- particularly in the first years of the war, say experts.

"The problem with blaming a fickle American public or the political leadership is that it gives you no tools to do better the next time," says Sarah Sewall, a former Clinton administration defense official who now oversees Harvard's Carr Center for Human Rights. "That is what happened after Vietnam."

Realism Pushes US And Iran A Bit Closer (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0018656

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - A mutual interest in a stable Iraq is driving Washington and Tehran - two otherwise increasingly antagonistic capitals - to sit down and talk.

Even as the Bush administration says America "may face no greater challenge from a single country than from Iran," and as US-backed efforts proceed in the United Nations Security Council to address Iran's nuclear ambitions, the two governments have agreed to meet in Baghdad.

The way forward for this conversation traverses a minefield of potential explosions, but the fact it is happening at all reflects a shift to pragmatic foreign-policy outlooks in both Washington and Tehran.

"No one knows how far this will go before it all blows up, or forces on one side or the other sabotage it, but it's another mark of the reemergence of realists in the Bush administration that we can even consider talking to the Iranians," says Daniel Brumberg, a professor of comparative government at Georgetown University in Washington.

In Iran, "efforts to talk to the US may well be the work of foreign ministry pragmatists [in Tehran] reasserting their influence" over the extremist stance of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, adds Mr. Brumberg. For these pragmatists, landing in the Security Council is the direct result of Mr. Ahmadinejad's confrontational antics, and they may see in Iraq a way to start undoing the damage.

The White House says the talks - the first acknowledged direct contacts between the two countries since discussions in 2003 on Afghanistan - will be limited in focus to Iraq. The US accuses Iran of providing support and materials to groups that have targeted American forces and interests in Iraq.

But the talks are also an acknowledgment of Iran's pivotal role in Iraqi affairs - political, social, and religious - at a particularly difficult moment for the US engagement there.

The US sought help from Iran after the US-led toppling of the Taliban government in Afghanistan. That experience ended up souring, but not before the Iranians took some constructive steps that aided the US goal of establishing a stable government, observers say.

One aim of Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador in Iraq and the man authorized by President Bush to meet with the Iranians, will be to confront his interlocutors on the supplying of Shiite militias, a relationship the US says is exacerbating sectarian violence.

But Mr. Khalilzad - who was previously the US ambassador to Afghanistan - may venture into more political discussions, analysts say, encouraging the Iranians to use their extensive influence with some political leaders of Iraq's ruling Shiites to help in ending the damaging deadlock over forming a new government.

"The US says these talks will 'just be about Iraq,' but what does that mean?" asks Ray Takeyh, an expert in US-Iran relations at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington. "Is it just rebuking them for their actions there, or is it, 'We don't want a civil war, and you don't, so how can we both work to avoid it?' "

The problem he sees is that the Bush administration rhetoric seems diametrically opposed to such an approach. "It might seem to make sense to talk to the Iranians about the mutual interests in a stable Iraq," he says. "But it would be inconsistent with everything else that the administration has been saying about the Iranians over the past two weeks: that they are our biggest single threat, and so on."

Mr. Takeyh says the Iranian regime is also motivated by a desire to undermine the deliberations about its nuclear program in the Security Council. "They may be betting they can lessen some of the pressure to act against them if they are seen to be engaging in something helpful like talks in Iraq," he says.

Some Iranian policymakers may be moved to demonstrate a willingness to cooperate with the Americans - who, after all, rid them of two of their archenemy neighbors, the Taliban and Saddam Hussein - both by the worrisome violence next-door and by a domestic population that wants desperately to avoid international isolation.

Iranian interests may not be identical to America's in Iraq, but growing prospects of a slide to full-blown civil war have rattled the Iranians, experts say. "The Iranians know that if the civil war accelerates they may be drawn into the swamp, and they don't want that," says Georgetown's Brumberg.

Still, actors on both sides could intervene to nip the talks before they even bud. "Will Ahmadinejad try to blow them up?" wonders Brumberg, who cites efforts already made to purge the foreign ministry.

And in the US, skeptics of such talks are surely watching for any missteps, he adds. "The Afghanistan experience" of talking with Iran "is actually a cautionary tale," Brumberg says. "It left a bitter taste, and some people are going to remember that."

Iranians See Talks With U.S. As Historic (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0018657

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

TEHRAN, March 19 -- Iran's acceptance of direct talks with the United States over Iraq is being regarded among Iranians as a major foreign policy development, a historic if still tentative departure from 27 years of official enmity that held the government of the "Great Satan" as one to be spoken against, but never with.

"America's objective in inviting Iran for talks is to send a message to Islamic movements throughout the world that Iran gave in to Washington after 27 years of resistance," Kayhan, a hard-line daily newspaper, warned Saturday in an editorial that analysts said underscored the significance of Iran's shift.

"Announce as soon as possible that you won't have any dialogue with the U.S. and avoid entering a destructive trap that has been prepared for Islamic Iran," the editorial continued.

Vehement opposition to the United States has been a pillar of Iran's theocratic system since 1979, the year an angry population overthrew the monarch Washington had helped install 26 years earlier in a coup engineered with the help of the CIA. From the U.S. side, a similar enmity was embedded in policy when student militants overran the red-brick U.S. Embassy in Tehran, taking 52 Americans hostage and holding them for more than a year.

The United States severed diplomatic relations with Iran, and over the next quarter-century both countries consistently found a reliable villain in the other.

Inside Iran, however, an appetite for rapprochement grew along with a population whose youthful majority had no memory of the revolution.

In 2002, a poll found that three-quarters of Iranians surveyed favored talks with the United States. The pollster was thrown in jail, but the reality drove a quiet competition between Iran's two rival political forces.

"Whoever could take the prize" of U.S. rapprochement would, it was widely believed, dominate Iranian politics for the foreseeable future, said Mehdi Karrubi, a moderate cleric who was speaker of the last parliament dominated by reformers.

The competition, however, had paralyzed the effort: Neither side would allow the other to reach out to the United States without risking accusations of betraying the Islamic revolution.

That changed last year, when conservative clerics edged reformists out of government, unifying Iran's elaborate ruling structure for the first time in nearly a decade. It also cleared the way for the opening to Washington, and even reformists urged the conservatives to act.

"This might be a historic irony, but it's true the state is in 'harmony,' " said Mostafa Tajzadeh, a prominent reformist theoretician, speaking before the announcement of the direct talks. "No time has been more convenient for talks between the two countries. We are less sensitive than at any time since the revolution."

A few conservatives quietly urged the same. Behind the scenes of Iran's conservative establishment, insiders whispered about the prospect of negotiations.

When the announcement came Thursday, it was pointedly public. Ali Larijani, who heads the Supreme National Security Council, announced the decision to parliament, then summoned American correspondents to interviews. With a level gaze, he said Iran would accept the invitation of the U.S. ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, to talk about Iraq.

Analysts and politicians said the decision showed every sign of carrying the weight of Iran's ultimate authority, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. And some conservatives fell in line.

"It is obvious that when the Iranian officials present an idea, it is a calculated act," said Habibollah Asgaroladi, a leader of the Islamic Coalition Society, according to the ISNA news agency. "Considering the problems in the region, there is this necessity to solve problems through negotiations."

No dates have been set for the talks, and Iran has yet to name its delegation, which Larijani said would be of a rank "appropriate" to the task. Both Iran and the United States publicly emphasize that the subject will be limited to the teetering situation in Iraq, where both have deep interests and influence.

U.S. officials underscore this adamantly, openly arguing that Iran is opening a channel to the United States in hopes of siphoning off pressure it faces from the U.N. Security Council about the intentions of its nuclear program.

Some Iranian politicians acknowledge as much. "Although the talks will be over Iraq, these talks would have certain impacts on other regional developments and also on nuclear diplomacy," said Reza Talainik, head of parliament's national security and foreign affairs committee, ISNA reported.

Others describe the opening as a first step toward reducing Iran's estrangement from the West. The United States long has labeled Iran the world's largest state sponsor of terrorism. But Tajzadeh said he feared the escalating rhetoric over Iran's nuclear program, which many suspect is a front for acquiring atomic weapons, was building toward military action.

"The public image the U.S. has made of Iran is a monster. They have to do something, at least break a horn," he said. "There is only a small chance. This is negotiation.

DOJ_NMG_0018658

"Of course, in the short term," he said, "it would not be in my party's favor. But in the long term, it would be in the favor of the Iranian nation and our party."

Naser Hadian-Jazy, a political scientist at Tehran University, said Iranian commentators of all stripes see the new opening as the most significant public approach to Washington since 1979, despite mid-level diplomatic contacts through third parties in advance of the invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq.

"Both the supporters and those who are critical have made this point clear," he said.

The public also appeared to welcome news of talks. "I think both sides should take advantage of this opportunity. They should be friends," said Kobra Mehdipour, 68, clutching her chador against the March wind.

Asked who in Iran might feel otherwise, she said, "There might be some illiterate people in the provinces who want to be friends with other countries but might be under the influence of some kind of propaganda."

Karrubi, the moderate cleric, moved from supporting the 1979 embassy takeover to urging rapprochement with Washington. He said that was the challenge for the governments as well.

"Both sides should forget the rhetoric used in the media and politics. They should put it aside," he said. "They should create something new."

U.S. General Doubts Talks With Iran Will Promote Mideast Peace (AP)

The Associated Press, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — The top commander of U.S. forces in Iraq expressed doubt today that negotiations between the United States and Iran over Iraq would help bring peace and stability in the Middle East.

"I don't have a lot of confidence that these will turn out to be productive, but I could be wrong," said Gen. George W. Casey, the top commander in Iraq.

"They're playing, I think, a very delicate balancing act," he said of Iran. "On the one hand, they want a stable neighbor. On the other hand, I don't believe they want to see us succeed here."

The Bush administration agreed last week to talk to Iranian officials about Iraq after a nearly three-decade break in diplomatic ties between the two countries. U.S. intelligence strongly suspects Iran has been arming Iraqi Shiite militia and some insurgent groups.

Casey said he didn't have much faith in the talks but that it was a "political call." Any negotiations should involve the Iraqis' use against coalition forces of "improvised explosive device technology" that he says are coming from Iran.

"That needs to stop," Casey said on "Fox News Sunday."

For the talks, U.S. officials have ruled out discussion of any attempt by Iran to gain a political foothold in Iraq, as well as international concern that Iran is seeking to build a nuclear bomb, an allegation that Tehran denies.

Last week, Bush's top foreign policy adviser, Stephen Hadley, expressed concern that Iran's willingness to talk might be a ploy designed to divert attention from the nuclear dispute. The U.N. Security Council is expected to discuss the nuclear issue this month, with Washington pressing for penalties.

Still, lawmakers from both parties said today they welcomed the discussions, saying it was critical for the Bush administration to engage the Middle East region — even countries it might disagree with — as the U.S. contemplates an exit strategy in Iraq.

"I think we have to understand that we are talking frequently to people with whom we have severe disagreement, whom we dislike, whom we may feel really are terrorists, but those are the folks that are in the world that we're going to have to influence," said Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind.

"Now, that doesn't mean that we're necessarily going to be successful in any of these respects, but clearly we're not only sharing the burden, but probably bringing some sense of urgency to the world in a way in which we are not perceived as doing in Iraq," Lugar said.

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., agreed, saying that Iran and the U.S. have a mutual interest in not seeing a civil war break out in Iraq. The U.S. can refuse to negotiate on other issues, such as terrorism or a suspected nuclear arms program, he said.

"Seventy-five percent of the Iranians or more hate their leadership, and the last thing they need is 50 million Shia on the other side learning from their Shia brethren how to wage a war," said Biden, who appeared with Lugar on CNN's "Late Edition."

Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., said that talking with Iran would give the U.S. more options in eventually pulling out of Iraq. He called that a better approach than to engage in a "mindless kind of banter" about "well, if we leave, the whole place falls apart."

"We've got to think in a big-picture way here that we haven't thought before. I think we need to talk to the Iranians," he said on ABC's "This Week." "There will be no peace in Iraq or in the Middle East without the Iranians being part of that."

Top U.N. Members To Try To Break Stalemate On Iran (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0018659

By Colum Lynch
The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, March 19 -- The Security Council's five permanent members and Germany will hold a high-level meeting Monday in New York to try to break an impasse over the international response to the Iranian nuclear crisis.

The meeting comes as U.S. and European diplomats have failed during two weeks of negotiations to overcome Chinese and Russian objections to a Security Council statement demanding that Iran stop its nuclear-enrichment activities and cooperate with the International Atomic Energy Agency. R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, and top foreign affairs officials from the five other governments are expected to attend.

U.S. and European officials say they will try to assuage Russian and Chinese fears that the adoption of the statement will inevitably lead to harsh punitive measures against Iran. "We're not hellbent on going to war; we're not hellbent on imposing sanctions," said a senior State Department official familiar with the discussions, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the talks are supposed to be confidential. "We're hellbent on having the Iranians return to the negotiations, like the Russians and the Chinese want."

Moscow's opposition to a Security Council declaration has hardened in recent weeks as senior U.S. officials, including Burns, have publicly threatened to press for targeted sanctions against Iran's rulers if they ignore the 15-nation council's call for a freeze on Iran's uranium-enrichment activities.

Russian diplomats say they are concerned that a U.S.-backed European draft, which sets a two-week deadline for Tehran to stop enrichment activities and agree to more intrusive U.N. inspections, provides too little time to test Iran's cooperation. Russia's U.N. ambassador, Andrei Denisov, mockingly told the Associated Press on Friday: "Let's just imagine that we adopt it and today we issued that statement -- then what happens after two weeks? In such a pace, we'll start bombing in June."

Monday's meeting, which will be held at the British mission, was scheduled in response to a request by Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov to hold talks outside the Security Council to map out the United Nations' long-term strategy for persuading Iran to scale back its nuclear activities.

An evening meeting, which will include the U.N. ambassadors for the six governments, will focus on reaching a deal on the presidential statement.

A second senior Bush administration official, who also spoke on the condition of anonymity, denied an AP report Saturday suggesting that Britain was considering proposing Monday to resolve the standoff through talks among the council's five veto-wielding members, Germany and Iran. "The report is absolutely false," the U.S. official said. "We checked with the Brits, and they were stupefied by that report, and they never heard of it. No one has made that proposal, and we wouldn't accept it."

The standoff hinges on whether the Iran crisis should be handled by the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency or the Security Council, which can impose sanctions or use force. Russia and China have insisted that the IAEA take the lead, while the United States, France and Britain say that Iran will stop its activities only if faced with the threat of sanctions.

Some council members say the European proposal for a two-week deadline for IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei to report to the council on Iran's cooperation is too short. China prefers four to six weeks. Russia opposes any report until the IAEA meets in June.

China said Friday that it would accept a continuing role for the U.N. council in managing the nuclear crisis. U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said he had offered a compromise to bridge the gap between Russia and the council's three major Western powers. Under the plan, ElBaradei would report on Iran to the 35-member IAEA board and the Security Council.

U.S., French and British diplomats say they have rallied a majority of the council's 15 members in support of a draft statement that would call on Iran to stop uranium-enrichment activities and cooperate with the IAEA. They will resume talks on Tuesday.

Tehran Courts Support Of Arabs (WP)

By Daniel Williams
The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

CAIRO -- Iran has embarked on a charm offensive in the Arab world aimed at expanding economic and political ties and circumventing efforts by the United States and its allies to isolate Iran over its nuclear program.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad traveled this month to Kuwait, the first visit there by a high-ranking Iranian official in more than 25 years. Other Iranian officials toured Persian Gulf states trying to persuade them to endorse Iran's desire to develop nuclear technology, which U.S. officials have called a cover for building weapons. In mid-February, Iran's deputy foreign minister for Arab and African affairs, Mohammad-Reza Baqeri, met in Mecca with Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal in a bid to persuade the Saudis to coordinate stands on regional issues, according to reports from Tehran.

DOJ_NMG_0018660

Iran also moved to shore up its longtime alliance with Syria, itself a target of U.S.-led isolation efforts. Iran and Syria signed preferential trade agreements and announced plans to lay an oil pipeline between the two countries, although a key section would have to pass through Iraq. During a recent meeting with Iranian officials in Damascus, Syrian Prime Minister Naji al-Otri publicly endorsed Iran's assertion of the right to develop nuclear technology, albeit for "peaceful purposes."

Across the Mediterranean, in Tunisia, officials pledged to increase trade, flights and tourism ties with Tehran.

The activity coincides with Iran's stated support for Hamas, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement, which won a majority of seats in the Palestinian parliament in January. Ahmadinejad has offered to fill gaps in the Palestinian Authority budget created by a withdrawal of international aid as Hamas takes over. The United States and many European governments consider Hamas a terrorist organization and have said it ought to be isolated until it recognizes Israel and forswears violence.

Arab observers say Iran's diplomatic offensive represents a newly vigorous approach to improving relations with its neighbors. "Iran is trying to become a player in the region. At least toward the Arabs, Iran is trying to moderate its tone," said Maha Altorki, an Iran analyst in the Asia section of the Arab League, based in Cairo, the Egyptian capital.

Altorki said Iran faces numerous obstacles in its campaign. Persian Gulf states closely allied with the United States are leery. Iran has laid claims to islands and undersea territory in the oil-rich gulf. During a meeting of Persian Gulf foreign ministers this month, Abdullah bin Zayed al-Nahyan, foreign minister of the United Arab Emirates, pointed out that Iran continues to occupy islands claimed by the UAE and called for their peaceful return.

Iran also faces suspicions about its long-term intentions. It is a majority Shiite Muslim country ruled under Islamic law as Iranian clerics define it, and that makes leaders of the predominantly Sunni Muslim Arab world wary that the Iranians will try to subvert their rule. Last year, Jordan's King Abdullah warned of an emerging "Shiite crescent" stretching from Iran through Iraq and Syria into Lebanon, where Iran has long been a patron of the Hezbollah movement that fought the Israeli army.

Abdullah and Middle East observers have noted that the Bush administration boosted Iran's regional profile by toppling Saddam Hussein and effectively shifting power to Iraqi Shiite parties and militias that Tehran had hosted while they were in exile.

"I have a real problem with certain Iranian factions' political influence inside Iraq," Abdullah said in a published interview last year. "My concern is political, not religious -- revolving around Iran, Iran's political involvement inside Iraq, its relation with Syria and Hezbollah and the strengthening of this political-strategic alliance. This would create a scenario where you have these four -- Iran, Iran-influenced Iraq, Syria and Hezbollah -- [with] a strategic objective that could create a major conflict."

Not all Arab countries share such alarm, cautioned Wael al-Assad, director of the Arab League's Department of Multilateral Relations. "There is no single position in the Arab world toward Iran. In general, the closer a country is to Iran, the more worried it is," he said. "Of course, the collapse of Iraq and the rise of the Shiites make the situation more frightening to some."

The Arabs' position on Iran's nuclear program is complicated by their demand that the region should be free of nuclear weapons -- including Israel, which has long possessed a nuclear arsenal but never acknowledged it.

"We don't want Iran to have nuclear weapons. The difference with the U.S. approach is that we see it as a regional issue," Assad said. "We want a nuclear-free zone. We declare it is wrong for any country in the area to possess nuclear weapons. Otherwise there will be an arms race. The Americans handle it on a state-by-state basis."

Ayatollahs Aside, Iranians Jump For Joy At Spring (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

ISFAHAN, Iran, March 19 — All day and all night, the main street of this city was packed over the weekend with shoppers jockeying to buy last-minute gifts and sweets as they hurried to get ready for the celebration of the Iranian New Year, called Nowruz. Behind his cluttered desk inside an antique shop, Sayed Ali Zargabashi watched with great satisfaction as the crowds spilled off the sidewalks.

"People are not listening to the regime," said Mr. Zargabashi, 63. "They are emphasizing and embracing the traditional celebrations. People want the best they can get. Their eyes are open now."

After the Islamic Revolution in 1979, the ruling ayatollahs sought to stamp out many traditions, like Nowruz, a celebration with some Zoroastrian links that stretches back thousands of years to the pre-Islamic era, to mark the arrival of spring. The celebration is considered by many here the most Iranian of holidays.

The ayatollahs tried, and failed.

Now, nearly three decades later, some people say the increasingly enthusiastic embrace of Nowruz and other ancient traditions represents a resistance against the country's more conservative religious rulers.

A few days before Nowruz, for example, Iranians poured out of their homes to celebrate Chahar Shanbeh Suri, igniting fireworks and jumping over small fires set in the streets, a traditional practice intended to bring good health in the new year. Several years ago, the government decided it could not stop the practice, and set up special parks where the fires could be set.

DOJ_NMG_0018661

This year's celebration — a time for family gatherings — has proved especially vexing for the religious leadership as it occurs on Monday, the same day the faithful are expected to mourn the death of Imam Hussein, a figure whose defeat in battle centuries ago became a defining moment in Shiism, the dominant Islamic sect in Iran.

Some clerics said in interviews that it was acceptable to observe the new year, but because the celebration was occurring on the 40th day after the anniversary of Imam Hussein's death, people should not show joy — which in itself prompted giggles from some as they hurried to get ready.

"I think these days, there is a silent resistance in Iran, especially among the middle class," said Hamidreza Jalaipour, a sociologist. "They are resisting not politically, but socially and culturally."

Like most conflicts in a society as complex and layered as this one, the contemporary story of Nowruz is not one-sided or exclusively about resistance. It is also about accommodation. While Iran's religious leaders have followed a policy of confrontation with the West over their nation's nuclear program, they have, however grudgingly, ceded to the public's insistence on retaining, even bolstering, traditions not founded in Shiism.

While it was the reformist government of former President Mohammad Khatami that decided to establish parks to hold the fire-jumping festivities, for example, the practice was continued this year after the election of the ideologically conservative President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

That Iran's religious leaders have accepted Nowruz, and other prerevolution traditions like Chahar Shanbeh Suri, also demonstrates a growing degree of stability, as the country's leadership has tried to reconcile the bookends of Iranian national identity — faith and culture, experts here said.

At last week's Friday Prayer service, held in the sprawling open-air arena at Tehran University and broadcast nationwide, Ayatollah Ahmad Jannati, among Iran's chief enforcers of strict Islamic doctrine as head of the Guardian Council, did not mention Chahar Shanbeh Suri. He also did not mention Nowruz, though he acknowledged that recreation was good, as long as people continued to observe the laws of the Islamic republic.

"In this new year," Ayatollah Jannati said from a podium high above the crowd, "God's kindness and affection should be on you. We should always observe piety and all laws decided by God. You can neither commit sin in happiness or sadness."

There still exists a battlefield between those on the extremes of the debate, the ultrareligious who would like to erase elements of Iranian identity not explicitly Islamic, and others, including many in the expatriate community, who try to undermine the credibility of the Islamic government by appealing to Iranian nationalism through such traditions as Char Shanbeh Suri.

"What is interesting is that it is not clear why the opposition is trying to benefit from setting fire to little thorn bushes and firecrackers, which has mistakenly turned into a tradition, and interpret it as opposition to the Islamic republic," Hussein Shariatmadari, editor in chief of the conservative daily newspaper Kayhan, wrote on Thursday.

The exact beginning of Nowruz — the name means "New Day" — is unclear, although its origin has been traced back thousands of years. In Iran, it is closely associated with the Zoroastrian faith, a monotheistic religion in which worshipers perform prayers and rituals in the presence of fire — a symbol of order, truth and righteousness. Zoroastrians are said to have made the Nowruz tradition formal.

Tooran Shahriari, a senior member of the Zoroastrian community in Tehran, said that the ancient calendar was divided in 12 months of 30 days each. At the end of the year, she said, the five days left over became "special days" and the basis for the celebration.

In practical terms, the holiday signifies the end of winter and the start of the new growing season, and resembles a blend of New Year's Eve and Thanksgiving. In advance of the holiday, Iranians conduct an intense spring cleaning.

The holiday begins at the exact moment of spring, and so on Monday Iranian families will gather in their homes at about 10 p.m. around tables set with seven symbolic dishes, each beginning with the letter S in Persian, including items like vinegar, dried fruit, garlic and sprouting seeds, which represent renewal. The holiday ends on the 13th day with an event called Sizdah Bedar, when everyone is supposed to go out into nature, hold picnics and enjoy the early spring.

In Isfahan, there was a rush to get ready for the holiday. One tradition is to buy new clothing, and tailors were busy trying to meet holiday orders. In one shop, a tailor named Akbar said that nearly half his annual business was conducted in the month before the holiday. He said he was certain Nowruz was so popular because people were rebelling against the government and its strict social codes of behavior.

"They really tried to take away Nowruz from people," Akbar said as he fitted a customer with a new suit. "People are turning away from religion altogether. They are not listening to what the government is saying." He is not being completely identified to protect him from possible reprisal over his comments about religion, which is often considered a red line in this country.

Not everyone shared the tailor's view. Instead, some people who identified themselves as religious said they saw no conflict with Iran's culture.

DOJ_NMG_0018662

"Iranians have both tradition and religion, and they both get respected in return," said Jaafar Hemmassian, 40, a baker in the center of the city as he sold piles of cream puffs and cases of confections. "All of the traditions of Nowruz are accepted by Islam."

A few days earlier, as people gathered in a small park in Tehran to set fires and celebrate Chahar Shanbeh Suri, held on the last Wednesday of the year, many people said they were pleased that the government had finally relented — and even helped to organize the occasion.

"This is an important night for us, especially because this regime has finally realized that it should respect peoples' demand and let them celebrate it," said Manijeh Emadi, 54, a high-school teacher. "They wanted to take away Nowruz and its traditions for 27 years. Finally they learned that this tradition has survived for hundreds of years, and it will survive them as well."

Where Comedy Isn't King (NYT)

By Jake Tapper

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

Washington — I was only a few hours into my recent two-week stay in Baghdad when I first noticed the discordant images on Iraqi television: Between the grisly shots of war dead, pools of blood and burnt-out shells of cars came bits of wacky slapstick.

Grown men and women joked around in silly makeup and goofy costumes, emoting exaggeratedly, acting like buffoons. It was difficult to compute at first: amid the horror, some Iraqis were actually trying to make the country laugh.

With the newfound freedom of speech here, more than 100 television and radio stations have been licensed; the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, marveled at the transformation a few days ago, noting that until the invasion Uday Hussein's "pen ruled supreme." This has resulted not only in more news and public affairs programming, but many new entertainment shows.

Every Tuesday night, for instance, the Kurdish TV station KurdSat runs "Program," which offers music and skits about corruption and society. Every Friday afternoon "Caricatures," on the satellite station Al Sharqiya, lampoons sectarian strife and the annoyances of day-to-day life like cellphones. The American Idol-esque "Iraq Star," which recently completed a season's run on Al Sumariya, came with its own version of Simon Cowell named Mo Hadi.

On radio, every day the Rashid station offers a four-hour show called "DJ Rashid," which brings listeners music, comedy and various contests. Callers share jokes and poems on the Mahaba radio station's "Mahtata" show every evening.

Struck by this phenomenon, my producers and I called Iraqi TV and spoke to Amjad Hamid, the manager of the entertainment division. He seemed very proud of a new sitcom set to debut next month. In 15 half-hour episodes, "Me and Layla" — starring Odei Abdel-Sattar, an Iraqi Danny DeVito — will show the misadventures of a hapless Romeo. Mr. Hamid invited us to visit the set to interview the producer, director and actors. He was convinced that what they were trying to do was important.

When we went a few days later to where they were filming in north Baghdad, we could have been on a back lot in Burbank. A one-camera crew shot a scene where the diminutive Mr. Abdel-Sattar and another actor — the straight man, it seemed — had an animated discussion. The director, Jamal Abed-Jasim — bald, wearing a red shirt and tan vest — barked out his vision; a woman in a business suit clutching a clipboard never left his side. The smooth-as-silk producer, Mazin Mohammed Mustafa, paced and smoked. Mr. Abdel-Sattar hammed it up off camera. Gaffers and grips tended to their tasks; extras milled around, waiting to shine.

For us, it was a chance to cover something besides car bombs, carnage and body counts. That perhaps understandable focus — and concerns for our own security — have clearly hindered the ability of journalists to tell stories about Iraqi society, about the less obvious ways that Iraqis are trying to rebuild their country.

"Iraqis have a real need to smile now to make them forget all the destruction and terrorism surrounding them," Mr. Abdel-Sattar told us, sunglasses perched atop his head. "God willing, things will get better."

Mr. Mustafa, the producer, told us more comedies were in production at Iraqi television stations now than at any time during Saddam Hussein's reign. And many of them were political — something unheard of. He echoed the sentiment of so many Hollywood producers: "Tragedy is easy; comedy is where the challenge is."

"Every director in Iraq wants to make the Iraqi people smile," he told us. "To ease what they are going through, to make the average Iraqi forget about the misery of his daily life."

Yet tragedy still has a way of rearing its head.

We had been on the set for less than an hour when Mr. Mustafa got a phone call that clearly upset him. Grabbing Mr. Abed-Jasim by the arm, Mr. Mustafa took him aside and told him that gunmen had assassinated Mr. Hamid, the entertainment-division chief, outside his Baghdad home just minutes earlier.

The director told the cast and crew. Shock and grief turned to terror. Everyone on the set immediately became restless, anxious. Eyes moist with tears began darting about the street. Iraqi TV is widely perceived as being pro-Shiite and pro-government; the Sunni-leaning Baghdad TV had just had one of its anchors shot and killed a few days before. Not that any of the violence in today's Iraq needs a reason.

DOJ_NMG_0018663

Mr. Mustafa told the crew to break down; within minutes everyone had jumped into cars and minivans and fled. My crew and I weren't far behind. Iraqi TV put a black band of mourning on the top left corner of its screen and spent much of the rest of the day covering Mr. Hamid's funeral.

It is American journalists' duty to try to look at the broader picture in Iraq — telling the stories about those brave souls who seek to restore normalcy and laughter into the daily routine here. But there is no denying that the horrific violence will often make that task impossible.

Jake Tapper is a correspondent for ABC News.

Afghan Man Prosecuted For Converting (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, March 20, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — An Afghan man who allegedly converted from Islam to Christianity is being prosecuted in a Kabul court and could be sentenced to death, a judge said Sunday.

The defendant, Abdul Rahman, was arrested last month after his family went to the police and accused him of becoming a Christian, Judge Ansarullah Mawlavezada told Associated Press in an interview. Such a conversion would violate the country's Islamic laws.

Rahman, who is believed to be 41, was charged with rejecting Islam when his trial started last week, the judge said.

During the hearing, the defendant allegedly confessed that he converted from Islam to Christianity 16 years ago when he was 25 and working as a medical aid worker for Afghan refugees in neighboring Pakistan, Mawlavezada said.

Afghanistan's constitution is based on Shariah law, which states that any Muslim who rejects their religion should be sentenced to death.

"We are not against any particular religion in the world. But in Afghanistan, this sort of thing is against the law," the judge said. "It is an attack on Islam. ... The prosecutor is asking for the death penalty."

The prosecutor, Abdul Wasi, said the case was the first of its kind in Afghanistan.

He said that he had offered to drop the charges if Rahman changed his religion back to Islam, but the defendant refused.

Mawlavezada said he would rule on the case within two months.

Afghanistan is a deeply conservative society, and 99% of its 28 million people are Muslim. The rest are mainly Hindus.

Democracy And Security (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

The publication last week of the Bush Administration's National Security Strategy has been greeted with a combination of media indifference and contempt. "Bush clings to pre-emptive force," was one news agency's sum-up of the 49-page document. Readers of these columns might prefer to draw their own conclusions by actually reading it: www.whitehouse.gov/nsc/nss/20061. What they'll find is a strategy that's admirably specific and, in the issues that matter most, broadly right.

This is especially important at a time when countries such as Iran, Syria and Egypt are betting that the Administration's domestic political weakness and its troubles in Iraq will see them safely through the 2008 election and what they hope will be a more pliant U.S. foreign policy. The document may now give those regimes second thoughts. Crucially, it reaffirms the Administration's first-term support of pre-emption: "When the consequences of an attack with [weapons of mass destruction] are potentially so devastating, we cannot afford to stand idly by as grave dangers materialize."

We'll take that to mean that the Bush Doctrine remains alive and well, despite persistent reports that it had been quietly shelved in favor of . . . well, no one has yet made clear what. Critics of the doctrine have argued that America's intelligence failure and difficulties in Iraq demonstrate the perils of pre-emption. Yet it is precisely because U.S. policy makers will never have perfect information about the capabilities and intentions of our enemies that pre-emption is sometimes needed, particularly when the threats are potentially catastrophic.

What distinguishes this document, however, is the emphasis it places on "effective democracy": that is, nations in which the institutions of democracy -- regular and honest elections; representative and accountable government -- serve as the armature of basic political, religious and economic freedoms.

Critics have questioned whether promoting democracy really advances U.S. security interests, pointing to the recent victory of Hamas in Palestinian elections. But leaving aside that the former government of Yasser Arafat was no less bloody minded, the objections fail to appreciate the ways in which effective democracies tend to counteract the very factors that gave rise to Hamas in the first place: Political participation takes the place of exclusion; the free flow of information and a marketplace of ideas replace "sub-cultures of conspiracy and misinformation," and so on.

DOJ_NMG_0018664

None of this guarantees that elections will inevitably lead to liberal outcomes. And, yes, there are times and places (Pakistan now) where the diplomatic prod to democracy has to be measured against the help a government is providing against a more urgent enemy (al Qaeda). But the evidence of the past century is that elections usually produce more long-run stability, and they merit a try in the Middle East.

Equally useful is the strategy's clear-eyed account of the connection between the nature of a regime and its behavior. "Governments that honor their citizens' dignity and desire for freedom tend to uphold responsible conduct toward other nations," the document notes, "while governments that brutalize their people also threaten the peace and stability of other nations."

This is directly relevant to Iran, whose nuclear ambitions are mainly a function of the ideological obsessions of its rulers -- and not, as is sometimes argued, of Iran's objective national interests. This means the threat Iran poses is unlikely to change as long as the regime remains the same: The "ultimate goal" of U.S. policy, therefore, is rightly an Iran which "[opens] up its political system and [affords] freedom to its people.

How this is done is another matter, and nobody is now arguing for changing the regime in Tehran the way it was changed in Baghdad. But we are heartened that the strategy begins with the declaration that "It is the policy of the United States to seek and support democratic movements and institutions in every nation and culture" (our emphasis). This puts us in mind of U.S. support for Russian refuseniks in the 1970s, Poland's Solidarity movement in the 1980s and Kurdish autonomy in northern Iraq in the 1990s -- all of which have analogs in modern-day Iran.

There is a great deal more in this document that deserves attention, notably the effort to retool the State Department into an engine of "transformational diplomacy," and not, as it usually is, the defender of every given status quo. It is also good to see the Administration belatedly recognize that Russian democracy is increasingly threatened by its own government.

Best of all is the line that "Though tyranny has few advocates, it needs more adversaries." One critique of the President's push for democracy is the idea that the U.S. should not too visibly support the world's democratic dissidents and movements, lest they be tainted by American associations. But we suspect that champions of liberty in places such as Egypt, Iran and China take greater courage from an America that states its purposes boldly than one that fears its own shadow. Since when did the love of liberty become the love that dare not speak its name?

DOJ:

Federal Prosecutor Joins Arent Fox's D.C. Office (WP)

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

Baruch Weiss, a veteran federal prosecutor who most recently was associate general counsel at the Department of Homeland Security, has joined the District office of Arent Fox in the litigation and white-collar defense groups.

From 1984 through 2002, Weiss was senior trial counsel for the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, where he handled cases including a fraud investigation of a major securities firm, appeals involving the first World Trade Center bombing in 1993 and the unsuccessful prosecution of boxing promoter Don King for insurance fraud.

Meanwhile, Jim Schumann, who was previously in the DHS office of legislative affairs, has joined the government affairs group at Akerman Senterfitt. He will serve on the firm's disaster recovery task force.

In other moves in the Washington offices of major law firms:

· Four lawyers who were with Heller Ehrman LLP -- Colin G. Sandercock, John P. Isacson, Paul M. Booth and David W. Laub -- have joined the life sciences and intellectual property practices of Proskauer Rose LLP as partners.

· Roger Nober, outgoing chairman of the federal Surface Transportation Board, has joined Steptoe & Johnson LLP as a partner.

-- Larry Liebert

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Prosecutors Have Another Key Witness, From Jail (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018665

The government heads this week into the home stretch of its case against two former Enron chief executives. Prosecutors will be looking to end on a flourish with the testimony of Ben F. Glisan Jr., the only former top executive who has already been sentenced in the Enron debacle.

Mr. Glisan, the former treasurer, is the last major witness for the government before the case shifts to the defense and to what promises to be memorable testimony by the defendants, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay.

Mr. Glisan worked closely with Andrew S. Fastow, the former chief financial officer, on developing special-purpose entities, like the Raptors group, that both men have said in plea deals were used to inflate earnings and hide debt. The government is also expected to use Mr. Glisan to try to connect the dots for jurors hearing a complex case.

For seven weeks and through 14 witnesses, jurors have listened to prosecutors build a case on largely disparate pieces of indirect circumstantial evidence that Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, the top executives of what was once the seventh-largest company in the world by revenue, conspired to mislead and defraud investors.

Legal experts have generally praised the government's case, which has shied away from complex explanations of accounting and focused on the actions and words of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay in the three years before Enron collapsed in December 2001.

But legal experts continue to debate two crucial issues: whether the government has presented enough evidence that Mr. Lay knowingly lied about the true state of Enron's businesses and, more broadly, whether there was an extensive conspiracy within Enron to defraud and mislead employees and investors, as the government contends.

Those issues underscore the importance of decisions that the judge, Simeon T. Lake III of Federal District Court, will make in the coming weeks about how to structure the jury instruction. If the judge grants a "deliberate ignorance" instruction, as expected by many legal specialists because of case precedent, it could ease the way for jurors to find Mr. Lay guilty — even if the government cannot prove he knew that fraud was occurring on his watch.

"These instructions are making it very difficult if not impossible for defendants to prevail in these types of cases," said Joel Androphy, a lawyer in Houston specializing in white-collar crime.

Mr. Lay's lead lawyer, Michael Ramsey, agreed that prosecutors were more likely than not to seek the "deliberate ignorance" instruction for his client. "There is nothing direct to say about Ken Lay," Mr. Ramsey said. "It has all got to be by insinuation and innuendo."

But legal experts said the cumulative impact of such testimony could be taking a toll on Mr. Lay. Last week provided some of the most emotional testimony against Mr. Lay to date. Johnnie Nelson, a 46-year-old pipeline operator in New Mexico, blamed Mr. Lay for steep losses in his retirement savings account, saying a man he formerly admired had let him down.

At week's end, Sherron S. Watkins, a former Enron vice president and now an author and lecturer, said she had become concerned about potential accounting problems and had taken the concerns directly to Mr. Lay after Mr. Skilling abruptly resigned.

Ms. Watkins criticized Mr. Lay's handling of an inquiry into her accusations and raised the specter that Mr. Lay might have authorized lawyers to look into firing her, which did not happen in the end.

Jurors seemed riveted by her testimony, which was peppered with her negative opinions of Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling. Judge Lake helped prosecutors by not reining in her answers.

Prosecutors have also presented evidence that Mr. Skilling participated in fraudulent acts. David W. Delainey, the former chief executive of the Enron Energy Services retail division, testified about one meeting in March 2001 in which Mr. Skilling assented to a plan to shift some $250 million in troubled retail contracts to the wholesale energy division.

Mr. Delainey contended that the meeting participants knew the move was being done to deceive investors about the retail unit, which he called a "basket case."

Mr. Fastow, while admitting his own criminality, testified that Mr. Skilling approved "bear hug" side deals guaranteeing that one partnership, LJM, would not suffer losses for doing deals with Enron that could help it manipulate its earnings. And Mr. Fastow, in somewhat shaky testimony, nevertheless said the side deals had been memorialized in a document called the Global Galactic agreement, aspects of which, he said, Richard A. Causey, the chief accounting officer, had discussed with Mr. Skilling.

Kevin P. Hannon, the former chief operating officer of Enron's troubled broadband unit, offered surprising testimony that Mr. Skilling uttered "They're on to us" in a May 2001 meeting at which senior executives discussed a research report suggesting Enron's stock was overvalued.

Despite the evidence presented so far, some legal experts said they believed the case could crumble once Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay took the stand.

"There is still no explosive evidence," said Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who is now a defense lawyer at McCarter & English in Newark. "Jurors will be expecting prosecutors to dissect their testimony with a scalpel."

DOJ_NMG_0018666

Before the defense takes over, Mr. Glisan's appearance for the prosecution offers one more chance for high drama. Mr. Glisan, 40, has already served more than half of a five-year sentence for conspiring to falsify financial results and make Enron appear more successful than it actually was. He was the chief architect of the Raptor vehicles, whose insolvency in the fall of 2001, prosecutors contend, played a role in the ultimate collapse of Enron.

Mr. Glisan is serving time at a low-security prison in Beaumont, Tex., about 100 miles east of Houston, according to Bureau of Prison records. He is sure to draw stares if he enters the courtroom in prison garb, as he did two years ago when he testified in another Enron case involving the sham sale of interests in Nigerian barges.

Affable and sharp, Mr. Glisan was credited with being a crucial government witness in the barge case, which resulted in five defendants being found guilty. Unlike other government witnesses, Mr. Glisan has less to gain from shading his testimony to fit the government's theory of the case because he is already serving his sentence, legal experts say.

Away from the courtroom, lawyers for both sides began hashing out the all-important jury instruction they will eventually submit to the court.

"I am not terribly optimistic after yesterday that we can get a charge together by agreement," he said Saturday. "The judge will have to get into it and make some rulings."

The "deliberate ignorance," or "conscious avoidance," charge made it fairly easy for jurors to find Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom, guilty last year of conspiracy and fraud charges.

In a motion seeking a new trial, lawyers for Mr. Ebbers, who was sentenced to 25 years in prison, argue that jurors were told they could find him guilty based on "conscious avoidance" even without evidence that Mr. Ebbers "deliberately avoided learning any fact at issue."

The judge in that case justified the charge on the grounds that the circumstances were "overwhelmingly suspicious" and that Mr. Ebbers had failed to question those suspicious circumstances.

Mr. Ebbers also struggled to win a "missing witness" charge, which defense lawyers in the Enron case are likely to seek as well. In the Ebbers case the judge denied defense motions to grant immunity to some witnesses or to allow use of previous statements to impeach the government's cooperating witnesses.

Absent that, Mr. Ebbers's lawyers sought to instruct jurors that certain witnesses were "missing" because they were under government control, had indicated they would exercise their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and were not given immunity by the court to testify for the defense.

Lawyers for Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay are facing the same challenges in responding to testimony by government cooperators testifying under plea agreements. Most of the government cooperators, including Michael J. Kopper, a close confidant of Mr. Fastow; and David B. Duncan, the former Andersen partner who had approved much of Enron's questionable accounting, have told defense lawyers they would invoke Fifth Amendment rights.

Others important Enron figures who have not been charged, like the former Enron president Greg Whalley, also have indicated they would invoke the Fifth if called.

That would make it tough for the defense to disprove Mr. Delainey's accusations about what was said at the March 2001 meeting in Mr. Skilling's office. All but one participant in the meeting — a former Enron accountant, Wesley H. Colwell — is likely to be unavailable for the defense.

Mr. Colwell testified earlier in the trial for the government but was not asked about his role in the effort to shift losses out of the retail unit.

Another participant in the meeting that day, Mr. Causey, is not likely to be called by the government except as a rebuttal witness, if at all, prosecutors have said.

Executive Pay Rises Show Big Slowdown In US (FT)

By Dan Roberts

Financial Times, March 20, 2006

Growth in US executive pay has slowed sharply in spite of record profit growth, according to preliminary findings from an independent corporate governance watchdog.

The Corporate Library, which usually estimates greater pay inflation than most industry studies, calculates that US chief executives took home 11 per cent more money in 2005, compared with a 30 per cent rise the year previously. Among the 500 largest companies, median total compensation reported to date rose by just 3.7 per cent in 2005 to $5.2m.

“It is early days yet, but it may be possible to find some small encouragement in the fact that, at least for a group of companies, compensation increases for CEOs, while far exceeding those for other employees, have dropped from the heady levels found in last year’s survey,” said Paul Hodgson, senior research associate.

DOJ_NMG_0018667

The slowdown coincides with a change in tactics among pay campaigners, who believe they may be reaching the limit of their efforts to shame companies into pay restraint.

More transparent disclosure rules that were recently proposed by the Securities and Exchange Commission should soon make it much harder for companies to disguise the total pay packages that are received by their executives.

Activists, such as those running union pension funds, are shifting their attention, proposing resolutions that will make it easier for investors to nominate directors to compensation committees or vote on approving remuneration, as is common in the UK and Australia.

"We are at a critical point as boardroom vested interests fight tooth and nail against further reform and there is a danger that the focus on disclosure becomes a distraction from the real question, which is board accountability," said Brandon Rees, a researcher with the AFL-CIO's office of investment.

Some experts are sceptical that giving investors the information and the tools to tackle boardroom excesses will necessarily make much difference to overall levels of pay.

"We may discover that investors are not really that bothered," said Mr Hodgson.

"There will be even fewer excuses with the proposed disclosure regulations coming in, so what will happen then is the blame will shift from compensation committees to shareholders."

Pat McGurn, special counsel at Institutional Shareholder Services, said this coming year would prove the acid test for those who argue that improved corporate governance automatically leads to lower executive pay. "The SEC can bring you to the water, but it is up to investors to fix things," he said.

While the Corporate Library's latest figures show pay inflation slowing, many high-profile cases appear the result of voluntary restraint. For example, General Electric announced its chief executive had chosen to waive the cash portion of his bonus due to poor stock price performance.

CEOs Report Stricter Rules (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, March 20, 2006

Large U.S. companies are making strides in corporate-governance practices, from creating stronger independent boards to linking more executives' pay packages to their companies' performance, according to a survey out today.

The survey of 100 CEOs by the Business Roundtable, a group of CEOs whose companies boast $4 trillion in revenue, suggests that leading corporations are taking their watchdog roles more seriously in the wake of Enron and other corporate scandals.

"This shows dramatic change, and it's all motivated by the desire for good corporate governance," said Steve Odland, CEO of Office Depot and corporate-governance chair of the Business Roundtable.

Among the survey's findings:

·Pay practices. Some 57% of companies have increased pay-for-performance elements in their executives' compensation packages. That's up from 40% in 2004. Also, nearly all companies have stock-ownership requirements or guidelines for executives and directors.

In general, pay and governance experts believe that corporate officials do a better job if their pay is tied to companies' earnings and stock-price performances.

·Board independence and oversight. At least 91% of the companies have an independent chairman or lead director — up from 71% two years ago.

Barely 11%, though, have split the chairman and CEO positions. Shareholder activists and some regulators think boards should be run not by CEOs, but by chairs with no ties to management.

·Compliance costs. Half the CEOs expect their costs to comply with the Sarbanes-Oxley anti-fraud laws to drop this year. Only 6% predict their costs will rise. Larger companies spend several million dollars a year in compliance costs.

Charles Elson, director of the University of Delaware's Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance, said the survey shows that companies "have made progress, but we still have a long way to go."

For instance, he said, all executives already should have pay-for-performance packages. The bigger issue: How is their pay structured? If pay increases are pegged to a 5% short-term investment return, that's far less demanding than higher goals over five or 10 years.

Elson said companies are improving their governance because of pressure from pension funds, labor unions and regulators, plus court rulings that make directors liable for not policing their firms.

DOJ_NMG_0018668

Executive pay has soared since the 1980s, provoking criticism from leading investors. “Too often executive compensation in the U.S. is ridiculously out of line with performance,” Berkshire Hathaway CEO Warren Buffett said in a letter to his shareholders last month.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Defendant In Plame Case Switches Focus To WMD (USAT/AP)

By Pete Yost, The Associated Press

USA Today, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Ten months ahead of his scheduled trial in the Valerie Plame affair, I. Lewis “Scooter” Libby seems intent on zeroing in on three little letters: WMD.

In their latest court filing, Libby's legal team described Plame's CIA identity as “at most a peripheral issue” to “the media conflagration” over the failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

It's the media conflagration, and the resulting fingerpointing among the White House, the CIA and the State Department over who was to blame, that Libby's lawyers want to focus on in a bid to get him off, their court papers suggest.

Libby's lawyers also suggested in a court filing late Friday that it's the State Department — not Libby — who's to blame for leaking Plame's CIA identity to the media.

The court papers underscore the possibility that a criminal trial of Libby could highlight the ongoing debate over whether the White House manipulated intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq.

If the jury learns the background information about “fingerpointing,” and also understands Libby's additional focus on urgent national security matters, the jury will more easily appreciate how Libby may have forgotten or misremembered “snippets of conversation” about Plame's CIA status, the defense lawyers stated.

Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff was indicted Oct. 28 on five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about how he learned of Plame's CIA employment and what he told reporters about her.

Libby's lawyers are asking U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton for access to government documents about a 2002 trip that Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, made to the African nation of Niger at the CIA's behest and about “his wife's involvement” with that mission.

The documents relate to what prospective witnesses — including then-deputy secretary of State Richard Armitage and deputy White House chief of staff Karl Rove — might say at Libby's trial.

Noting news reports last week, the court papers say there has been speculation that Armitage told The Washington Post's Bob Woodward that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA, and speculation that Woodward's source and the primary source for conservative columnist Robert Novak are the same person.

Novak disclosed Plame's identity on July 14, 2003, eight days after Wilson contended in a New York Times op-ed column that the administration twisted prewar intelligence to exaggerate the Iraqi threat from a nuclear weapons program.

“If the facts ultimately show that Mr. Armitage or someone else from the State Department was also Mr. Novak's primary source, then the State Department and certainly not Mr. Libby bears responsibility for the ‘leak,' ” Libby's lawyers said.

The court filing also focused on Marc Grossman, a former undersecretary of state for political affairs who allegedly told Libby a month before Plame's identity was disclosed that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.

“If Mr. Armitage or another State Department official was in fact the primary source for Mr. Novak's article, Mr. Grossman's testimony may be colored by either his personal relationship with Mr. Armitage or his concern for the institutional concerns of the state Department,” the lawyers wrote.

Rove — a source for Novak and Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper — is under investigation by special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald.

Libby's lawyers say that “either the government or the defense may call Mr. Rove as a witness at trial” and note that “the grand jury's investigation may be continuing with respect to Mr. Rove or other witnesses.”

The defense says the documents it seeks will help demonstrate that the White House did not launch a concerted effort to punish Wilson by leaking his wife's identity.

Libby also is asking for notes from a September 2003 meeting in the White House Situation Room where Colin Powell, who was secretary of State, is reported to have said that everyone knows Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and that it was Wilson's wife who suggested the CIA sent her husband to Niger.

DOJ_NMG_0018669

"The media conflagration ignited by the failure to find WMD in Iraq and in part by Mr. Wilson's criticism of the administration, led officials within the White House, the State Department and the CIA to blame each other, publicly and in private, for faulty prewar intelligence about Iraq's WMD capabilities," the court papers state.

"The government's version of events blows out of proportion the minor role Ms. Wilson actually played and in doing so creates an impression that is highly prejudicial to Mr. Libby," they say.

Wilson's accusations stemmed from President Bush's assertion in his 2003 State of the Union address that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein had recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa.

Based on his 2002 trip, Wilson said he had found it doubtful that Niger had agreed to sell uranium yellowcake to Iraq, as alleged in intelligence provided to the CIA.

Why Clearing A Cop's Name Matters In Abramoff Scandal (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

A former D.C. cop could alter national politics this year.

Here's why: An appeals court decision that involves the police officer could well make it harder for prosecutors to make a case against lawmakers implicated in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Pundits have long predicted that testimony by Abramoff would produce a string of indictments of federal officials this year and that those, in turn, would so tarnish the reputation of his fellow Republicans that the party could lose control of the House, the Senate or both in the November elections.

But that was before the surprising court decision that helped a former Metropolitan Police Department detective named Nelson Valdes.

According to the court's record, Valdes ran license plates through a law enforcement database and provided the vehicle-owner information he collected to a person who paid him cash. He was convicted in 2002 of taking illegal gratuities.

But a three-judge appeals court panel recently reversed that decision. It said, in an opinion dated Feb. 24, that his actions weren't a formal part of his duties and therefore weren't covered by the statute.

Scholars say that as a result of the Valdes case, the process of charging lawmakers and their aides with wrongdoing in the Abramoff scandal (and others like it) will be more difficult.

"Now, virtually every time the government tries to bring an official-acts prosecution, the defense will cite the Valdes case," said George D. Brown, professor at Boston College Law School. "The decision raises a substantial element of doubt,"

Kathleen Clark, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis, agreed. "I'd be very troubled if I were in the Justice Department pursuing these things," she said.

The federal appeals court here in the District decided that officials such as Valdes should not be convicted for taking payoffs unless their behavior involved a "decision or action" that affected a "formal government decision made in fulfillment of government's public responsibilities."

"Casual and informal use of government resources," which in this case included Valdes's database queries, the decision added, would not qualify as the kind of official act that could be prosecuted under the law.

His conviction on three counts of receiving an illegal gratuity was overturned, and other bribery-like cases could be turned upside down, as well.

In short, Clark said, the Valdes case "narrows the scope of what is an official act."

"It certainly hamstrings the use of the gratuities statute as the basis for a public corruption indictment," Brown agreed.

Not every expert agrees, of course. And lawyers are still poring over the details of the ruling. But many of those who have studied the decision closely believe that it leaves the definition of "official act" vague enough to cast doubt on all sorts of corruption cases.

Put simply: How can prosecutors know for sure what are formal and what are informal duties involved in an official act?

Some instances are clear-cut. If a lawmaker accepts money to vote in favor of a briber's interest, that is obviously a crime.

But if the lawmaker uses his powerful position to pressure a business executive to help a friend who gives him money, is that a formal official act? Maybe not.

Or what about the instance in which a lawmaker calls an executive branch official to praise a business that wants a government contract? Even though the bureaucrat understands the conversation to be a pointed request on the business's behalf, would the communication be a formal official act or an informal one?

Who knows? But that distinction could make all the difference.

All we know is that the Valdes case has raised the bar on proof for the prosecution.

DOJ_NMG_0018670

"It opens the door for good defense lawyers to make arguments," Clark said. "This could open the way to a lot of tough motions to dismiss" bribery and gratuity cases.

Here are the facts of the case:

On Feb. 17, 2001, Valdes met William Blake, an FBI informant posing as a judge. They exchanged pleasantries at a popular nightclub called MCCXXIII near DuPont Circle and went on to see each other on several other occasions.

Blake said he might need Valdes to do him a favor. That favor turned out to be obtaining data such as automobile registration information about various people through a police computer system. In implicit exchange for the assistance, Blake gave Valdes money.

Valdes was indicted on three counts of bribery and was convicted on three counts of receipt of an illegal gratuity, a lesser charge. But he appealed and won reversal last month.

The majority ruled that the government "failed to show that the acts for which Valdes received compensation were official acts" within the meaning of the bribery statute. What the government needed, the decision stated, was to show "at least a rudimentary degree of formality" in what that official act was.

In dissent, Judge Karen LeCraft Henderson accused the majority of, in effect, making payoffs legal.

"In Mexico, they call it 'la mordida' (literally, 'the bite'); in Iran, 'bakhshish'; and in France, 'pot-de-vin.' Here in America, we call it a 'payoff' and, today, the majority calls it lawful," Henderson wrote.

She also said that Valdes was clearly acting officially when he used the police's special databases.

But at least for cases that come before the federal court in Washington, the majority will rule. Any future bribery charges against lawmakers or their aides will probably be harder to prove thanks to this obscure onetime detective.

An Unassuming Witness, Steeped In The Underworld (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

To look at him, one might never guess that Burton Kaplan devoted 40 years to a protean life of crime.

Short, bald, meek, myopic, Mr. Kaplan is an unassuming presence, an aging man from Brooklyn with more than a vague resemblance to the low-rent hucksters who gather every week for pastrami sandwiches in Woody Allen's "Broadway Danny Rose."

He is a complex character, who, for decades, led a double life. On one hand, he was that stock-in-trade cliché, "the legitimate businessman," who owned a discount clothing store in Bensonhurst and a factory for Chinese garment makers in Antigua. On the other hand, he is — or was — an inexhaustible fountainhead of crime.

Both sides of Mr. Kaplan's personality were on display this week in Federal District Court in Brooklyn, where he spent three vivid days as the star government witness at the trial of Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, retired New York detectives, who stand accused of taking part in at least eight murders for the mob.

He linked the lawmen to at least a dozen killings and kept the courtroom spellbound with his clipped accounts of how the two defendants had once gunned down a gangster on the grass berm of the Belt Parkway and, earlier, had delivered a kidnapped mobster to his rival, who accepted the bounty in the parking lot of a Flatbush Toys "R" Us.

In 14 hours on the stand, Mr. Kaplan, 72, speaking softly and lubricating his accounts with constant gulps of water, proved himself a linchpin of the prosecution's case and then survived the opening round of cross-examination. By Thursday evening, when court let out, it was clear he had an encyclopedic understanding of the underworld — the Balzac, if you will, of Brooklyn crime.

It was an unlikely expertise for a young man raised in Depression-era Bedford-Stuyvesant to a working-class family that owned an appliance store on Vanderbilt Avenue. A feckless student, Mr. Kaplan attended the prestigious Brooklyn Technical High School, but dropped out after a year and a half. "I wish I'd stood there," he testified this week.

On St. Patrick's Day 1952, he said, he enlisted in the Navy and was sent to Japan, where he spent the early cold war deciphering and analyzing Russian military codes. Discharged four years later, he returned to Brooklyn and the family business, installing washers, dryers and air-conditioners, as his father had done.

But even then, he told the court, he had a secret. He was "a degenerate gambler," betting on the horses and playing in "neighborhood poker games" from the age of 13. "I enjoyed it, I became sick with it," he said.

Gambling led to debts, which led to loan sharks, which led to the Mafia, he said. By the 1960's, Mr. Kaplan said, he was in the orbit of Christopher Furnari, a rising star in the Luchese family, to whom he offered fealty through what he called "small pays."

Mr. Kaplan was never an imposing man (he said he once paid someone $1,000 while in prison to assault another inmate on his behalf), although he did have a taste for "rough-and-tumble characters," as Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler, said. The roughest among them was no doubt the Luchese underboss, Anthony Casso, who once shot a dog outside a gangster bar for barking too loudly.

In 1985, when Mr. Furnari went to prison, Mr. Kaplan — and his "pays"— were handed over, gangland-style, to Mr. Casso, and the two men started dining together at least twice a week. By then, Mr. Kaplan's business ventures had encompassed everything from counterfeit watches to homemade quaaludes. He was also smuggling marijuana, though at first, he said, "I didn't even know what it was."

The next year, mob assassins tried to murder Mr. Casso, and he turned to Mr. Kaplan for assistance with revenge. Mr. Kaplan testified that the gangster knew he had connections to a pair of Brooklyn lawmen who would kill for cash, and he said Mr. Casso hired them to wreak his vengeance on seven rivals, who all eventually turned up dead.

Mr. Kaplan said it was the start of a blood-tie that bound the mobster to the two detectives from 1986 to 1993, when Mr. Casso was arrested. In 1994, he agreed to cooperate with the authorities, and Mr. Kaplan, despite a wife in Brooklyn and a daughter in Manhattan, went, as he put it, "on the lam."

He was already in his 60's, but with help from friends, he said, he got a library card and memberships at AAA and Costco, all in the name of Barry Mayers, and used these fake documents to obtain a state ID. He skulked about from San Diego to Mexico to Oregon and finally to Las Vegas. There, in a triumph of fugitive entrepreneurship, he opened a storefront warehouse selling suits to "female casino executives."

"A good suit for a good value," he said.

Then, without a word to anyone, he returned to New York City in the spring of 1996 and was arrested that September on a federal narcotics charge in which he was accused of selling up to 13,000 pounds of marijuana a year.

After spending nine years in prison, he decided he would testify at trial. His agreement with the government is classic Burton Kaplan.

In exchange for his cooperation, he faces a prison term with an abundance of wiggle room: "zero to life," he said.

Pellicano Wiretap Witness Admits Scheme (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian And Andrew Blankstein, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

A Valencia businessman who said he hired the investigator to get illegal information decides to cooperate with the federal investigation.

A Valencia businessman admitted Friday to conspiring with Anthony Pellicano to illegally dig up information about a teenager who had accused him of sexual assault, becoming the latest witness cooperating in the federal probe of the indicted private eye.

"I hired Mr. Pellicano because he told me he could listen in" to the young woman's phone calls, a shaken George Kalta, 37, told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer, as he entered his guilty plea. "That was the only reason I hired Mr. Pellicano."

The plea makes Kalta the fourth person to acknowledge that they hired — or helped — Pellicano to illegally investigate others using wiretaps, confidential police record searches or other methods.

Once one of Los Angeles' best-known private investigators, Pellicano is at the center of a wide-ranging FBI investigation that has shaken Hollywood and its legal community. To date, 13 people have been charged, including an entertainment attorney, a record company executive, two former police officers accused of selling him confidential data and several telephone company employees.

Without exception, the many attorneys and celebrities who hired Pellicano over the years have said since his indictment that they were unaware that his alleged hardball tactics may have crossed the line into lawlessness.

But criminal defense attorney Leslie Abramson, representing Kalta, said outside court on Friday that Pellicano bragged to her client about listening in on other people's conversations and about having connections within law enforcement. The connections included "a contact" in the Los Angeles County district attorney's office and a police officer who he said could get him a district attorney's memo for $5,000.

"He bragged about how he did this [wiretapping] for other clients," Abramson said. "He said that is why people pay him so much."

Abramson said Pellicano also boasted of his celebrity clients, including Tom Cruise, Michael Jackson and O.J. Simpson.

Kalta, owner of a lighting manufacturing company, was charged by the district attorney's office in early 2002 with sexual battery by restraint and false imprisonment.

County prosecutors said his victim was an 18-year-old woman who was assaulted in October 2001, when she was making a delivery to Kalta's Canoga Park store.

DOJ_NMG_0018672

Kalta eventually pleaded guilty to felony assault without a deadly weapon and was granted probation. The charge was later reduced to a misdemeanor and dismissed, Abramson said.

During Friday's federal court hearing, Assistant U.S. Atty. Kevin Lally said authorities could prove that Kalta hired Pellicano on Oct. 17, 2001, to investigate his accuser and to listen to the woman's telephone conversations. Kalta paid Pellicano $50,000 for the information.

Outside court, Abramson said her client went to Pellicano after searching the Internet for a private investigator who could help prove his innocence.

She said Kalta later began to suspect that Pellicano was bugging his telephone because on four separate occasions between March and May of 2002, the investigator called Kalta right after Kalta spoke with Abramson. "Every single time we had a conversation about Pellicano, as soon as we hung up, he would call George and badmouth me," she said.

The events outlined by Abramson parallel those of another criminal defendant who also hired Pellicano and was represented by attorney Danny Davis. Davis represented Kalta before Abramson.

Last year, Abramson said, federal prosecutors played her and her client a recorded conversation in which Pellicano urged Kalta not to fire another attorney in order to hire Abramson. "He said I was not a lawyer he could trust," Abramson said.

Kalta, however, hired Abramson, who brought in another private investigator.

After that, Abramson said, Kalta found the locks in his office glued shut. One of the doors had a knife jammed into a keyhole.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Dan Saunders said he could not discuss evidence in the case that had not yet been made public. Pellicano's attorney, Steven Gruel, could not be reached for comment.

A spokeswoman for the district attorney said she was unaware of claims that Pellicano had a contact within the office and urged anyone with information to come forward.

Davis' attorney, Harland Braun, disputed the notion that Pellicano had any special relationship with Davis. He said Davis became involved in the two cases after Pellicano had been hired.

Without disputing that her client broke the law, Abramson said Kalta was hardly the most important figure in the Pellicano investigation.

"There are much bigger fish to fry," she said. "As far as I'm concerned, George is a minnow."

Men Accused In Child Prostitution Ring Describe Teens As Partners (ABJ)

Akron Beacon Journal, March 20, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio - Troopers and a judge in Pennsylvania found themselves repeatedly processing the same young prostitutes, who paid fines with already-prepared money orders and went back to the truck stops where they worked.

Slowly, through talks with the girls, authorities built up evidence that led to federal charges against men accused forcing teenage girls from northwest Ohio to work in a prostitution ring, a newspaper reported.

The work was painstaking. And the jailed men accused of being pimps are unrepentant, The Blade reported in Sunday's editions.

"Pimps do things like ... lock the girls up in closets. I'm 'finesseful,' you know what I'm saying?" Derek Maes told the newspaper in a telephone interview from a Pennsylvania jail.

He and 12 other men were named in a 102-page federal indictment in December that accused them of taking teenagers, including at least nine from the Toledo area, across state lines for prostitution. The indictment said the girls were beaten if they failed to follow orders or make enough money.

Maes, 41, and another man charged, Robert Scott, 44, deny they are pimps, arguing that they didn't force the girls - including a 12-year-old - to do anything. They say if the girls were selling themselves against their will, they would have asked law enforcement for help when arrested.

Scott said the prostitutes were more like business partners, free to work with different employers.

"She's choosing the best investment for her money," he said. "The prosecutors are trying to make it like a bunch of us running around with candy in our pocket, going to parks and picking up little kids. It wasn't like that at all - period."

The federal case centered on truck stops outside Harrisburg, Pa., where state police had started cracking down on the problem through undercover arrests.

Fines collected for offenses such as prostitution and vandalism in a township with one of the truck stops increased tenfold to $32,400 in 2004 from about $3,300 a year earlier.

"You could sit and watch girls run down the rows, run under the trucks, in all directions. There were some nights out there it looked ridiculous," said trooper David Olweiler, a state police intelligence officer.

DOJ_NMG_0018673

As arrests piled up, Olweiler started keeping the girls' booking photos in a three-ring binder, trying to show a pattern of repeat arrests. He also had long conversations, trying to understand them.

"A lot of these girls, you wouldn't know they're victims," he said. "They love to brag. You wouldn't know they were in it against their will."

The prostitutes came to court with money orders already made out for the exact fine and costs of $418.50, West Hanover Township Magistrate Roy Bridges said.

"You should have seen how some of them were dressed," Bridges told the newspaper. "Sometimes troopers would wrap them up in one of those yellow blankets used to cover dead bodies."

Eventually, state police called for federal help.

The FBI assigned 16 new agents to the investigation, and the agency is hiring six more this year. The FBI says the interstate ring is organized crime, equating it to drug trafficking.

Many of the girls came from backgrounds of abuse or incest, and the pimps conditioned them through abuse and threats against family members to accept their fate, said Chip Burrus, the FBI's acting assistant director for criminal investigations.

"They just become accustomed to that lifestyle," Burrus said. "You can't consent to be a prostitute at age 14. That's just an impossibility."

After the indictments, the truck stops near Harrisburg cleared out.

"For a long time, we didn't see anybody," Olweiler said. "But one of our patrols came back the other day and said they're back out there."

Corruption Case Swallows The Police Force Of A Texas Town (LAT)

By Lianne Hart, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

Many Troup residents are shocked by the shutdown amid charges of evidence tampering. But rumors of lapses have circulated for years.

TROUP, Texas — It happened without warning. The FBI swooped in, shut down Troup's five-man police force and jailed the chief and a sergeant — the 2005 Chamber of Commerce officer of the year, no less — on charges of corruption.

Startled residents watched in silence as authorities secured the tiny station with yellow crime-scene tape and swarmed the building for evidence.

Sgt. Mark Turner, 47, was charged with delivering marijuana and tampering with or fabricating evidence. According to a search warrant, Turner gave marijuana to an undercover agent, assuring him later that there was more where that came from: the police evidence box.

Police Chief Chester Kennedy, who led the force for 14 years, also was charged with evidence tampering. He admitted to investigators that he gave Turner 24 cans of light beer from a 30-pack seized in a bootlegging case, but said he planned to buy more if the case went to court. "Beer is beer," he said, according to a Sheriff's Department affidavit.

Events unfolded so quickly here that, weeks after the March 3 raid, stunned residents are still talking about it when they meet on the street. Some, however, are less surprised; rumors of police misconduct had circulated for years.

"Mind you, they're innocent until proven guilty, but I think there was too much temptation," said Addie Herring, 85, who has lived in Troup for half a century. "This used to be such a good place to live, but now we've got all this dope."

Here in rural East Texas, methamphetamine labs can operate unnoticed. Misdemeanor drug charges in Smith County, about 100 miles southeast of Dallas, are as common as drunk driving arrests, Dist. Atty. Matt Bingham said. But in the last six years, the Troup police force sent just 11 drug cases to the district attorney's office.

Maj. Mike Lusk, head of criminal investigations for the Smith County Sheriff's Department, said Troup police had sent a total of two drug evidence samples to the Texas Department of Public Safety crime lab since 2000. "We do that much in an hour," he said.

Bingham said: "It appears from the current investigation that the problem is not with the Troup Police Department prosecuting innocent people, it is that they were not prosecuting guilty people."

Lawyers for Kennedy and Turner could not be reached for comment.

Since the police force was shut down, a notice has been taped to the front door of the darkened station: Dial 911 or call the sheriff in an emergency.

Turner, unable to make $500,000 bond, remains in jail. At an emergency City Council meeting held days after his arrest, he was fired.

DOJ_NMG_0018674

Kennedy, 59, posted $400,000 bond and often can be seen at his regular table at the Farmer's Cafe in Troup. The waitresses welcome him with smiles, but fellow diners shoot sidelong glances as he keeps his eyes on his meal. At a special City Council session March 10, Kennedy too was fired.

At that meeting, resident Vicki Risvold stood and said what had festered inside for too long. For years, she said, drugs were sold openly from the house across the street. Risvold said packets of white powder were traded so casually that her young daughter recognized a sale in progress. Twice Risvold reported the drug dealing to police, who promised to look into it but never did, she said.

"We moved from Austin for a small-town life, but my children weren't exposed to the drug culture until we came here," said Risvold, 43. The city officials sat in a semi-circle in front of her. Risvold looked hard at one who, when she had told him about the drug dealing, had merely asked if she was sure.

"I hope you can sleep at night," Risvold said, her voice quaking with anger.

Mayor John Whitsell, 30, has brushed off suggestions that Troup had turned a blind eye. If there was talk of wrongdoing, it was rumor, and "in any small town, you're going to have rumors," he said.

Whitsell said he had no idea there might be a problem with the police until he got a call from authorities about the arrests. "I was shocked," he said.

It took one of the department's own to call attention to the alleged corruption. In January, patrolman Justin Johnson told a Smith County sheriff's investigator that Kennedy and Turner were accepting money or drugs in exchange for covering up crimes. Before long, Johnson was wearing a recorder and talking to Turner about taking drugs from an evidence box for personal use.

Authorities searching the station after it closed found a department in disarray, Lusk said. Drugs were lying in open bags or had not been tagged; some evidence bags were empty; rape kits were stored in a refrigerator next to rancid, moldy food. As the investigation continues, more charges and arrests will come, Bingham said.

Since the FBI raid, Bingham said, the district attorney's office has fielded dozens of calls from citizens complaining of crimes they said were poorly, or never, investigated by Troup police. "People feel like they can come out and tell us things now," Bingham said.

Troup bills itself as the "good neighbor town." It has 1,949 residents, one medical doctor and 12 churches. Its main street is a study in shuttered stores, but the businesses that seem to sustain small Texas towns hang on: a beauty parlor, a video store, a tanning salon. Outside of town are oil pumps operated by heavy-booted riggers, who stomp into eateries and leave behind trails of red dirt.

Robin Bradford works on the production line at a plastics factory, cleaning just-made buckets as they roll down a conveyor belt. In December, she said, someone stole her furniture and a lifetime of possessions from a rented storage room. The thief took an urn that held her father's ashes but left a large painting of Jesus.

"It seemed that all Mark and Chester did was take fingerprints. The more I thought about it, the more upset I got," Bradford said, stabbing a piece of fried catfish with her fork.

But some in the diner where Bradford was eating defended the officers as caring professionals who often performed acts of kindness.

Kennedy had the city turn on Rodney Colbert's water when he was new to town and waiting for his first paycheck, Colbert said.

Anita Watson said Kennedy sometimes picked up children at school in his patrol car when parents couldn't get off work.

"The children trust him," Watson said. "That says a lot about what kind of person he is. I'm worried about how the children will feel."

Bradford looked up from her plate. "I'm worried about the children too, what kind of example he's setting for them," she said.

If Kennedy is found guilty, waitress Lisa Duley said, she won't hold a grudge. "Even if he did it, he's still Chester. Everybody makes mistakes. You deal with them and move on," she said.

Town leaders are focusing on cleaning up the mess and restoring Troup's reputation. The three remaining police officers have been transferred to the public works department. County constables and sheriff's deputies are temporarily filling the void, patrolling the town with vigilance.

"This is the most Sheriff Department cars I've ever seen, and I've been living in the same spot for 45 years," one woman said.

Though relieved that change is coming, Risvold hates that Troup's problems have been so publicly exposed. She's protective of the place where she raised four children, where her friends and memories reside.

"You want people to see the good in it, not the bad," she said. This is my home…. But I think it'll take a long time to trust the police again."

DOJ_NMG_0018675

Killing In Texas Spotlights Attacks On Social Workers (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

AUSTIN, Tex., March 19 (AP) — In six years as a social worker with the state's Child Protective Services, Holly Jones has been cursed, chased by dogs and run out of houses by angry parents.

Threats are a daily part of the job for caseworkers who investigate accusations of child abuse and neglect and often remove children from their homes. But the killing of a social worker in South Texas last week has prompted Ms. Jones and her colleagues to re-evaluate the steps they take to keep safe and has raised questions about what the state can do to better protect them.

"We don't have weapons, we don't have training in self-defense, we didn't go through a police academy and we're dealing with the same people they are," Ms. Jones said.

The social worker who was killed last week, Sally Blackwell, 53, was found in a field in Victoria on Wednesday. Her family said she had received threats in her position as program director, overseeing several offices of caseworkers. The authorities have ruled the case a homicide but have not said whether her death was related to her job.

The killing comes a year after a woman fired a shotgun at two caseworkers who had come to her home near Alice, about 45 miles west of Corpus Christi, to investigate a child abuse complaint. The caseworkers fled. The woman was convicted in December of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon.

Ms. Jones, 28, who recently became a supervisor for a Child Protective Services unit in suburban Austin, said caseworkers needed to know how to protect themselves.

A study released last week by the National Association of Social Workers found that 55 percent of 5,000 licensed social workers surveyed said they faced safety issues on the job. Sixty-eight percent of them said their employers had not adequately addressed their concerns. A survey in 2002 of 800 workers found 19 percent had been victims of violence and 63 percent had been threatened.

As the investigation into Ms. Blackwell's death continues, state protective services officials are thinking about ways to make the job safer, the Family and Protective Services commissioner, Carey Cockerell, said in an e-mail message to employees on Thursday.

Currently, social workers in Texas receive a half day of safety training, and the issue frequently comes up in a 12-week course, said a spokesman, Chris Van Deusen.

The child services department has no way of tracking how many threats its roughly 3,000 caseworkers receive, said Patrick Crimmins, spokesman for the Department of Family and Protective Services. But even people who have spent their entire careers with the agency can remember only a few instances in which threats escalated to violence, Mr. Crimmins said.

In 2001, Michigan lawmakers toughened the penalties for people who threaten or attack social workers after a child welfare caseworker was beaten, bound, gagged and suffocated while checking on a family. The law also required safety training for workers who make home visits.

The death of a Kansas mental health social worker prompted Representative Dennis Moore, Democrat of Kansas, to introduce a resolution last fall that would encourage state and local agencies to improve the safety of social workers. The resolution is pending.

Victim's Kin Denounce Shooting By Md. Deputy (WP)

By Christian Davenport

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

A 22-year-old Oxon Hill man fatally shot by a Charles County sheriff's deputy Saturday morning had drawn a handgun and fired it while three deputies were trying to arrest him on a drunken driving charge, the sheriff's office said yesterday.

Friends and relatives of the suspect, Jonathon Lyles, offered a starkly different view. They questioned whether Lyles had a gun and said officers targeted him because he was a young African American man who had had previous run-ins with police.

Sharonda Lyles, 28, of La Plata said her brother would not pull a gun on an officer. "I don't know why the police sought out to kill my brother," she said.

The sheriff's office said Lyles was shot about 7:30 a.m. after Officer James Thompson spotted his car, which had backed over a curb and nearly hit an apartment building in the 600 block of Zekiah Run Road in La Plata.

Authorities said Lyles was slumped over the steering wheel of the vehicle, which was still running, and Thompson called for backup. When two other officers arrived, they interviewed Lyles and gave him field sobriety tests, which Lyles failed, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0018676

As the deputies tried to arrest him and place him in handcuffs, Lyles fought back, drew a semiautomatic handgun and fired a shot that missed the officers, officials said.

They said Officer Clint Walter, a four-year member of the sheriff's office, fired back, hitting Lyles in the chest with a single shot. Lyles was taken to Prince George's Hospital Center, where he was pronounced dead.

Sheriff's officials said they recovered the handgun Lyles had fired, and they denied that race played a part in the shooting.

"The man had a gun. He fired on a police officer, and the police officer returned fire," Capt. Joe Montminy said. Race "has nothing to do with it. . . . [The officers] were struggling for their lives."

The officer who initially spotted Lyles's car, Thompson, is African American, said Kristen Timko, a spokeswoman for the sheriff's office. Walter and Officer Jonathan Rager, who responded to assist in the arrest, are white, she said.

All three have been placed on routine administrative leave pending an investigation.

John Bowlin, 22, of Largo, who is Lyles's half-brother, said the authorities' version of events does not make sense. He wondered why the deputies did not immediately check whether Lyles had a gun, before the sobriety tests.

Timko said suspects may or may not be patted down for weapons, depending on the circumstances.

Lyles's friends and family members gathered yesterday at the scene of the shooting, where a shrine of candles and flowers had been created.

Sharonda Lyles said her brother had served time in prison for drug offenses and violating parole and had been pursuing a career in music since his release in November.

"He was trying to get his life together, and they kill him," said friend Michael Jones, 24, of La Plata.

Lyles worked at a mall music store selling CDs and T-shirts and was working on a rap album, his sister said. She said he was tall and plain-spoken. "He would do anything for you," she said. "He was all that. He was my little brother."

She and several of Lyles's friends, who had gone to the scene Saturday morning after word of the shooting spread, said Lyles was left lying on his back for about an hour without medical care before an ambulance came.

Timko disputed that, saying the officers immediately called for an ambulance, which arrived 3 1/2 minutes later. Once the paramedics assessed the situation, they called for a helicopter, which arrived at a nearby fire station at 7:59 a.m., about 30 minutes after the shooting, Timko said.

Quest To Heal Leads Abuse Victim To Face Old Demons (WP)

By Caryle Murphy

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

On a balmy, hint-of-spring day last week, Michael Donovan drove his rented car slowly past Holy Name School in Northeast Washington, where a billboard read, "He who angers you, controls you."

The 63-year-old Vietnam veteran and retired businessman from California was on a mission into his past, a mission to banish his own anger and regain control. A mission of healing.

Almost 50 years ago, during Donovan's eighth-grade spring break, he was sexually abused at Holy Name by Thomas S. Schaefer, then a 30-year-old, newly minted Roman Catholic priest.

Schaefer went on to molest at least 20 more boys in the Washington Archdiocese, according to church officials, before pleading guilty in 1995 in five of those cases. Only one other priest in the archdiocese, Robert J. Petrella, had more known victims, officials said. About 25 people have reported being molested by Petrella. The two priests were responsible for more than a third of the 123 reports of sexual abuse by clergy in the archdiocese's 59-year history.

For decades, Donovan kept quiet about his traumatic experience, confiding only in his current wife. But in 2003, determined to be counted in a national survey of the church's abuse problem, he informed the archdiocese of Schaefer's 1956 misconduct. He learned then that he was Schaefer's earliest known victim.

"It took me 47 years to raise my hand," Donovan said. "These are things that get buried in people's lives. But they don't forget it."

Donovan, who served with the 101st Airborne in Vietnam, recalled that the priests who took his initial calls apologized immediately, which "was really heartfelt by me. Nobody had ever apologized to me for what happened."

He decided that he needed to do two things to "face the dragon I need to face." One was to meet Schaefer. The other was to visit the room at his old school where the abuse occurred.

Psychologists and victims' advocates say it is common for survivors of child sexual abuse to want to meet their abusers, partly because the once-powerless child becomes the empowered adult controlling the encounter.

Gary Schoener, a Minneapolis psychologist whose clinic has treated more than 4,000 people abused by professionals, including teachers, doctors, psychiatrists and clergy, said that "at least half of child abuse victims want to physically see or visit with the offender. . . . They feel that any kind of clarity about why those things happened can help healing."

DOJ_NMG_0018677

Donovan asked the archdiocese to pay for him and his wife to travel to see Schaefer. In June 2004, the archdiocese sent him a check for $3,000. It has also paid for his psychological counseling, Donovan said.

Donovan has retained a lawyer who is negotiating with the archdiocese for a financial settlement.

After his 1995 conviction, Schaefer was sentenced to 16 years in prison by Prince George's County Circuit Court Judge William B. Spellbring Jr. But after Schaefer had served less than five months, the judge suspended the rest of the sentence and released him to a facility for priests with psychological problems.

Now 80, Schaefer lives in Vianney Renewal Center in Dittmer, Mo., about 30 miles from St. Louis. Run by the Servants of the Paraclete, a religious order of men, the center is a community for priests who cannot engage in active ministry "for personal, health-related, psychological, social or canonical reasons," according to its Web site.

He is not allowed to leave the community unsupervised, Washington Archdiocese spokeswoman Susan Gibbs said, adding that "the archdiocese pays to keep him in that facility.

"He's asked several times to return to Washington. . . . He'd like to die here," Gibbs said. "And we have declined because we want to ensure that he never returns to this community where he harmed children." Schaefer is not receiving a church pension, she said.

Schaefer did not respond to a message left with a Vianney official seeking comment.

Donovan and his wife, Sharon, met Schaefer in St. Louis. A psychologist treating Schaefer was also present, Donovan said.

Schaefer, who is tall, thin and balding, was aloof, the couple said in separate interviews. "We were expecting to find a feeble, old man in poor health," said Sharon Donovan. "He seemed to be a vigorous . . . quite a dapper man. Well-dressed, well-groomed, urbane, quite distant, quite cavalier about the whole thing."

Schaefer did not admit doing anything wrong with Donovan, both said. But Sharon Donovan said he told her husband, "I'm sorry for anything I might have done to hurt you."

Donovan recalled that Schaefer "said that he had found his peace with God and that God had forgiven him."

Their meeting also included this: "He had no recollection of me," Donovan said. "Zero."

Initially, Donovan said he felt "elation" that he had "conducted myself as a gentleman. . . . I came away feeling empowered. But a few weeks later, it hit me like a ton of bricks," and he sought professional help for an emotional breakdown.

What Schaefer could not recall, Donovan could not forget.

The pale, redheaded priest at Holy Name favored him, Donovan said, often taking him out of class to spend time together because, as Schaefer told the nuns, he thought Donovan might have a vocation to be a priest.

Schaefer also knew Donovan's love of wrestling, and during spring break in 1956, when no one else was in the school, he suggested that they wrestle. But the priest showed up saying that he had forgotten his wrestling gear and asked whether they could wrestle "Greco-Roman style," or nude, Donovan said. "I gave no thought to the impropriety of it," he said.

As they wrestled for the next three-quarters of an hour, Schaefer got increasingly excited and aggressive, finally attempting to sodomize him, Donovan recalled. "At the very end, I was fighting someone who was trying to rape me," he said.

He said he struck the priest with an open-handed slap across the face. "I expected a lightning bolt from God because I'd hit a priest, but he immediately stopped and whimpered," Donovan said.

The building where he attended eighth grade is now a day care and parish activity center. On his visit, he quickly found the musty auditorium where he played a munchkin in the "Wizard of Oz" and the old basketball court "where I proved what a terrible basketball player I was."

But the low-ceilinged room, with its dusty wrestling mats, that he had come to see was not there. A layer of concrete covers the brick wall where, as Donovan recalls, there used to be a door to the room where he was molested.

He said he was not disappointed.

"I feel very good about being here. . . . It completes what I had to do. I've got what I needed out of it," he said. "There were many good days here. There was only one bad."

When Words Bear Witness (NYT)

By Michael Rips And Amy Lester

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

THE Supreme Court is scheduled to hear oral arguments today in two cases that may make domestic violence cases all but impossible to prosecute. The cases, Davis v. Washington and Hammon v. Indiana, raise the question of whether statements made to 911 operators can be admitted in prosecutions if those who made the calls refuse to appear in court. Such evidence has become crucial in bringing domestic abusers to justice.

DOJ_NMG_0018678

Domestic violence accounts for up to 34 percent of all reported violent crimes, but it is notoriously difficult to prosecute, because victims frequently drop charges or refuse to testify when their abusers threaten them with further violence. In the 1980's and 1990's, the refusal of victims to cooperate in the prosecution of their batterers may have resulted in the dismissal of as many as 70 percent of all domestic violence cases.

In recent years, however, prosecutors, police officers and advocates for domestic violence victims have developed techniques, together known as "evidence-based prosecution," that focus on the use of reliable evidence, like 911 tapes, to build cases that do not depend on the cooperation of the victim. In San Diego, the City Attorney's domestic violence unit uses evidence-based prosecution, and it obtains convictions in about 88 percent of its cases. In a typical six month period in the old days, the unit's conviction rate was just 12 percent.

But evidence-based prosecution suffered a major setback in 2004. That year, in Crawford v. Washington, the Supreme Court held that if witness statements were "testimonial" in nature, they could not be introduced unless the witness was available for cross-examination by the defendant. The court deferred the question of exactly what types of statements should be considered "testimonial." That is the matter at the heart of the two cases now before the court.

A significant number of courts have interpreted Crawford to bar the use of 911 tapes and answers to questions posed by police officers unless the witness is available for cross-examination. In so doing, they've overturned convictions in cases of domestic battery. In a survey of more than 60 prosecutors in California, Oregon and Washington, 63 percent said that Crawford hampered the prosecution of domestic violence; 76 percent reported that they'd grown more likely to drop domestic violence charges when they encountered uncooperative witnesses; and 65 percent said that Crawford had made domestic violence victims less safe than they were before. Reports from other jurisdictions echo these findings.

If the Supreme Court, in deciding Davis and Hammon, adopts a definition of "testimonial" that includes statements made by victims to 911 operators or to officers arriving at the scene of the abuse, prosecutors will face some undesirable options in domestic violence cases. They can refuse to bring cases in which the victim won't testify; or they can try to force the victim to testify. The latter is no solution because it would entail subjecting abuse victims to state-imposed sanctions, including jail time.

This is why, in answering the question left open by Crawford, the court should not define "testimonial" in a way that restricts the use of out-of-court statements made by victims to 911 operators or police officers at the scene of the crime. Without access to such evidence, the criminal justice system may be rendered virtually incapable of protecting victims of domestic violence and of holding their batterers accountable.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Grants Google A Reprieve (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

A federal judge ruled Google Inc. doesn't have to turn over data about consumer Web-search queries to the Justice Department.

U.S. District Judge James Ware on Friday ordered Google to work with the government to provide 50,000 randomly selected addresses for Web sites from its databases. He denied a request by government lawyers for a sampling of 5,000 search queries entered by Google users, concluding that they essentially duplicated information the government could glean from the Web addresses.

Judge Ware also said that turning over the queries potentially could cost Google the trust of some users, and he expressed concern about whether releasing "search queries themselves may constitute potentially sensitive information."

The Justice Department requested the information from Google last year to defend the Child Online Protection Act, a federal law intended to shield minors from sexually explicit materials on the Internet. Enforcement of the law has been blocked in the courts.

"This is a clear victory for our users," Google said in a statement Friday. A Justice Department spokesman couldn't be reached.

Some legal experts said future government requests could meet with more success.

"The next time the government comes calling, it will pile so much more on its side of the scale -- a better explanation of its need and a more compelling set of facts -- that the court will have no choice but to compel Google to turn over search queries," said Paul Ohm, a former Justice Department lawyer and associate professor at the University of Colorado School of Law.

Tobacco Lounge Blows Smoke In The Face Of Chicago's New Ban (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0018679

By Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

CHICAGO -- Glasses clink, friends chat in plush chairs and a fire crackles in a stone hearth at Marshall McGearty Tobacco Artisans, a "tobacco lounge" that has opened in Chicago's trendy Wicker Park neighborhood.

It appears every bit the bar or coffeehouse. But appearances can be deceiving: Marshall McGearty is technically a tobacco retail shop with at least 65 percent of its sales in tobacco.

And that means it is exempt from Chicago's new ban on smoking in bars, restaurants and other public places.

Many patrons on a recent evening were enjoying the lush atmosphere and freedom, they said, from dirty looks from nonsmokers.

But critics say the parent company of the lounge, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., is taking advantage of a loophole in the city's anti-smoking ordinance.

"It's just another example of tobacco companies skirting the law," said Kevin Tynan, marketing director for the American Lung Association of Metropolitan Chicago.

Last month, city Alderman Edward M. Burke introduced an ordinance to close the loophole in the smoking ban, stating that venues that serve food and drink cannot be classified as tobacco retail stores.

Burke's ordinance charges that "tobacco lounges have attempted to circumvent the power and purpose" of the smoking ban, which currently affects restaurants, music venues and other public places; bars and taverns have until 2008 to comply.

Though Marshall McGearty opened the same week in January that the Chicago City Council passed the anti-smoking ordinance, R.J. Reynolds said the timing is pure coincidence.

"This has nothing to do with the smoking ban," said RJR Senior Marketing Director Brian Stebbins, noting that the company opposes the smoking ban.

He said the lounge is solely intended to promote the company's new high-market Marshall McGearty brand of hand-rolled, small batch cigarettes with tobacco from Zimbabwe, Brazil and North Carolina. Stebbins noted that upscale cigar stores frequently have a few chairs and a television, and offer beverages such as Scotch or coffee.

The cigarettes at Marshall McGearty, with names such as Aegeans, Muse and the Earl, are displayed in ornate boxes with descriptions that sound more like fine wines. Oriental Rose promises "smoke that is creamy, sweet and delicate, highlighted by floral notes."

Stebbins said the lounge is a first for R.J. Reynolds and the first of its kind in the country. A spokesperson for Philip Morris USA said the company has no such outlets. Both declined to say whether they anticipate more tobacco lounges in the future. But judging from the number of smoking bans around the country, it is possible companies will see the lounges as a way to promote their brands while providing a hangout for smokers otherwise denied by bans.

"We certainly expect them to try to put these in other cities with bans," said Annie Tegen, program manager for the group Americans for Nonsmokers' Rights. "This is just another slimy trick by Big Tobacco to circumvent the system. An $8 pack of cigarettes still exudes the same toxins as a $4 pack. For the people of Chicago, this is an equal opportunity killer."

Sitting in the lounge, Clay Beardshear and Clay Achee said they had traveled along the West Coast for several months recently and had a hard time finding a place to have a cigarette with their beer or coffee, because most of the cities they visited had smoking bans.

When they arrived in Chicago and heard about Marshall McGearty, they made a beeline for it.

"This place will be booming," once the Chicago ordinance goes into full effect, predicted Achee as they played Scrabble and smoked.

A group of young women who meet at the lounge every Tuesday evening said they are tired of getting heat from nonsmokers and are happy to have a place to relax among their own.

"Just last night someone was saying I was blowing smoke in their face all night, though I wasn't aware of it," said Justine Hanchar, 28, a medical receptionist. "Anywhere you go, you get those vibes."

Sarah Nawrocki, 28, predicted the group will be there "every night" once the smoking ban goes into full effect.

Shannon Moore, a 24-year-old musician who said she enjoys the ambience created by smoke in the piano bars where she plays, said smoking has become "like an underground thing" because of bans and anti-smoking sentiment. "This is like a haven for us," she said.

There are about 6,000 municipalities nationwide with some type of smoke-free ordinance, and smoking is banned in all bars in the states of California, Connecticut, Washington, Delaware, Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Rhode Island and Vermont.

Tegen and other anti-smoking advocates said they think tobacco lounges ultimately will be unsuccessful in the face of growing opposition to smoking.

DOJ_NMG_0018680

"I'd expect this business model to flop," Tegen said. "People in Chicago are excited about the smoke-free law. And many smokers I know in Chicago don't mind stepping outside for five minutes to smoke. I don't see them as a trend that will continue."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Oakland Nears Final Payouts For Protesters Hurt By Police (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

OAKLAND, Calif., March 19 — A clash between the police and antiwar protesters here nearly three years ago will cost the City of Oakland more than $2 million, including dozens of payouts to people injured when officers fired wooden dowels, bean bags and rubber pellets.

The Oakland City Council is scheduled Tuesday to approve the final payments related to the incident, which was the most violent of many protests nationwide in the early weeks of the Iraq war. At least 58 people were injured, including nine longshoremen who were caught in the crossfire on their way to work.

The Oakland Police Department said officers had fired the "less than lethal" rounds to disperse several hundred demonstrators, some of whom the police said had thrown rocks at them.

The protesters said they had been behaving peacefully and accused the police of using excessive force. A lawsuit against the city, the Police Department and several officers, which led to the settlement payments, accused the authorities of civil rights violations.

Many here say the officers were on edge during the protest because state officials had warned that terrorists or self-described anarchists might try to disrupt the event, which was held at the Port of Oakland on April 7, 2003.

The demonstration had been organized to draw attention to two shipping companies that were assisting the government's military efforts. American President Lines was under contract to ship weapons to the military in Iraq, and Stevedoring Services of America held the government contract in 2003 to operate the port at Umm Qasr, Iraq.

In settling the lawsuit, the city did not admit fault, and there is still disagreement about whether the police were provoked by the protesters. Even so, the department did agree to change its crowd-control policy to prohibit the "indiscriminate use" of rubber and wooden bullets and similar ammunition and to require a fair warning to protesters to disperse.

"The settlements are a vindication," said Jim Chanin, one of the lawyers representing the protesters and dock workers. "The punishment did not fit the crime. It was not appropriate use of force."

Erica Harrold, a spokeswoman for the Oakland city attorney, John Russo, said the revision of the crowd-control policy was overdue, as were the clearer guidelines on the use of force.

"The most useful outcome of the case has been the revamping of the crowd-control and use-of-force policy," Ms. Harrold said, adding that the changes did not indicate an admission of wrongdoing.

The city has already paid more than $1 million to settle most of the claims. The payouts, from $5,000 to $500,000, cover medical costs associated with the injuries, which included broken bones and grapefruit-size welts and in some cases required operations and skin grafts.

Mr. Chanin estimated that the settlement would ultimately cost the city over $2 million, including $1.5 million in payments to the plaintiffs, plus legal fees and costs associated with the new crowd-control policy. That tally does not include the cost of hiring an outside lawyer to help with the case, which the city said would add well over $500,000.

Thirteen of the 52 plaintiffs had been holding out for a trial, in hopes of drawing attention to their complaints of free speech and civil rights violations, but in the end agreed to the settlement, Mr. Chanin said.

"We got the comprehensive crowd-control policy and every single person got money, with serious compensation for the most serious injured," Mr. Chanin said. "There was no need to put on a show trial for no reason."

The longshoremen's union, a plaintiff in the lawsuit, held a protest in Oakland this month and invoked the memory of the violence in 2003 to raise concerns about the Iraq war, terrorism, port security and the domestic spying program.

"Real port security means inspecting all containers offloaded," one of the injured longshoremen, Jack Heyman, wrote in an opinion article for The San Francisco Chronicle to coincide with the protest, "not stifling the free-speech rights of those who work in the ports."

Plight Deepens For Black Men, Studies Warn (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018681

BALTIMORE — Black men in the United States face a far more dire situation than is portrayed by common employment and education statistics, a flurry of new scholarly studies warn, and it has worsened in recent years even as an economic boom and a welfare overhaul have brought gains to black women and other groups.

Focusing more closely than ever on the life patterns of young black men, the new studies, by experts at Columbia, Princeton, Harvard and other institutions, show that the huge pool of poorly educated black men are becoming ever more disconnected from the mainstream society, and to a far greater degree than comparable white or Hispanic men.

Especially in the country's inner cities, the studies show, finishing high school is the exception, legal work is scarcer than ever and prison is almost routine, with incarceration rates climbing for blacks even as urban crime rates have declined.

Although the problems afflicting poor black men have been known for decades, the new data paint a more extensive and sobering picture of the challenges they face.

"There's something very different happening with young black men, and it's something we can no longer ignore," said Ronald B. Mincy, professor of social work at Columbia University and editor of "Black Males Left Behind" (Urban Institute Press, 2006).

"Over the last two decades, the economy did great," Mr. Mincy said, "and low-skilled women, helped by public policy, latched onto it. But young black men were falling farther back."

Many of the new studies go beyond the traditional approaches to looking at the plight of black men, especially when it comes to determining the scope of joblessness. For example, official unemployment rates can be misleading because they do not include those not seeking work or incarcerated.

"If you look at the numbers, the 1990's was a bad decade for young black men, even though it had the best labor market in 30 years," said Harry J. Holzer, an economist at Georgetown University and co-author, with Peter Edelman and Paul Offner, of "Reconnecting Disadvantaged Young Men" (Urban Institute Press, 2006).

In response to the worsening situation for young black men, a growing number of programs are placing as much importance on teaching life skills — like parenting, conflict resolution and character building — as they are on teaching job skills.

These were among the recent findings:

¶The share of young black men without jobs has climbed relentlessly, with only a slight pause during the economic peak of the late 1990's. In 2000, 65 percent of black male high school dropouts in their 20's were jobless — that is, unable to find work, not seeking it or incarcerated. By 2004, the share had grown to 72 percent, compared with 34 percent of white and 19 percent of Hispanic dropouts. Even when high school graduates were included, half of black men in their 20's were jobless in 2004, up from 46 percent in 2000.

¶Incarceration rates climbed in the 1990's and reached historic highs in the past few years. In 1995, 16 percent of black men in their 20's who did not attend college were in jail or prison; by 2004, 21 percent were incarcerated. By their mid-30's, 6 in 10 black men who had dropped out of school had spent time in prison.

¶In the inner cities, more than half of all black men do not finish high school.

None of the litany of problems that young black men face was news to a group of men from the airless neighborhoods of Baltimore who recently described their experiences.

One of them, Curtis E. Brannon, told a story so commonplace it hardly bears notice here. He quit school in 10th grade to sell drugs, fathered four children with three mothers, and spent several stretches in jail for drug possession, parole violations and other crimes.

"I was with the street life, but now I feel like I've got to get myself together," Mr. Brannon said recently in the row-house flat he shares with his girlfriend and four children. "You get tired of incarceration."

Mr. Brannon, 28, said he planned to look for work, perhaps as a mover, and he noted optimistically that he had not been locked up in six months.

A group of men, including Mr. Brannon, gathered at the Center for Fathers, Families and Workforce Development, one of several private agencies trying to help men build character along with workplace skills.

The clients readily admit to their own bad choices but say they also fight a pervasive sense of hopelessness.

"It hurts to get that boot in the face all the time," said Steve Diggs, 34. "I've had a lot of charges but only a few convictions," he said of his criminal record.

Mr. Diggs is now trying to strike out on his own, developing a party space for rentals, but he needs help with business skills.

"I don't understand," said William Baker, 47. "If a man wants to change, why won't society give him a chance to prove he's a changed person?" Mr. Baker has a lot of record to overcome, he admits, not least his recent 15-year stay in the state penitentiary for armed robbery.

DOJ_NMG_0018682

Mr. Baker led a visitor down the Pennsylvania Avenue strip he wants to escape — past idlers, addicts and hustlers, storefront churches and fortresslike liquor stores — and described a life that seemed inevitable.

He sold marijuana for his parents, he said, left school in the sixth grade and later dealt heroin and cocaine. He was for decades addicted to heroin, he said, easily keeping the habit during three terms in prison. But during his last long stay, he also studied hard to get a G.E.D. and an associate's degree.

Now out for 18 months, Mr. Baker is living in a home for recovering drug addicts. He is working a $10-an-hour warehouse job while he ponders how to make a living from his real passion, drawing and graphic arts.

"I don't want to be a criminal at 50," Mr. Baker said.

According to census data, there are about five million black men ages 20 to 39 in the United States.

Terrible schools, absent parents, racism, the decline in blue collar jobs and a subculture that glorifies swagger over work have all been cited as causes of the deepening ruin of black youths. Scholars — and the young men themselves — agree that all of these issues must be addressed.

Joseph T. Jones, director of the fatherhood and work skills center here, puts the breakdown of families at the core.

"Many of these men grew up fatherless, and they never had good role models," said Mr. Jones, who overcame addiction and prison time. "No one around them knows how to navigate the mainstream society."

All the negative trends are associated with poor schooling, studies have shown, and progress has been slight in recent years. Federal data tend to understate dropout rates among the poor, in part because imprisoned youths are not counted.

Closer studies reveal that in inner cities across the country, more than half of all black men still do not finish high school, said Gary Orfield, an education expert at Harvard and editor of "Dropouts in America" (Harvard Education Press, 2004).

"We're pumping out boys with no honest alternative," Mr. Orfield said in an interview, "and of course their neighborhoods offer many other alternatives."

Dropout rates for Hispanic youths are as bad or worse but are not associated with nearly as much unemployment or crime, the data show.

With the shift from factory jobs, unskilled workers of all races have lost ground, but none more so than blacks. By 2004, 50 percent of black men in their 20's who lacked a college education were jobless, as were 72 percent of high school dropouts, according to data compiled by Bruce Western, a sociologist at Princeton and author of the forthcoming book "Punishment and Inequality in America" (Russell Sage Press). These are more than double the rates for white and Hispanic men.

Mr. Holzer of Georgetown and his co-authors cite two factors that have curbed black employment in particular.

First, the high rate of incarceration and attendant flood of former offenders into neighborhoods have become major impediments. Men with criminal records tend to be shunned by employers, and young blacks with clean records suffer by association, studies have found.

Arrests of black men climbed steeply during the crack epidemic of the 1980's, but since then the political shift toward harsher punishments, more than any trends in crime, has accounted for the continued growth in the prison population, Mr. Western said.

By their mid-30's, 30 percent of black men with no more than a high school education have served time in prison, and 60 percent of dropouts have, Mr. Western said.

Among black dropouts in their late 20's, more are in prison on a given day — 34 percent — than are working — 30 percent — according to an analysis of 2000 census data by Steven Raphael of the University of California, Berkeley.

The second special factor is related to an otherwise successful policy: the stricter enforcement of child support. Improved collection of money from absent fathers has been a pillar of welfare overhaul. But the system can leave young men feeling overwhelmed with debt and deter them from seeking legal work, since a large share of any earnings could be seized.

About half of all black men in their late 20's and early 30's who did not go to college are noncustodial fathers, according to Mr. Holzer. From the fathers' viewpoint, support obligations "amount to a tax on earnings," he said.

Some fathers give up, while others find casual work. "The work is sporadic, not the kind that leads to advancement or provides unemployment insurance," Mr. Holzer said. "It's nothing like having a real job."

The recent studies identified a range of government programs and experiments, especially education and training efforts like the Job Corps, that had shown success and could be scaled up.

Scholars call for intensive new efforts to give children a better start, including support for parents and extra schooling for children.

They call for teaching skills to prisoners and helping them re-enter society more productively, and for less automatic incarceration of minor offenders.

In a society where higher education is vital to economic success, Mr. Mincy of Columbia said, programs to help more men enter and succeed in college may hold promise. But he lamented the dearth of policies and resources to aid single men.

DOJ_NMG_0018683

"We spent $50 billion in efforts that produced the turnaround for poor women," Mr. Mincy said. "We are not even beginning to think about the men's problem on similar orders of magnitude."

A Moral Battleground, A Civil Discourse (USAT)

By Charles C. Haynes

USA Today, March 20, 2006

Tragically, public schools have become front lines in the culture war over homosexuality — and the biggest losers are the kids caught in the crossfire of incendiary rhetoric and bitter lawsuits.

In school districts across the nation, escalating conflicts involving sexual orientation in the curriculum, student clubs, speech codes and other areas of school life are undermining the educational mission of our schools. Media stories in the past two months alone have spotlighted bitter fights over these issues in Utah, Pennsylvania, Kansas, California, Idaho and Florida. Any notion of the public interest is often lost in the clash of world views across seemingly unbridgeable distances.

When people are this far apart, every act by one side is seen as a hostile move by the other. A "Day of Silence" to protest treatment of gays and lesbians is now followed by a "Day of Truth" to promote conservative religious views of homosexuality. A T-shirt proclaiming "Straight Pride" is worn to counter one professing "Gay Pride." These differences are deep and difficult to negotiate.

Can we do better? If we care about education — and the future of the nation — we must. That's why the First Amendment Center asked Wayne Jacobsen of BridgeBuilders, an organization that helps communities find common ground on religious issues, to help me create a road map for winning the peace in the fight over sexual orientation in schools. The drafting committee also included representatives from the Christian Educators Association International and the Gay, Lesbian and Straight Education Network, two groups with widely divergent views on homosexuality, but with a shared commitment to civil discourse.

It took eight months to hammer out a statement of principles we could all support. But finally, on March 9, we released "Public Schools and Sexual Orientation: A First Amendment framework for finding common ground." Two major educational organizations, the American Association of School Administrators and the Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development, have endorsed the document. The guide does not prescribe a particular outcome, but rather proposes a process for reaching an agreement that all sides can support. All of the sponsoring groups have agreed to disseminate the guidelines widely and encourage schools to address these issues proactively.

Fairness is a two-way street

For the process to work, school officials must be fair, honest brokers of a dialogue that involves all stakeholders. That means, first and foremost, that school leaders must refrain from choosing sides in the culture-war debate over homosexuality. If schools are going to find agreement on policies and practices that bring the community together, it won't be by taking a side and coercing others to accept it.

Consider the case a few years ago of Thomas McLaughlin, a junior high school student in Pulaski County, Ark. Thomas complained that because he refused to keep quiet about being gay, school officials harassed and punished him — forcing him at one point to read aloud Bible verses and prayers. After a lawsuit was filed, the school district settled by paying damages and apologizing to the student.

On the other side of the spectrum, Betsy Hansen, a high school student in Ann Arbor, Mich., challenged her district in 2002 for censoring her religious views in opposition to homosexuality. During a "diversity week" program, school officials prevented Betsy from delivering a speech she was asked to give because they claimed her Roman Catholic views on homosexuality were "negative." Betsy also sued — and she won when a judge ruled that her free speech rights had been violated.

As the outcome of these cases makes clear, school officials can't impose one religious view of homosexuality, but neither can they censor the religious convictions of students.

First Amendment ground rules

To avoid divisive fights and lawsuits, educators and parents must agree on civic ground rules to ensure fairness for all sides. After all, public schools belong to everyone. However deeply we disagree about homosexuality, the vast majority of us want schools to uphold the rights of all students in a safe learning environment. It isn't possible for us to reach ideological or religious consensus, but it is possible — and necessary — to reach civic consensus on civil dialogue.

School districts divided about how to handle issues concerning sexual orientation should take a step back from the debate and find agreement on First Amendment principles. Most Americans can agree that freedom of religion and speech are inherent rights for all. Starting with an acknowledgement of inalienable rights immediately levels the playing field, helping to ensure that everyone has a right to speak — and everyone's claim of conscience is taken seriously.

DOJ_NMG_0018684

More challenging, but still attainable, is an agreement that we all have a civic responsibility to guard the rights of others, including those with whom we disagree. And, finally, people must agree to debate one another without resorting to personal attacks, ridicule, false characterizations of opposing positions and similar tactics.

In the guide, we call this commitment to the principles of rights, responsibilities and respect "First Amendment ground rules." Using this framework, people with deep differences are able to come to the table ready to engage in constructive dialogue.

Finding common ground

With civic ground rules in place, school districts should consider creating a permanent "common ground task force" that fully represents the range of perspectives in the community. Given time and opportunity, people with opposing views learn to trust and respect one another. And that trust and respect can then translate into shared recommendations on safe schools, balanced curricula, appropriate student expression and other issues.

When they begin to listen to one another, most educators, parents and students discover that they want the same thing: public schools that are safe and free for all students. As we say in the guide: "A safe school is free of bullying and harassment. And a free school is safe for student speech even about issues that divide us." Once these shared goals are identified, people are ready to tackle other contentious issues such as gay student clubs and the treatment of sexual orientation in the curriculum.

Winning the peace isn't easy — it takes commitment and courage. But if people on all sides uphold the rights and responsibilities of the First Amendment, they can agree on policies and practices that serve the common good.

Charles C. Haynes is the co-author of Finding Common Ground: A Guide to Religious Liberty in Public Schoolsand senior scholar at the First Amendment Center in Arlington, Va.

ANTITRUST:

Zurich Financial Unit To Settle Bid-Rigging Case With 9 States (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Zurich American Insurance Co. agreed to pay $171.7 million in a settlement with nine states that have been investigating allegations of bid rigging in the commercial-insurance business.

The company, a unit of Zurich Financial Services of Switzerland, will pay more than $150 million to reimburse policyholders and another $20 million will go to the states to cover investigative and other costs and as payments in lieu of penalties, according to the states.

"We can confirm that Zurich is finalizing agreements with certain state legal and regulatory authorities to resolve inquiries related to insurance business practices," Zurich said. The company said it will release "further details as soon as possible."

The agreement announced by several of the nine states is the latest development in the probes that authorities around the country have been conducting in recent years into insurance-industry practices.

In 2004, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer charged Marsh & McLennan Cos., a major insurance broker, with cheating corporate clients by rigging bids and collecting fees from insurance companies for directing business to them. Last year, without admitting wrongdoing, Marsh signed an $850 million settlement agreement with Mr. Spitzer's office.

Zurich admitted no wrongdoing as part of the settlement, said Mark Tobey, head of the antitrust and civil Medicaid-fraud division in the Texas attorney general's office.

"Going forward, companies like Zurich will be disclosing a lot more information," Mr. Tobey said. He described the company as "very cooperative."

Mr. Tobey said the policyholders involved included major companies, universities and local governments. The settlement is subject to court approval, and the court will determine which policyholders are reimbursed and how much.

Besides Texas, the states involved are California, Florida, Hawaii, Maryland, Massachusetts, Oregon, Pennsylvania and West Virginia.

Florida last week filed a civil lawsuit against Marsh making charges similar to those made by Mr. Spitzer's office. An attorney for Marsh has questioned that lawsuit's validity and said Florida's Department of Financial Services had signed a general release absolving the New York company.

Prudential PLC Rejects Aviva Bid As Big Insurance Battles Mount (WSJ)

By Charles Fleming And Michael Wang

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018685

LONDON -- In what is likely to prove the first round in a long-running takeover battle that could affect insurance markets world-wide, United Kingdom life insurer Prudential PLC Saturday rejected an unsolicited £17 billion ($29.87 billion) takeover proposal from larger rival Aviva PLC.

Prudential, which isn't related to Newark, N.J., insurer Prudential Financial Inc. but is active in the U.S. through its subsidiary Jackson National Life Insurance Co. of Lansing, Mich., said Saturday it had received a proposal from Aviva about a possible combination of the two London companies. In a statement, Prudential said it had rejected the proposal as not in the best interests of its shareholders. "The board confirms that it is not in discussions with any party and reaffirms its confidence in Prudential's future as an independent company."

An Aviva spokeswoman declined to comment on the proposal or on Aviva's next possible move. Statements by Aviva's chief executive, Richard Harvey, about his desire to find acquisitions that would allow the company to expand suggest Aviva won't throw in the towel easily.

People with knowledge of Aviva's overture said the initial proposal was an all-share offer that valued Prudential at about £17 billion, a 6.25% premium to the group's market value. They said Aviva's top managers were meeting to discuss how to proceed. Although Aviva might improve the proposed terms, Mr. Harvey is seen as unlikely to launch an overtly hostile bid. He has said a hostile bid is a "low probability" because unsolicited takeovers are seldom successful in the life-insurance industry.

The global insurance industry is expected to continue to see consolidation -- although how quickly remains unclear. The Wall Street Journal, citing people familiar with the matter, reported Friday that St. Paul Travelers Cos., of St. Paul, Minn., is in the preliminary stages of discussing a possible merger with Zurich Financial Services AG of Switzerland, although no deal may ultimately emerge. Yesterday, St. Paul Travelers said "recent media reports of its being in discussions regarding the possibility of a merger with Zurich Financial Services Group are not true." A spokesman for St. Paul declined to elaborate beyond the statement. A spokesman for Zurich Financial declined to comment.

A combination of the two U.K. insurance heavyweights companies has been rumored for months. Prudential has consistently poured cold water on market speculation, and the group's chief executive, Mark Tucker, who took over in May last year, has stressed that he thinks Prudential should continue as an independent company under his management. A merger would allow the combined group to leapfrog, by market value, the continental European insurance competitors, such as AXA SA, of France, and Allianz AG Holding, of Germany.

Aviva's interest in Prudential primarily concerns the neat fit between the two group's overseas operations. While Aviva has concentrated on building its European business, Prudential has a strong U.S. presence through Jackson National Life, which sells life-insurance and savings products. Prudential has a strong presence in Asia, where it has been active since the 1920s and where it ranks as the largest European life insurer, with 8,700 workers in 12 countries, including China, India, Japan and South Korea.

Aviva, which sells life- and general-insurance policies, has a market capitalization of £20.2 billion. Prudential, which sells life-insurance and savings products, has a market capitalization of £16 billion. Prudential shares rose 7.1% to close Friday at 672 pence in London, while Aviva was up 2.8% to close at 850.50 pence.

This month, Aviva announced a 29% rise in 2005 operating profit at £2.9 billion. Prudential last week said its 2005 operating profit was up 33% to £1.7 billion.

U.K. Tallies Market Abuse (WSJ)

By Margot Patrick

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

LONDON -- The U.K. market regulator said it has found widespread signs of improper share-price moves before corporate takeovers are announced.

In an effort to assess the deterrent effects of its regulations, the Financial Services Authority studied 1,500 market announcements on takeover bids and company results in various time periods over the past eight years. The researchers found that price movements from nonpublic information may have taken place before 29% of the takeover announcements and before 22% of the trading updates.

The implementation of the Financial Services & Markets Act in 2001, which toughened sanctions for individuals caught insider trading as well as the disclosure requirements for companies, had no apparent change in market cleanliness.

The regulator said there was a small but statistically significant increase in informed price movements immediately following the conclusion of the first enforcement cases under the new rules, in 2004.

"The analysis shows that there was no improvement in market cleanliness in the period after the introduction of the FSA's new powers, and before any high-profile enforcement cases were concluded," said Hector Sants, the FSA's managing director.

"This suggests that visible enforcement action may be the key tool in our work to reduce market abuse," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0018686

The FSA said that by developing its methods to assess the cleanliness of U.K. financial markets, it should over time be able to measure whether its regulatory efforts are working.

In its 2006 Financial Risk Outlook, the FSA said some firms are failing to comply with the European Union-wide market-abuse directive, which prohibits the use of nonpublic, price-sensitive information.

"Firms must ensure that they have procedures in place to identify transactions which they reasonably suspect to be abuse, and make suspicious-transaction reports to us as appropriate," the regulator said.

It said it was reviewing trading and market behavior at institutions including investment banks and hedge funds to find potential cases of market abuse.

Roche, Amgen Engaged In 'Arms Race' On Patent Law (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

A furious lobbying effort between F. Hoffmann-La Roche and Amgen Inc. has fueled big spending on K Street and led to both drugmakers hiring heavy-hitting firms and high-profile former government officials.

Roche is pushing for a patent-law change that lobbyists close to the debate say could make it possible for the Swiss-based company to get approval and eventually market in the United States a competing product to Amgen's renal disease treatment, Epogen.

Initially, Roche pursued a more secretive strategy, as Roll Call first reported in November. At that time, Roche quietly sought a rider on an appropriations bill that would have changed five words and two commas — the seemingly innocuous "for purposes of this title" — in U.S. patent laws.

Since then the level of rancor has only grown between the two companies. And lobbyists familiar with both sides' strategies now agree that the battle will have much wider implications on patent policy.

According to numerous sources, Roche has tapped a bipartisan team that includes Mickey Kantor, the former U.S. trade representative and Commerce secretary under former President Bill Clinton, and Ted Olson, the former U.S. solicitor general in the current Bush administration. Olson, a partner with Gibson Dunn & Crutcher did not return a call seeking comment. Kantor, who is with the firm Mayer Brown Rowe & Maw, confirmed that he and Olson were handling patent matters for Roche. Roche also has retained the Federalist Group, long a Republican powerhouse that recently went bipartisan.

For its part, Amgen upped its lobbying spending during the last six months of 2005, after the biotech firm became aware of Roche's quiet lobbying push. Between the first and second halves of 2005, Amgen spending rose by $1 million, from $2.4 million to $3.3 million, according to public filings.

And recently, Amgen has signed two patent experts from the firm Drinker Biddle & Reath: Michael Remington, an intellectual property specialist, and Chris Katopis, former director of Congressional affairs for the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office and a one-time aide to House Judiciary Chairman Jim Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.).

"I've never seen an arms race like this in terms of the hiring of consultants," said one lobbyist familiar with the issue.

Amgen's side, lobbyists say, wants to maintain current precedent set by the International Trade Commission. The ITC can stop products that infringe on U.S. patent holders from coming into the country. And the lobbyists on Amgen's side say Roche's proposed change could end up undermining the ITC's ability to do that.

"If you cannot infringe a U.S. process patent in Indiana, you should not be able to move manufacturing to India and then bring the infringing product back into the U.S.," said one lobbyist familiar with Amgen's side.

A statement from Daniel Whelan, an Amgen spokesman, said, "We believe that a strong patent system is essential to protect American jobs. We are on record as strongly opposing measures that would jeopardize the interests of patients, threaten innovation, or hurt American jobs."

Roche's side, however, argues that the change would help the ITC interpret the original intent of the patent law at issue and would simply harmonize how federal courts and the ITC treat process patents.

(Amgen is currently suing Roche for patent infringement in U.S. District Court in Boston.)

Shelley Rosenstock, a spokeswoman for Roche, said her company is restricted about what it can say on the issue because of the pending lawsuit.

In an e-mailed comment, she said: "As I understand it, the issues before Congress at this time are broad policy issues that pertain to legal forum shopping, statutory interpretation and patent law standards. Roche believes consumers would benefit if Congress would eliminate forum shopping and duplicative litigation from the patent code."

Lobbyists familiar with Amgen said they expect Roche to try to get the policy change through regular order such as hearings, markups and perhaps as a free-standing bill, or as a part of broader patent reform.

DOJ_NMG_0018687

And although no lobbyists involved in the debate said Roche is still looking for an appropriations vehicle to the make the change, Sensenbrenner and Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) sent a recent letter to House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) warning him that such an effort could be afoot.

The letter said, "We respectfully ask that you decline any request to include changes" to the patent laws Roche is seeking "in any appropriations bill." The letter did not mention the company by name.

The letter adds that, "A proposal has been circulated that would limit the authority of the International Trade Commission (ITC) to enforce the rights of U.S. process patent holders against infringing foreign products made abroad."

Lobbyists familiar with both sides said the letter tracked Amgen's point of view almost perfectly.

Jeff Lungren, spokesman for the House Judiciary Committee, said Sensenbrenner routinely sends such letters to colleagues.

"This is more of a jurisdiction process letter, letting the Appropriations Committee know that we'd be opposed to that," Lungren said. "We had heard rumblings about maybe some type of effort to put patent provisions in an appropriations bill, and they just wanted to make sure that didn't happen."

Justices Reach Out To Consider Patent Case (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

For the first time in a quarter-century, the Supreme Court will hear on Tuesday a case involving the basic question of what type of discoveries and inventions can be patented.

Both sides say the case, which involves a blood test for a vitamin deficiency, could have a wide-ranging impact on the development of diagnostics, perhaps threatening many of the underlying patents for genetic and other medical tests.

But the array of companies filing supporting briefs — including American Express, Bear Stearns and I.B.M. — indicates that intellectual property in other fields might also be affected.

Some patent specialists say they think the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case, against the advice of the United States solicitor general, to rein in patenting.

"The Supreme Court reached out and grabbed this case," said Edward R. Reines, a patent attorney at Weil, Gotshal & Manges who is not involved in the case. "These circumstances suggest that some members of the court believe there are too many patents in areas where there should be none."

At issue is whether relationships between a substance in the human body and a disease — for example, the familiar association between high cholesterol and a higher risk of heart attacks — can be the basis of a patent, or whether such relationships are unpatentable natural phenomena.

This case, LabCorp v. Metabolite Laboratories, stems from a 1990 patent awarded to scientists at the University of Colorado and Columbia University. They found that a high level in the blood of homocysteine, an amino acid, indicated a deficiency of either vitamin B12 or another B vitamin called folic acid.

Much of the patent describes a specific way to measure homocysteine, and those claims are not at issue. But the 13th claim of the patent is more general: it covers a way of determining vitamin deficiency by first testing blood or urine for homocysteine by any means and then correlating elevated levels with a vitamin deficiency.

The patent is owned by Competitive Technologies, a publicly traded patent management firm in Fairfield, Conn., and licensed to Metabolite Laboratories, a tiny company based at the University of Colorado. LabCorp, one of the biggest clinical testing companies in the nation, with 2005 revenues of $3.3 billion, sublicensed the test from Metabolite.

At first, LabCorp, whose full name is Laboratory Corporation of America Holdings, tested for homocysteine using the specific method described in the patent and paid royalties to Metabolite and Competitive Technologies. But in 1998 it switched to a newer and faster test developed by Abbott Laboratories.

Metabolite and Competitive sued, charging LabCorp with violating Claim 13 of the patent. In 2001 a federal jury in Denver ruled against LabCorp, and the company was eventually ordered to pay $7.8 million in damages and attorneys' fees. The appeals court that handles patent cases affirmed the lower court decision in 2004.

In asking the Supreme Court to overturn the lower court decisions, LabCorp is arguing that Claim 13, because it does not specify how testing is to be done, patents nothing more than the natural relationship between homocysteine and vitamin B deficiencies, blocking other inventors from developing better tests.

"The present-day implications of such a holding are limitless — and dangerous," LabCorp wrote in its brief. "Anyone who discovers a new medical correlation could stifle medical treatment through a 'test plus correlate' claim."

DOJ_NMG_0018688

But Metabolite and its allies argue that such correlations are the basis of diagnostics and that not allowing patents would stifle development of new tests. There are tests, for instance, that look at mutations in particular genes to predict a high risk of breast cancer or to predict which AIDS drugs will not work.

"Hundreds, if not thousands, of patents would at once be called into question" if the ruling goes against Metabolite, said a brief jointly submitted by Perlegen Sciences, a company developing genetic tests, and Mohr Davidow Ventures, a venture capital firm that backs diagnostics companies.

Another question in the case is whether doctors could infringe the patent merely by looking at a test result for homocysteine and then thinking about vitamin deficiency. Indeed, the lower courts said LabCorp had not directly infringed but rather had induced doctors to infringe by performing the correlation.

Partly with that in mind, the American Medical Association, the American Heart Association and AARP have submitted briefs in support of LabCorp, arguing, in the words of the heart association, that the patent could have "devastating effects on patient health care."

Millions of homocysteine tests are done each year because high levels of the amino acid are associated with an increased risk of heart attack, stroke, birth defects and other diseases; people often take B vitamins to lower homocysteine and reduce the risk. (Clinical trial results announced last week, however, suggested that taking B vitamins did not prevent heart attacks.)

Court precedents have held that laws of nature, natural phenomena and abstract ideas cannot be patented. "Einstein could not patent his celebrated law that E = mc2; nor could Newton have patented the law of gravity," the Supreme Court wrote in a 1980 decision. '

But in a 1981 decision in Diamond v. Diehr — the last time the Supreme Court considered the issue — the court upheld a patent on a method of curing rubber that made use of a well-known equation governing chemical reactions. The court said that the equation was only part of a broader invention.

Glenn K. Beaton, an attorney for Metabolite, said that as in that 1981 case, "it's not the correlation itself that is patented here," but rather "the use of that correlation to determine B12 and folate deficiencies."

In recent years, controversial patents have been granted on software and on business methods, such as ways of managing investment portfolios or of allowing people to order merchandise on Amazon.com with one click of a mouse.

Bear Stearns, Lehman Brothers and the Computer and Communications Industry Association filed briefs urging the court to use the LabCorp case to restrict such business method patents, or at least not expand them. Other companies, including American Express and I.B.M., say the LabCorp case is not relevant to business method patents.

The solicitor general, in urging the court not to hear the case, said there was not enough of a record from the lower courts on the question of patenting natural phenomena. That is because LabCorp did not raise that argument in the lower courts, instead trying to get the claim invalidated on other grounds. If LabCorp wins the case in a way that weakens patents on diagnostic tests, it could be one of the bigger losers. The company, based in Burlington, N.C., is counting on high-priced, patented genetic tests to fuel its growth.

Bradford T. Smith, executive vice president for corporate affairs at LabCorp, disputed that. "We think this case can be decided very narrowly," without undermining other patents, many of which rely on more than just correlations, he said.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

For Interior, A Collaborative Conservative (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, March 20, 2006

ASHLAND, ORE. - Dirk Kempthorne, President Bush's nominee to the head the Interior Department, has both the experience and the record of collaboration that could help smooth the way in the often-contentious position.

As governor of Idaho, a former US senator, and mayor of Boise before that, Mr. Kempthorne is known to work in concert with those who don't agree with him. He believes that the level of government closest to a problem is the best place to find a solution. And though his environmental record - according to those who score such things - is a pale shade of green, he is not a fire-breathing ideologue likely to dismiss endangered species in the name of corporate ranching or a new highway.

"I've been dealing with this guy for years," says Rick Johnson, executive director of the Idaho Conservation League. "He's not overtly anti-environment. He is overtly states' rights."

The West, for all its wide-open spaces where most of Interior's 500 million acres of responsibility lie, in fact is becoming the most urban region of the country. Cities like Boise, growing rapidly, are more conservation-minded than in the past, says Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0018689

Johnson. As a result, many newcomers to the West value environmental quality - something reflected in some of Kempthorne's policies.

Most national environmental groups blast the nominee as "an unabashed champion of the resource-extraction and development interests that profit most from public lands," as Philip Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust, put it. But Kempthorne has already won praise from some prominent Democrats. Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D), who chairs the Western Governors' Association, warmly congratulated him. Sen. Maria Cantwell (D) of Washington noted that Kempthorne had "stood up to the administration" over nuclear-waste cleanup at a federal facility in Idaho. He has many friends in the United States Senate, which is expected to confirm his nomination.

Still, the Bush administration and Kempthorne face battles over many issues: development in roadless forest areas; salvage logging of burned timber; the proposed sale of some federal land to lessen the federal budget deficit; changes to the Endangered Species Act; a huge backlog in national parks maintenance; oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and the Outer Continental Shelf; and protections for grizzly bears, wolves, and other recovering species.

As the likely new "landlord" over national parks and wilderness areas, water reclamation projects, and vast rangelands where cattle graze and new gas and oil wells have sprouted under Mr. Bush, Kempthorne will be in the thick of the fray.

National parks could be an especially difficult issue. The mammoth National Park Service, part of Interior, oversees 388 parks, monuments, battlefields, historic sites, lakeshores, scenic rivers, and trails. The number of park units has nearly doubled since 1970, and annual visits now total almost 300 million.

"One thing he did in Idaho was try to get more resources for parks," says Craig Obey, vice president of the National Parks Conservation Association. "Hopefully, he will try to carry that ahead nationally."

It's a big load to carry. The parks' maintenance backlog is between $4.5 billion and $9.7 billion, estimates the Congressional Research Service.

Meanwhile, the administration is trying to open some parks to more commercial activities, such as snowmobiling in Yellowstone. Its parks management plan, critics say, deemphasizes natural-resource protection in favor of commerce and recreation - which could increase traffic, air pollution, and other adverse impacts.

"That could be potentially devastating to the parks, depending on how it turns out," says Mr. Obey. The 500-member Coalition of National Park Service Retirees, too, has expressed concern. Last month, the watchdog group Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility sued the department for refusing to give details of industry lobbying efforts regarding national parks policies.

Utilities Offer Energy Dept. Site For Waste (New York Times)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 19 — A group of nuclear utilities that is planning to build a private nuclear waste dump on an Indian reservation in Utah has offered to sell space there to the federal government. The move could help the government avoid billions of dollars in potential legal damages over its failure to build its own repository.

This month the utilities, eight companies from around the country, won a license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to open a repository at Skull Valley, on land leased on a Goshute Indian reservation, about 60 miles west of Salt Lake City.

The utility consortium, called Private Fuel Storage, does not have the permits it needs to transport waste to the site, however, and the State of Utah is trying to block those.

The Energy Department signed contracts in the 1980's with each of the nuclear operators, promising to accept their spent fuel beginning in January 1998, in exchange for a payment of a tenth of a cent for each kilowatt-hour they generated.

The project now appears to be at least 20 years behind schedule, and the department faces approximately $50 billion in damage claims from the utilities, many of which have resorted to building giant casks adjacent to their reactors to store the old fuel.

In a letter to the chairmen and the ranking minority members of the House and Senate Energy Committees, Private Fuel Storage said it could begin taking fuel within three years, at a cost of about $61 million a year. In the letter, which was sent in December but released last week, the company estimated the Energy Department's costs to maintain the fuel at the reactor sites at about $500 million a year.

The fuel is currently kept at 72 sites whose storage costs vary widely. At some sites, the reactors have been retired and torn down, and maintenance and security personnel remain in place simply for the fuel. At others, while construction of the casks was expensive, the cost to maintain them is small.

Of the eight utility partners, three have announced that they have no immediate need for off-site waste storage.

DOJ_NMG_0018690

The consortium proposed either that the Energy Department take title to the fuel and pay for storage, or let the utilities continue to own the fuel but reimburse them for the storage costs. It suggested legislation to reassure Utah that even if the government's proposed repository, at Yucca Mountain in Nevada, never opened, the Goshute site would not become permanent.

Representative David L. Hobson, the Ohio Republican who is chairman of the energy and water subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, has been pushing for dry-cask storage, possibly as a prelude to chemical processing of the wastes to extract useful material before burial. And last month, the Bush administration endorsed such chemical processing, through a partnership. But the cask idea has not gone far with the Energy Committees.

"The view right now on Capitol Hill is that this is a free-market project, and let's see if the market sends business their way," said Marnie Funk, a spokeswoman for the Senate Energy Committee.

State-U.S. Revenue Sharing At Core Of Offshore Plans (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, March 20, 2006

Oil companies and U.S. industries have been aching for years to get at the billions of barrels of oil and trillions of cubic feet of natural gas sitting off the shores of the USA.

There have always been reasons to look elsewhere: cheaper energy overseas, governors demanding royalty payments, beachgoers opposed to the sight of derricks in the distance, environmental groups predicting ecological disaster.

However, the creators of a new campaign to drill up and down the coasts say the time is right to get it done. And they say they've come up with a way of doing it that has statehouses, U.S. industry and even some notable environmental groups on board.

“Never before has there been such a flurry of legislative activity on the issue,” says Adam Sharp, spokesman for Sen. Mary Landrieu of the Gulf Coast state of Louisiana.

The proposal is simple:

·States that open their territory to drilling will get a cut of the royalties that currently go 100% to the federal government.

·A specified chunk of royalties must be spent restoring coastlines.

Simple, and hard to resist.

Consumers are paying relatively high prices for energy. Polls show concern among the public about U.S. alliances with even friendly Arab countries, which control much of the world's oil. The White House is calling for new energy solutions. A top item on the agenda of environmental groups — restoring coastlines ravaged by human activity — will take big money.

“We hope this will be a front-burner story for the next couple of months,” says Kevin McCoy, vice president for energy resources policy at the National Association of Manufacturers.

Former Louisiana senator John Breaux is hoping to build interest.

Breaux is a lobbyist for the Washington firm Patton Boggs and is working on a volunteer basis for the state of Louisiana to give it a share of the royalties from oil and gas off its shores. He's working with a coalition of manufacturers, municipalities and energy companies to bring attention to the plan.

“We need that oil,” said Breaux, who is working with Shell Oil, among others. “In Louisiana, it would fund coastal restoration.”

The Interior Department estimates there are 86 billion barrels of oil and 420 trillion cubic feet of gas yet to be discovered off U.S. shores. That's 11 times as much oil as the USA used in 2005 and 19 times as much gas, the U.S. Energy Information Agency says.

Major drilling off the outer continental shelf, which extends 3 miles to 200 miles from shore, is banned in all but a portion of the Gulf of Mexico.

Utilities say they have always coveted the deposits but found the political opposition too daunting. Bills filed in Congress during the 1990s went nowhere, largely because of budgetary issues.

Utilities are more optimistic this year given the drive to give states a cut of the action.

Revenue sharing “would provide, hopefully, economic incentives to the states to support … development of their offshore resources,” says Richard Shelby, executive vice president for public affairs at the American Gas Association.

Congressional leaders also see a more hopeful scenario among a handful of competing bills.

“Things are different now,” says Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., chairman of the House Resources Committee, who is looking at several new bills on revenue sharing.

“We're paying an all-time high for natural gas, an all-time high for oil,” says Pombo, who expects a vote on the issue this spring. “States are beginning to look at this in terms of revenue and their own energy security. Those are things we have to balance. It's completely different than a few years ago. The stakes have changed.”

DOJ_NMG_0018691

Some coastal states are now on record as supportive of the idea.

Georgia's Department of Natural Resources supports a plan to lease the outer continental shelf for oil and gas. Connecticut's Department of Environmental Protection says it would like a share of any drilling in its region. The Virginia Legislature voted to urge its congressional representatives to support the idea.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco says she wants an end to a double standard for gas and oil drilled on land, the royalties from which are shared with the affected state. Thirty-five states received $1.7 billion in such royalties in 2005. Wyoming received the most: $878 million.

Much more money is at stake in offshore drilling.

Oil and gas leases in the portion of the Gulf where drilling is allowed brought in $5.7 billion for the federal government in 2005. Blanco wants states to get half of the royalties and says Louisiana should get 54% of that cut in the Gulf. Under that formula, Louisiana could receive as much as $1.5 billion a year for a state with an $18.5 billion annual budget.

Members of Congress from some states are not supportive of new drilling, however, and some have filed bills to ban it. Pombo expects differences to be worked out. “I have to compromise between states that want to produce and states that don't want any production near their shores,” Pombo said.

Supporters think the stance of some environmental groups could help their cause.

For decades, such groups have lamented the degradation of the Louisiana coastline. Much of the damage was caused by channels cut through marshes for pipelines and for ships that ferry supplies to the derricks offshore.

To restore the coastline, miles of long-gone banks must be rebuilt with massive amounts of soil, then planted with cypress and marsh grass. That would take billions of dollars, and letting offshore drilling continue in order to get it is a choice some groups are willing to make.

“We think it's reasonable,” says Susan Kaderka, director of the National Wildlife Federation's Gulf States Natural Resources Center.

The deal has caused a rift among the groups. Kaderka says her group only supports revenue sharing for a significant portion of the Gulf Coast. Other groups warn that it sets a bad precedent to ever support drilling and it could lead to much more of it.

“Once this happens, it's hard not to make other states expect to get a chunk of the change,” says Lisa Speer, director of water and ocean policy at the Natural Resources Defense Council.

Marvin Odum, a Shell Oil executive vice president in charge of exploration in the Americas, is among those hoping other states do decide to join in. As for support from any environmental groups, Odum says, “That would be more voices on the idea that are favorable.”

Court Deals Blow To EPA's Relaxed Rule On Air Emissions (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, March 20, 2006

The US Environmental Protection Agency will probably have to go back to the drawing board now that a US appeals court has said aging power plants and other industrial sites must meet the same federal pollution standards as new plants.

Friday's decision represents a repudiation of EPA policy under the Bush administration, which sought to exempt plants that predated the 1970 Clean Air Act from compliance with the tougher air-emission standards. It was cheered by environmentalists - especially those who live and work near such power plants.

One, Lisa Graves Marcucci, a mother and clean-air activist who lives near Pittsburgh, says the ruling gives her hope that EPA investigations of nearby aging power plants, which the agency halted a few years ago, will resume.

"It's a huge victory for people like us because, when we see a ruling like this, it gives us hope that facts and figures and law will dictate a fair outcome rather than pressure from lobbyists," she says.

The ruling, however, is a setback for industries, which may now be required to install expensive new emissions-cutting equipment. It could also initiate endless reviews of their plants, they say.

"Today's decision ... is disappointing," said Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, in a statement. "What benefit comes from today's decision? Certainly none for the environment."

The ruling could prompt some big utility companies to upgrade pollution controls at the oldest, most polluting power plants, or shut them down.

"The language of the court's decision is very, very strong," says Eric Schaeffer of the Environmental Integrity Project, a New York environmental group. "The EPA's excuses, always pretty thin, have gone away. We now know this rule is going to go forward, and that these guys will have to get permits, and clean up their emissions."

DOJ_NMG_0018692

Many older power plants had their sulfur-dioxide and nitrous oxide emission levels "grandfathered," or accommodated, under the Clean Air Act of 1970.

Under the EPA's "new source review" (NSR) rules, these plants weren't required to bolt on costly new air-pollution equipment in the 1970s. But NSR, as interpreted until about five years ago, subjected older plants to the more stringent contemporary pollution standards if their facilities were upgraded at any point and emissions increased.

The utility industry and the EPA under the Bush administration have argued that many plant modifications, including those that previously would have trigged NSR, did not bring about a review - even when higher emission levels were the result.

The US Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, in Washington, D.C., disagreed with the EPA. "The EPA's interpretation would produce a 'strange' ... result," the judges wrote. "A law intended to limit increases in air pollution would allow sources ... to increase significantly the pollution they emit without government review."

The EPA could appeal the decision to the US Supreme Court.

Since President Bush took office, the EPA has held a looser interpretation of NSR. In 2003 the agency withdrew from scores of NSR investigations and a number of court cases, and refused to press 20 such cases that had been recommended to the Justice Department for prosecution, Mr. Schaeffer says.

The Road To Nowhere (NYT)

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

It seems insane that the National Park Service would even think of spending $600 million on a road that few people want and nobody needs — especially when the service has barely enough money to keep up appearances. But that could happen unless the Interior Department musters the courage to resist Representative Charles Taylor of North Carolina.

Mr. Taylor, who says a new road would stimulate the local economy, runs the subcommittee that controls the Interior Department's budget. For that reason, neither the park service nor Interior's outgoing secretary, Gale Norton, has publicly criticized the idea. But there is more at stake here than pleasing one's paymaster. The road would not only blow a hole in the department's budget; it would also leave a scar on one of the most popular national parks.

At issue is a 30-mile road proposed for the north side of Fontana Lake on the eastern edge of the Great Smoky Mountains National Park in North Carolina. The road was promised to the residents of Swain County in 1943 when the Tennessee Valley Authority built a major hydroelectric dam, creating the lake and flooding out an existing road. After a fitful start in the 1960's, the road was abandoned for environmental and budgetary reasons.

Those reasons still apply. The road, including three big bridges, each the length of the Brooklyn Bridge, would breach an unbroken tract of national forest, destroy wildlife habitat and poison hundreds of miles of streams. Its estimated cost of $604 million — up 40 percent from only a year ago — is three times the annual roads budget for the entire national park system, which is already suffering from a big repair backlog.

There is no pressing need for the project. Swain County has other roads. The road's opponents include Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, and Swain County's own commissioners. There is broad agreement that restitution of some sort is due the residents of the region, and that the spirit if not the letter of the original agreement should be honored. A cash settlement of $52 million has been proposed.

As Mr. Taylor has noted, this will not generate the jobs and income that the road project would. But it's fair, and it won't do lasting damage. Interior should endorse the settlement. The department's neutrality serves only to keep alive an idea that makes even less sense now than it did in 1943.

Eastern Law Firms Roll The Dice On Indian Law (LAW)

By Charles Toutant, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, March 20, 2006

Native American law, long a well-established practice area west of the Mississippi, is gaining ground at eastern law firms as tribes displaced in the 19th century seek to reclaim ancestral lands -- and make them instantly profitable.

After the successful land-claim settlement by the Mashantucket Pequot Tribe in Connecticut, which led to the opening of Foxwoods Resort Casino in 1992, and the Mohegan Tribe's acquisition of land in nearby Uncasville, Conn., for the Mohegan Sun Casino, other tribes have started bringing land-claim suits, and law firms are lining up to help them.

While tribes' finances are short and the odds of prevailing long, there are still legal fees to be generated. That's because there are casino developers willing to underwrite the tribes' legal costs on the chance that they'll obtain a new site for gaming, say Indian law experts.

DOJ_NMG_0018693

"Part of what's going on these days in Indian country is there are certain forces that are trying to unearth potential claims that might be made to re-establish a tribal homeland and ultimately establish a casino," says Robert Odawi Porter, director of the Syracuse University Center for Indigenous Law, Governance and Citizenship.

In cases where land-claim suits are funded by outsiders, the tribe is usually a passive participant in the litigation, says Porter. Such arrangements are permitted under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act of 1988, which gives states authority to negotiate revenue-sharing agreements with tribal casinos.

"Everything is dictated by the developer -- I call it the 'sit back and take a check approach,'" Porter says.

But the process is arduous. Last June, the Shinnecock Indian Nation of Long Island filed a claim for 3,600 acres in the exclusive Hamptons resort area that it says belonged to its ancestors. The casino plan is opposed by New York's governor and senators, as well as by residents of the Hamptons. The tribe's costs are being underwritten by Michigan casino developers Marian Ilitch and Michael Malik. Ilitch, founder of the Little Caesars pizza chain, owns the Motor City casino in Detroit. She and Malik are also building an Indian casino in Barstow, Calif.

The Shinnecocks' lawyers are from Roseland's Lowenstein Sandler: Kurt Lenz and Nicomedes Herrera, both real estate practitioners, and Richard Ricci, an environmental lawyer. Lenz says he and his colleagues have been instructed not to answer press inquiries. He referred questions to the tribe's public relations consultant, who did not return a call.

NATIONAL FIRMS ON BOARD

Native American law is a well-established practice niche in the West, touching on subjects ranging from mineral and timber rights agreements to treaty enforcement, federal regulation and jurisdictional disputes between tribal security forces and non-Indian police.

In the East, fewer lawyers have formed Indian-affairs practices because forced emigration of the 1800s has left few tribal groups.

But in 1987, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled, in California v. Cabazon Band of Mission Indians, 480 U.S. 202, that if a state allows any type of gambling for any purpose for any type of organization, a tribe can engage in that type of gambling on its reservations. Since then, with Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun as shining beacons, tribes have come to view casinos as a route to self-sufficiency -- and land claims have proliferated.

That helps explain why national firms such as Dorsey & Whitney of Minneapolis, and Hughes, Hubbard & Reed and Holland & Knight, both of New York, have been building up their Native American practice groups.

Holland & Knight's 23-lawyer group, which includes former U.S. Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell of Colorado, is headed by Jerome Levine, who joined the firm in 2000 after running an Indian law boutique in Los Angeles for 20 years. Levine says he moved his practice because his tribal clients required a Washington, D.C., presence and access to real estate and corporate finance experts that his small firm lacked.

Lawyers focused on Indian law are rare in New Jersey, where casino gambling is constitutionally limited to Atlantic City. But an exception is Michael & Carroll, for whom Native American clients constitute 50 percent of its work, says partner Guy Michael. The Atlantic City firm is counsel to the Chitimacha Tribe, which operates a successful casino in Louisiana, and Michael is general counsel to the tribe's gaming commission that his partner, Robert Carroll, chairs. Both Michael and Carroll worked in casino regulation as New Jersey deputy attorneys general and then helped develop Foxwoods in Connecticut.

Michael sees no end to the growth of Indian gaming places. "Everybody says we're going to reach the saturation point," he says, "and then more [Indian casinos] come on line and everybody goes to them."

HIGH HURDLES

Major impediments make it no easy task to win a land claim. Tribes must first have recognition from the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs as a sovereign nation. About 500 groups have earned such recognition, of which about 200 operate casinos, bingo halls or other gambling facilities, according to the National Indian Gaming Association.

But many more tribes lack official recognition, and the path toward such status can require expert analysis of a group's linguistics, culture and religion, says Hershel Kozlov of Wolf Block in Cherry Hill, N.J., who represents some Native American clients in his gaming practice.

Such proceedings are primarily administrative but can be contentious. Porter says that in the East primarily, intermarriage and assimilation make it more difficult to prove tribal integrity.

For example, the Ramapough Mountain People of New York and New Jersey were on the verge of BIA recognition when the Cabazon Band case came down and Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun went up. Atlantic City casino owners, Donald Trump among them, opposed recognition, aware that the Ramapough land was within an hour's drive from New York City. In 1994, the BIA denied recognition, saying the Ramapoughs' uncertain origins negated identity as a distinct community descended from an historic tribe.

DOJ_NMG_0018694

Even tribes that have official recognition still have to prove they are the appropriate heirs of those who occupied the seized property. Land-claim cases usually cite violations of the Non-Intercourse Act of 1790, which required that sales of land by Indians to local or state governments had to be ratified by Congress. Many local officials continued to buy land from Indians in violation of that law, Kozlov says.

One such claim of an unauthorized transaction was filed in federal court in Camden in December. The Unalachtigo Band of the Nanticoke Lenni-Lenape Nation says its 3,000-acre homestead in Shamong Township was improperly purchased by Burlington County in 1801.

But the 108-member tribe has yet to find a lawyer. On Jan. 11, it filed a brief with U.S. Magistrate Judge Ann Marie Donio claiming indigence and seeking assigned counsel. In fact, it goes so far as to request Hughes Hubbard, which has brought such cases before.

The tribe has offered to settle its case in exchange for two 1,500-acre parcels of land -- one in Rancocas State Park in Burlington County and the other the Alpine Boy Scout Camp in Bergen County -- on which to build casinos, though the tribe has not held negotiations with casino developers, says tribal chairman James Thomas.

Burlington County Solicitor Evan Crook said the county would fight the suit and had appointed Anthony Drollas Jr. of Trenton's Capehart & Scatchard as its outside counsel.

An earlier attempt by a tribe to establish an Indian casino in New Jersey fell flat in 1998. The Delaware Tribe of Western Oklahoma, which claims the New Jersey shore as its ancestral home, sought to buy a two-acre parking lot from Wildwood City for a casino. But the tribe pulled out of the project after Attorney General Peter Verniero filed suit to stop the transaction.

HOLDOUTS

Not all Indians embrace the development of casinos. Donald Daines, a land-use lawyer at Hill Wallack in Princeton, represents tribal dissidents pro bono in civil rights disputes.

In 2004, Daines represented an Oneida woman, Danielle Patterson, who was arrested and had her mobile home seized and demolished by tribal police because she refused to let it be inspected, in violation of a reservation ordinance.

At the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Daines argued that Patterson was persecuted because she opposed a pro-casino tribal administration, but the Northern District of New York dismissed the claim brought under the Indian Civil Rights Act, 25 U.S.C. 1301. The 2nd Circuit affirmed in Shenandoah v. Halbritter, 366 F.3d 89 (2004), and the Supreme Court denied certification.

"There are a lot of casino nations who are disenfranchising and removing those who oppose the casino," Daines says. "What you are seeing when you talk about the area of law related to casinos is the tip of the iceberg in Indian law."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Many N.Y. FBI Agents Have Neither E-mail, Internet-ready Phones (NYDN)

New York Daily News, March 20, 2006

NEW YORK _ It seems as if every Manhattan prep schooler has one, but many of New York's FBI agents are fighting crime and terrorists without an Internet-ready phone or even an e-mail account, the New York Daily News has learned.

Mark Mershon, the assistant director in charge of the FBI's 2,000-employee city office, blamed the technology gap on Washington budget constraints.

He said there's a cost attached to assigning an agent or analyst an e-mail address with the official domain name _ ic.fbi.gov.

"And as ridiculous as this might sound, we have real money issues right now, and the government is reluctant to give all agents and analysts dot-gov accounts," he said when asked about the gap at a News editorial board meeting.

"We just don't have the money, and that is an endless stream of complaints that come from the field."

Mershon also revealed that only about 100 agents in New York have BlackBerry devices, which allow users to send and receive e-mail and access the Internet from their phone.

And just a few weeks ago, the New York office was notified that funding for its BlackBerry pilot program _ designed to help the FBI better communicate with city, state and federal law enforcement _ was being cut.

"I, with the help of others, raised a stink," Mershon said, adding that BlackBerry funding has been restored.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., decried the penny-pinching.

"The FBI should have the tools it needs to fight terrorism and crime in the 21st century, most of all in New York City, and one of the most effective means of communications is e-mail and the Internet," he said. "FBI agents not having e-mail or Internet access is much too much a pre-9/11 mentality."

FBI officials in Washington, however, insisted that agents are not at a disadvantage because of cost-cutting.

Spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan said about half the FBI employees don't have official accounts because e-mail addresses are still being assigned.

By the end of the year, the entire bureau should have dot-gov mailboxes, she said.

As for the BlackBerry devices, she conceded funding for the pilot program was put in jeopardy because a lawsuit over the technology had threatened to make the machines obsolete.

Now that the issue has been resolved, the FBI intends to keep the 100 wireless gadgets in the budget, though there are no plans to issue them to more agents.

Those who don't have them can use their regular cell phones, pagers and secure radios to communicate internally and with other agencies.

"BlackBerrys do cost money," she said. "It's the newest high-tech gadget, but it's not the only way to communicate."

Official: Some New York FBI Agents Don't Have E-mail Accounts (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, March 20, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) _ Budget constraints are forcing some local FBI agents to operate without e-mail accounts, according to the agency's top official in New York.

"As ridiculous as this might sound, we have real money issues right now, and the government is reluctant to give all agents and analysts dot-gov accounts," Mark Mershon said when asked about the gap at a Daily News editorial board meeting.

"We just don't have the money, and that is an endless stream of complaints that come from the field," he said.

FBI officials in Washington denied that cost-cutting was putting agents at a disadvantage.

Spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan said e-mail addresses are still being assigned, adding that the city bureau's 2,000 employees would all have accounts by the end of the year.

Mershon, the assistant director in charge of the agency's New York City office, also said that 100 city agents have been given Internet-ready phones such as BlackBerry devices.

Sen. Charles Schumer called for better access to technology for agents.

"The FBI should have the tools it needs to fight terrorism and crime in the 21st century, most of all in New York City, and one of the most effective means of communications is e-mail and the Internet," he said. "FBI agents not having e-mail or Internet access is much too much a pre-9/11 mentality."

Internet Untouchable For FBI Agents In City (NYDN)

New York Daily News, March 20, 2006

FBI terror fighters need modern tools

Anyone who watches the TV show "24" might well believe that America's counterterrorism agents are so technologically advanced they can communicate instantly and tap into computers across the world. Well, we're here to tell you that Jack Bauer could never survive in the FBI.

Forget about having the capability to download secret documents and other such fanciful feats; superagent Bauer wouldn't even have a government e-mail account were he assigned to the bureau's New York office, headquarters of the nation's premier anti-terror unit.

You read right. Somewhere up the bean-counting chain of command, someone decided the FBI couldn't afford to give every agent and analyst in the bureau's largest office outside D.C. a <USnew_edit>basic 20th century communication tool like an FBI.gov e-mail address. As for giving them 21st century technology, such as BlackBerrys, fuhgeddaboudit.

This bit of backwardness and misplaced priorities came to light as we chatted with Mark Mershon, the assistant FBI director who runs the New York office, about the bureau's progress in creating information systems after trying and failing twice. Working our way down a technologies checklist, we arrived at what we though was the mundane item of e-mail, only to be stunned.

Establishing state-of-the-art electronic case files will take money and more expertise than we can muster, but you don't have to be a geek to know something is very wrong - and solvable - when field agents are denied modern basics.

To say there's not enough money in a $2.5 trillion federal budget to give FBI agents e-mail addresses is patently absurd. Which is why headquarters now says everyone will have official e-mail by the end of the year. That must happen. Every major employer provides workers with job-related e-mail because it enhances productivity. Agents should be able to distribute business cards that say JohnJones@fbi.gov. Now, they rely on personal accounts, on which no FBI business should take place.

As for BlackBerrys - devices that are both phones and e-mail terminals - only 100 managers and counterterrorism agents have them in the FBI's 2,000-person New York office. And those are part of a field-testing program. Testing? What's to test?

Every business executive in the country has a BlackBerry. Every assistant to every business executive and every law enforcement agency with which the FBI communicates has BlackBerrys. People who want to blow up the Brooklyn Bridge probably have BlackBerrys.

Think this is outrageous? E-mail your congressional representative. Which you can, because Congress has e-mail. And BlackBerrys.

<USnew_edit>Avoid the refund ripoff

As the April 15 tax deadline approaches, financial offices have opened in New York City's poorest neighborhoods, the better to fleece the unwary with overpriced tax-preparation services and high-interest loans that promise "instant money," all quite legally.

There's no reason to swim with the loan sharks. You can avoid predators by calling 311 and asking for the name of a nearby tax preparer who won't charge a penny for the service and who should also explain why instant-money loans are an extremely bad deal.

The lure of that type of loan is that a taxpayer gets refund money right away and repays the debt when the IRS check arrives. Two facts are left out of the picture: first, the loans carry annual interest rates as high as 700%, and, second, you don't have to wait very long for the government check to come.

According to a report by the Neighborhood Economic Development Advocacy Project, a consumer rights organization, more than 300,000 city taxpayers coughed up a total of more than $92 million in tax preparation and loan fees in 2004, paying an average of $276 per filer. More than three-quarters were families earning less than $34,678 a year.

What's worse, most of the people who took out instant-money loans were waiting for payments of the Earned Income Tax Credit, the federal program that gives cash to the working poor. As a result, companies that offer instant-refund loans wound up with millions that were intended for the needy.

Instant refunds are all but unnecessary. Thanks to improved processing, taxpayers whose filings get sent in electronically can expect a refund check in 15 days or less. And more than three dozen banks, credit unions, community organizations and government offices offer free tax preparation. Working families ought to take advantage of this painless way to avoid the annual refund ripoff.

12 Accused Of Making Marijuana-Laced Candy, Soda (LAT)

By Lee Romney, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

They face cultivation and distribution charges over 'Pot Tarts,' 'Toka-Cola' and others.

SAN FRANCISCO — A dozen Bay Area residents appeared in federal court Friday on marijuana cultivation and distribution charges in connection with a large-scale operation to make pot-laced candy bars and sodas.

The products, bearing such slightly off-brand names as Keef Kat, Toka-Cola, Stoney Ranchers, Trippy peanut butter and Pot Tarts, are packaged to look like the legitimate brands they mimic.

According to an affidavit filed in U.S. District Court here, some of the products — sold under the company name Beyond Bomb — were seized this month at the Compassionate Caregivers medicinal marijuana dispensary in Los Angeles.

They also were being sold at other dispensaries throughout the state, including the Green Grocery Co-Op in Van Nuys, the warrant said.

Though the packaging evokes the irreverent Wacky Pack stickers of years past by mocking trademarked products, federal officials say the psychoactive goods are no joke.

"The packaging is so similar to that of the name brand, it has the potential to fall in the hands of children, with potentially tragic consequences," DEA spokeswoman Casey McEnry said.

Medicinal marijuana use, purchase and cultivation are permitted with limitations under state — but not federal — law.

Federal drug agents identified Kenneth Affolter, 39, of the upscale East Bay community of Lafayette as head of the manufacturing outfit.

Search warrants served on three East Bay warehouses and Affolter's home turned up hundreds of the candy bars and sodas, as well as $100,000 in cash and more than 4,000 marijuana plants, McEnry said.

Affolter and 11 others identified by officials as Beyond Bomb employees are being held without bail.

Their attorneys could not be located Friday. Bruce Margolin, director of Los Angeles NORML — National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws — called the arrests aggressive and "uncalled for."

"There are a lot of people depending on [marijuana products] for their health and safety and welfare," he said. "What do they want, for them to be buying off the street?"

DOJ_NMG_0018697

Despite the large number of plants seized, Margolin said the suspects could have a defense if they operated as a caregivers' cooperative.

Bitter Fight Over Sweet Pot Treats Drug Agents Fear Candies Appeal To Kids -- Medical Marijuana Users Insist They're Legal (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 18, 2006

They had colorful labels and names such as Trippy, Stoney Rancher, Toka-Cola, Pot Tart and Budtella.

To federal drug agents, they were dangerous marijuana-laced concoctions that could fall into the hands of children. But to sick patients who rely on cannabis to ease their symptoms, they were just tasty ways to get their medicine -- and legal under California law.

Federal agents who converged on several of what they called "marijuana candy factories" in the East Bay on Thursday seized hundreds of sodas and candies laced with marijuana in what they said was the largest bust of its kind on the West Coast.

Authorities say the drug is illegal no matter what form it takes, especially marijuana candy products that mimic mainstream candies and are attractive to youths.

But angry medical-marijuana patients said Friday that investigators are blowing smoke and that the raids in Oakland and Emeryville on Thursday are just the latest proof that federal investigators are running roughshod over local and state laws that allow for medicinal cannabis use.

In 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, which allows the use of marijuana for medical purposes with a doctor's recommendation. Despite the law, authorities -- from the California Highway Patrol to the Drug Enforcement Administration -- have pounced on local marijuana-growing operations in the Bay Area, including locations in San Francisco and Sonoma County in December.

The candy-factory raids are the latest crackdown.

"I think the government is once again trying to create terror through our community," said Angel Raich, 40, of Oakland, who uses the drug to treat pain, nausea and seizures associated with a brain tumor and a wasting syndrome. "I do know for a fact that medical-cannabis candy and those kinds of products are in the dispensaries, and patients do use them."

Rick Steeb, 55, of San Jose, who uses marijuana to treat the pain from glaucoma, said he's "never seen (the candy) outside the dispensaries. It's not like they were being sold in convenience stores."

But Special Agent Casey McEnry, spokeswoman for the DEA, the agency that conducted this week's raids, said Friday that marijuana "is a violation of federal law in this form and in the smoked form. Even though there may be claims that these weren't meant for kids, the packaging may suggest otherwise."

The alleged ringleader, Kenneth Affolter, 39, of Lafayette, six other men and five women appeared Friday before U.S. Magistrate Bernard Zimmerman in San Francisco and were ordered held without bail pending a hearing next week.

Affolter, whose nickname is "Kena," operated Beyond Bomb, a manufacturer of the marijuana treats, from adjoining warehouses at 1055 and 1071 Yerba Buena Ave. and 3960 Adeline St. in Emeryville, DEA Special Agent William Armstrong wrote in an affidavit unsealed Friday.

Investigators learned that a $3,913 PG&E balance for a month's period covered all three locations and was billed to Affolter, Armstrong wrote.

Affolter is listed as president of Clear Soap, which is under suspension for failing to pay state taxes, DEA Special Agent Jason Chin wrote in an affidavit. Affolter told Oakland police officers who responded to a silent alarm at one of the Yerba Buena warehouses last month that "he made soaps and candles," agents wrote.

Marijuana candies have been around for at least five years, cannabis users say. But raids of these products only began recently.

In May, police seized Beyond Bomb products from Compassionate Caregivers, a medical-marijuana dispensary in Los Angeles. In July, DEA agents seized Beyond Bomb candies from a San Lorenzo home.

Oakland's Compassionate Caregivers Club at 1740 Telegraph Ave., which Affolter used as a marijuana-cultivation site, was also searched as part of this week's raids, which netted up to 5,000 marijuana plants and $150,000 in cash, authorities said.

At the Telegraph Avenue site, agents found more than 100 marijuana plants, authorities said. Growers there wore identical gray, short-sleeve collared shirts and white lab coats, Armstrong wrote.

Employees also meticulously tracked their work hours on time cards, affidavits said.

Affolter's attorney, Robert Byers of Oakland, said Friday that it was unfair for authorities to claim that children could end up eating Beyond Bomb's creations.

DOJ_NMG_0018698

"They know it's not marketed for kids," Byers said. "They're only seen in the context of people who use medical marijuana. A sweet, nice-tasting product is certainly going to benefit them."

Raided Pot 'Edibles' Trouble Advocates (CCT)

By John Simerman

The Contra Costa Times, March 18, 2006

A day after federal agents seized thousands of marijuana plants and a booty of pot-laced candy and soda pop in raids on warehouses in Emeryville and Oakland, local medical cannabis advocates reacted coolly -- bitter at another federal plunder on a substance the state deems legal for the sick, but leery of an operation that packaged its products to mimic popular brands of sweets.

The raids on a business called Beyond Bomb netted some 10,000 rooted plants, thousands of tiny plant "clones," as well as boxes of candy and soda with take-off names such as "Pot Tarts," "Toka-Cola," "Stoney Rancher" and "Munchy Way," with labels to match.

Agents also raided the Lafayette home of Kenneth Dean Affolter, 39, who they say ran the business. He and 11 others were taken into custody and charged with of distributing marijuana.

Authorities say they believe the snacks and soda were headed to pot dispensaries and cooperatives across the Bay Area and California, said Special Agent Casey McEnry, a spokeswoman for the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

"We don't have any information that these products did ultimately end up in the hands of minors, but that doesn't mean it didn't happen," she said. "They look so similar to the real products, it would almost suggest ... that's the way it looks."

Medicinal marijuana advocates pointed to state law and said it was doubtful the THC-laden snacks and soda were aimed at children.

"There's actually a lot of product like that, and dispensaries are the places they can be had. They're the only places that marijuana is retailed in California," said Dale Gieringer, California coordinator for the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, or NORML.

"They're usually five bucks, three bucks, about like a joint. They're good. A lot of them are very professionally made."

For patients who have trouble smoking, or for whom doctors are concerned about them smoking, "edibles" are the age-old alternative. Droplets and sprays are other options, advocates say.

Gary Ainsworth, who suffers chronic pain, said he likes the taste and medicinal quality of the company's sodas, with names such as "Puffsi" and "Joint," after Pepsi and Jolt. He bought some at an Oakland dispensary but said he doesn't drink it much because of the cost and the long drive from his home in Clovis.

"It works real well for the medication part. But I think it was like $12 for an 8-ounce bottle," he said.

Still, "I'm not hip with the idea of using Jolly Ranchers and (candy) names like that," said Ainsworth. "I think it should be packaged as medicine. If a patient were to have that laying out, somebody might think it's something else -- like, 'have a lollipop.' "

Jeff Jones, executive director of the Oakland Cannabis Buyers' Cooperative, said he has the same concerns over confusion, and another one: that one of the raided warehouses was in an area near homes and schools. Jones favors regulating the suppliers like other businesses.

"If there were permits, they would not have been allowed to be in the neighborhood," said Jones. "That's what this calls for, in my mind. Businesses this big need regulations."

The four warehouses -- three in Emeryville, one in Oakland -- each had sophisticated growing equipment and "looked like they had been in operation for quite some time," said McEnry. The workers all wore gray collared work shorts, and white lab coats were found there, according to agents and the criminal complaint released Friday.

Authorities also found more than $150,000 in cash.

It was the second federal raid in a week on a California medical marijuana supplier, after a raid Tuesday of a Desert Hot Springs farmer who supplied a dispensary in Palm Desert. Federal authorities have been emboldened by a U.S. Supreme Court ruling last summer, in a case against an Oakland woman, that they can prosecute patients who keep and grow marijuana in states that allow it for medical use.

The conflict between state and federal law "means that if you are growing large quantities of marijuana for medical use, you're always going to be a target for the federal government, and the piece of the puzzle that's taking the most risk," said Camilla Norman Field, deputy director of the Drug Policy Alliance in San Francisco.

Under pressure from the federal clash, state lawmakers have tried to clarify the guidelines for medical marijuana and Proposition 215, the medical marijuana law passed in 1996 by 56 percent of California voters.

DOJ_NMG_0018699

A 2004 law established a voluntary ID system, recognized the right for patient and caregiver collectives to cultivate pot, and set out restrictions for how much pot patients could keep: up to six mature or 12 immature plants and up to a half-pound of dried, processed marijuana.

The law, however, did not authorize "any individual or group to cultivate or distribute marijuana for profit." The extent to which Affolter may have profited from Beyond Bomb was unclear Friday. Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, declined to comment.

One medical marijuana advocate said it appeared the operation was professional, concerned with the quality and cleanliness of the product, and "most likely doing this with the best intentions of it being medical."

Still, Caren Woodson, campaign director of Americans for Safe Access, acknowledged that the packaging is somewhat hard to defend.

"But that is part of waging the debate around medical cannabis, trying to figure out what works with the public and what doesn't work," she said.

"Unfortunately, yes, the names are kid-friendly. But who's to say medical cannabis patients can't have fun, too? It's not just kids who eat Milky Ways."

27,800 Bags Of Heroin; Eight Arrests (HRE)

By Tom Jennemann

Hoboken (NJ) Reporter, March 19, 2006

Hudson County Prosecutor Edward DeFazio and the Hoboken Police Department have arrested eight Hudson County residents for running a major heroin ring.

According to Prosecutor Edward DeFazio, the arrests were the result of a six-month investigation by the Hudson County Prosecutor's Office Municipal Task Force, Hoboken Police Department, and the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The individuals arrested were allegedly part of a major organization that supplied heroin throughout the Hudson County area. Detectives also seized a number of high-end customized luxury vehicles with secret compartments allegedly used by members of this organization to hide and transport the heroin.

According to DeFazio, detectives executed search warrants at various locations in Hudson County, including 406 3rd St., Union City, and 4525 Kennedy Blvd., North Bergen. Detectives also searched several vehicles.

The searches resulted in the recovery of 22,000 bags of heroin from "a sophisticated hidden compartment" in a Ford Explorer.

DeFazio added that police also recovered four loaded semi-automatic handguns and 5,000 bags of heroin from a hidden compartment in a Lincoln Navigator. The guns recovered were two Highpoint .9mm handguns, one .45 caliber Ruger, and one .40 caliber Glock, which was reported stolen.

Also, 811 bags of heroin were recovered from the Lumina. A bulletproof vest was found in the Range Rover. DeFazio said police seized a total of more than 27,800 bags of heroin with a street value of over $250,000. Detectives believe the organization was trafficking 15,000 to 20,000 bags of heroin per week.

DeFazio said that those arrested "represented high- and mid-level distributors, suppliers and supervisory level participants. As such, they face potential state prison sentences ranging from a minimum of five years to a maximum of life imprisonment in the case of those charged with leader crimes."

DeFazio said that the U.S. Attorney's office of New York will prosecute the case because they believe it might lead to a large source of heroin in New York City. He also said that he expects more arrests in this case and that several of those arrests will be local.

Arrested individuals

The following is a list of individuals who were arrested and their respective charges and bails:

* Jose "Nutty" Gonzalez, 24, of Union City. He was charged as leader of Narcotics Trafficking Network; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin (2 counts); Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property (two counts); Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; Certain Person not to have a Weapon; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million.

* Rory Praylow, 27, of Hoboken. He was charged as leader of a of Narcotics Trafficking Network; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million.

* Manuel "Murder" Suarez, 30, of Jersey City. He was charged as a "Leader of Narcotics Trafficking Network"; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin (two counts); Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property (two counts); Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; Certain Person not to have a Weapon; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million.

* Philip Anthony "Spud" Pasquale, 21, of Hoboken. He was charged with Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 500 feet of a public park; and Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more. His bail was set at $500,000.

* Jason "Jay" Santos, 24, of Jersey City. He was charged with Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million.

* Alexander Gonzalez, 20, of Jersey City, He was charged with Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $100,000. * Mary J. Gama, 26, of Union City was charged with Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more. Her bail was set at $100,000.

* Darryl L. Oliver, 34, of Hoboken was charged with Possession of Marijuana. His bail was set at $5,000.

Lawyer Criticizes D.E.A. On Death Threat Response (NYT)

By Julia C. Mead

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

Thomas Liotti has been branded a big mouth for his self-promotion and propensity to tongue-lash prosecutors, police officers and even judges. He shrugs off the criticism, calling it a byproduct of being a lawyer who defends some of the most dangerous criminals to pass through any of New York's downstate courtrooms.

Mr. Liotti has defended clients on death row, others who murdered their previous lawyers and major drug traffickers with connections to Colombian drug lords.

"It's all part of a day's work," Mr. Liotti, of Garden City, N.Y., said in his characteristic boom.

But even a self-described tough guy like Mr. Liotti gets scared.

In a press release on Wednesday in which he bragged about the toughness of his clients — one, he said, was involved in a courthouse shootout; another waved a gun at him and boasted he was a contract killer — he also criticized the federal Drug Enforcement Agency for what he called its lukewarm response to a death threat against lawyers who defend Colombian drug traffickers.

"I want the U.S. government to realize that they have a responsibility to protect everyone, even criminal defense lawyers," he said. "There's not much I can do. I can't hide. I'm a person with a family."

Asked whether he took the threat — certainly not his first — seriously enough to be frightened, he said, "Yeah, absolutely."

Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the United States attorney's office, said, "We do take these cases very seriously."

He added, however, that as a matter of policy he could not confirm that any investigation was under way.

The threat was contained in an anonymous letter that came to light in Colombia in November, naming 22 lawyers, 7 in New York and 15 in Colombia. Among other things, it said any American lawyer found in Colombia would be "captured and executed." Soon after, a memo thought to have come from inside a prison in Cómbita, Colombia, began circulating among lawyers. It rated the performance of about 30 in New York, New Jersey and Miami who had represented accused drug dealers.

"I think I won the prize for the most derogatory evaluation," said Mr. Liotti, a former president of the New York State Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. Next to his name, it said, "Incompetente, Desleal, Mentiroso, Traidor, Sin Excrupulos" — incompetent, disloyal, liar, traitor, without scruples.

Tipped off to the threat by a colleague, Mr. Liotti wrote to the enforcement agency in early February to demand an investigation. The Feb. 28 response from Jodi L. Avergun, the agency's chief of staff, said the agency had taken the threat seriously and immediately referred the matter to the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn for investigation.

Lawrence M. Herrmann, a lawyer in Jackson Heights, Queens, who was named in the death threat, said he had clients awaiting extradition from the Cómbita prison but was afraid to visit them. "I spoke with three D.E.A. agents I know in Bogotá; two said it was nothing, the third told me to be careful," he said.

Like others on the list, Mr. Liotti said he had represented some clients who became informers rather than face a long prison term and others who refused to testify for the prosecution.

"Who knows why this threat was made?" Mr. Liotti said. "There are just rumors out there, and you never know what the plots and subplots are. It's like fighting ghosts."

Detroit Dealers Invade West Virginia Town (PPG)

By Milan Simonich, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 19, 2006

The 'Hillbilly Highway' from Motor City now carries crack and crime, not jobs

HUNTINGTON, W.Va. -- They still talk about "the Hillbilly Highway," a route that led from poverty in Appalachia to jobs in the auto plants of Detroit.

Connections between Detroit and rural America remain strong, but nobody romanticizes about them anymore. Detroit doesn't export cars the way it used to. Instead, say police across the region, it turns out drug dealers who travel hundreds of miles to enrich themselves in smaller towns.

In Huntington, detectives keep a running list of the Detroit crack dealers they have arrested. It contains more than 250 names but accounts for only a portion of those who have infiltrated the city of 50,000 in the past three years.

"Those are just the adults that we've caught. There are more. Lots more," said narcotics Detective Paul Hunter.

Law officers in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky and West Virginia all have stories about the Detroit drug pipeline, but no town has been hit harder than Huntington.

It was here that gunmen killed four teenagers one day last year, leaving their bodies scattered on a sidewalk, a driveway and the front yard of a house. Huntington police have not arrested anybody in the case, but they have a theory.

"We believe, obviously, that there's a Detroit connection. We haven't seen anything to change our minds," Capt. Steve Hall said last week.

These days, just about every drug arrest in Huntington produces suspects from Detroit. The quadruple homicide is a variation of that pattern, Capt. Hall says.

Detectives believe the shooters targeted Donte Ward, 19, because he supposedly stole from a woman connected to Detroit drug dealers. The triggermen, determined not to leave any witnesses, also killed the three people who happened to be with Mr. Ward.

Two of them, Michael Dillon, 17, and Megan Poston, 16, had gone together to their high school prom that night.

"I can still see the corsage falling off Megan's wrist," Capt. Hall said. "That will stick with me forever."

Ten months have passed since the shootings, which also took the life of 18-year-old Eddrick Clark. Capt. Hall said three detectives continue to work the investigation in between other cases.

Huntington Mayor David Felinton said the crime changed Huntington.

"The killings were our 9/11," he said. "We're no longer the same place as a result of what happened. We're not as safe."

The mayor meets occasionally with the victims' families, sharing information about the investigation's two fronts, one at home, the other in Detroit.

But the scourge of crack cocaine makes it impossible to update everyone. Police had Mr. Ward's mother, Tina, in jail last week on drug-possession charges.

The invasion of Detroit drug dealers coincided with the layoff of police in Huntington to balance the budget. Sixteen of 91 officers were let go in 2002.

Given its size, Huntington should have 120 to 130 police officers, Mr. Felinton said. Today, the police force has been built back up to 88, though not everybody is working. Some officers are on military leave.

Narcotics officers say Detroit dealers control most of the 30 or so crack houses in Huntington. But Detective Hunter said they are shrewd enough to keep their names off deeds and leases.

With less competition in smaller cities than in Detroit, the dealers can sell crack at inflated prices. They call Huntington "Moneyton." Nearby Ashland, Ky., is "Cashland."

To fight the drug incursion, Mr. Felinton said, he hopes to add 10 police officers and two code enforcement officers to the city payroll this year.

The code enforcement officers would help police close down crack houses after raids. Sgt. J.T. Combs, who heads the narcotics unit, says he has been frustrated by the city's lack of diligence in boarding up drug dens.

Mr. Felinton says the problem is money. Huntington has only one code officer on staff. He says police will get more help if he is able to add the extra positions in the next budget.

Beefing up the police department has become a more popular idea since the quadruple homicide and a separate drive-by shooting in an affluent neighborhood.

Mr. Felinton said he thinks the quadruple murder will be solved. Capt. Hall is less confident.

"I'm not real hopeful," he said. "But we're not giving up."

For police in smaller towns, fighting the Detroit connection can be daunting, even on seemingly routine cases.

Capt. Hall said his officers have arrested Detroit residents on felony drug warrants, only to have police or prosecutors in Michigan decline to extradite them, possibly for financial reasons. Huntington is 340 miles from Detroit, so a trip to pick up a prisoner may mean lodging and food expenses, plus two days' wages.

Thomas Sansone, police chief of New Castle, Lawrence County, had the same problem with Detroit drug dealers caught in his town. He said Detroit authorities declined to extradite certain prisoners that New Castle officers arrested on felony drug warrants. Chief Sansone then had no choice but to release them.

This emboldened the suspects, he said. Instead of hiding from New Castle police, the accused drug peddlers suddenly felt comfortable.

Police in Steubenville, Ohio, have a different frustration in dealing with Detroit suspects. They say that because of the large number of cases in overburdened Detroit and Wayne County, Mich., courts, some criminals can avoid serious punishment, then move to smaller towns.

They point to the case of Ramone Barnett. He served six months in jail for a 2003 shooting in Detroit, said Steubenville narcotics Detective Jon Sowers. After Mr. Barnett, 34, went free, he headed for Steubenville and restarted a crack-dealing business, Detective Sowers said.

Steubenville police arrested him last month, alleging that he had a dozen individually wrapped packages of crack cocaine, each weighing 3 grams.

Because of his criminal record, Mr. Barnett also was charged with illegally possessing a firearm. Police say they found him carrying a 9 mm handgun, which had been reported stolen in a Weirton, W.Va., break-in.

Steubenville, an easy drive from parts of Pennsylvania and West Virginia, is the type of smaller border town that Detroit dealers often target.

Two Detroit gangs that took over crack-dealing operations in New Castle eventually expanded to Beaver Falls and Farrell in Mercer County, said Pennsylvania Attorney General Tom Corbett. Local and state law officers eventually pooled their resources to raid the gangs' crack houses and issue arrest warrants for 28 of their members, including both leaders.

In Huntington, police say, there are no Detroit gangs but there are countless Detroit drug dealers.

"You put one in jail and there are two to take their place," Capt. Hall said.

He has about four years until retirement and one last hope -- seeing the quadruple murder case solved.

Mr. Felinton said hiring more officers and stepping up day-to-day drug enforcement may give police the lead they need.

People in the drug world know who committed the killings, the mayor said, but they are not inclined to talk, unless they are arrested and facing charges themselves.

High Crimes, Or A Tokin' Figure? (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Canadians Find the 'Prince of Pot' Harmless. The DEA Begs to Differ.

VANCOUVER

Sweet marijuana smoke tumbles down the steps from "the Vapor Lounge," a corner of Marc Emery's bookstore where customers toke up at will.

"We get high with everybody," Emery says, shrugging. "This is a pilgrimage spot, and people come here from all over the world. We get high."

Illegal? Yes.

So were the seeds he used to keep in a case in the store, with exotic names like Afghan Dream and Chemo Grizzly. So was the booming business he ran, complete with glossy seed catalogues describing the subtle and sublime nuances of his varieties. ("Nebula: Fruity flavor and scent. Transcendental buzz. Harvest outdoor.") So, for that matter, are the other marijuana businesses that have sprouted up in the block around his Vancouver bookstore. The street is nicknamed "Vansterdam," with pot-hazy cafes, headshops filled with pipes and bongs, and neon signs advertising illegal seed sales.

Until recently, nobody much cared, it seemed. The police hadn't bothered to come around for eight years. Before that, they busted Emery for seed sales and raided him four times. But he just got fined -- once with "a nice speech from the judge saying what a nice person I was and how marijuana probably shouldn't be illegal," Emery says -- and the police stopped trying.

In truth, Emery hated being ignored. He tried to stir up notoriety. Every year, he filled out his income taxes listing his occupation as "Marijuana Seed Vendor," paying heftily and honestly, he says, on his multimillion-dollar business. The Canadian Revenue Service never questioned him.

He told the Canada post office he was getting and sending his seeds through the mail. They never stopped delivery. He started the B.C. Marijuana Party, fielded 79 candidates in 2001, and ran repeatedly for local and federal offices. He never won.

DOJ_NMG_0018703

He broadcast "Pot-TV" on the Internet, entertained politicians, and openly funded marches, lawsuits and marijuana-legalization drives from Arizona to Israel to Washington, D.C.

When it was too quiet at home, he would go somewhere to rattle up a pro-pot demonstration. He would light up a fat joint in front of a police station, daring the cops to arrest him.

Twenty-one times they did. Usually he got off, or was released after a night in jail, or fined. His longest stretch was 61 days in jail in 2004, ordered by a Saskatoon judge clearly irked at Emery's in-your-face apologia. No big deal, Emery says. He read the Bible behind bars.

Then came the DEA.

Emery figured something was up when a strange young woman pestered him to buy 10 pounds of pot. He refused. She bought some seeds at his store, asked for tips about how to hide them to go to the States, and left.

Eight days later, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents and Vancouver police tromped into his store, ordered the customers out, taped paper over the windows and began hauling out computers and files. Emery, on the other side of Canada to speak near Halifax at the Atlantic Hemp Festival, was grabbed by six plainclothes policemen as he left a restaurant.

Emery is "one of the attorney general's most wanted international drug trafficking targets," the DEA in Washington crowed on July 29, 2005, announcing an extradition request for Emery and two employees. Emery's bust, the DEA said, was "a significant blow not only to the marijuana trafficking trade but also to the marijuana legalization movement."

And he thought trying to change the law was legal, Emery muses.

So did lots of other Canadians, it turned out. Emery's arrest for extradition on U.S. "drug kingpin" charges, carrying a minimum sentence of 10 years to life in prison, outraged many in Canada. They resented the long reach of America's law and what they saw as the United States' fevered preoccupation with pot.

"They need to leave our country alone," complained a letter to the editor in the London (Ontario) Free Press. "If we wanted to prosecute Emery we would, but it is not worth our time and money."

"Marc's business was known to police and every level of government," intoned a columnist in the Vancouver Province. To arrest him now "is petty and dishonest."

Todd Greenberg, the assistant U.S. attorney handling the case in Seattle, says Canada's apparent tolerance of Emery's seed business does not make the U.S. bid to prosecute him unfair.

"What Canada does or does not do is not particularly relevant to us," he says. "We are prosecuting him for what he did in our country -- distributing millions and millions of marijuana seeds in the United States. When someone does that, the United States has the obligation to enforce our laws whether that person is physically located here or overseas."

Greenberg says the charges brought by a federal grand jury followed an 18-month investigation in which DEA agents repeatedly found Marc Emery's seeds at the root of illegal marijuana "grow ops." He insists Emery's legalization campaigns did not affect the charges.

That sounds hollow to Bruce Mirken, a spokesman for the Washington-based Marijuana Policy Project that Emery says he helped finance (contributors are confidential, the organization says). The DEA's public boast to have dealt a blow to "the legalization movement" showed its hand, Mirken says.

"This is a democracy. We are supposed to be able to talk about whether our laws make any sense.

"Year after year they roll out ad campaigns that attempt to demonize marijuana," Mirken notes. "They consider it the number one drug threat in America. That always struck us as bizarre."

If the DEA tries to demonize marijuana, Emery runs a multimedia juggernaut to sanctify it. In addition to his irreverent Internet site, his Cannabis Culture magazine comes out every other month, a slick magazine chockablock with advertisements by seed vendors and hydroponics suppliers, articles on growing lush and potent plants, and even a "pot puzzler" crossword. He says he distributes 75,000 copies.

Emery's bookstore is a cheerful dispensary for books and magazines on marijuana, bongs and pipes of every conceivable design, T-shirts, pot cookbooks, grinders, vaporizers, mushroom spores, and hemp clothing.

And then there is Emery himself. At 48, he looks more like a Young Republican than a stoner who calls himself the Prince of Pot. As often as not, he is in a coat and tie, with neatly combed hair, an earnest expression, with a good sound bite for the TV. He has been a soccer coach and a foster parent. Married, divorced and soon to remarry -- to Jodie Giesz-Ramsay, 21, who transcribed his jailhouse musings and now helps edit his magazine.

He talks with a machine-gun style unmellowed by his admitted custom of a daily joint or two. He compares himself to Martin Luther King and Mahatma Gandhi. He had to apologize last year for calling a federal minister a "Nazi," and he won no PR points when he spat on a policeman during a 2000 arrest of one of his employees.

Emery's life is the limelight. For 17 years, he ran a used-book store in Ontario, and publicly challenged a business fee, his town's bid for the 1991 Pan American Games, its Sunday shopping laws and pornography laws. In 1990 he flouted the prohibition against selling High Times magazine, then banned as "illicit drug literature." He helped win that battle, getting the law overturned, and found his calling in the marijuana movement.

DOJ_NMG_0018704

He wound up in British Columbia, a tolerant corner of a tolerant country. The official statistics agency of Canada says 45 percent of Canadians over age 15 have used marijuana. Possession and use is legal for medical purposes, and the former Liberal government tried to make possession of pot a matter of a small fine.

The legislation did not pass, but the laws on marijuana and sales of seeds are often overlooked. Until his arrest in July, Emery says only two people had ever been prosecuted for selling seeds, and both had simply been fined.

So Emery sold and sold. He accepted seed orders of the 534 varieties listed in his catalogue or on the Internet only with money orders that could not be easily traced. He got and sent seeds through the Canadian Postal Service, and then destroyed the records, he says.

"I sold millions of seeds proudly to people all over the world," and perhaps 70 percent of them were mailed to the United States, he concedes. "Everything the DEA said is correct -- except I don't buy the charge that I'm poisoning children of America."

Emery says he did it all for the movement, not for profit. He claims to have funneled more than $3 million to marches, candidates, lawsuits and ballot drives over a decade. He says he paid taxes and kept very little. He lives modestly in his fiancee's apartment. He doesn't own a car or a house, investments or fancy jewelry, he says.

Emery will get a judicial hearing in Canada later this year. The Canadian justice minister in the new conservative government could block the extradition, but he is a tough-talking former prosecutor and Emery acknowledges his chances are "slim odds indeed."

"In the U.S, I have every confidence I would get a minimum of 30 years," Emery says in an interview in the basement of his bookstore. "I'll get a longer sentence than I'd get in Canada for multiple murder, for something no one in Canada has ever gone to jail for."

Here is the twist: Emery welcomes it. Almost.

"I'm interested in whatever would legalize pot fastest," he says. "Part of me believes that going to jail will accelerate that process. And part of me believes that if I die in jail it will accelerate it even faster."

That is as much for Emery's devotion to the spotlight as devotion to the cause, he concedes.

"I'm very interested to see what happens to me, because I think I am a person of destiny," he says, with no trace of modesty. "I haven't been fearful since the moment I was arrested. I just felt my time has finally come. . . .

"I've already got this grand-scale epic going in my head. I am out to destroy the DEA and defeat them. And they are out to destroy me."

(SLPD)

By Philip Dine

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 18, 2006

For now, the cabbage-green rows of small poppies in the furrowed squares of land resemble any variety of legitimate crops. In a few months, these plants will stand out as a tall sea of crimson.

Viewed from the window of a low-flying helicopter, new poppy fields come into view every few seconds, spread around a desolate landscape virtually unchanged for centuries in this remote part of Afghanistan. The houses are small, isolated and fashioned from mud, some with mud walls around them. There is no sign of mosques or schools, hospitals or stores.

This is the epicenter of poppy cultivation in Afghanistan. The nation's crop provides 87 percent of the world's opium, from which heroin is produced, according to the United Nations. Early indications are that Helmand, a province deep in southern Afghanistan bordering Pakistan, will produce half the world's supply of opium this year.

The poppies are invaluable cash crops to farmers seeking to sustain their families, but dangerous to a young Afghan democracy. An unholy alliance is emerging among farmers, drug lords, Taliban remnants and al-Qaida fighters. Intelligence sources and Afghan officials cite mounting evidence that insurgents are using drugs to wreak havoc on Afghan society - including the corrupting of public officials - while also extracting funds from drug profits for their anti-government violence.

The resulting tension was in evidence on a recent tour of the area by two U.S. gunships. The helicopters landed in a poppy field to give State Department officials and a reporter a chance to look around - for two minutes - encircled by guards with automatic weapons. The guards worry about violence, either from farmers who think their crop is threatened, or from insurgents protecting the poppy fields.

"You can get on the ground, but that's when you're the most vulnerable," warned Ed Morris, lead pilot in the U.S. military detachment providing protective cover for joint Afghanistan-American drug-eradication efforts in this area.

Drugs are already the nation's sole export of any magnitude, and threaten to turn it into a "narco-state," a country whose policies and politics are dominated by drug lords.

DOJ_NMG_0018705

"The concern is that this government will fail and fall and the country will be a breeding ground for terrorists again," says Doug Wankel, director of the Counter Narcotics Task Force at the U.S. Embassy in Afghanistan. Former chief of operations for the Drug Enforcement Administration, he is a native of Bowling Green, Mo.

Poisoning "infidels"

There is also a little-noted bonus for al-Qaida in the burgeoning heroin production. Afghan sources say the terrorist group has acknowledged in private sessions its satisfaction that expanding heroin use is poisoning "infidels" in other countries. One example is a skyrocketing rate of AIDS, sparked by dirty needles, in Russia and former Soviet republics.

Kahir Ismailee of Kabul has worked for years with international groups on health, education and human rights issues in rural areas where anti-Western sentiment is strong.

He says that in the terrorists' "jihad against all Westerners, one of their tactics to ruin a society was to make them addicts, so they export heroin to the Western countries."

Ismailee says an influential Taliban cleric told him: "Drugs are illegal in Islam, but we want infidels to die."

Mohammad Nabi Hussaini directs the poppy eradication program in the Afghan Ministry of Counter Narcotics. It's dangerous work; when traveling around the country, he wears a turban to disguise himself.

"They say this, if you go to their gatherings, their religious gatherings: 'Western countries, they are sending us alcohol, they are sending us rockets - this is our rocket, poppy. This is how we can fight them,' " Hussaini says. "But they are also fighting their own people, because it brings the moral degradation of our society. It is against Islam."

And, he noted, more Afghans are becoming addicted to heroin or opium.

"It's not true that it's not our problem. It's becoming our problem," he says. "The rate of addiction will increase, I think, very badly. I believe it is something that is destroying our nation. My village has 120 families. When I was a kid, there was only one person who was taking raw opium, who was an addict. Right now in my village there are more than 12 very hard addicts."

Afghan President Hamid Karzai has put it bluntly: "If we don't destroy the poppy, it will destroy us."

The last two years have been the biggest in history for opium production in Afghanistan, each topping 4,000 tons of opium, and this year looms as a third banner year. Hoping to avert another flooding of the heroin market, Afghan forces and their allies, particularly the United States, are responding strongly - if belatedly - to the threat.

Eradication is one element in a multipronged response to the mounting drug problem, an effort that also includes a range of educational, economic and legal approaches. The point man for the U.S. State Department is St. Louis native Tom Schweich, a top official for international narcotics and law enforcement who seeks to coordinate actions among Americans, Afghans and their international partners.

"The reason we went into Afghanistan was to eliminate the people who were responsible for 9/11," Schweich says. "There's now a nascent democracy here. The threats that are posed to this democracy are narcotics and terrorism. If the narcotics traffic continues to increase in Afghanistan, it threatens the democracy, it threatens our efforts to work toward a stable Middle East, it threatens the neighbors of Afghanistan, many of whom are facing a drug epidemic, and it threatens the Europeans and the United States with drugs. It really does have implications across the entire world."

The Taliban and the poppy

In some ways, the proliferation of poppy is an unintended consequence of the U.S. overthrow of the Taliban in 2001.

In earlier years, the Taliban had been content to allow the production of opium, even urging farmers to continue in defiance of the desire of the West that poppy cultivation cease - and often profiting from drug trafficking.

"The Taliban told people this was a fight against Muslims, that you should grow poppy. Even if you have no land, you should use your roof," says Asadullah Khalid, governor of Kandahar province.

But the Taliban abruptly switched gears at the start of this decade, as it faced growing international pressure to moderate its rule. Hoping to win diplomatic recognition from the West, the Taliban knew it had to make some concessions, and yielding on narcotics was the most palatable choice, Ismailee says.

In its last years in power, the Taliban clamped down on the drug trade in an effective but brutal way.

"There were executions without any transparent trials, hands were cut off, legs were severed," Ismailee says. By 2001, the extremist government had reduced the opium production to virtually nothing.

The U.S.-led removal of the Taliban removed the fear ordinary Afghans felt, spurring many to get back into poppy farming.

In addition, American and Afghan policies initially contributed to the growth of the narcotics problem. U.S. forces enlisted the support of warlords in the fight against the Taliban, turning a blind eye to their drug trafficking. After he assumed office, Karzai - hoping to solidify his hold on the country - brought some compromised provincial figures into his government.

Now, insurgents trying to weaken the U.S.-backed government find it advantageous to forge alliances with drug traffickers and encourage farmers to grow poppy - telling them "whenever the government tries to eradicate, the Taliban will be there to protect you," Ismailee says.

DOJ_NMG_0018706

Insurgents also have issued warnings that those who stop growing poppy will be seen as "siding" with the government. It is no coincidence, officials say, that the areas where anti-government rebels are strongest are the same places where poppy production is at its highest.

Corruption, poverty, porous borders

Other factors have helped worsen the drug problem in Afghanistan.

Corruption, bribery and the quick release from jail of suspected drug traffickers.

Widespread poverty, which forces farmers to seek any possible means to support their families. Other crops pay a fraction of what poppies yield. And many traditional Afghanistan crops, such as fruits and nuts, were uprooted when Soviet troops destroyed trees to prevent guerrillas from hiding.

The return of Afghan refugees who had fled to Pakistan to escape Taliban rule. Some went into poppy farming on their own; others were compelled by landowners who made it a condition of their getting a parcel of land as tenant farmers.

Abysmal roads. Farmers often can't get legitimate crops to market, whereas poppy is so valuable that traffickers will come to the farmers.

The trend toward the processing of opium into heroin in Afghanistan, turning Afghans from opium exporters into heroin producers. Afghans have seen the profits to be made and, in recent years, provided necessary precursor chemicals by foreigners, began setting up their own labs to make the end product.

Porous borders that let drugs move freely into Iran, Pakistan or former Soviet republics to the north, often eventually going to Europe - which gets 90 percent of its heroin from Afghanistan.

The hardiness of the crop. Poppies require little care and little water, critical in a country suffering from massive environmental degradation and long arid periods and whose mountainside irrigation systems were largely destroyed over decades of armed conflict.

"The narcotics problem in our province is very, very complicated," said Engineer Daud, governor of Helmand, as he stood at an airfield flanked by Afghan and U.S. troops.

"Our land is productive land for narcotics, and we have more than 100 miles of border with Pakistan, with deserts and mountains," he says. "Because of the low capacity of our national police, it is difficult to control that part of the problem. Drug dealers and terrorists are carrying drugs across the border, and terrorists are getting money from narcotics."

"Both forces are mobilizing"

In the northern part of his province, people are so desperate for water that farmers trying to make a legitimate living on their tiny plots, with virtually no money for their own families, are forced to buy water to keep their chickens alive.

Daud understands why they "have the reason to cultivate cash crop like poppy," and he prefers to go after the larger and wealthy drug dealers rather than the simple growers, but the traffickers are more evasive, more powerful - and more threatening.

In many ways, Afghan officials and their international allies, preoccupied with overthrowing the Taliban and then keeping it and al-Qaida at bay, were caught off guard by the insidious drug trade and didn't get serious until relatively recently.

"The problem was . . . unique, because of its scope and because there are so many moving parts," said Craig Chretien, formerly a senior official at the Drug Enforcement Administration, where he spent 26 years in several South American countries. He is now deputy director of the counternarcotics task force at the American Embassy in Afghanistan, which is helping the Afghans tackle the problem.

"It's challenging, but is it impossible? No," Chretien says.

After a rather tepid Afghan response last year, and some faltering steps by the United States, both countries are launching a broader, better coordinated and more aggressive campaign.

The next few months will begin to signal how successful the effort is likely to be.

"We've got an increased ability to fight the drugs, and they've got an increased ability to grow the drug," Schweich says. "So both forces are mobilizing."

Taliban Rebels Team Up With Drug Barons (WT)

By Emmanuel Duparcq, Agence France-presse

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

LASHKARGAH, Afghanistan -- Taliban rebels determined to keep southern Afghanistan in chaos have teamed up with drug barons against the government and its opium eradication campaign, officials say.

The campaign to destroy opium poppy fields was begun March 8 in southern Helmand, the producer of most of Afghanistan's opium crop -- which makes up nearly 90 percent of the world total -- and also one of the provinces worst-hit by a Taliban-led insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0018707

"Terrorists and narcotics are very close; they're supporting each other," said Helmand province Gov. Muhammad Daud. "When narcotics production is up, terrorism automatically goes up."

Lt. Col. Henry Worsley of the 3,500 British forces deployed in the province agreed. "Taliban and drugs feed each other. You cannot separate them here."

In their final two years in power, before they were toppled in a U.S.-led invasion in late 2001, the Taliban banned opium and succeeded in drastically slashing its production to 185 tons from 3,300 tons.

Some observers say their motivation was to win international favor. Others say they wanted to push up the price of the raw ingredient of heroin.

Four years later, the Taliban rebels are willing to protect opium crops and farmers against the new administration in Kabul. The United States and other Western countries, which see opium as a source of terrorist funding, are pressuring the government led by President Hamid Karzai to eradicate the crop.

Several anonymous letters attributed to the Taliban have been distributed in the past few months in Helmand and other insurgency-infested provinces that threaten farmers with reprisals if they do not plant opium, residents said.

Some letters also offer protection against government eradication attempts.

"Taliban will try to disrupt the eradication campaign," said the Helmand governor who has vowed to remove all the opium from his province in two months.

"Eradication will cause fighting," said Mohammed Sardar, an official from the nongovernmental group Mercy Corps that is trying to persuade opium farmers to switch to other crops.

"Poor farmers won't fight, but Taliban and smugglers will," he said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney Dismisses Suggestions Of Shake-Up (AP-Y2)

By Douglass K. Daniel

AP2, March 19, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney on Sunday dismissed suggestions that the Bush White House, hampered by a weak response to Hurricane Katrina and stumbles on policy questions, needs a shake-up.

"I don't think we can pay any attention to that kind of thing," Cheney said on CBS "Face the Nation." "The president has got a job to do. ... He ignores the background noise that's out there in the polls that are taken on a daily basis."

Bush's job approval in March was at 37 percent, which tied for his lowest rating in the AP-Ipsos poll. Senior Republicans and others have said the Bush team may need an infusion of fresh blood and ideas.

Cheney, in a rare Sunday morning television interview, told CBS that he heard similar grumbling 30 years ago when he was chief of staff for President Ford.

"Administrations go through peaks and valleys," he said. "When you're down in the polls you're going to take shots that you don't deserve, and when you're up in the polls you're probably going to get praise you don't deserve."

Asked if he and Bush had a "good cop, bad cop" partnership in which Cheney took the heat for controversial policies, the vice president said: "It may look that way. It's not conscious."

Added Cheney, who has said he will not seek the presidency: "My job is to do what I can to support him and to support the administration. My advice to him is untainted by any concern I might have on how the folks in Iowa look at me in connection with the 2008 Iowa caucuses."

Cheney chuckled when asked if he himself had ever considered resigning amid low poll numbers and suggestions by commentators that he was a liability for the administration.

"It's been a highlight of my career to be a part of this administration," he said. "I've now been elected to a second term, and I'll serve out my term."

To political strategists who say that he should step aside with a year or so remaining in his term to give someone a jump on gaining the Republican nomination for president, Cheney said such a move wouldn't make sense to him. "Nobody has suggested it to me," he said.

Cheney and the White House were criticized for not immediately notifying the national press corps after he accidentally shot a companion while hunting in Texas last month. On Sunday, the vice president said he still thought the situation had been handled appropriately.

Calling the circumstances unusual, the vice president quipped, "It's probably the first time the Secret Service ever had to worry about a protectee shooting somebody else instead of being shot at."

DOJ_NMG_0018708

Cheney Comfortable In His Role (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

Dick Cheney's lack of political ambition to succeed his boss gives him unusual freedom to be a lightning rod for contentious issues and serve as an "untainted" adviser to the president, the vice president said yesterday.

"Frankly, I don't spend a lot of time worrying about the polls," said Mr. Cheney, who as vice president is spearheading some tough battles on Capitol Hill involving the treatment of terrorist detainees and the administration's terrorist surveillance program.

Historically, vice presidents have used their second term to plan their own presidential campaigns and, accordingly, walked on eggshells to appease voters.

"This has been a different kind of arrangement than most administrations have between the president and the vice president, primarily because I'm here to serve him; I'm not here to run for higher office," Mr. Cheney told CBS' Bob Schieffer on "Face the Nation."

"My advice to him is untainted by any concern I might have about how the folks in Iowa look at me with connection with the 2008 Iowa caucuses," Mr. Cheney said.

"And when I speak out on an issue, it's because somebody needs to speak out on the issue. And I can do it without fear [because] I'm not here to try to burnish my image or improve my standing in the polls. I'm here to do a job that needs to be done for the president of the United States," he said.

Mr. Cheney dismissed reports suggesting that he will be asked to step down and allow a presidential contender to take his seat.

Tongue-in-cheek, Mr. Cheney did confirm some Republican criticism that he has changed since becoming vice president: "I'm a lot older. I've got less hair," he said.

He added seriously: "The job I have now as vice president is to be an adviser to the president, primarily. I don't run anything. I'm not in charge of the White House."

"I don't talk about the conversations I have with him. I think presidents need to have somebody around them who is totally reliable and trustworthy and is going to protect those communications they have with the president."

When asked whether he and President Bush play "good cop, bad cop," with Mr. Cheney taking the political lumps on hot-button issues, the vice president said: "It may look that way. It's not conscious."

As for his accidental shooting of lawyer Harry Whittington on a recent hunting trip, Mr. Cheney said that even in hindsight and amid abundant late-night jokes, the White House press corps was adequately notified.

"I must admit the first thing I thought when I saw what had happened and rushed over to help Harry, I did not think, 'Gee, I better call the press corps and tell them what's going on here,' " said Mr. Cheney, who does not travel with the White House press corps on vacations.

"It struck me as a bit of a tempest in a teapot over the question of how it was announced. It was announced by us, I believe, in a timely fashion as soon as we knew what Harry's status was," Mr. Cheney said.

"I think it's one of those situations or circumstances that is obviously difficult and generates controversy. It's probably the first time the Secret Service ever had to worry about a protectee shooting somebody else instead of being shot at," he said.

The vice president declined to speculate about a major staff shake-up at the Bush White House. "The president hasn't indicated he plans to make any changes. If he does and when he does, I'm sure he'll announce it," Mr. Cheney said.

A 'Third Term' For Bush (WSJ)

By Fred Barnes

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

It's time for President Bush to think about a third term. No, he doesn't need to overturn the Constitution. He can start the equivalent of his third term now, by filling his presidential staff and cabinet with new faces -- or old faces in new positions -- and by concentrating on new or forgotten initiatives. The goal: rejuvenation of his presidency by shocking the media and political community with a sweeping overhaul of his administration. The impact would be enormous because it's exactly what his foes have been demanding and exactly what he is not expected to do. And it would give him a chance to escape the political doldrums that may otherwise doom his presidency through its final 34 months.

Only a few months ago, it appeared the Bush administration didn't need emergency resuscitation. True, Mr. Bush had suffered a year of serious troubles -- failure of Social Security reform, Katrina, Harriet Miers, Iraq -- following his second inauguration. Yet he emerged bruised but politically alive. He'd even won the confirmation of two conservative Supreme Court justices.

DOJ_NMG_0018709

Then he was belted with a new round of reversals. His State of the Union address was uninspiring, the Dubai ports deal had to be nixed, and his proposed spending cuts were going nowhere. This time the fallout was worse for Mr. Bush. Republican unity, so important to his past success, dissolved as congressional Republicans began criticizing the White House. And Iraq was again a political problem. Even several top Bush aides now suspect an infusion of fresh talent could liven up the administration.

A broad transformation, playing on the media's overreaction whenever surprised, would do more. Reporters would be forced to write stories about new officials, cover confirmation hearings, show up at press conferences they might have ignored, assess new policies, and -- this is most important -- take a fresh look at the president. It would be like the beginning of a new presidential term. Sure, the press and politicians would be cynical about Mr. Bush's bold moves, especially since he wouldn't be uprooting any policy or hiring Bush critics. In truth, there would be a large element of smoke and mirrors in his actions. The trade-off is that Mr. Bush might revitalize his presidency.

A sweeping overhaul on a smaller scale has worked before. In one swoop in 1975, President Ford replaced Defense Secretary James Schlesinger with Donald Rumsfeld, made Dick Cheney chief of staff, appointed George H.W. Bush as CIA director in place of William Colby, and stripped Secretary of State Henry Kissinger of his second post as national security adviser, installing Brent Scowcroft. These surprising and dramatic steps strengthened a weak Ford presidency. President Carter tried something similar in 1979 when his presidency was at a low point. But the overhaul was handled clumsily. Mr. Carter appeared to act arbitrarily and his presidency never recovered.

Mr. Bush's first task must be to jettison his admirable but unrealistic sense of loyalty. Unlike other presidents, he reciprocates the loyalty of his aides. But for the good of his presidency, he must let some of them go, regardless of whether they deserve firing.

The president's most spectacular move would be to anoint a presidential successor. This would require Vice President Cheney to resign. His replacement? Condoleezza Rice, whom Mr. Bush regards highly. Her replacement? Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, whose Bush-like views on Iraq and the war on terror have made him a pariah in the Democratic caucus.

Mr. Cheney would probably be happy to step down and return to Wyoming. But it would make more sense for him to move to the Pentagon to replace Donald Rumsfeld as defense secretary, a job Mr. Cheney held during the elder Bush's administration. The Senate confirmation hearing for Mr. Cheney alone would produce political fireworks and attract incredible attention. At Treasury, Mr. Bush has a perfect replacement for John Snow, someone he already knows. That's Glenn Hubbard, former chairman of Mr. Bush's council of economic advisers and currently dean of Columbia's business school. He is in sync with Mr. Bush ideologically and has the added value of being respected on Wall Street.

With these changes, Mr. Bush would have brought in new Cabinet chiefs at three of the big four agencies. Only Justice would be untouched, but it might be too much for the president to force his friend Alberto Gonzales out as attorney general.

At the White House, highly visible changes would be required, starting with the most visible post of all besides the presidency -- press secretary. Dan Senor, a Republican and former spokesman for Paul Bremer in Iraq, would be a perfect successor to Scott McClellan. He would be an articulate and forceful defender of Mr. Bush on Iraq. And if not Mr. Senor, then presidential counselor Dan Bartlett, who always does well in TV interviews.

As a new chief of staff, Mr. Bush's pal from his Harvard Business School days, Al Hubbard, could replace Andy Card. Mr. Hubbard is miscast as top White House economic adviser. To replace him, Kevin Hassett of the American Enterprise Institute would fit. He has close ties to the Bush White House. There's also a natural choice for national security adviser to replace Stephen Hadley. It's Zalmay Khalilzad, the tough-minded ambassador to Iraq. Once a permanent government is installed there, he could be summoned home.

The trickiest issue is how to handle Karl Rove, the deputy White House chief of staff and political adviser. He is the closest thing to indispensable -- on policy as well as politics -- at the White House. But any overhaul that didn't involve him would run the risk of not being taken seriously. The solution is to send Mr. Rove to the Republican National Committee as chairman and bring the current chairman, Ken Mehlman, back to the president's staff as communications chief. The president lauded Mr. Rove as "the architect" of his re-election in 2004. Now he could be the architect of a Republican comeback in 2006. Mr. Mehlman would sharpen the president's communication operation. He and Mr. Rove would work together, as they do now.

New faces and personnel shifts are necessary but not sufficient to produce the aura of a new presidential term. Major policy initiatives are required, too. And there are plenty to choose from. For one, Mr. Bush could mount a fresh crusade for confirmation of federal appeals court judges: 11 of them are waiting in the wings. And there's always taxes, a hardy GOP perennial. Mr. Bush's tax reform commission was a bust, but that shouldn't stop him from proposing significant tax reforms and cuts. He doesn't have to win congressional approval. To revive his presidency, at this point he only need focus on them.

In foreign policy, there's a broad new alliance waiting to be packaged, now that NATO has lost its rationale. Suggested by Tom Donnelly of the American Enterprise Institute, it would bring together four antiterrorist, free-market democracies, all concerned about the growing power of China. They are the U.K., India, Japan and the U.S.

The new but still conservative look of the Bush administration and its new policy emphasis would thrill the base and perhaps independents as well. Should that lead to an unanticipated Republican victory in the midterm election in November, Mr. Bush would be empowered to return to old initiatives such as Social Security reform and his faith-based initiative.

Of course, there are risks and problems in trying to revitalize a flagging administration. The most worrisome risk is that Mr. Bush would look weak and desperate. Mr. Carter did in 1979 and became a laughingstock. That could happen to Mr. Bush. Also, it may be difficult to persuade outsiders to join what looks to them as a hopelessly lame-duck administration.

The president could lose a lot more than face. But the potential upside of a stunning facelift of his administration is great. It could make his presidency productive and enjoyable again rather than stymied and disheartened. Achieving the aura and feel of a new presidential term is not farfetched. Mr. Bush fooled everyone by becoming the president of big ideas and bold plans. He could fool them again.

Mr. Barnes, executive editor of the Weekly Standard, is author of "Rebel in Chief," published last month by Crown Forum.

Hardballs Replace Softballs, And Bush Takes A Few Swings (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON

At first it looked as if it was going to be another warm bath of a White House question-and-answer session with President Bush. There was a happy group of retirees arranged on a stage, a poster in red, white and blue that proclaimed "Strengthening Medicare" and a peppy president with microphone in hand.

But at the Riderwood Village retirement community last week in the Washington suburb of Silver Spring, Md., something different happened: the president got hit with hardballs by the crowd of 80-somethings. Not only did the retirees, many of them Democrats and former government officials, ask sharp questions about the day's topic, the Medicare prescription drug program, they took on Mr. Bush on global warming and nuclear war.

"I guess I'm one of the three left standing Americans who did the negotiation of the nonproliferation treaty," one of the retirees, Lawrence Weiler, a former official of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, told Mr. Bush. But the treaty can't hold, Mr. Weiler said, if the position of the United States is that it will initiate a nuclear war "if it is necessary." Would the president consider a "no-first-use" policy instead?

Mr. Bush, startled, said he would think about it, thanked Mr. Weiler for his contribution, then concluded the session with a "God bless you all." Afterward, White House officials insisted that they were pleased. "The president is at his best when he's answering real and difficult questions from a cross-section of Americans," said Nicolle Wallace, the White House communications director.

Whether that is the view of the people at the sessions is another question, but the fact remains that in the last three months, Mr. Bush has started taking questions, some of them tough, from audiences not stacked with supporters. Mr. Bush typically sidesteps the hardest questions, but his answers often produce news. It is a big change from last year and, particularly, from the 2004 campaign, when the president appeared before rapt crowds who had gotten in with tickets from local Republican parties.

The result was Bush love-ins across red-state America, derision from Democrats and critical news coverage about canned events. White House officials say they took the heat because the events produced good sound bites for the local news and pumped up political troops. In 2005, they used a similar, equally criticized model — citizens screened by the White House sitting with Mr. Bush on panels and making points that underscored administration policy — in the president's failed campaign to overhaul Social Security.

The new approach began in Philadelphia in mid-December when Mr. Bush made a speech about Iraq to the World Affairs Council, a foreign policy group. With the campaign and Social Security out of the way and elections in Iraq pending, White House officials, along with Mr. Bush, reasoned that there was little to lose and much to gain by opening up. More to the point, the president had been criticized the week before for refusing to honor the tradition of taking questions after a speech at the Council of Foreign Relations in Washington.

"We like to mix things up so you'll pay more attention," said Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff, in explaining the new approach.

People did pay attention that day in Philadelphia, when Mr. Bush said in response to the first question that about 30,000 Iraqis had been killed in the Iraq war since the beginning of the American-led invasion in 2003. It was the first time that Mr. Bush had publicly given an estimate of Iraqi deaths, and White House officials scrambled to explain where it had come from — a Web site on Iraqi body counts, it turned out, and not an internal government accounting.

DOJ_NMG_0018711

In February, White House officials scrambled again after Mr. Bush surprised them, and everyone else, by answering a question at a session in Tampa, Fla., with the news that he would support an expanded role by NATO and a doubling of United Nations peacekeepers in the Darfur crisis in western Sudan. Mr. Bush's comments were especially startling because the question had been about Uganda, not Sudan, although Mr. Bush segued by saying, "I presume if you're worried about northern Uganda, you're also worried about western Sudan, as am I."

Mr. Bush's answer reflected planning already under way at the United Nations and the State Department, but his public comments signaled a new American commitment to the crisis. The subject seemed to be on Mr. Bush's mind after a meeting earlier in the week with Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general. But his apparent off-the-cuff response underscored how a president could create policy with a few sentences on a Friday afternoon on the west coast of Florida.

"He doesn't have to check with the press office to see what we've said before," Ms. Wallace said. "He's the president; it's his prerogative."

In Silver Spring, Mr. Bush made news when he told a questioner who was struggling to help her 75-year-old mother decipher the complicated drug program that he was opposed to extending the May 15 deadline for enrollment.

"And the reason why is there's got to be a fixed time for people to sign up," Mr. Bush said flatly.

The president was less direct when another questioner asked if Medicare's chief actuary had really been threatened with dismissal if he told Congress the truth about the projected cost of the drug program, which was about $600 billion, not $400 billion, as the administration was saying publicly in 2003.

"There's been a lot of estimates of the cost of the program," Mr. Bush responded, neglecting to say that a 2004 investigation by the Department of Health and Human Services confirmed the man's question. The president did say, however, that "this is a good deal for you."

Lawmakers Get Out Of The House (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House of Representatives is on track this year to be in session for fewer days than the Congress Harry Truman labeled as "do-nothing" during his 1948 re-election campaign.

Members of Congress are taking an entire week off for St. Patrick's Day. It's the latest scheduling innovation to give members more time to meet with constituents.

Through Friday, the House was in session for 19 days, compared with 33 for the Senate. If they stick to their current schedule — including two weeks off in April, a week in May and July, plus all of August — House members will spend 97 days in Washington this year.

The House was in session 108 days in 1948, according to the chamber's archives, compared with 141 days last year.

"This is an election year and people want to see more of their constituents," says House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

During the first two months of the year, House members logged a total of 47 hours in the Capitol. They took off almost the entire month of January, while the Senate confirmed Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court.

For both chambers, workweeks have become short in recent years. Roll call votes are seldom scheduled for Mondays or Fridays. In the House, they are often postponed until late Tuesday.

As a result, it's difficult to schedule committee meetings. Some panels meet when Congress is not in session, but not often.

When in Washington, lawmakers do a lot of multitasking. Last week, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., struggled to ready an immigration bill for the full Senate, as panel members drifted in and out of the room. They were juggling a floor debate on the budget and other meetings.

Critics contend Congress needs time to discuss important issues. "The Tuesday-to-Thursday work schedule is a detriment," says Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., who served five terms in the House during the 1980s and returned last year.

Some experts think an absentee Congress is not bad. "I don't think there's anything wrong with them being out of Washington," says John Samples of the Cato Institute, a think tank that favors limited government. "They might be better representatives."

Lawmakers will make $165,200 this year. Leaders get more.

GOP Struggles To Define Its Message For 2006 Elections (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jonathan Weisman

DOJ_NMG_0018712

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

Republican efforts to craft a policy and political agenda to carry the party into the midterm elections have stumbled repeatedly as GOP leaders face widespread disaffection and disagreement within the ranks.

Anxiety over President Bush's Iraq policy, internal clashes over such divisive issues as immigration, and rising complaints that the party has abandoned conservative principles on spending restraint have all hobbled the effort to devise an election-year message, said several lawmakers involved in the effort.

While it is a Republican refrain that Democrats criticize Bush but have no positive vision, for now the governing party also has no national platform around which lawmakers are prepared to rally.

Every effort so far to produce such a platform has stumbled.

In January, Bush laid out a modest menu of ideas on health care and energy independence, but Congress has made little movement on them. Senior White House officials consulted with lawmakers earlier this year about jointly crafting an agenda that would allow Bush and Republicans in Congress -- both suffering from depressed public approval ratings -- to get off the defensive. A Republican familiar with the process said these discussions did not result in a consensus.

New House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) has been wrestling with the same problem, so far without success.

The struggles reflect philosophical differences among competing factions within the party, but they also underscore the political consequences of holding power. Republicans insist they remain united around core principles of smaller government, lower taxes and a strong national defense, but can no longer agree on how to implement that philosophy and are squabbling over their delivery on those commitments.

Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R) said the root of the problem is a failure of Washington Republicans to stick to principles, saying that his party risks losing power because it has done "a pretty poor job" of executing its small-government philosophy. "Republicans just need to take stock, go back and realize that the American people elected them because of their principles, and when you do not adhere to those principles, the American people are just as likely to turn you out and choose someone else."

Lately, the drift Perry described has been on glaring display almost daily. A week ago, Republican speakers at a GOP gathering in Memphis complained about the breakdown in fiscal discipline. A few days later, lawmakers in Washington raised the federal debt ceiling by an additional $781 billion and voted to authorize more than $100 billion in new spending.

Republicans are engaged in a face-off in Congress over two sharply different views of how to deal with illegal immigration -- with no compromise in sight. The split between the White House and congressional Republicans over the Dubai port deal underscores cracks in the party's national security consensus and has given Democrats an opening to challenge the GOP on what has long been a core strength. Republicans do remain united behind Bush's Iraq policy, albeit nervously, with widespread concern that a violent and open-ended commitment in that nation will be a liability in November.

The president once clearly set the Republican agenda, and when his approval ratings were higher, congressional Republicans followed his lead. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said that model hit a wall last year when the president's centerpiece proposal to restructure Social Security "turned out to be not doable."

This year, Bush came back to Congress with a scaled-back agenda -- including tax incentives to expand health coverage and some money to study using wood chips and switch grass as alternative energy sources -- that Blunt said "is not as easily defined." And in Bush's weakened state, his proposals command less allegiance. "It's always the challenge of a second-term administration to keep the agenda fresh, to keep moving with the same intensity they had in the first term," Blunt said. "Combine that with less popularity, and people are much slower to salute the flag."

When asked last week whether Republicans had any broad visions to pursue this year, Boehner said, "Before the week is out, you will have a pretty good idea of what they are." But on Thursday night, after House members approved a $92 billion measure to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and ongoing hurricane relief, lawmakers left town for a week-long break with no agenda ready.

Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), the vice chairman of the House Republican Conference, said Boehner has been preparing an agenda based on four "silos": national security, retirement security, economic security and energy. But Republicans will have a difficult time turning those broad themes into legislative accomplishments.

The central plank of the national security agenda is border security and a crackdown on illegal immigration. But Republicans are deeply divided between those who favor increased enforcement at borders vs. those, including the president, who want to couple those measures with a guest worker program that would offer avenues for lawful employment for those already here illegally.

Under the retirement security rubric, House leaders would like to see a restructuring of the private pension system and permanent repeal of the estate tax. The former is within reach, although its political appeal may be limited. The latter almost certainly would die in a Senate filibuster. Likewise, the centerpiece of economic security -- an extension of Bush's first-term tax cuts -- faces long odds in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0018713

Because of these realities, Republicans have adopted a midterm strategy designed to avoid making the election a national referendum on their performance or one that focuses on their policy divisions. Their goal is to concentrate less on the kind of positive message they have challenged the Democrats to produce and more on framing a choice that says, however unhappy voters may be right now with the Republicans' leadership, things would be worse if Democrats were in charge.

"If you are someone who favors small government," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "you're going to have a clear choice between someone who has cut taxes every year in office, who believes you ought to own your own health care . . . and who plans to cut the deficit over five years versus people who have consistently supported more spending, have opposed tax cuts and who oppose patients owning their own health care. The question is, who's on your side for reducing the size of government?"

Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, chided the Democrats last Thursday for not producing an agenda. But he insisted at the same time that such "inside-the-Beltway" debates will be of little consequence in November, when local issues will decide the closest congressional contests. "We have repeatedly guided our candidates: All politics are local," he said.

In the absence of a positive national message, Republicans also hope to use long-standing "wedge issues" to galvanize their own base and try to put Democrats on record with unpopular votes. Congressional leaders, for instance, plan to push a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

Democratic pollster Geoffrey Garin said that even some once-powerful weapons in the Republican political arsenal have less appeal today than in the past. "Whether it's taxes or moral conservatism or national security, there's nothing the Republicans have said or done in their experimenting with message that outweighs this overwhelming sense Americans have that President Bush has misled the country onto a negative path," he said.

Republican pollster David Winston said his party can find broad consensus on jobs and competitiveness, fighting terrorism and securing U.S. borders. "Those are the three big items," he said. "There is unanimity on those three. Once you get beyond those three, there may be different senses of direction."

Blunt said it is more important for Democrats to produce a governing agenda because Republicans have a record to run on. But he also said action this year is essential. "We are, after all, legislators," he said. "We need to be making something better, eliminating something or moving in a new direction."

Republicans have a list of prospective priorities. Whether many will become law is problematic, although that does not seem to worry GOP leaders such as Blunt. "We'd like to see them become law, but a vote lets the people know where we stand," he said.

One Republican strategist, who asked not to be identified so he could speak openly about the party's problems, said divisions between moderates and conservatives have left the House and Senate Republican conferences in disarray. "Getting consensus on policy matters . . . is very difficult," he said. "That has caused stagnation and led to perceptions that Republican governance is going nowhere."

Bush Ignores GOP Rebuffs In Congress (CHIST)

By Robert Novak

Chicago Sun-Times, March 20, 2006

"Presidents come and go," Rep. Jerry Lewis told the House Rules Committee last Wednesday. That was a reason Lewis gave, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, for opposing President Bush's proposed line-item veto. But the broader meaning of what he said suggested the congressional Republican majority's mind-set: Bush's presence is evanescent and not to be equated with the permanence of legislators.

Lewis is a 71-year-old 14-termer who has been in public office continuously for 38 years and is known as a dependable Republican regular. It is not in character for Lewis to so casually dismiss the new fiscal initiative by a president under fire for lack of an agenda. The former insurance salesman from Redlands, Calif., is not known for swimming upstream against the Republican tide, and he was not doing so last week.

Lewis' opposition to the Bush proposal did not make headlines, and neither did similar acts of opposition to the Republican president by Republicans in Congress. As if responding to a silent signal, similar acts of defiance were simultaneously erupting all over Capitol Hill. This constitutes no rebellion and is not even a divorce. Rather, it is a trial separation of congressional Republicans from their president.

More than half a century has passed since an unpopular president has been subjected to such treatment from a Congress controlled by his own party. Harry Truman's Gallup approval rating reached its low of 23 percent in January 1952 as he began his last year as president. Burdened by the military stalemate in Korea, President Truman appeared uninterested in the wrecking of his program by the congressional Democratic majority. Bush, with his latest Gallup rating at 36 percent as he copes with another unpopular war, seemed similarly detached from the rebuffs handed him last week.

DOJ_NMG_0018714

The White House did not react when Lewis called the president's line-item veto "a very serious error" because it would "change the relationship between the president and the legislative branch." Lewis told me he has not been contacted by the president or his agents. Nor was there a presidential reaction to these further indignities:

*At a town hall meeting Wednesday in Silver Spring, Md., Bush rejected a delay in the May 15 deadline to apply for Medicare prescription drug subsidies because "there's got to be a fixed time for people to sign up." Two hours later, the Senate voted 76-22 for a delay.

*On that same Wednesday, the House International Relations Committee overrode Bush's opposition and voted 37-3 to force the president into imposing sanctions on Iran. Even Chairman Henry Hyde, a Bush supporter, changed his mind and ended up voting for this bill.

*To complete the week Thursday, the Senate piled an additional $16 billion on the budget resolution. At the same time, Bush's efforts to slow the growth of mandatory government spending were defeated.

Although there was no sign of the president lobbying to deflect this carnage, he was at the packed ballroom of the Washington Hilton on Thursday night for the House Republican fund-raiser ($2,000 a plate or $5,000 for the reception and a photo with Bush). GOP lawmakers may disdain Bush's policies, but they respect his ability to raise money for their campaigns.

Even when he was getting battered by Congress, Truman liked to call up his former Senate colleagues for a poker-playing cruise on the presidential yacht. Bush does not care to spend his spare time with members of Congress, and it was extraordinary that Bush traveled to the Capitol on Wednesday for National Hungary Day. Typically, the White House legislative affairs office was not consulted, and the president mistakenly talked about the March 15 event commemorating the 1956 anti-communist uprising rather than the 1848 revolution.

One of the president's top political operatives is telling the party's members of Congress that they should support Bush, not out of loyalty, but for self-preservation. In 1952, Democrats in Congress, accustomed to more than 20 years in power, thought they could survive by separating themselves from Truman. Instead, Republicans swept the November elections, which might be an object lesson about abandonment of their president.

Private Account Language Fails (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

In a little-noticed vote last Thursday, the Senate went on record, apparently for the first time, against President Bush's proposal to set up personal investment accounts under Social Security, with some unexpected Republicans helping a unified Democratic Caucus defeat the nonbinding proposal.

"This is now the starting point," said Wesley Denton, spokesman for Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), who offered the Social Security amendment to the fiscal 2007 budget resolution. "We now know where everybody stands. We know who the obstacles to reform are, and we can take the debate and go from there."

Eight Republicans joined all 45 Democrats in opposing the DeMint amendment, which would have directed the creation of a reserve fund for Social Security, but only after the Senate produced legislation allowing younger workers to divert a portion of their Social Security taxes into personal investment accounts or permitting some other type of "legally binding ownership" of a worker's Social Security money.

The 46-53 vote was sandwiched in with 20 consecutive votes on amendments to the budget resolution.

The Republican centrist votes in opposition — including Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.), Susan Collins (Maine), Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Olympia Snowe (Maine) — were hardly a surprise. But the amendment also forced the hands of some less likely Republican opponents, including Sens. Conrad Burns (Mont.), Pete Domenici (N.M.), Dick Lugar (Ind.) and Jim Talent (Mo.) — who have typically been more loyal to the GOP leadership.

Chafee, Burns, and Talent all have tough re-election races this year. Snowe and Lugar also will be on the ballot in November, though their seats are considered safe.

While the vote received little press attention at the time, Democrats — who have tried to turn all talk of personal accounts under Social Security into a campaign issue (See related story, p. 11.) — made note of the vulnerable Republican Senators who voted for it.

In a news release, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee blasted three GOP Senators up for re-election next year — Rick Santorum (Pa.), Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Jon Kyl (Ariz.) — for voting "to raid the Social Security trust fund in an effort to advance the President's unpopular plan to privatize Social Security."

For his part, DeMint accused the 53 Senators who voted against his measure of raiding Social Security as well.

DOJ_NMG_0018715

In his own release, DeMint excoriated his detractors: “Now, every senator will be on record whether they oppose or support the raid. This said absolutely nothing about personal accounts, it was about whether you believe Social Security should be saved or allowed to wither on the vine.”

Though the Senate voted on several Social Security-related amendments during last year’s budget debate, this is the first time Senators have actually voted on anything resembling Bush’s personal account proposal.

Denton said the vote marks “the first substantive vote in years” on Social Security. He added that DeMint was pleased with the number of Senators who voted with him, given the Democrats’ nearly uniform opposition to personal accounts.

“I think a lot of people expected us to get a lot less votes than we did,” Denton said.

President Bush began the debate to overhaul the government’s guaranteed retirement safety net when he proposed personal accounts during his 2005 State of the Union address as a part of his “ownership society” agenda. Though it was much discussed in Congress last year, GOP leaders concluded that they did not have the votes to pass Bush’s Social Security plan and that they might suffer at the ballot box in November if they were to pass such legislation.

While DeMint insisted the language of his amendment would not necessarily require the creation of private accounts, Baucus took exception to that argument.

“My colleagues are not being fooled,” said Senate Finance ranking member Max Baucus (D-Mont.) in a floor speech. “This is privatization, pure and simple.”

The exact language of DeMint’s amendment would have allowed the Senate Budget Committee to set up a reserve fund for the Social Security surplus, but only if the Senate Finance Committee approves legislation that, among other things, provides younger workers the “voluntary option ... to obtain legally binding ownership of a portion of their [Social Security] benefits.”

Baucus wasn’t the only one to say that DeMint’s amendment appeared to be trying to lay the groundwork for personal accounts under Social Security.

“This clearly was a way to try to advance private accounts under Social Security, and Sen. Snowe has been clear that she’s not against private accounts, per se, but she does have concerns about diverting money away from the traditional Social Security program in order to create private accounts,” said Snowe spokeswoman Antonia Ferrier.

Denton said the amendment would obviously permit a bill with personal accounts, “but it would also allow Democrats or anyone else to come up with another plan that meets” the “ownership” criteria.

Sen. Mike Crapo (R-Idaho), a DeMint supporter, said he supported the amendment because it offered a way to ensure that Congress does not continue to dip into the Social Security trust fund coffers to pay for other programs — not because it had anything to do with personal accounts.

“I’m saddened this amendment was characterized inaccurately as a privatization move,” said Crapo in a statement. “It is unfortunate that we continue to have partisan rhetoric cloud the issue.”

Social Security Reform Rejected (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

Last week, during the Senate budget debate, Republicans raised the issue of Social Security reform, and Democrats -- surprised that the issue won't go away -- pledged to make it a major campaign issue this year.

"The issue that won't die," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer after the Senate narrowly defeated a Social Security amendment to the budget bill.

"It's going to be one of the big issues in 2006," pledged the New York Democrat, who is chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "They just gave us more fuel."

Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, offered the proposal, which would have let Congress create a reserve fund protected under budget rules to save the Social Security surplus to pay for future benefits instead of other federal programs, as happens now.

"There is simply no way to save Social Security if we don't have the courage to stop using the surplus as a secret slush fund," Mr. DeMint said. "We will not be deterred by cynics who offer no solutions."

The Senate defeated the proposal 53-46, with eight Republicans voting no, but Democrats still called it a step towards creating the Social Security private accounts that President Bush wants.

Mr. Schumer pledged to tell voters that electing a Democratic Senate is the only way to "make sure Social Security isn't privatized."

"Any time there's an opportunity to privatize Social Security, they'll take it," said Sen. Max Baucus, Montana Democrat. He said the DeMint proposal was "evidence today that they're going to stick with it."

DOJ_NMG_0018716

Mr. Bush's proposal to let individuals divert a part of the Social Security's payroll tax into personal retirement accounts was "soundly rejected by the American people," yet Republicans still pursue it, Mr. Baucus said.

But supporters of the proposal said Democrats just want the status quo, under which Social Security will crumble. Mr. DeMint said his proposal stated "absolutely nothing about personal accounts," but was "about whether you believe Social Security should be saved or allowed to wither on the vine."

"I'm saddened this amendment was characterized inaccurately as a privatization move," said Sen. Michael D. Crapo, Idaho Republican. "The American public and future generations of taxpayers will suffer if we cannot address the issues regarding Social Security and fiscal discipline."

Democrats aren't the only ones who see a campaign issue. "Those who voted against this amendment voted to raid Social Security," Mr. DeMint said. "Now, every senator will be on record whether they oppose or support the raid."

Including interest, Congress has raided $1.7 trillion from Social Security since 1985, according to Mr. DeMint's office. Mr. Bush's Social Security proposal never gained enough momentum in Congress, but administration officials, some Republicans and even Mr. Bush himself continue to raise the issue from time to time. In his State of the Union speech, Mr. Bush called for a commission to investigate options for saving the system, and just days later he mentioned his personal-accounts proposal in his long-term budget outline.

A Contractor's Purchase On Power (WP)

By Charles R. Babcock And Renae Merle

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

The consulting work that MZM Inc. received from a Pentagon agency in 2003 was for only $40,000, but to company owner Mitchell J. Wade, the face value was just the beginning.

Over the following year, the work grew to $4 million as MZM added employees that the government had not asked for; pressed successfully for the agreement to be on a "time and materials" basis so it could bill for hours worked; and left the impression that Wade could pull strings, if necessary, to get his way.

According to excerpts of e-mails collected by a Pentagon employee and provided to The Washington Post, one contract official inaccurately thought Wade was a former undersecretary of defense. Another wrote that "Mitch Wade is a force to be reckonned (sic) with . . . he has a lot of perceived power that can slow us down . . . maybe even grind us to a halt."

The recent corruption conviction of former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham -- and Wade's recent guilty plea for bribing him -- focused attention on Congress's practice of "earmarking," or setting aside, federal money for favored interests.

A review of the rise and fall of Wade and his company, based on interviews and MZM and government documents, shows that bribing Cunningham was only one part of Wade's formula for success. His firm, which had no prime federal contracts in fiscal 2002, collected more than $170 million over the next three years, thanks not just to Cunningham, but also to Wade's ability to take practices common among government contractors and push them to the limit.

In a tight labor market, he paid well above the going rate for workers with security clearances -- wages that left others in the government contracting industry puzzled. He freely distributed title and rank, appointing more than 100 vice presidents, executive vice presidents and "senior executive vice presidents" in a company of about 400 people. He aggressively used the "revolving door" between the government's defense and intelligence bureaucracy and the private industry, attracting top talent and often sending new hires back to work on contracts at their former agencies and to try to cultivate new business.

MZM was able as the sole bidder to win a "blanket purchase agreement" for up to $225 million over five years in Pentagon technology work, though procurement regulations require at least three competitive bids.

Kenneth L. Wainstein, U.S. attorney for the District, said after Wade's guilty plea that the agreement amounted to "a $225 million blank check drawn on taxpayer funds."

Cunningham admitted accepting at least $2.4 million from Wade and three other men over the past several years in return for official favors, including steering money for contracts their way. The California Republican was sentenced to eight years and four months in prison earlier this month. That was a week after Wade pleaded guilty to four felony counts for his role in the case. MZM was sold last summer to a New York investment firm, which changed its name but kept many of its contracts and people.

Wade, who declined an interview request through his lawyer, had learned the intricacies of the procurement system from the inside. He was a civilian worker at the Pentagon, working at times on classified programs, from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s. He then became a consultant to Brent Wilkes, a San Diego defense contractor who was so close to Cunningham that competitors complained the congressman was giving Wilkes's company favored treatment. In the following years, Wade supplanted Wilkes as Cunningham's favorite, and Wilkes -- who has been implicated but not charged in the scandal -- ended up as an MZM subcontractor.

DOJ_NMG_0018717

Wade first bribed Cunningham on Nov. 16, 2001, according to prosecutors' court papers. That Friday, barely two months after the terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, the contractor bought the congressman $12,000 worth of antiques, and Cunningham told Wade that he would make him "somebody." At the time, the government filings said, MZM had contracts of less than $1 million a year.

Their partnership became apparent early the next year as Wade requested a $15 million earmark for a counterintelligence program. He was also working at the time to get on the General Services Administration's schedule of companies authorized to seek federal business, a prelude to the broader intelligence-related "blanket purchase agreement" he pursued that summer and fall.

Cunningham requested that $7.5 million be set aside for MZM's program and made it his first priority, according to his office's internal chart, which prosecutors filed as an exhibit. The House approved the earmark in June, and it passed Congress as part of the defense appropriations bill in October, though at a slightly reduced level.

The GSA officials who approved MZM's application to join its schedule were supposed to ensure that the hourly labor rates Wade charged were "fair and reasonable." They were, however, higher than some other contractors from the region offering the same types of services, according to labor rates published by the GSA.

According to several sources inside and outside the company, including some former employees, Wade attracted staff by offering tens of thousands of dollars more than the going salary. The sources agreed to speak only on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject. As his company grew, he hired people like retired Army Lt. Gen. James King, who held several high positions at Pentagon intelligence agencies and now runs Athena Innovative Solutions Inc., MZM's successor company. Wade also hired David Holmes, a former CIA lawyer; John Quattrocki, a high-ranking FBI officer; and Kay Coles James, the former head of the Bush administration's Office of Personnel Management.

The blanket purchase agreement, signed with a Defense Department contracting office in September of 2002, was written so broadly that any agency inside or outside the Pentagon could order a wide variety of help. It seemed crafted for the Bush administration's post-Sept. 11 push for more defense and intelligence spending. It referred to homeland security, law enforcement planning, geospatial integration, document exploitation and what is called MASINT, for measurement and signature intelligence.

The Defense Information Systems Agency refused to answer questions about how it selected MZM. But it announced last summer, after Wade's relationship with Cunningham was exposed, that it was cutting off further work. It said it realized Wade's company was the only one that responded to its initial request, when federal regulations required three bidders.

To ensure that MZM "could milk that account without interruption or interference" from the Defense Department officials who oversaw the contract, Wade enticed them with personal favors, the government said in court documents filed along with Wade's guilty plea. He hired the son of one Defense Department official at the Army's National Ground Intelligence Center in Charlottesville in early 2002, when MZM was still a subcontractor. In return, the official gave MZM inside information and favorable performance reviews ensuring further work, prosecutors alleged.

The matter is still under investigation.

The first order under the blanket agreement was in October 2002, a $193,281 order to do a "concept report" of a computer system in Charlottesville. Wade apparently felt so confident of his company's future with the ground intelligence center that he opened an office nearby.

The next order, in late January 2003, was much larger, though the client for the $6.1 million contract isn't clear from sketchy descriptions released under the Freedom of Information Act. A few weeks later, MZM got an order for $12.7 million.

Two days after the war in Iraq started, MZM won a $1.2 million contract to provide interpreters for "post conflict" work. And in March, Wade's company got a $6.2 million contract, this one with the Pentagon's new Counter Intelligence Field Activity. In fiscal 2003, MZM got a total of $38.6 million in orders through the blanket purchase agreement.

That climbed to $65 million, then $60 million in the following two years, as Cunningham continued to add earmarks to make more money available for programs Wade worked on, and the contractor continued his bribes for the congressman. Those included the use of a 42-foot yacht renamed the Duke-Stir, a used Rolls Royce, more antiques and the purchase of his home in San Diego for $700,000 more than it was worth -- even a check for $115,100 to pay the capital gains on Cunningham's inflated profit on the home sale.

As MZM's revenue soared, so did Wade's personal spending. He and his second wife owned a $3 million house in Kalorama. He took his staff on outings to the Greenbrier resort and Bermuda. He started the Sure Foundation, named after a Christian verse, to help children around the world who were victims of war and unrest.

The global war on terror was good for business. There was lots of work at the National Ground Intelligence Center and the Counterintelligence Field Activity. The Pentagon called on MZM to help seek counters to roadside bombs in Iraq. The Special

DOJ_NMG_0018718

Operations Command in Tampa needed help too. And thanks to an earmark from Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. (R-Va.), MZM was picked to run a Foreign Supplier Assessment Center in Martinsville, Va., to check out foreign-based contractors.

Last July, a month after the San Diego Union-Tribune triggered the investigation by disclosing the home sale, the Pentagon was still telling Cunningham's office that money was in the pipeline for his latest MZM earmarks.

'Phishing' Scheme Targets Thrift Savings Plan Holders (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

Last week's scare at the Thrift Savings Plan is an opportunity to offer this reminder: Do not click on Web links in unsolicited e-mails.

Someone, or some group, operating from somewhere, took advantage of the TSP's trusted name in a scam to rip off credit card and bank accounts. The scheme was built around a fictional TSP e-mail and a bogus TSP Web site.

After calls started pouring in from plan participants about the suspicious e-mail, the TSP staff played it safe and shut down part of the agency's Internet operation, stopping account transactions. They also called in the FBI.

"It was the first time we have had a phishing situation where they are sending people to something that looks like our Web site," a TSP official said.

The TSP, a 401(k)-type retirement savings program, has more than 3.5 million participants and assets of more than $178 billion. The plan uses the Internet to provide account information to participants and to process withdrawals, interfund transfers and other transactions.

TSP officials have no tally of how many people got the phony e-mail or how many responded and turned over personal financial information. Although it appears that many of the e-mails went to government employees and retirees, TSP officials said they have been contacted by persons who are not TSP enrollees. Some people did fall for the scheme, the officials said.

The officials pointed out that TSP does not maintain e-mail addresses for participants and never asks participants to provide credit card or banking information, such as pass codes for automated teller machines.

The phony e-mail informed recipients that a new e-mail address had been added for their TSP accounts and directed them to click on a link to www.tsp.gov "if you did not authorize this change."

The link, however, did not take the recipient to tsp.gov but to a mock site, where people were directed to type in their Social Security number and TSP personal identification number, or PIN.

Once completed, the e-mail recipient was sent an "unblock form" that should have sent up red flags to readers because of poor grammar and misspellings.

"If you see this message means that your account is bloked and u got a notification email, enter the information below and click on the Unblock my Account button," the Web page began. It directed readers to type in a credit card number and their "Atm PIN Number."

The TSP is not the only federal agency exploited for online identity-theft schemes known as "phishing." E-mails claiming to be from the Internal Revenue Service have been on the increase, even though the IRS does not communicate with taxpayers electronically.

The TSP learned about 2 p.m. Thursday that it was being impersonated and stopped transactions on its Web site at about 6 p.m. On Thursday night, TSP posted a notice warning participants about the scam.

After the scammers turned off their bogus Web site on Friday, officials restored full service on the TSP site.

TSP officials suspect that the scammers were after credit card information and doubt they could meet criteria for taking money out of a TSP account. But they said reviews are underway to detect any suspicious activity in TSP accounts.

The scam, however, has disrupted processing of loans and withdrawals, which may be delayed for two days, in part because of the TSP internal review.

If you received one of the phony e-mails, TSP urges you to read a special notice posted on tsp.gov under the heading "E-Mail Scam" and use a toll-free phone number to contact a customer service representative.On the Move

Mark A. Robbins , who worked on E Street NW as general counsel at the Office of Personnel Management, is now working on F Street, as the executive director of the president's Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board.

The board was created by Congress to ensure that privacy and civil liberties issues are given appropriate consideration in the development of counterterrorism policy. Carol E. Dinkins serves as chairman and Alan Charles Raul as vice chairman.

Bogus Bush Bashing (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018719

"The single word most frequently associated with George W. Bush today is 'incompetent,' and close behind are two other increasingly mentioned descriptors: 'idiot' and 'liar.' " So says the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, whose most recent poll found that only 33 percent of the public approves of the job President Bush is doing.

Mr. Bush, of course, bears primary responsibility for the state of his presidency. But there's more going on here than his personal inadequacy; we're looking at the failure of a movement as well as a man. As evidence, consider the fact that most of the conservatives now rushing to distance themselves from Mr. Bush still can't bring themselves to criticize his actual policies. Instead, they accuse him of policy sins — in particular, of being a big spender on domestic programs — that he has not, in fact, committed.

Before I get to the bogus issue of domestic spending, let's look at the policies the new wave of conservative Bush bashers refuses to criticize.

Mr. Bush's new conservative critics don't say much about the issue that most disturbs the public, the quagmire in Iraq. That's not surprising. Commentators who acted as cheerleaders in the run-up to war, and in many cases questioned the patriotism of those of us who were skeptical, can't criticize the decision to start this war without facing up to their own complicity in that decision.

Nor, after years of insisting that things were going well in Iraq and denouncing anyone who said otherwise, is it easy for them to criticize Mr. Bush's almost surreal bungling of the war. (William Kristol of The Weekly Standard is the exception; he says that we never made a "serious effort" in Iraq, which will come as news to the soldiers.)

Meanwhile, the continuing allegiance of conservatives to tax cuts as the universal policy elixir prevents them from saying anything about the real sources of the federal budget deficit, in particular Mr. Bush's unprecedented decision to cut taxes in the middle of a war. (My colleague Bob Herbert points out that the Iraq hawks chose to fight a war with other people's children. They chose to fight it with other people's money, too.)

They can't even criticize Mr. Bush for the systematic dishonesty of his budgets. For one thing, that dishonesty has been apparent for five years. More than that, some prominent conservative commentators actually celebrated the administration's dishonesty. In 2001 Time.com blogger Andrew Sullivan, writing in The New Republic, conceded that Mr. Bush wasn't truthful about his economic policies. But Mr. Sullivan approved of the deception: "Bush has to obfuscate his real goals of reducing spending with the smokescreen of 'compassionate conservatism.' " As Berkeley's Brad DeLong puts it on his blog, conservatives knew that Mr. Bush was lying about the budget, but they thought they were in on the con.

So what's left? Well, it's safe for conservatives to criticize Mr. Bush for presiding over runaway growth in domestic spending, because that implies that he betrayed his conservative supporters. There's only one problem with this criticism: it's not true.

It's true that federal spending as a percentage of G.D.P. rose between 2001 and 2005. But the great bulk of this increase was accounted for by increased spending on defense and homeland security, including the costs of the Iraq war, and by rising health care costs.

Conservatives aren't criticizing Mr. Bush for his defense spending. Since the Medicare drug program didn't start until 2006, the Bush administration can't be blamed for the rise in health care costs before then. Whatever other fiscal excesses took place weren't large enough to play more than a marginal role in spending growth.

So where does the notion of Bush the big spender come from? In a direct sense it comes largely from Brian Riedl of the Heritage Foundation, who issued a report last fall alleging that government spending was out of control. Mr. Riedl is very good at his job; his report shifts artfully back and forth among various measures of spending (nominal, real, total, domestic, discretionary, domestic discretionary), managing to convey the false impression that soaring spending on domestic social programs is a major cause of the federal budget deficit without literally lying.

But the reason conservatives fall for the Heritage spin is that it suits their purposes. They need to repudiate George W. Bush, but they can't admit that when Mr. Bush made his key mistakes — starting an unnecessary war, and using dishonest numbers to justify tax cuts — they were cheering him on.

Illogical Cutbacks On Cancer (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

When I was a kid I had the wildest crush on my Uncle Breeze's wife, Betty. She was beautiful and with all my heart I wanted to grow up and marry someone just like her.

I remember acutely the sadness I felt some years later when my mother told me that Aunt Betty was ill. She died not long after that. Cervical cancer.

DOJ_NMG_0018720

This old memory was brought back to me by, of all things, a small but telling item in President Bush's mammoth budget proposal.

The federal government has a national breast and cervical cancer early detection program, run by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. It provides screening and other important services to low-income women who do not have health insurance, or are underinsured.

There is agreement across the board that the program is a success. It saves lives and it saves money. Its biggest problem is that it doesn't reach enough women. At the moment there is only enough funding to screen one in five eligible women.

A sensible policy position for the Bush administration would be to expand funding for the program so that it reached everyone who was eligible. It terms of overall federal spending, the result would be a net decrease. Preventing cancer, or treating it early, is a lot less expensive than treating advanced cancer.

So what did this president do? He proposed a cut in the program of $1.4 million (a minuscule amount when you're talking about the national budget), which would mean that 4,000 fewer women would have access to early detection.

This makes no sense. In human terms, it is cruel. From a budget standpoint, it's self-defeating.

"The program is really designed to help working women," said Dan Smith, a senior vice president at the American Cancer Society. "They may be working at a job that doesn't provide health insurance, but they're not the poorest of the poor who would qualify for Medicaid."

In many cases, these are women who do not have family doctors who might encourage them to be screened. The program offers free mammograms, Pap tests and other early detection services. "If they're diagnosed," said Mr. Smith, "there's a complementary program that allows them to be immediately insured so they can actually have the coverage for their treatment. That's a great program, as well."

"The early detection program is a good program because it has saved lives," said Dr. Harold Freeman, a senior adviser to the Cancer Society. "The women who are served come from a population that has a proven higher death rate from cervical and breast cancer."

He added: "It's hard to get into the health care system when you are asymptomatic. It's much easier to get into the system if you're obviously sick, if you're bleeding or in pain. But the problem with cancer is, if you're going to be cured, you have to get in before those kinds of symptoms occur. So these women need to be screened."

Dr. Freeman, a New York physician who has long specialized in the prevention and treatment of cancer, made it clear that his first concern was the health and quality of life of his patients. But then he addressed what he characterized as the "shortsighted" economic rationale for the budget cut.

"It won't save money," he said. "You don't save money by not diagnosing cancer early. You end up spending more money because anyone who develops cancer will get into the health care system and they will be treated. And the cost at that point will be a lot more. The logic here is very simple: the later you diagnose cancer of the breast or cervix, the more expensive it is to the country."

This is just one program in a range of cancer services that rely on support from the federal government. As if immune to the extent of human suffering involved, President Bush has proposed a barrage of cuts for these programs.

"What's really amazing," said Mr. Smith, "is that the president cut every cancer program. He cut the colorectal cancer program. He cut research at the National Cancer Institute. He cut literally every one of our cancer-specific programs. It's incomprehensible."

A bipartisan movement is under way in the Senate to block the president's proposed cuts. How that ultimately will fare is unclear.

What is clear is that cancer is a disease that horrifies most Americans, and with good reason. One out of every two men will contract the disease in his lifetime, and one out of every three women.

This is an area in which we need to be doing more, not less.

Fining The Blues (WP)

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

THE FEDERAL Communications Commission is in a tough spot when it comes to enforcing the law against broadcast indecency. Determining what crosses the line from acceptable to indecent and therefore can't be broadcast before 10 p.m. isn't easy in an increasingly coarse culture. As network programming has become racier and more graphic, the FCC has been deluged with complaints in recent years, understandably so. Parental controls such as the V-chip can help shield children from inappropriate programs, but they aren't always effective; sports and awards shows, for example, aren't rated in advance.

At the same time, the theory that allows broadcasters to be fined for such speech consistent with the First Amendment -- that "uniquely pervasive presence" of broadcast media "in the lives of all Americans" -- seems increasingly obsolete in an age when the overwhelming majority of American households (more than 85 percent) get their television programming via cable or satellite -- receiving numerous channels that aren't subject to indecency rules. As a result, a single profanity uttered on one (broadcast) channel can result in a multimillion-dollar fine, while worse language spoken at the very same time on another (cable) channel is exempt from regulation.

DOJ_NMG_0018721

Last week the FCC once again ventured into this politically, legally and emotionally charged territory, ruling on complaints involving nearly 50 programs broadcast between February 2002 and March 2005 and signaling a renewed zeal for indecency enforcement under its new Republican chairman, Kevin J. Martin. The commission upheld a $550,000 fine against CBS for Janet Jackson's infamous "wardrobe malfunction" in which her breast was exposed during the 2004 Super Bowl halftime show, and it levied a record $3.6 million fine against the same network for an episode of the drama "Without a Trace" that featured what the commission called a "teen sex orgy."

One particularly disturbing aspect of the ruling involved a Martin Scorsese-produced documentary, "The Blues: Godfathers and Sons," broadcast by a community college public television station in San Mateo, Calif. The documentary included scenes in which musicians and a producer used numerous profanities. The FCC, citing a previous decision that profanity in "Saving Private Ryan" would not subject broadcasters to indecency fines, noted that "in rare contexts, language that is presumptively profane" will still be allowed "where it is demonstrably essential to the nature of an artistic or educational work or essential to informing viewers on a matter of public importance."

But the commissioners didn't find that standard was satisfied in the case of the documentary, whose educational purpose, it said, "could have been fulfilled and all viewpoints expressed without the repeated broadcast of expletives." Really? How do they know better than, say, Mr. Scorsese? As commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein, a Democrat, wrote in dissenting, "It is certain to strike fear into the hearts of news and documentary makers, and broadcasters that air them, which could chill the future expression of constitutionally protected speech." This is a dangerous kind of line-drawing -- one better left to filmmakers, or even television executives, than government bureaucrats.

Is Anyone Listening? (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, March 20, 2006

The banner hanging over President George W. Bush read united to victory. But as Republicans listened to Bush slog through his familiar pep talk at a $2,500-a-head fund-raiser last Thursday night, the party faithful knew they were anything but united. Over the last year, they ejected a majority leader, squabbled over ethics and spending, and openly criticized the president on Iraq, port security and a Supreme Court pick. If the Republican guests were hoping for a spiritual revival, they left disappointed. Bush's speech met with tepid applause, and GOP officials shuffled to the cash bar feeling deflated. "It just wasn't as celebratory as it has been," said one House aide who declined to be named when talking about a private event.

For five years nobody needed to blare the word "united" at Republicans; it was their biggest strength. The president handed his agenda to Congress and the party leaders delivered the votes. They twisted the arms of small-government conservatives to pass education reforms and Medicare drug benefits. They held their ranks together even as the Iraq occupation spiraled downward in 2004. And they picked up seats in two election cycles. But now that strategy has fallen apart. Members of Congress, tired of being taken for granted by an overbearing White House, have lost faith in the president's political touch. Social Security, Katrina, Harriet Miers, ports and, of course, Iraq have destroyed the aura of invincibility that once gave Team Bush its swagger.

The stress is starting to show. Republicans are beginning to look and sound like their own caricature of the Democrats: disorganized, off message and unsure of their identity. Fearful of defeat in November, GOP candidates are uncertain how to pull themselves together in the eight months left before the elections. The toughest question: whether to run, as they have in the past, as W Republicans, or to airbrush the president out of their campaigns. "What I've tried to tell people is that a political tsunami is gathering, and if we don't do something to stop it, we'll be in the minority a year from now," says Rep. Ray LaHood from Illinois. "But some people still don't get it."

The president won't have an easy time persuading wobbly Republicans to stick with him. Bush recorded his lowest approval rating in the NEWSWEEK Poll, with 36 percent; congressional Republicans trailed Democrats by 11 points (39 to 50 percent). Second-term presidents often suffer a six-year slump, losing seats for their party at this point in their tenure. But Reagan, Johnson and Eisenhower—who all watched their parties crater in their sixth year—enjoyed approval ratings in the high 50s or low 60s, according to Gallup. Bush has actually been lucky in one respect. He held his party together longer than most two-term presidents. Johnson kept control for just eight months until he suffered defeat on the parochial issue of home rule for the District of Columbia in 1965, when Democrats took him on—and won. "They saw they could vote against the president and wake up alive the next day," says presidential historian Michael Beschloss.

DOJ_NMG_0018722

Republicans in Congress had the same revelation when they slapped Bush down on the Dubai ports deal. Even so, the White House and its party operatives still believe they can muscle Capitol Hill back in line. Bush's aides say that it would be suicidal for members to run away from the president. In strategy memos circulated on the Hill, Republican National Committee pollsters argue that disunity will only discourage the base from turning out to vote. But even the party's analysts concede that standing shoulder to shoulder with Bush may not always be the best way to win. In one RNC memo, pollster Dave Sackett argues that incumbents need to demonstrate their "independence" and disagreements with party leaders, but still present "an overall unified front." (The easiest way to project unity: defend Bush against attacks from the other side. That's why the GOP seized on Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold's futile attempt to censure the president over the National Security Agency eavesdropping program.)

In one way, Bush has succeeded in uniting his own party: almost everyone is together in sniping at him. Some are pressing for staff changes at the White House. Sen. Norm Coleman told the Associated Press last week that he wanted to see a new White House team with "fresh political antenna." Others are telling Bush's aides to keep the current team away from the cameras. "You are losing the message," LaHood told one White House session on Iraq last week. "We don't need Don Rumsfeld or the generals or anybody in the military out trying to explain this to the American people." The White House responded tartly that there is no staff shake-up in the works.

Some candidates are happy to stand beside Bush, as long as nobody actually sees them together. Locked in a tight race for re-election, Sen. Mike DeWine chose not to accompany Bush on one trip to his home state of Ohio last month. A week later he attended a private fund-raiser with the president in Cincinnati—out of sight of photographers and reporters.

Even Hill leaders are substituting their own agendas for the president's. In the Senate, Bill Frist announced his own immigration bill last week that focuses on border security, not the temporary-worker program favored by the president. In the House, new Majority Leader John Boehner is also striking out independently. Boehner has drawn up an eight-week strategy, without White House input, that includes a Higher Education week and Protecting the Homeland week. "This is our plan and our message," says one GOP leadership aide, who spoke anonymously about strategy. "It is our a— on the line."

Republicans once happily attacked Democrats for second-guessing the commander in chief on Iraq and the war on terror. Now they are daring to do the same. Last week House and Senate leaders backed a new bipartisan panel to study Iraq policy and draw up alternatives to Bush's current war plan. A year ago GOP members would have saluted Bush and accused his critics of "undermining the troops." But now they are ready to march in a different direction. The only question is where they'll end up.

OTHER NEWS:

Snow Defends President's Handling Of Economy (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Confronting criticism of the Bush administration's economic record, Treasury Secretary John Snow said the widening gap between high-paid and low-paid Americans reflects a labor market efficiently rewarding more-productive people. But he insisted Americans are still broadly sharing in the economic expansion.

"What's been happening in the United States for about 20 years is [a] long-term trend to differentiate compensation," Mr. Snow said in an interview with The Wall Street Journal last week. "Look at the Harvard economics faculty, look at doctors over here at George Washington University...look at baseball players, look at football players. We've moved into a star system for some reason which is not fully understood. Across virtually all professions, there have been growing gaps."

Mr. Snow said the same phenomenon explains why compensation for corporate chief executive officers has climbed so sharply. "In an aggregate sense, it reflects the marginal productivity of CEOs. Do I trust the market for CEOs to work efficiently? Yes. Until we can find a better way to compensate CEOs, I'm going to trust the marketplace."

Since the 1970s, CEO compensation has gone from 40 times to more than 300 times the average worker's salary, according to a study by Carola Frydman of Harvard University and Raven Saks of the Federal Reserve.

Mr. Snow, a former CEO of CSX Corp. who holds a doctorate in economics, said the administration intends to publicly challenge perceptions that typical workers and families haven't benefited much from the economic expansion. The extent to which the expansion has been broadly shared is "the new sort of battle line in the political arena," he said.

Economic output has increased at an annualized pace of almost 4% since mid-2003, and the unemployment rate has fallen to 4.8% from 6.3%. Despite that, polls show more Americans think the economy is worsening than think it is improving.

Mr. Snow distributed a fact sheet that showed after-tax income per person, adjusted for inflation, rose 8.2% from January 2001, when George W. Bush took office as president, through January 2006. The sheet also showed that per-person net worth -- total assets minus debt -- rose 24%, unadjusted for inflation, from early 2001 to the end of 2005. "People have more money in their pocket" and in their bank accounts, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0018723

Mr. Snow's case relies on averages, which can be skewed by big gains among the wealthiest. Other data suggest the typical family has seen little advance in income or net worth since Mr. Bush took office. Census Bureau data show median family income -- half of families have income greater than the median, half have less -- fell 3.6% from 2000 through 2004. Incomes for the poorest families fell even further. The only group to gain was the family at the 95th percentile -- that is, richer than 95% of all families. Data for 2005 are unavailable.

Alan Krueger, a labor economist at Princeton University who served in the Clinton administration, cited Labor Department data that showed the real median wage rose 3% from 2000 to 2005. Gains were smallest for the lowest-paid workers and largest for the best-paid. "From the standpoint of the work force, it's been a very weak recovery," he said. Wage data don't incorporate the effects of taxes, investment income or government payments.

As for net worth, a triennial Federal Reserve survey found that the net worth of the median family rose 1.5%, after inflation, from 2001 through 2004. That is far less than the 17% increase from 1995 to 1998 and the 10% increase from 1998 to 2001. The survey wasn't conducted in 2000 or 2005.

Robert Gordon, an economist at Northwestern University, says the past few years represent the continuation of a 35-year trend in which a growing share of all labor income goes to a small group of "superstars: professional athletes, CEOs and top corporate officers." On top of this trend, income on capital -- such as interest, dividends, rent and capital gains -- has taken a growing share of national income from labor, and it "goes mainly to a small slice of the population at the very top."

Mr. Snow said inequality at "one philosophical level...is troubling. It's really a serious, far-reaching question about how to organize the economic affairs of a great country. We as a society have made two determinations. We're going to let more productive people have higher incomes and we're going to tax them more" through a progressive-tax system.

Mr. Snow argued the administration's tax cuts have made the tax code more progressive, because the rich now pay a larger share of total individual taxes. Some scholars counter that the tax cuts still widened the gap between the after-tax incomes of rich and poor Americans. The Tax Policy Center, a joint venture of the Brookings Institution and Urban Institute think tanks, estimates that after-tax incomes of the richest 1% of taxpayers were 4.6% higher in 2005 than they would have been without the tax cuts. Incomes of the middle 20% were 2.6% higher, and incomes of the bottom 20% were 0.3% higher.

Slowing Home Market To Ripple Through Many Layers Of Jobs (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh And Noelle Knox

USA Today, March 20, 2006

With the allure of easy money, thousands of Americans flocked to jobs in the real estate industry during the boom years.

“You saw it — there were dollar signs in their eyes,” recalls Nick Vayonis, a former real estate agent in Los Angeles, where median home prices rose 145% in four years.

He left the business a year ago, just in time, he says. Home sales have declined nationwide for the past five months, and sales in Southern California fell to their lowest level in five years in February, DataQuick reported Tuesday.

“I could see the ebb and flow. It wasn't going to be like that forever,” says Vayonis, 40, who just opened a coffee shop in Canton, Ga., near Atlanta with his wife Anne-Marie, also a former agent.

As the housing market slows, there will likely be a lot of stories of people who are bailing out of their real estate jobs and other professions related to housing — appraisers, mortgage brokers and home construction workers — and many not by choice. This could send shock waves through the job market and the economy.

That's because housing helped drive the economy out of the last recession. Almost four out of every 10 jobs created in the past four years were in housing-related fields. At the end of last year, a record 9.8% of U.S. workers were employed in the real estate industry, up from 8.2% a decade ago, according to Moody's Economy.com. Only the health care industry added more jobs.

“Job growth is the main engine for consumer spending,” says Scott Anderson, senior economist at Wells Fargo in Minneapolis.

“If we don't get the job creation that we need to sustain spending, the economy could be in trouble as we get into '07,” he says. “If we don't get any help from these other (non-housing) sectors, longer-term the implications are slower job growth, which means slower consumer spending, which would eventually discourage businesses from spending. You'd have this downward spiral in growth.”

While it's too early to tell how deeply the housing industry will contract, many companies are already seeing some business evaporate.

DOJ_NMG_0018724

Last month, Washington Mutual said it would close 10 mortgage processing centers and fire 2,500 employees. In November, mortgage company Ameriquest handed out 1,500 pink slips. The housing industry is braced for more belt-tightening.

"At best, people should prepare for no pay increase and no bonus, something they have been getting a lot of. At worst, they should be thinking they may need to change occupations," says Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com in West Chester, Pa.

While it's painful for those involved, Zandi calls the slowing in housing "a necessary adjustment." The economy had gotten so dependent on housing that it needed to come down a bit to make the economy more evenly balanced.

"Housing has been flying high, and it's now coming back down to earth," he says.

Existing home sales fell in January for the fifth month in a row, and home builders Toll Bros. and KB Home say more buyers are canceling their orders. In all, home sales are expected to fall 8% from last year's record, according to a group of economists surveyed by USA TODAY in January.

That's going to make it harder, for example, for the nation's 2.6 million real estate agents to make a living. In a "normal" real estate market, the median income for an agent in business for two years or less is $12,852, according to the National Association of Realtors. (However, it picks up rapidly after that, with agents making about $47,187, after three to five years.)

Your income "is very unpredictable," says Janice Hofferber, who left her job as a Wall Street stock analyst in 2003 and tried her hand as an agent in Bay Head, N.J. She quit last September and became an investment adviser for Smith Barney. "You're not really building a business, you're building a reputation," explains Hofferber, 41. "There's no recurring revenue. Every year, you start at zero again. That wasn't really attractive."

It was no easier in the mortgage loan business, says Toney Goucher, who closed his restaurant in Arkansas and became a mortgage broker in 2002. When he joined Leader One Financial in Kansas, home sales were hot, interest rates were low, and anyone who wasn't buying was refinancing. Last summer, the market started drying up.

"It seemed like every month, we had another interest rate hike, and it got harder and harder to find clients," recalls Goucher, 55. "I joined organizations and networking groups to find more business. I called on Realtors every day — cold calling — I just didn't enjoy what I was doing anymore."

Goucher threw in the towel and put on an apron. After traveling to St. Louis for a conference, he opened Fat Toney's barbecue restaurant there in January.

So far, the economic impact of the downturn in housing has been soft. Other sectors of the economy are adding jobs. In February, employers added workers in a broad number of industries, such as retail, health care, restaurants and bars and state and local government. If that continues, those jobs will help take up some slack if people in housing-related fields find themselves out of work.

Plus, many economists expect housing to slow, but not to slide dramatically.

"We don't expect housing to completely collapse," says Anthony Chan, chief economist at JPMorgan Private Client Services, adding that the housing market might regain some momentum in 2007.

There are also a few trends that could reduce the blow to the economy:

·Construction. Although residential construction is weakening, commercial building is picking up, thanks to demand for new roads, government office buildings and retail shops. More than 768,000 people had jobs in the non-residential construction industry in February, the most in more than three years.

"The commercial market now seems to be on a pretty good upswing, and if housing loses ground, which I think is very likely, we will see some of those workers move into the non-residential side," says Dave Seiders, chief economist for the National Association of Home Builders.

Many of the skills used in home construction are transferable to commercial building.

"A carpenter can just as easily work in a non-residential building as … a residential building," says Michael Montgomery, an economist at Global Insight in Lexington, Mass.

·Hurricanes. Hurricanes last year damaged or destroyed 700,000 homes on the Gulf Coast, according to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, based on the number of families receiving federal housing aid.

Although it's unclear how many of those homes will be rebuilt, the process of rebuilding homes, businesses, roads and other infrastructure will likely create jobs for years to come.

·Refinancing. About 25% of outstanding mortgages in the fourth quarter were adjustable-rate mortgages, according to the Mortgage Bankers Association.

For those who got into the mortgage brokerage business, that's good news. Many homeowners will likely want to refinance their mortgages in the months and years ahead to lock in a fixed rate as interest rates are expected to rise, but not by a lot.

"That will kind of prop things (up) for awhile in terms of activity," Montgomery says

And plenty of people who got into the real estate market are determined to ride out any downturn.

DOJ_NMG_0018725

One of them is Steve Wydler, 37, who left his job as a lawyer at AOL's headquarters in Virginia in December 2002 to join his brother, Hans, an entrepreneur with a Harvard MBA who is a real estate agent.

The two are getting their brokers' licenses in Virginia and Maryland so they can operate throughout the Washington, D.C., area. They now employ three people and work with four other agents as a team. He makes more money now than he did at AOL.

"Personally, I'm not scared," he says. "We're not in it for the next sale. We're in it for the long haul."

But back in St. Louis, at Fat Toney's, Goucher says he has already gotten a couple of calls from mortgage brokers he knew in Kansas asking about possible franchise opportunities for his barbecue restaurant.

"They say, 'You're lucky you got out.' "

Parties Test Messages On Social Security And Medicare Drug Plan (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

With Congress gone for the St. Patrick's Day recess, there's a flurry of activity on both sides of the aisle over the Medicare prescription drug plan.

Republicans are aggressively touting the program, which debuted in January, while responding to criticism from Democrats — and, apparently, from many senior citizens — that the plan is too complex and offers too few benefits.

Building on Democratic efforts to stoke the issue back home, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has unveiled an effort to boost challengers in key 2006 House contests by focusing on the drug benefit. The targeted districts so far include seats held by Republican Reps. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Heather Wilson (N.M.), Steve Chabot (Ohio) and Rob Simmons (Conn.).

In this latest installment of our "Hot Topics" format, in which we gauge which competitive House and Senate races could be shaped by key issues this fall, we'll look at the impact of the Medicare drug plan and President Bush's efforts in 2005 to create personal accounts for Social Security.

Democrats are optimistic that they have a winning issue.

"Right now, seniors are squeezed on health care costs, energy prices and prescription medications, and I think that anxiety over retirement security has the potential to be a very important issue in the next election," said Brad Woodhouse, a spokesman for Americans United, the successor group to the now-defunct Americans United to Protect Social Security, a pro-Democratic group credited with helping kill Bush's Social Security overhaul.

Americans United last week announced a campaign attacking the drug plan, estimated to cost $3 million to $5 million, that will include advertisements and grass-roots organizing.

Because it's so new, the reaction to the Medicare drug plan is still evolving. But on another issue of special interest to seniors — Social Security — there's a long track record of politicians grappling with the fallout when they support major program changes. And, despite a reputation as the "third rail" of American politics, not all of that fallout has been decisively negative.

In an analysis published immediately after the 2002 election, Michael Tanner, director of the Cato Institute's Project on Social Security Choice, noted that Republicans Elizabeth Dole (N.C.) and Lindsey Graham (S.C.) breezed to victory in Senate races despite their open support for individual accounts. Dole taunted her Democratic opponent, Erskine Bowles, by brandishing a blank sheet of paper and labeling it the "Bowles Social Security Plan."

Other Republican supporters of a Social Security overhaul who won Senate races that year despite taking fire from Democrats on the issue included John Cornyn (Texas), Saxby Chambliss (Ga.), Jim Talent (Mo.) and John Sununu (N.H.), according to Tanner. On the House side, GOP Reps. Shelley Moore Capito (W.Va.), Chris Chocola (Ind.) and John Kline (Minn.) also won tight races in which Democrats aggressively hit them on Social Security.

One obvious contest in which these issues will play a major role is the battle between Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.) and Democratic state Sen. Ron Klein. Shaw represents a Democratic-leaning district that has one of the largest populations of senior citizens in the country. The 13-term Republican has weathered tough challengers before, but Klein is expected to be the toughest yet.

As a senior Ways and Means Committee member, Shaw plays a key role in shaping Social Security policy. While he came out in support of an approach that was different from the president's, Democrats see enough similarities between the two that they can make an issue out of it.

"We haven't gone too far at this early stage of the campaign, but Bush's Social Security plan certainly didn't fly in the district, and it was glaringly obvious that President Bush didn't come down here when he was promoting it," said Klein's campaign manager, Brian Smoot.

DOJ_NMG_0018726

Smoot also sees the drug benefit as a potentially strong issue for his candidate. "The program is extremely complicated — there are editorials in local papers every day that voice the frustration of seniors in figuring it out," he said. Smoot added that "the plan does not do simple things, like allow the government to directly negotiate for lower prices, or reimport drugs from Canada. I think people will be extremely frustrated with it" by Election Day.

Shaw's office begs to differ. "In our district, seniors have expressed a need for reform because they're worried about whether there will be a Social Security system for the next generation or not," said Gail Gitcho, a spokeswoman for Shaw. "It's not just about what's happening to them but about what happens down the line, too."

Another hot race involving a key player in the Social Security debate is the dogfight between Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) and state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D). Santorum was an early and energetic ally of Bush on Social Security reform, then later criticized the White House for tactical errors in how it rolled out and pitched the proposal.

Already, an air war has been launched in the Santorum-Casey race, with the conservative group Americans for Job Security placing ads that tout Santorum's commitment to Social Security and seniors. Casey and his allies have assailed the ad as misleading because it doesn't mention his support for personal accounts.

Another hot Senate race where Social Security has come up is in the re-election bid of Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.). While Chafee opposed Bush's Social Security overhaul, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee last year accused him of endorsing, in an interview with the Kent County Times, a related Bush proposal that Democrats blasted as a cut in Social Security benefits.

Seven of the 10 Congressional districts with the highest percentage of Social Security beneficiaries are held by Republicans, as are two-thirds of the top 25 districts. Of those top seven, five are in Florida, making the Sunshine State ground zero in the fight over Social Security and the Medicare drug benefit.

But so far, Susan MacManus, a political scientist at the University of South Florida, hasn't yet seen frustration with the drug benefit translate directly into anger at Members of Congress. "It doesn't appear to be creating animus — confusion, yes, but not blame yet," she said. "It's one of the balls in the air. I'm not sure if it will go flat or keep bouncing."

In addition to Shaw's seat, hot races in Florida that could be shaped by the issue include the contest between Sen. Bill Nelson (D) and Rep. Katherine Harris (R), as well as the races to fill House seats vacated by Harris and retiring Rep. Mike Bilirakis (R).

Longer-shot races in which Democrats seem likely to raise the issue against GOP incumbents include the re-election bids of Reps. Ric Keller, Mark Foley and Ginny Brown-Waite. The districts held by Foley and Brown-Waite cluster near the top of the rankings in proportion of constituents who receive Social Security benefits.

Still, MacManus urges caution when analyzing the potential impact of Social Security and Medicare on House Members: Seniors are not unanimous about the right policies to follow.

Some younger, more active and more affluent seniors do not automatically oppose reforming Social Security and would likely tolerate stricter means testing on benefit levels, she said. By contrast, the strongest support for keeping Social Security in its present form comes from lower-income seniors.

Politically, this distinction is important. Many of the Florida seniors who are more affluent live in Republican-held districts, she said, while lower-income seniors are likelier to live in Democratic-held districts. And that could lead to a status-quo result electorally — a reality that could put a damper on Democrats' hopes to ride Social Security and the Medicare drug benefit to victory in 2006.

Boehlert Hangs Up His Spikes (RC)

By Josh Kurtz and Ben Pershing

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, the senior Republican in New York's Congressional delegation and a leading House moderate, announced Friday that he would not seek a 13th term.

Boehlert, who first came to Capitol Hill more than 40 years ago as a Congressional aide, said he was ready to do something else.

"It's time," the 69-year-old Congressman said during an appearance at a historic train station in his home town of Utica.

Boehlert's departure ensures that his central New York district will become a top target of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and it could spark a bitter fight among Republicans seeking to replace him.

Boehlert's retirement creates the 18th Republican House vacancy heading into November; his district isn't in the top tier of competitive open GOP seats, but it isn't far down the list.

In the House, Boehlert was termed out as chairman of the Science Committee but held out some hope that he could be handed the Transportation and Infrastructure gavel in the 110th Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0018727

In the wake of Boehlert's announcement Friday, both Democrats and Republicans sought to claim the advantage. Although Boehlert never had to sweat re-election — his toughest challenges came from the right in GOP primaries — the 24th district has only slightly leaned Republican in recent presidential and statewide elections.

"This is a district that a Democrat can win and should win because New York families deserve a voice in Congress who will not become irrelevant or simply act like a rubber stamp for the special interest Bush agenda," said Bill Burton, communications director for the DCCC.

Four Democrats already are running for Boehlert's seat, with Oneida County District Attorney Michael Arcuri, who formally entered the race just a week ago, seen as the preference of national and New York party leaders. The other candidates are lawyer Leon Koziol, college professor Les Roberts and former Cortland Mayor Bruce Tytler.

In a statement Friday, Arcuri praised Boehlert's service but said his centrist views were ignored in a Congress dominated by conservative Republicans.

"I think the people in the district want a change in how Congress operates," said Arcuri, who has been his county's top prosecutor for a dozen years.

Early indications Friday were that the Democratic field was not likely to grow significantly following Boehlert's announcement, although state Assemblywoman RoAnn Destito and former Oneonta Mayor Kim Muller have been mentioned as possible candidates.

But Democratic hopes of an epic primary struggle between two prominent Republican state Senators were dashed shortly after Boehlert's announcement.

In anticipation of Boehlert's retirement, state Sens. Ray Meier (R) and Jim Seward (R) have spent the past several weeks angling for support, and both recently used state campaign funds to run TV ads — ostensibly to promote issues they were working on in the Legislature.

But Seward issued a statement late Friday saying he would seek re-election in the fall — sparing the GOP the pain of a primary between the two lawmakers and minimizing the number of open seats in the state Senate, which they are fighting desperately to keep control of this year.

Meier is expected to formally announce his candidacy today, and the state's GOP establishment will almost certainly coalesce around him.

"Senator Meier is clearly the only A-level candidate on the Republican side who's shown an interest," said Scott Armstrong, a GOP consultant in New York who is working for Meier.

But Meier probably won't have the field to himself. Former Seneca Falls Mayor Brad Jones (R) was already challenging Boehlert from the right and is expected to stay in the race. Jones, who had $49,000 in his campaign account at the end of 2005, did not respond to a phone message left at his campaign headquarters Friday.

Other possible Republican candidates for the seat are James Griffo, the Oneida County executive — a position Boehlert held before he was elected to Congress in 1982 — and Catherine Bertini, a former undersecretary of management at the United Nations who fits Boehlert's moderate profile.

Brian Adey, a Griffo spokesman, said Friday that his boss will "continue to keep all of his options open at this point."

The small but influential New York Conservative Party could play a decisive role in the Republican scrum. The Conservatives have always been estranged from Boehlert and frequently ran candidates against him. With the Democrats putting up only nominal opposition, it didn't matter; but with the DCCC showing a renewed interest in the seat, a Republican-Conservative split could prove fatal to the GOP's ability to hold on to Boehlert's seat.

Before Boehlert retired, Jones seemed like a shoo-in for the Conservative nomination, but Meier has run with Conservative support before.

"The guy's got a pretty good conservative base," said Shaun Marie Levine, executive director of the state Conservative Party.

Levine said the party's executive committee would designate a nominee in July in consultation with the Conservative chairmen in the Congressional district's 11 counties. Another candidate could choose to force a primary in September with the choice of the Conservative leaders.

Because Boehlert was one of the stalwarts of the House GOP centrists, moderate groups also may push hard to elect one of their own. Boehlert is the third Republican moderate from New York to step down from the House in the past two cycles — Reps. Amo Houghton (R) and Jack Quinn (R) called it quits at the end of the 108th Congress.

Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, said the organization's leaders knew for weeks that Boehlert was considering retiring, but they were hoping that he'd change his mind.

"It's a loss, but it's not a death," Resnick said.

DOJ_NMG_0018728

While Boehlert is well-respected by his fellow moderates and many lawmakers like the New Yorker personally, Boehlert will be remembered with mixed feelings by members of the leadership.

Boehlert has clashed frequently with Republican leaders on a variety of subjects, particularly environmental matters — and environmental groups lavishly praised him Friday.

Boehlert was a key player last year in persuading the Republican leadership to remove a provision from the budget reconciliation measure that would open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas exploration. Boehlert eventually voted for the bill, but only after leaders added money back for Medicaid, dairy subsidies and food stamps.

Boehlert's frequent rebellions on key party issues made him a long shot to chair the Transportation committee in the 110th Congress, even though he is currently third in seniority on that panel.

With Boehlert gone, the race for the Transportation gavel remains somewhat in flux, with GOP Reps. Tom Petri (Wis.), John Duncan (Tenn.) and John Mica (Fla.) all interested in the post.

On the Science Committee, the most likely contenders for the gavel are GOP Reps. Ralph Hall (Texas) and Vernon Ehlers (Mich.).

Hall previously served as ranking member on the Science panel before he switched parties in 2004. Ehlers recently became House Administration chairman but told the Grand Rapids Press in January, "I would not let this stand in the way of being chairman of the Science Committee."

To his colleagues, Boehlert is perhaps best known as a baseball fanatic whose district includes the baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown. He cited future Hall of Fame pitcher Roger Clemens in his farewell remarks Friday.

"When I reflect on these 24 years in Congress I, to use the language of the House in which I serve, identify with the words of the distinguished gentleman Roger Clemens who, when asked about retirement, said, '...when I shut it down, I'll be walking away with a smile on my face,'" Boehlert said. "There will be no regrets because I feel like I've done it the right way.'

"Those are my sentiments. I do feel like I've done it the right way."

Rep. Sabo Calls It A Career (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

Rep. Martin Sabo (D-Minn.) announced Saturday that he will retire at the end the 109th Congress instead of seeking a 15th term, as he previously said he would.

"It's time to move on," he said in a statement. "In my gut, I know the time is right."

The 68-year-old Congressman's announcement quickly set off a barrage of interest among potential candidates to succeed him in his heavily Democratic seat and on the Appropriations Committee.

Many Minnesota political observers believe that Sabo's chief of staff, Mike Erlandson, who surrendered the chairmanship of the state Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party last year, is the early frontrunner.

"It's a solid Democratic district so the question will be who will get the nomination and win the primary," said Jim Farrell, one-time spokesman to the late Sen. Paul Wellstone (D-Minn.). "I know Mike Erlandson is oft-talked about as a successor for that seat so I would think he would have the advantage."

Erlandson confirmed in an interview Friday evening that he hopes to succeed Sabo in the Minneapolis-based 5th district.

Other potential contenders, according to Minnesota Democratic sources, include: Peter McLauglin, who recently lost the Minneapolis mayoral contest; Sharon Sayles Belton, a former two-term Minneapolis mayor who lost to Mayor P.T. Rybak; state Sens. Scott Dibble and Satveer Chaudhury; state Rep. Keith Ellison; Minnesota House Minority Leader Margaret Anderson Kelliher; Julie Sabo, the Congressman's daughter and a former state Senator; Minneapolis City Council Majority Leader Scott Benson; and City Councilmembers Lisa Goodman and Gary Schiff.

Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer (D), a professor at the University of St. Thomas, opened a campaign office and was challenging Sabo at party precinct caucus, according to the Minneapolis Star-Tribune.

Republicans are not expected to seriously contest the 5th district, which gave Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) 71 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential election.

Minnesota and national Democrats said they were surprised and saddened by the news that the 44-year public servant was leaving elective office.

"For his nearly 30 years in Congress, Martin Sabo has provided expertise and insight on crucial issues from national security to economic security," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said in a statement. "In his tenure as the senior Democrat on the Homeland Security appropriations subcommittee, Congressman Sabo has worked tirelessly to strengthen the security of our nation. From Chairman of the Democratic Study Group to Chairman of the Budget Committee, he has always been a leader in our Caucus. His knowledge and commitment has earned him the respect and trust of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

DOJ_NMG_0018729

"He will be missed," Pelosi concluded.

For his part Sabo said in prepared remarks that he will continue to "fight for peace and for more responsible budget policies" during the remainder of his term, adding that he's "looking forward to having more time for other things."

Sabo, a ranking member on an Appropriations subcommittee, briefly led the Budget Committee, ascending to the chairmanship in 1993 but relinquishing the gavel in 1995 after Republicans won control of the House.

While chairman he helped pass the largest deficit-reduction package in history, which led to surpluses at the end of former President Bill Clinton's administration.

The son of Norwegian immigrants, Sabo was first elected to the Minnesota state House in 1960 at the age of 22. He served as Speaker from 1969 to 1973 and was sent to Congress in 1978.

A pet issue of Sabo's is economic disparity. With regularity he has unsuccessfully introduced an Income Equity Act, which puts a cap on the wages of corporate CEOs.

Sabo is an avid baseball fan and did not let his passion for the game lie while serving in Congress.

He has managed the Democrats in the Annual Roll Call Congressional Baseball Game for 20 years, and while his team has lost more than it has won, Sabo will head back to Minnesota with the coveted Roll Call trophy he won in 1994.

It's too soon to determine who will succeed Sabo as manager, although Erlandson, who worked the game for Sabo for many years, could be a contender for that job as well.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, March 20, 2006

SpongeBob on Brit Hume's Target List

The steady creep to the top for Brit Hume's nightly Special Report on Fox--not just the No.1 Washington-originated cable show but also the fourth in all basic cable at 6 p.m.--has the host eyeing the next victim. "We've been having a series of meetings here about how we can beat Nickelodeon," he says. "We just hope that they don't put SpongeBob SquarePants up against us." Fun aside, Hume's hourlong mix of news and debate now reaches 1.5 million nightly while dominating the key 25-to-54 age demographic. And it happened in a very un-Fox-like way: without fanfare, even though Hume has recently surged to the No. 2 spot among all cable news shows, after Bill O'Reilly.

When Special Report started in 1998, the goal was giving the growing Washington bureau some visibility. Now the top audience-getter of Washington shows, including CNN's Situation Room and MSNBC's Hardball, Hume says, "We kind of pinch ourselves." Like a good boss--Hume is the managing editor of the D.C. bureau--he credits his news team. But the "poisonous" mood in Washington doesn't hurt either. "For those who have a rooting interest in it," he says, "they want to hear about it."

While beating the pants off SpongeBob is a long-term goal, Hume has a more immediate worry: No. 12 ESPN's March Madness coverage. "If they've got games on at 6 at night," he frets, "that's gonna be tough."

California Condi Has a Nice Ring

She doesn't want to run the country, she says, but Condoleezza Rice is the hottest thing in politics right now. Pollster Frank Luntz did a straw poll at the recent California Republican convention. Guess who won? Stanford University's provost before joining the Bush administration, Rice was first with 29 percent, followed by Virginia Sen. George Allen at 26 percent and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani at 16 percent. What's it mean? With Rice on the 2008 ticket, even as veep, California could go Republican.

CIA to Bloggers: Honor the Oath

The CIA's Publications Review Board is sending out terse reminders to agency veterans reminding them of the rules requiring that any writings--even blogs--must first get agency approval. Among those getting the warning is outspoken blogger and ex-agency man Larry Johnson, who smells censorship. "It's very selective," says Johnson, who has been critical of the CIA's failure to defend outed ex-spook Valerie Plame. His note from CIA brass referenced his blogging. A CIA spokesman described the reminder as standard operating procedure. "Should anyone be surprised if CIA reminds people of the obligations they voluntarily assumed?" asks the agency in a statement. Exempted from the review list: radio and TV appearances--unless written notes are used.

New Hints That, Yep, Rudy's In

Republicans looking for some excitement in the lead-up to the 2008 presidential race are starting to chant Rudy, Rudy, Rudy. While Rudolph Giuliani, New York's 9/11 mayor and national hero, hasn't talked about running, there are hints he's ready.

DOJ_NMG_0018730

A key Republican senator tells us that Rudy's peeps are already at work in Florida. And we hear that he's making a trip to Iowa--home of the first 2008 presidential caucus--to help raise money for Republican gubernatorial candidate Rep. Jim Nussle.

Rummy's Really a Pressroom Junkie

Imagine this: You're the dean of the Pentagon press corps and planning a retirement party miles away at your wire service's downtown Washington HQ. You invite SecDef Donald Rumsfeld, known for snarling at the press, and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs. And they show up! That's exactly what happened at Reuters last week at reporter Charlie Aldinger's retirement party. And attendees say it wasn't just a quickie stop. Pace gave Aldinger, 68, a medal for his service to the country--22 years on the beat--and he and Rumsfeld stayed for over two hours, a rare tribute to a journalist. "I was deeply moved by it all," says Aldinger.

The Coyotes on Old Wolf's Tail

OK, so we know that Fox is king of cable news, largely at CNN's expense, but now it looks like Ted Turner's brainchild is under attack from the other side. Little MSNBC is making an advance during the key 6 p.m.-to-9 p.m. period, hounding Wolf Blitzer's Situation Room, Paula Zahn, and Lou Dobbs. "This is really big news," says MSNBC's Jeremy Gaines. First, let's be clear: CNN has more viewers. But, as they say in TV, only the "demo" matters, and in the key 25-to-54 demographic that ad rates are based on, MSNBC is nipping at CNN. Here, The Abrams Report has seen a 35 percent jump in just a year, though it still lags behind Dobbs. But Hardball With Chris Matthews, up 52 percent, edges Blitzer by 1,000 viewers in the demo, and Countdown With Keith Olbermann, up 39 percent, ties Zahn. MSNBC's Gaines credits "consistency" and good hosts for the trend. At CNN, they note that total viewers are still higher and say that any February pop was due to MSNBC's Olympic coverage. "People were tuning in to watch Bode Miller slip and slide down a ski slope," says spokeswoman Edie Emery, "and they got Chris Matthews instead."

A Snapshot of Presidential Power

White House photographers last week got a lesson in presidential authority. Already in place for a Bush visit to a New York seniors facility, the newsmen were asked by the master of ceremonies if they'd take pictures of the crowd before President Bush arrived. No one stepped forward. That is until Bush heard and called on Reuters photographer Larry Downing to get snapping. "Ask and ye shall receive," grinned Bush. "The president just sort of ambushed me," said Downing. Downing is something of a Bush fave. In Istanbul in 2004, Downing recalls taking a picture of NATO officials, then pausing to write down their names. From behind, a man asked, "Do you need any help with the names?" It was the prez.

An Empire State Headache For Republicans? (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, March 20, 2006

Looking for a sign of whether a big Democratic wave is developing? Try New York.

Once a state with genuine political competitiveness where liberal Republicans (including Thomas Dewey, Jacob Javits, Nelson Rockefeller and Ken Keating) prospered, the Empire State has veered toward the Democrats over the past few decades.

Yes, New York Republicans have now held the governorship for three consecutive terms, and they retain their longtime lock on the state Senate. But Democrats hold more than a 2-to-1 advantage in the state's Congressional delegation as well as both Senate seats and an unassailable majority in the state Assembly. And, of course, no Republican presidential nominee has carried the state since Ronald Reagan's re-election landslide of 1984.

This cycle, Democrats are making a major effort to flip a handful of Congressional districts in the state, and they hope that strong Democratic showings at the top of the ticket, combined with a favorable national environment, could net them a seat or two in Congress.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) will coast to an easy re-election victory, and state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer is expected to win the Democratic nomination for governor and crush his eventual GOP opponent in November. Democrats also hope to make gains in the state Senate.

By contrast, New York political observers say Republicans have a chance to swipe only a single statewide office — attorney general — and even there, Westchester County District Attorney Jeanine Pirro, once thought of as a rising star, is off to another unimpressive start. Her competitiveness in that race stems from the baggage of the two leading Democratic contenders for the office, former Housing and Urban Development Secretary Andrew Cuomo and former New York City Public Advocate Mark Green.

Overall, national Democrats believe that the combination of good candidate recruitment in New York and a favorable political environment has put seven New York House districts "in play" this cycle. But do they really have a chance in any of them?

DOJ_NMG_0018731

In many ways, the best Democratic opportunity is in the 20th district (Saratoga Springs to Lake Placid), currently represented by Rep. John Sweeney (R), a four-term Congressman who previously served as New York labor commissioner and executive director of the state party.

His opponent, attorney Kirsten Gillibrand, 39, has good political bloodlines and worked in the Clinton administration. Attractive and personable, Gillibrand raised an impressive $370,000 through the end of December.

Sweeney has been hospitalized with high blood pressure, and he has ruffled some feathers within his own party, including backing candidates in county party races who eventually lost. He also has strained relations with outgoing Gov. George Pataki (R).

Just based on the numbers, Democrats should have their best shot at GOP Rep. Jim Walsh. Unlike the other six districts Democrats are targeting in the state, Walsh's Syracuse-centered 25th district was carried by Democratic Sen. John Kerry (Mass.) in 2004, 50 percent to 48 percent.

From an incumbency point of view, two GOP-held seats look particularly inviting. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert's retirement creates an open seat in the 24th district (Utica/Rome), while first-term Rep. Randy Kuhl drew an unimpressive 51 percent in the 29th district against a weak opponent last time, making him an obvious target this time.

Elsewhere, Democrats think they have a shot against GOP Reps. Sue Kelly in the 19th district, Tom Reynolds in the 26th district and Vito Fossella in the 13th district.

Reynolds, as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, would be a particularly sweet trophy for Democrats, though his chairmanship gives him the means to fight back effectively against a strong challenge. Millionaire Jack Davis (D), who drew 44 percent against Reynolds last time, is running again.

As for Fossella's seat, Democrats hope that New York City Councilman Bill de Blasio will take him on.

Yet while this crop of Democratic opportunities is better than in the past, Democrats remain distinct underdogs in all of these seats.

State political observers argue that upstate voters turn out with clock-like consistency, and that any surge or decline in turnout is likely to occur downstate. And there are plenty of Bush Republicans in these Democratic-targeted districts. In 2004, Bush carried Sweeney's and Kelly's districts with 53 percent, Boehlert's with 52 percent, Kuhl's with 56 percent, and Reynolds' and Fossella's with 55 percent.

The numbers simply are against the Democrats in these districts. "There are too many cows, too many trees and too many Republicans" for Gillibrand to knock off Sweeney, one insider told me.

In Boehlert's district, Republicans are likely to nominate a popular GOP state Senator, probably Ray Meier, who actually looks to be stronger than Boehlert — who's repeatedly faced tough primaries with conservatives — would have been in November. And Walsh's likely opponent doesn't look strong enough to threaten the relatively popular Congressman.

While I found Kuhl's main challenger — retired naval officer and former Wesley Clark aide Eric Massa — to have an interesting background and potential appeal, I wasn't impressed that he ended December with just more than $87,000 in the bank.

The most recent buzz about a de Blasio challenge to Fossella ignores the fact that de Blasio is a Brooklyn-based politician who would have a difficult time in Fossella's district, which is dominated by Staten Island.

One last comfort for upstate Republicans is that state Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno will pour big money into GOP-held state Senate districts to try to retain the party's 35-27 majority — a factor that could help Republican efforts to retain the seven Congressional districts Democrats are targeting.

Still, despite all the challenges facing Democrats in the New York Congressional races, the contests are worth watching. Political waves can build bigger and faster than anyone expects, and that fact alone makes the Empire State worth paying attention to. Just don't lay down money on any of the Democrats just yet.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Bonnie And Clyde Budgeteers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Remember when Al Gore pledged to create a "lockbox" to protect Social Security trust fund surpluses from the annual Congressional spending raid? Well last week, while voting to raise the federal-debt ceiling to $8.96 trillion, Senators had a chance to terminate this notorious money-laundering scheme.

And guess what? Every Democrat in the Senate joined with eight Republicans to kill an amendment by GOP Senators Jim DeMint and Mike Crapo that would have stopped the Bonnie and Clyde budgeting. The vote was 53-46, and on the list of those voting to continue the Social Security raid is every potential 2008 Democratic Presidential aspirant in the Senate, including Hillary

DOJ_NMG_0018732

Clinton, John Kerry and Joe Biden. Worse, the list also includes Republicans Conrad Burns (Montana), Jim Talent (Missouri) and Gordon Smith (Oregon), who are running for re-election this year.

Apparently, these Senators want the money stored in a lock box, but only on the condition that they know how to pick the lock. The DeMint-Crapo proposal would deposit surplus payroll tax dollars in personalized bank accounts for each U.S. worker. This would in effect have created more than 100 million personalized lock boxes -- and as taxpayers' private property, well out of the reach of the politicians.

We're talking big dollars here. The payroll tax will collect some $80 billion more in taxes next year, and $436 billion more over the next five years, than Social Security will pay out to current retirees. Under today's law, Congress simply keeps that cash to spend itself. Under the DeMint-Crapo idea, the average young worker would be able to accumulate roughly $40,000 in tax-free wealth for retirement based on eight years of surplus tax payments and 30 years of interest.

And if you want to know why Members of Congress want to keep this annual spending raid going, all you have to do is look at the budget outline for Fiscal 2007 that this ostensibly Republican Senate passed last week. Gone was President Bush's proposal to reduce runaway entitlement spending by a modest $65 billion over five years. Gone, too, was the White House proposal to expand health-savings accounts, as a way to reduce the number of uninsured and reduce health-care costs. Making the 2003 tax cuts permanent? Not a chance.

Instead, the $2.8 trillion budget outline increased spending by $16 billion more than Mr. Bush requested. Some $7 billion of that was passed in an amendment by Senator Arlen Specter (R., Pa.), who has mastered the art of what are called "advanced appropriations," which means shifting spending items between fiscal years to evade even modest budget limits. "It's not sort of a gimmick. It is a gimmick," Mr. Specter was quoted in the Journal regarding this ruse. The vote on his amendment was 73-27, and a majority of Senate Republicans joined Democrats to pass it.

Mr. Bush can't veto a budget resolution, which is one more reason to reform the deliberately opaque budget process. And judging from last week's votes, Republicans aren't learning from their low approval ratings. They think the way out of trouble is simply to spend more money -- that is, to behave like Democrats. As long as they're behaving that way, conservative voters might well oblige them and sit home in November so next year we can get the real thing.

Katrina Lost & Found: Loyalty (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

Politicians in Washington know bad things happen when you neglect the unglamorous but essential task of providing personal service to constituents.

Take the recent example of New York international banker and lifelong conservative Jeffrey Volk . Volk once worked in the Nixon White House for speechwriter Patrick J. Buchanan . He help draft Ronald Reagan 's economic platform in 1980.

Over the years he's contributed to and raised money for Republicans. In 1998, Volk was one of those who urged George W. Bush to run for president. He attended Bush's second gubernatorial inauguration that year in Austin and contributed to both Bush presidential campaigns, the Florida recount and attended the first presidential inauguration.

Volk, who saw the second plane hit the World Trade Center and ran away from a collapsing tower, found himself in New Orleans in August with his wife and daughter, a freshman at Tulane University, when Hurricane Katrina hit.

Volk figured they could ride it out at a downtown hotel. His daughter had no ticket home, he said and, besides, "usually they blow in and out." Not this time.

The huge hurricane struck on Sunday, and it wasn't long before arsonists and looters were prowling the streets, the hotel across the street was being ransacked, there were no lights and fresh water was barely running. Volk called the White House for help.

"I was sent to voice mail," he said, where he was told he could "leave your comments." He called back and asked to speak with someone from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. More voice mail. His third try got him to FEMA in Alabama, which had its own concerns. "I called a half-dozen times . . . there was no one to talk to."

"I decided I would call my senator," Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), whom he'd never met, Volk said. "An aide in Clinton's Washington Senate office took the call and said I needed to call Dan Burton , a caseworker in New York. When I called, he knew to expect a call from me.

"He basically said: 'What would you want Senator Clinton to do?' I said, 'Call [Gov. George E.] Pataki and get the National Guard plane and send it down for the New Yorkers.' "

Burton could not get the plane, but "he called two or three times a day to make sure we were okay," Volk recalled.

DOJ_NMG_0018733

"I can't begin to tell you how much that meant to us in that hotel," he said. "The fact that anyone in government cared that we were there meant maybe there was a list somewhere, maybe we could get out. It was enough just that someone in government knew we were there."

Finally, on Wednesday, hotel employees put together a five-car caravan to move the guests to Baton Rouge.

Upon his return to New York, Volk said he called a White House aide who told him they were getting overwhelmed with people calling to complain. "I said I wasn't calling to complain but to try to figure out how I was supposed to get out."

"I also arranged to meet [Clinton] and to say thank you for Dan Burton," Volk said. They had a long chat, and while "she and I don't agree on a lot of things," he said, there was common ground on key issues such as the need for a balanced budget, strong armed forces and health care concerns. "We need to get an informed debate going," Volk said. "I am thoroughly unhappy with the direction of our government."

The Dec. 11 Clinton fundraiser that he co-hosted raised nearly $100,000 for her Senate campaign. Would he support her in 2008 if she runs for president? "I probably would," Volk said.

Remember, constituent service.Stealth Spokesman Under Pentagon Wraps

Reporters at the Pentagon are still hoping to meet, perchance to interview, J. Dorrance Smith , who's been assistant secretary for public affairs since Jan. 4. One reporter spotted Smith leaving his office, but he accelerated before a question could be asked. Another apparently bumped into him in the men's room. And another body-blocked him in a hallway and managed to chat for a few minutes.

Things may not change soon because the Pentagon has decided to adopt the White House model of a communications director and a spokesman, with Smith directing and press aide Eric Ruff doing the speaking and the briefings.Longtime Pentagon Reporter Wraps It Up

Speaking of the Pentagon, retired Air Force Gen. Richard B. Myers , who left his post as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in September, has joined the board of directors of aerospace giant Northrop Grumman Corp. Under ethics rules, he's not allowed to go near his old F-4 for two years.

Also across the river, Reuters reporter Charlie Aldinger , dean of the Pentagon press corps, retired last week after 22 years covering seven secretaries. Aldinger won a word of praise, on the record, from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld , who said Aldinger -- "even I have to admit, almost always gets it right -- or about right."

Mass. Loses Ground In Faith-based Funding (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, March 20, 2006

Massachusetts has seen its share of faith-based grant funding from the US government plunge by more than a third over the past three years, new federal figures show.

Religious groups in the state took in $19.6 million in federal grants under the program last year, down from $29.9 million in 2003, according to figures released this month by the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. Only Idaho had a steeper drop during that period.

The 34 percent reduction for Massachusetts from 2003 to 2005, which came as funding to faith-based groups nationwide increased, occurred largely during the tenure of Governor Mitt Romney, a Republican who has touted his ties in Washington, D.C., as a boon for Massachusetts. Romney has also stepped up his outreach to evangelical and Catholic voters as he prepares for a potential run for president.

Last June, Romney, acknowledging the state could do more to help religious charities win federal money for their social service programs, appointed his wife, Ann, to lead the effort. Ann Romney, who has worked for years with charitable causes, was appointed with three months left in federal fiscal year 2005, so the newly released figures don't reflect her involvement.

"The reason Governor Romney established the state's first-ever, faith-based liaison and appointed his wife, Ann, to this new position is because we felt we could do more to help faith organizations in Massachusetts get access to money that would allow them to do good works in the community," Romney's communications director, Eric Fehrnstrom, said in an e-mail. "Previously, that wasn't being done."

GLOBE GRAPHIC: Reaching out

In Massachusetts, federal faith-based money has gone to housing, youth mentoring, and anti-drug programs, among others. The biggest recipients have been elderly housing organizations and the Black Ministerial Alliance of Greater Boston.

Since her appointment, Ann Romney has been a "dynamo" in encouraging more Massachusetts groups to go after federal grants, said Jim Towey, director of Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. The payoffs from the state's new focus will be evident down the road, he said.

"I think the fruit of their strides will be clear in future years," Towey said.

DOJ_NMG_0018734

The decline in funding to Massachusetts has come as federal funding nationally to domestic faith-based programs has risen from $1.2 billion in 2003 to $1.6 billion in 2005, according to the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. The number of individual faith-based grants to the state has remained steady.

Massachusetts dropped from 13th place to 20th place overall during the three-year period. States in the West and Midwest saw the biggest increases, but every other New England state experienced a significant boost: Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont all saw their total grant funding more than double, while Connecticut saw a 69 percent increase. (The figures reflect federal fiscal years.)

Page 2 of 2 --The Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives has no role in allocating funding. It compiles information on some 23,000 grants made to faith-based groups from federal agencies such as the US Department of Housing and Urban Development and the US Department of Health and Human Services.

Federal officials caution that the awards list is meant only to be a snapshot, not a complete accounting of federal grant dollars to organizations with religious affiliations. Indeed, several past grant recipients in Massachusetts that are not on the government's list for 2005 say they should have been, because they did receive money that year.

Over the past three years, grants have gone to an array of organizations in Massachusetts. In 2005, for example, Catholic Social Services of Fall River received almost $300,000 for housing and abstinence-education programs, and Jewish Community Housing for the Elderly in Framingham received $7.9 million for senior housing.

The Black Ministerial Alliance of Greater Boston received a $1.4 million grant in 2005. The organization uses the money to help a host of community organizations set up and run their social service programs. The alliance, for example, worked with dozens of groups to create the High-Risk Youth Network, an initiative to expand services for youths and reduce violence among teens.

"From our experience, the program works," Harold Sparrow, executive director of the Black Ministerial Alliance, said of the faith-based initiative. "At a grass-roots level it's been effective and we've helped people."

GLOBE GRAPHIC: Reaching out

It's unclear exactly why Massachusetts didn't attract as much faith-based money in 2005 as it did in prior years. One explanation could be that the state received a few sizable, one-time grants in 2003. Towey also said that the competition for federal money has intensified, with many first-time applicants around the country making a pitch for funding.

"You can argue about how big the pot of money is or should be," Towey said. "[But] this is what happens in competitive grant programs . . . You're going to see the variances."

Towey was in Boston last June for a roundtable with religious and social service leaders, and he's coming back in May for a similar meeting and to tour a program that relies on federal grants.

Massachusetts is one of 32 states that has a faith-based liaison or office, but other states have had theirs up and running longer, helping to connect religious organizations with federal grant opportunities. Ohio created its faith-based office in 2003, Oklahoma established one in 2000, and Texas opened its office in 2004.

Sparrow said that concerns about the church-state separation and political opposition to the faith-based initiative are particularly strong in Massachusetts, which he said could cause some leaders here to be more reluctant to get involved than their counterparts in other states.

"In Massachusetts it's not politically correct to do that," Sparrow said. But US Representative Edward J. Markey said faith-based grants make up only a small fraction of all the federal money Massachusetts receives, which he said has remained steady over the past five years even as the state has lost population.

"Massachusetts is doing very well overall," Markey, a Democrat, said in a statement.

President Bush launched the faith-based initiative soon after taking office in 2001, saying he wanted to remove barriers that had prevented religious organizations from accessing federal funds.

The measure stalled in Congress, but Bush later ordered federal agencies to rewrite regulations to allow religious charities to compete for federal contracts.

Many religiously affiliated charities had been getting government money before, but the change has opened the door for many others.

Critics say the faith-based initiative is little more than a political strategy to help Republicans court voters around the country, particularly African-Americans and Hispanics in so-called swing states. Bob Wineburg, a professor of social work at the University of North Carolina-Greensboro and critic of the effort, said the Bush administration is simply interested in shoring up support among conservatives.

"This is about politics," Wineburg said. "This is not about effective social-services delivery."

Towey rejects suggestions that the money is distributed for political advantage.

"The issue is not about regions, it's not about religions," he said. "It's about results."

For Bridge Over Troubled Waters, a Boston organization that helps runaway and homeless youths, the federal money has produced results.

The organization uses a federal grant to fund a mobile health van, manned by volunteers, that goes out every night to Harvard Square, Dudley Square, the Park Street T station, and other areas of the city to develop relationships with youths and connect them with other services.

"That's what opens the door to having a conversation with these kids," said Carol Phillips, director of development and public relations for Bridge Over Troubled Waters.

Work Starts On Islamic High School (WP)

By Daniel De Vise

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

Construction has begun on a 20-acre campus near Annapolis that will house an Islamic high school, a television station, athletic facilities and eventually a college, according to project directors.

Mohammad Arafa, executive director of the Islamic Society of Annapolis, said the Mekkah Learning Center will be the first Islamic high school in the region. Work will progress on the $8 million project only as fast as donations permit; religious law forbids the society to take out a loan with interest.

The school will complement two established Islamic schools in the region, Al-Huda School in College Park and Al-Rahmah School in Baltimore, each serving a few hundred students up to the middle-school grades. Arafa said he has the support of 22 Muslim leaders across Maryland.

He envisions the campus as a means "to help our children to be Americans and Muslims without having to compromise their identity" and as a place where Muslims and non-Muslims can gather to bridge their differences.

He hopes there will not be a fight. Islamic schools and mosques have engendered fear and suspicion across the Washington region, both before and since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, whose creators purported to be acting in Allah's name.

Perhaps the most explosive case, which preceded the 2001 attacks, was a proposed $80 million complex for the Islamic Saudi Academy in Ashburn. Partly financed by the government of Saudi Arabia, the project thoroughly divided the community in 1998. Some residents said the school, given its backing, might pose a security risk.

Protest later subsided, but in 2004, academy officials decided not to pursue the project, according to Dave Kovalik, school spokesman. The academy serves 1,000 students in preschool through grade 12 at campuses in Burke and Alexandria. It is the only accredited Islamic high school program in the Washington-Baltimore region, Kovalik said. Some students travel from as far as Waldorf.

Arafa said the idea for the Mekkah school took root in the 2001 attacks and the resulting need for Muslims in Maryland to express the peaceful nature of their faith. A release for the new school states that "it is imperative that area Muslims get the message out as to the true peaceful nature of Islam."

He recalls fielding 106 telephone calls after Sept. 11; 104 were supportive, and two were not.

But when he learned last year that the Islamic Society's lease in a strip mall on Forest Drive would not be renewed because of parking concerns, Arafa found the search for a new home to be an exercise in rejection. Arafa said at least eight prospective landlords turned him away after learning the identity of the tenant. Mosques and Islamic schools nationwide have been victims of anti-Muslim vandalism and other hate crimes, as well as allegations that their facilities are harboring terrorists.

"They turn around, as soon as they find out who it is, and say, 'Sorry, we don't want you,' " said Martha Scott, a spokeswoman for the society, which offers prayer services for a congregation of about 250 families.

The nascent school garnered its first publicity early this month, in a write-up in the Annapolis newspaper. Afterward, neither the county nor the society received any complaints, officials said, an encouraging sign. Scott said the news coverage even improved the group's reception as a prospective tenant, with some landlords indicating that they wanted to reconsider the society's application. The society will maintain its headquarters at a separate location.

When Arafa first saw the Millersville property and learned that the asking price for the prospective campus was $550,000, he told the real estate agent that the society could never afford it: "First of all, we don't deal with interest. Second of all, we are broke. Third of all, we don't have assets."

Much to his surprise, the seller agreed to an interest-free installment plan. About two-thirds of the purchase price has been paid, he said.

Arafa cannot predict when classes will begin on the site, southwest of where Crain Highway meets Interstate 97. The next wave of fundraising will pay for grading work and a septic system. School organizers hope they can offer classes in fall.

DOJ_NMG_0018736

The first building will house a prayer hall, assembly rooms and space for two ninth-grade classes, one for boys and one for girls. Arafa hopes to add one grade each year, eventually serving 250 to 300 students. Plans call for 171,000 square feet of building space.

If all goes as planned, he said, the school will be a place "where you can give me the child at 3 years old and he can finish with a PhD."

Shama Farooq, civil rights director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations for Maryland and Virginia, said Arafa is probably correct in predicting that the school will draw students from the broader Baltimore-Washington region.

"Obviously, people are sending their children to Islamic middle schools, and they're trying to find Islamic high schools as well," she said. "I know of people who drive their children 30, 40 miles to private schools."

Hamas Presents Proposed Cabinet (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 20, 2006

Hamas presented a proposed government Sunday, giving itself key ministries after failing to persuade more moderate parties to join in a coalition that could have softened its hard-line image and prevented likely economic sanctions.

Incoming Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh presented Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas with a 24-member Cabinet made up of Hamas activists and professionals, including one woman and one Christian. Fellow Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar would be the new foreign minister.

Earlier Sunday, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators reached a tentative agreement on opening at least one crossing into Gaza to get aid into the Palestinian area. The agreement was reached at a meeting called by the United States to alleviate the humanitarian crisis in Gaza.

Hamas swept to victory in January 25 parliamentary elections, but despite nearly two months of negotiations, it was unable to persuade any other faction to join. Hamas was not prepared to compromise on its basic principles — the right to violent resistance against Israel and refusal to accept the Jewish state.

Failure to bring moderate forces into its government is likely to strengthen Western resolve to cut off desperately needed aid. The United States and European Union have threatened to cut off hundreds of millions of dollars of aid to the Palestinians if Hamas does not renounce violence, recognize Israel and promise to honor existing peace agreements.

Last week a World Bank report warned of economic disaster in Gaza if aid is cut off. Hamas has killed hundreds of Israelis in suicide bombings.

Abbas said he would submit the list to the Palestine Liberation Organization executive committee and then to the parliament if it approves. PLO approval is expected to take several days.

Haniyeh said he was optimistic his Cabinet would win approval. "I can say that the indications are positive toward constitutional stability on the Palestinian platform," he said.

The Cabinet list also includes Gaza Hamas leader Said Siam as interior minister, in charge of some of the security forces. Ten of the ministers would be from Gaza and 14 from the West Bank.

Abbas, who favors negotiating a final peace settlement with Israel, has urged Hamas to moderate its violent ideology but likely will approve the Cabinet, his aides said.

Abbas was elected separately last year to a four-year term and wields considerable authority. He cannot impose his own Cabinet lineup on Hamas, however, because it controls an absolute majority in the legislature.

With Palestinians facing severe shortages of bread, milk and other foods in Gaza, U.S. officials called an emergency meeting Sunday at the home of U.S. Ambassador Richard Jones and brokered a compromise with Israeli and Palestinian negotiators in a two-month-old border standoff.

Afterward, Jones told reporters, "We have agreed that the crossing from Kerem Shalom will open tomorrow for imports of food and other essential humanitarian products from Egypt," and details would be worked out Monday.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat, who took part in the Sunday meeting, said he hoped both Kerem Shalom and Karni would reopen Monday.

"I hope they will succeed in allowing goods to come into Gaza as of tomorrow to alleviate the dire humanitarian situation in Gaza," he told The Associated Press. He said Egyptian trucks were already lining up across from Kerem Shalom.

Israeli negotiator Amos Gilad said the Palestinians had to arrest militants before Karni could open. The vital cargo crossing between Israel and Gaza has been closed for most of the past two months, shutting off almost all exports and imports for the poverty-stricken seaside territory.

Palestinians charge Israel is punishing them for Hamas' election victory, but Israel insists it is keeping the crossing shut because of warnings of terror attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0018737

Under an agreement brokered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in November, Israel and the Palestinians agreed to boost cargo traffic through the crossing. The accord was meant to give momentum to peace efforts and economic recovery programs after Israel's summer pullout from Gaza.

The Karni deal was never implemented, and Israel has closed the crossing for long periods, citing security concerns.

Hamas Presents Cabinet To Palestinian President (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, March 20, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Hamas on Sunday presented a new Cabinet to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas that is dominated by veteran members of the militant Islamic group.

Hamas' month-long effort to recruit other factions into the government after winning parliamentary elections Jan. 25 failed.

Prime Minister-designate Ismail Haniyeh unveiled his lineup of 24 ministers after presenting the list to Abbas. Haniyeh told reporters in Gaza that Abbas "will study the names and the program of the Cabinet" before deciding whether to accept the new Palestinian government.

"The president will approve Hamas' list," chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said in a telephone interview. Erekat added that Abbas retains the constitutional power to fire a Hamas Cabinet if it rejects previously signed Palestinian agreements.

Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel, is on the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist organizations.

Asad Mubarak, Hamas' parliament leader, said in an interview that the group's armed resistance to Israel's occupation of the West Bank would continue until "it totally withdraws from our land." He added: "We've fought for 100 years and can resist for 20 more, if that's what it takes."

Haniyeh tapped Mahmoud Zahar, who survived an Israeli bombing of his home in 2003, as foreign minister. Said Siam will be interior minister in charge of Palestinian security services. Omar Abdel Razik, an economist at An-Najah National University in Nablus, will take over as finance minister. Haniyeh described his Cabinet, which will include a woman and a Christian, as full of "professionals, experts and technocrats," Reuters reported.

Erekat said it could take a week for the Cabinet and Hamas' political program to receive final approval from the parliament.

Since Hamas' electoral victory, the United States and the European Union have cut almost $1 billion in annual aid and monetary transfers to the Palestinian Authority, citing Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel and peace agreements.

Israel also has refused to transfer tax money to the new Palestinian government.

Mubarak said Hamas is raising funds in Iran and other Persian Gulf states to fill the Palestinian treasury's $1 billion shortfall. "Iran has promised to cover whatever the U.S. and the European Union do not give," he said. He conceded that no money has reached the Palestinian treasury so far.

An economic collapse could be insignificant when compared with the political fallout, said Iyad Barghouti, director of the Ramallah Center for Human Rights Studies. "For the first time since (the Palestinian Authority was established in 1994), there is no common ground at all between the Palestinians and Israelis," he said.

Suheil Tammuz, who owns a cellphone shop in Ramallah, voted for Hamas because he wanted "Fatah's reign of corruption to be over," he said, referring to Abbas' party. However, an isolated Hamas is bad for business and for the Palestinians, he said.

Tammuz had hoped for a national unity government. Without it, he worried that "foreign aid will end and people could go hungry." He said: "Spring has started, but the days ahead are dark."

Hamas Likely To Take Key Cabinet Posts (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, March 20, 2006

Hamas, the Islamist movement that won control of the Palestinian parliament in elections in January, has abandoned attempts to form a national unity government and was on Sunday night due to announce a cabinet in which it would hold the key posts.

A meeting was scheduled in the Gaza Strip between Ismail Haniya, Hamas's prime minister-designate, and Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian Authority president, who must approve the cabinet list before it goes forward to the 132-member parliament for confirmation.

With 74 seats in the assembly, Hamas was certain to have its nominees, many of them technocrats, accepted. However, people close to Mr Abbas said a vote might be deferred until after Israeli elections on March 28.

DOJ_NMG_0018738

Hamas's failure to persuade Mr Abbas's defeated Fatah party and other factions to join the government looked certain to worsen the international isolation of the PA. International aid donors have said they would not deal with a government run by a party regarded by the US and the European Union as a terrorist organisation.

Fatah and a number of small moderate parties decided against taking cabinet posts, although all denied they were responding to US pressure to stay out of government.

Hamas was left entirely on its own on Sunday when the leftwing secular Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) belatedly announced it would also decline portfolios.

Ahmed Sa'adat, the PFLP's leader and one of its three elected representatives, was seized by Israeli forces in last week's Jericho prison siege and transferred to Israel where he is wanted for the murder of an Israeli cabinet minister.

According to an unofficial cabinet list circulating in Gaza, Hamas parliamentarians will take the senior ministries in a 24-member government. Most portfolios would go to technocrats.

Mr Haniya would serve as prime minister, a post introduced in 2003 under international pressure by a reluctant Yassir Arafat, Mr Abbas's predecessor, to dilute the powers of the presidency.

The Hamas members were likely to include Mahmoud Zahar, a Gaza leader, as foreign minister, with Said Siyyam as interior minister in charge of at least some branches of the PA's 70,000-strong security forces.

Omar Abdel-Razeq, a Nablus university economics professor recently released from Israeli administrative detention, was expected to be named finance minister.

His tasks will include finding the resources to pay salaries for the security forces and a similar number of other public employees in the face of a threatened international funding boycott. Public sector salaries support about a quarter of the 3.5m people of Gaza and the West Bank.

Mr Abbas was expected to approve the cabinet despite Hamas's refusal to commit itself to all agreements with Israel previously entered into by the Fatah-dominated PA

Key Hamas Cabinet Posts Go To Hard-liners (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, March 20, 2006

JERUSALEM - Hamas introduced a cabinet Sunday that creates a hard-line Palestinian government - lacking moderate forces and led by some of the Islamic organization's most militant actors. It's a signal, say analysts, that the Palestinian leadership appears willing to forgo much of the funding it has been receiving from Western nations.

The crucial diplomatic position of foreign minister, for example, went to Mahmoud Zahar, who is adamantly opposed to any softening of Hamas's position that Israel should be destroyed. Dr. Zahar is known for his fiery rhetoric and vocal support for the organization's use of suicide bombings.

"The international community has to respect the choice of the Palestinian people," says Ahmed Abdel-Aziz Mubarek, a newly elected Hamas legislator from Ramallah. "The majority of the Palestinian people gave their votes to Hamas to establish the new government, so the world has to deal with this reality."

The world's response, however, is an increasingly complicated matter. Countries that have in the past been actively engaged in the now-dormant peace process and in giving aid to the Palestinian Authority (PA) are facing a difficult choice: how to withhold political support for Hamas without turning off humanitarian aid, especially at a time of increased instability. It is not clear how much of the estimated $1 billion a year the Palestinians get in foreign aid might be withheld. Hamas has vowed to replace it with funds from Iran and other Muslim states.

Russia and Turkey, a moderate Muslim country, recently hosted Hamas delegations in the wake of the January election landslide. But Israel, the US, and the European Union have shunned any political contacts with Hamas unless it meets several criteria outlined by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan in January: recognize Israel, respect previously signed peace accords, and forswear violence.

Zahar, a physician, has risen to become one of the organization's most senior members, particularly since several others in the uppermost echelons of the Islamic organization were assassinated by Israel over the past few years. Zahar, too, has been the target of at least two Israeli attempts to kill him, making it unlikely, say analysts, that he or his Israeli counterparts will soon sit at the same negotiating table.

While Zahar is viewed as unbending in his beliefs, says Mr. Mubarek, that does not mean that he will define the entire outlook of the PA.

"The policy of the government will not be swayed by one member of the government only," says Mubarek. "That Mahmoud Zahar will be foreign minister will not make too much of a difference in how we approach things, because the government has its policy, and all the members will have to work according to this policy. We will ask the international community to force Israel to give the Palestinian people their rights."

DOJ_NMG_0018739

In a government platform released this weekend, Hamas outlined what it believes those rights to be: the right of return for all Palestinian refugees to their land, a release of Palestinian prisoners, and an end to the Israeli occupation. The document, as translated by Reuters, says if Israel withdraws from the land it occupied in 1967, including East Jerusalem, "it will be possible to look into a mechanism of negotiation."

But Zahar, expressing a more rigid view of the conflict, has long said that all of historical Palestine is holy to Islam and must be liberated. He says that altering Hamas's charter, which calls for the Jewish state's destruction, is out of the question; Israel has said it won't deal with Hamas under the current charter.

From Israel's point of view, Zahar as foreign minister - a post that had never officially been filled in the past - is simply a symbol of what Israel faces with Hamas at the helm.

"The problem is not with the particular personalities in the cabinet: the problem is that it is a Hamas cabinet," says Israeli foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev. "Zahar is particularly outrageous in what he says, but he's more honest than some of the other ones." Without moderating their viewpoint, he predicts, the new cabinet may lead to a situation where the PA will become a pariah government.

Several other senior figures in Hamas named to the Cabinet are considered to be relatively moderate. These include Said Siyam, who was tapped to be interior minister, and Omar Abdel Razeq, who would serve as finance minister. About half of the seats in the 24-member cabinet go to Hamas members, while other ministries were expected to be given to independent lawmakers of professionals with technical experience.

Western officials initially hoped that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of the heretofore ruling Fatah faction - whose leaders reached a historic peace deal with Israel in 1993 - could act as a go-between, bridging the gap between Hamas and Israel.

Mr. Abbas, who was directly elected more than a year ago following the death of long-reining PLO leader Yasser Arafat, technically holds presidential powers that enable him to override legislative branch decisions by vetoing them. But Abbas is in an increasingly weak position following Israel's raid last week on a prison in the West Bank city of Jericho, which embarrassed Abbas and only underscored his political ineffectiveness.

"Today I will meet [Prime Minister] Ismail Haniyeh and we will see the [formation] of the cabinet. After that the legal procedures will take place such as going to [parliament] and the swearing in," Abbas told a news conference Sunday at the Rafah terminal on the Egyptian border.

· Material from Reuters was used in this report.

Hamas, Failing To Find Partners, Proposes Cabinet (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 19 — Hamas delivered its proposed cabinet list to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, on Sunday night. Hamas is expected to control the most important government ministries after weeks of negotiations failed to persuade other Palestinian parties to join its government.

Ismail Haniya, the Hamas leader and prime minister-designate, presented the lineup to Mr. Abbas at a meeting in Gaza City. Pressed by reporters, Mr. Abbas declined to say whether he would give his approval, though aides said he was likely to do so. He said he would convene the Palestinian legislature, in which the militant Islamic Hamas has an absolute majority, for a vote of confidence on the cabinet.

"I pray to God to help us," Mr. Abbas said. "The task is not easy, neither for us nor for the new government."

He added: "There are great difficulties and many obstacles ahead. But with determination and the support of our people, things will move ahead."

Mr. Haniya declined to make public the names of the proposed ministers in the 24-member cabinet, though he said it would include "professionals, experts and technocrats," in addition to Hamas members. However, Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement and all other Palestinian parties rejected Hamas's invitation to join a government of national unity. Negotiations between Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a small, militant faction, continued until the last moment, but the group opted out.

In remarks to reporters, Mr. Haniya did say that two prominent Hamas leaders — Dr. Mahmoud Zahar and Said Siam — would be in the cabinet, though he did not give their positions. However, Dr. Zahar, more confrontational in his public comments than Mr. Haniya, is expected to become foreign minister, and Mr. Siam is believed to be the choice for interior minister, which would give him authority over the police and other branches of the security forces.

DOJ_NMG_0018740

Since Hamas won the Palestinian parliamentary elections on Jan. 25, Mr. Haniya and other Hamas leaders have held a number of seemingly cordial meetings with Mr. Abbas. However, the relationship could become much more complicated once Hamas formally assumes power.

